'If a modern corrector,' he adds, 'has been at work, he has apparently been so very busy, as to leave but little or none of the original. His file has worn what it polished. If the poetry before us could have been only corrected or interpolated by parts, I believe there will be no difficulty in drawing the line of distinction between the respective property of Rowley and Chatterton; for such corrections and interpolations appear to consist, not only in words and hemistichs, but in a suite of stanzas, in pages of considerable length, and such as have been the favourite of the public, and have been distinguished for their poetical beauties.'

There appears in these poems none of that learning which peculiarly marked all the compositions of the 15th century. Our old poets are perpetually confounding Gothic and Classical allusions, knight-errantry and ancient history, sculpture and romance, religion and chivalry. Ovid and Saint Austin are sometimes cited in the same line. A studious ecclesiastic of that period would give us a variety of useless authorities from Aristotle, from Boethius, and from the fathers; and the whole would have been interspersed with allusions to the old romances: the round table, with Sir Launcelot, and Sir Tristram, and Charlemagne, would have been constantly cited. Poems from such an author would have occasionally exhibited prolix devotional episodes, mingled with texts of scripture, and address to the saints and Blessed Virgin, instead of apostrophes to such allegorical divinities, as Truth, and Content, and others of Pagan original.

The metre of the old English poetry is totally different from that of Rowley. The stanza in which the majority of these poems are written, consists of ten lines, the two first quatrains of which rhyme alternately, and it closes with an Alexandrine, no example of which occurs in Chaucer, Lydgate, or Gower. Spenser extended the octava rima of Chaucer to nine lines, closing with an Alexandrine, to which Prior added a tenth. This last, of which examples have been multiplied, was Chatterton's model. Mr. Warton observes, that the unvaried and habitual exactness of the modulation of the final Alexandrine, in the poems of Rowley, excludes their claim to antiquity. 'Had the supposed Rowley,' he adds, 'written Alexandrines, he would have exceeded Spenser, and equalled Dryden, in the music of versification.'

Notwithstanding the affectation of ancient language, the tinsel of modern phraseology may, in too many instances, be detected. Such phrases as puerilitie; before his optica; blameless tongue; the authoure of the piece; vessel wreckt upon the tragic sand; proto-sleyn; &c. could not be the language of the fifteenth century. We find also a number of modern formularies and combinations, 'systers in sorrow;' 'Ah, what availde,' 'Oh, thou, whate'er thie name,' &c. with a number of compound epithets, such as, 'guile-depynted; nome-depynted; blodde-steyned; swift-berved; gore-red; super-hallie, &c. and other terms of expression and allusions evidently modern.

To these may be added some anachroisms, such as the art of knitting stockings, alluded to in the tragedy of Ælla, which was utterly unknown in the reign of Edward IV, and a great variety of particular and appropriate imitations of modern poets. Such coincidences as the following are so palpable, that it seems to be out of the power of prejudice itself to evade the inference which arises from them.

O forr a spryte al feere! Ælla.

Of the forms of composition adopted by the supposed Rowley, such as Odes, Eclogues, Discoursing tragedies, &c. not one example could be found in England in the fifteenth century. Plays, if any existed, were nothing more than a ballad, or solitary recital, without plot or dialogue, and incapable of representation.

The similarity of manner, language, versification, &c. in the poems said to have been written by Canynge, Sir Thybbot Gorges, John Iscam, and John, Abbot of St. Augustine, who is said to have died in 1215, is an objection to their authenticity. If Rowley possessed a talent of writing melodiously, unknown to his contemporaries, it is not easy to conceive how he could communicate to his friends the same miraculous endowment. All Rowley's friends write like his spirit; their lines are equally harmonious, and the versification has the same suspicious cast of modern manufacture. Sir Thybbot Gorges sings with the ease and airiness of a poet, who has only antiquity in the spelling of his name.

As ever clove pyne or the baskette, &c.

Dynge Maistre Canynge is a poet so much like the gode priest, that Dr. Milles, like a true commentator, supposes that 'Rowley might give his friend and patron the credit of the performance.' The same pen undoubtedly produced what is called Canynge's, &c. as well as what is called Rowley's—but that pen was Chatterton's.

Such is the conclusion which the present writer has formed, from an examination of the arguments on both sides of this curious literary question. He hesitates not to declare, that his opinion of the authenticity of the poems is on the side of those who support the title of Chatterton. Mr. Warton and Mr. Tyrwhitt have convicted them of being spurious, by technical criterions. He esteemed it, therefore, a part of his duty to arrange them with the compositions of a modern era. But, though he cannot entertain a doubt but that they were written by Chatterton, yet he means not to dictate to others. He has expressed his dissent from the opinion of those who defend their authenticity, without being influenced by the authority of names. He has stated his observations as they rose in his mind, from a consideration of the facts, without being influenced by the force of names. He has expressed his feelings as they came to his who, though he respects the study of antiquities, dislikes the blind prejudices of the mere antiquary. It was impossible for him to peruse a statue of this controversy, without smiling at the delusion and gravity of those learned gentlemen, who have all their lives dealt in uncouth lore, and not in our classic authors, nor have perceived that taste had not developed itself in the reign of Edward IV. The question, in his opinion, is as much a matter of taste as it is of learning, and is more to be decided by internal evidence, than by external facts. The man of taste, who has a moderate at least, if not a critical knowledge of the compositions of our poets from Chaucer to Pope, feels every argument on this head to be decisive, by an emotion which is superior to all laboured reasonings, but which, nevertheless, every reason and every examination, still more strongly serve to support. It is the taste in the poems of the supposed Rowley that will forever exclude them from belonging to the period in which, it is said, they were written. Superiority of genius could not possibly have produced any thing so perfect and refined, in language, structure, and sentiment, as those poems, by any native effort of its own, unassisted by preceding improvements, and independent of all models; for poetry, like other branches of literature and science, has its gradual accessions, is influenced by the condition of society, assumes accidental and arbitrary forms, and is subject to new and peculiar modifications.

It is not, says Dr. Warton, from the complexion of ink or of parchment, from the information of contemporaries, the tales of relations, the recollection of apprentices, and the prejudices of friends, nor even from Domesday Book, pedigrees in the heralds office, armorial bearings, parliamentary rolls, indentures, episcopal registers, epitaphs, tomb-stones, and brass plates, that this controversy is to be finally and effectually adjusted. Our argument should be drawn from principles of taste, from analogical experiments, from a familiarity with ancient poetry, and from the gradations of composition. Such a proof, excluding all imposition, liable to no deception, and proceeding upon abstracted truth, will be the surest demonstration. A man, furnished with a just portion of critical discernment, and in the meantime totally unacquainted with the history of these poems, is sufficiently, perhaps more properly, qualified to judge of their authenticity. To such a person, unprepared and unprejudiced as he is by any previous intelligence, and a stranger to facts, let the poems be shown. I can easily conceive to which side of the question he will incline. Nor will he afterwards suffer his opinion to be influenced by reports. External arguments, such at least as have hitherto appeared, may be useful, but they are not necessary. They will hang out lights sometimes false, and frequently feeble. In the present case, external arguments have seldom served to any other purpose than to embarrass our reasoning, to mislead the inquisitive, and to amuse the ignorant.

At the shrine of Chatterton some grateful incense has been offered by the most elegant and pathetic poets of our nation. Mr. Pye, the present poet laureat, thus speaks of Chatterton, in his elegant and classical poem on the Progress of Refinement.

Yet as with streaming eye the sorrowing muse
Pale Chatterton's untimely urn bedews,
Her accents shall arraign the partial care
That shielded not her son from cold despair.

Mr. Preston, an elegant poet of a neighbouring kingdom, has distinguished Chatterton among the 'martyrs of the lyre,' in his pathetic 'Epistle to a Young Gentleman, on his having addicted himself to the Study of Poetry.'

Behold yon shade! he bears an antique roll,
With many a scutcheon clad and many a scroll!
'Tis he, the wond'rous youth of Bristowe's plain,
Who pour'd in Rowley's garb his solemn strain;
A stripling scarcely, and yet more than man;
His race was ended ere it well began.
Th' indignant spirit tower'd o'er little men;
He look'd thro' nature with an angel's ken,
And scorn'd, with conscious pride, this petty stage,
The tardy homage of a thankless age.
The furies wrung his agonizing soul,
And desperation mix'd the Stygian bowl.

The following lines in Mr. Hayley's excellent 'Essay on Epic Poetry,' are uncommonly animated and poetical.

If changing time suggest the pleasing hope
That bards no more with adverse fortune cope;
That in this alter'd clime, where arts increase,
And make our polish'd isle a second Greece;
That now, if poesy proclaims her son,
And challenges the wreaths by fancy won;
Both fame and wealth adopt him as their heir,
And liberal grandeur makes his life her care;
From such vain thoughts thy erring mind defend,
And look on Chatterton's disastrous end.
Oh, ill-starr'd youth, whom nature form'd in vain,
With powers on Pindus' splendid height to reign!
O dread example of what pangs await
Young genius struggling with malignant fate!
What could the muse, who fir'd thy infant frame
With the rich promise of poetic fame;
Who taught thy hand its magic art to hide,
And mock the insolence of critic pride;
What could her unavailing cares oppose,
To save her darling from his desperate foes;
From pressing want's calamitous controul,
And pride, he fever of the ardent soul;
Ah, see, too conscious of her failing power,
She quits her nursing in his deathful hour!
In a chill room, within whose wretched wall
No cheering voice replies to misery's call;
Near a vile bed, too crazy to sustain
Misfortune's wasted limbs, convuls'd with pain,
On the bare floor, with heaven-directed eyes,
The hapless youth in speechless horror lies!
The poisonous vial, by distraction drain'd,
Rolls from his hand, in wild contortion strain'd;
Pale with life-wasting pangs, its dire effect,
And stung to madness by the world's neglect,
He, in the presence of the dangerous art,
Once the dear idol of his glowing heart,
Tears from his harp the vain detested wires,
And in the frenzy of despair expires!

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The attention of the public has lately been much excited, by the impressment of some British seamen, by order of the captain of the Cambrian frigate, on board the British letter of marque Pitt, as is alleged, within the jurisdiction of New-York. The lively sensibility which has been displayed by our citizens, in regard to a supposed infraction of neutral rights, is highly honourable to them. Fortunate would it be for the honour and the interests of our country, if a portion of the same sensibility could be infused into those who administer it. What wrongs, what insults have we suffered, because our government had not a spirit to resent and redress them! How has our flag been degraded, our citizens insulted, and their best rights disregarded and violated, because our government had not the courage, or was afraid of the expense of defence and protection! Hence the destruction of the navy, which had been created and nurtured, and was growing up to an honourable and useful utility, under our former rulers: hence too, as a consequence of this, the destruction and loss of one of our most valuable frigates, and, what to every man of feeling is ten thousand times worse, the slavery of hundreds of our brave tars, who are pining in chains and wretchedness which they had never known but for the permy saving wisdom of our very economical rulers: hence too the heavy expense of ransoming these brave and unfortunate men, unless indeed our government (which is not unlikely) may think their ransom too expensive, and leave them the alternative of lingering out their tedious lives in exile and wretchedness, or of ending their misery by self destruction. Hence too our tame and humiliating submission to the shutting of the port of New-Orleans, contrary to our natural rights, and to treaty; and our encumbering ourselves since, in order peaceably to regain this natural and admitted right, with an enormous increase of our national debt, and an increase of territory, which will ere long dis sever these states, and involve us in civil war and bloodshed. All these, and a thousand other evils, have flowed from the economy and the cowardice of our government; and now we are exposed to the insults and the injuries of the smallest armed vessel that may visit our sea-ports. Our ships of war, except the few that are on distant service, are sold, or rotting in the philosophical worm dock at Washington. Our forts and arsenals are tumbling into decay and ruin; our military is reduced to a handful of soldiers, scarcely sufficient for the defence of any single post in the territory. All this proceeds from the economical and pacific foibles of the hero of Carter's mountain. 'Tis thus the coward avoids personal danger by throwing away his sword. He knows that the brave man will not attack him with weapons unarmed, and he seeks safety by suffering himself to be kicked and cuffed, and licking the feet of his enemy. Shame, shame, to the American name! The spirit of WASHINGTON blushes at our pusillanimity!—But it is not the fault of the people; they have as much spirit and as much courage as the nation from whom they have descended.—It is the government that is in fault. Instead of being foremost to redress our wrongs, and protect our rights, our government is the last to do either. Hence they go unredressed and unprotected, and the people are left to the vain and unprofitable task of intemperate abuse and resentment, which may some day or other hurry us into a situation very different from our wishes. It is our wish that the government should, in all instances, by manly actions, as well as firm resolutions, repel the aggressions of all nations, without favour or partiality, and to whatever consequences it may tend. Such is the policy, and such the interest of our government.

With respect to the right of the British to transfer her seamen, within the jurisdiction of a neutral country, from one of her armed ships to another, and that without compromising the peace or disturbing the tranquillity of the neutral, we think much may be said in favour of it. Nations in amity uniformly aid and assist each other, in subjecting their mariners to the laws and regulations of their respective governments. Offences committed on board of the ships of one government, within the jurisdiction of another, and not involving an actual breach of the peace, but relating to the good order and discipline of the ship, are always, at least by comity, if not by the law of nations, reserved for punishment in the country to which the offender belongs. Our courts of admiralty will not interfere in a contract between a foreign captain and his seamen, but uniformly lend the aid of their process to compel the seaman to remain with the foreign ship, and to seek redress, if he has been injured, from the nation to which he belongs. The same of foreign vessels in our ports are uniformly delivered up to their commanders to be dealt with according to the laws of their own nation. In the year 1793, the government of New-York aided and assisted the French minister in endeavouring to apprehend Galbaud, Tanguy, and others, in order to their being forcibly carried on board their ships, whence they had deserted, to be subjected to the laws of France. If then we recognize the laws of a foreign government, within our own jurisdiction, in some cases, it would be difficult to shew why the commander of the Cambrian frigate had not the right, which he contended for, of impressing British seamen on board a British letter of marque, which is warranted by the laws of England, and transferring them to a public armed vessel, where their services were wanting? This is not levying troops in a neutral country, nor increasing the force of the belligerent: it is merely a new disposition of that force; and as well might the change of a helmsman or boatswain on board the ship of a belligerent, in a neutral port, be objected to.

We say nothing, as to the alleged obstruction of the execution of the health law of New-York, nor, if such obstruction was effected, shall we pretend to justify it. It is to be remembered that we speak only of cases where the peace of neutral citizens is not disturbed, for whenever that shall happen, it is the duty as well as the right of the neutral to interfere, and to enforce its laws for the preservation of peace and order.

We hope that our citizens will not be led into intemperate conduct or remarks on this subject. It is a matter for the government to settle, and we could wish, (but we dare not hope), that the American government will take it into consideration, if necessary enter into a fair discussion of it, and, if we have been insulted, and our rights infringed, demand suitable reparation. And we may depend upon the justice and the magnanimity of the British government that she will enter into the discussion with us with temperance and dignity, and if we have been wronged, will do all that one independent and friendly nation can require of another, under such circumstances.

MISCELLANY.

[The following apologue, from the French of Voltaire, was translated, at the request of the Editor, by a friend and a scholar, who has rendered it in a style more elegant and faithful to the spirit of the original than any version we have seen of European origin. This article is an ingenious satire upon the vaunts of philosophy, and presents a striking picture of the magnificent promises and despicable performance of that inconsistent animal, man. From the story we have rescinded one sentence, in which the ignorance, flippancy, and irreligion of the author appear in the form of a paltry joke against the received opinions of the Christian world on the subject of angelic nature.]

MEMNON OR HUMAN WISDOM.

Memnon conceived one day, the chimerical project of being perfectly wise. There are few men, who have not sometimes cherished a similar delusion.—Memnon said to himself, to be truly wise and consequently perfectly happy, it is only necessary to subdue the passions; than which nothing is more easy. In the first place, I will never love the sex; for at the sight of a perfect beauty, I will say to myself; those cheeks, will be one day furrowed by age; those beautiful eyes will be bordered with red; that round and prominent bosom will become flat and pendant; that beautiful head will be stripped of its golden tresses. Thus shall I have always present to my imagination, that now beautiful form ravished by the ruthless hand of time of all its graces, and perfections; and surely I shall be then fortified against its fascination.

In the second place, I will be always sober: I may be tempted by a sumptuous entertainment, by delicious wines, by the seduction of company: but I shall represent to myself the consequences of excess, a heavy head, a stomach surcharged, the loss of reason, of health and of time, I will then eat only to preserve life; my health will be always equal, my ideas pure and luminous. All this is so easy, that there is no merit in its performance.

Afterwards, said Memnon, it is necessary to devote some attention to my fortune; my desires are moderate; my property is securely lodged with the receiver general of the Finances of Nineveh. I have an ample sufficiency to live in independence: That is the greatest of blessings. I shall never be subjected to the cruel necessity of making my court: I shall envy no one, nor will any envy me. This also is perfectly easy. I have friends, continued he, I shall preserve them, because they can have no cause of contention with me. I shall never be at variance with them, nor they with me. In that there is no difficulty.

Having thus formed his little plan of wisdom in his chamber, Memnon looked from the window; He saw two women walking in the shade of the Palm Trees, near his house. One was ugly and thoughtless, the other was young, handsome, and appeared to be greatly distressed. She sighed, the tears flowed down her beautiful cheeks, and rendered her more graceful. Our sage was moved, not by the beauty of the Lady, (he disdained such weakness) but by the affliction which she suffered. He came down, and approached the young Ninevite with the intention of consoling her with wisdom. This beautiful person recounted to him with the most pathetic naivete, all the injuries which she suffered from a pretended uncle, the artifices by which he had deprived her of a fortune which she had never possessed and all that she had to dread from his violence. You appear to me so excellent a counsellor, said she that would you condescend to come home with me and examine my affairs, I am confident you could extricate me from the cruel embarrassment in which I am involved. Memnon hesitated not to follow her, for the purpose of sagely examining her affairs, and of giving her good advice.

The afflicted lady conducted him into a perfumed chamber, and placed him near her on a sofa, on which they sat opposite to each other with their legs crossed. The lady spoke with downcast eyes, from which tears sometimes escaped, and which when raised always met those of Memnon. Her conversation was always full of tenderness, which redoubled whenever they looked upon each other. Memnon took the greatest interest in her affairs, and felt the strongest desire to oblige a person so well bred and so unfortunate. During the heat of conversation, they insensibly changed their positions. Their legs were no longer crossed. Memnon in counselling her approached so near, and gave her advice so full of tenderness, that neither of them could any longer converse on business.

Thus were they situated when the uncle arrived; he was armed from head to foot, and threatened his niece and the sage Memnon with instant death: the latter who escaped from him well knew that a large sum would purchase pardon. Memnon was obliged to give all he had. A man was fortunate in those times to escape at so cheap a rate; America was not then discovered, and afflicted ladies were far less dangerous than now.

Memnon ashamed and in despair returned to his house. He there found a billet of invitation to dinner with some of his intimate friends. If I remain at home, said he, my unfortunate adventure will engross my thoughts, I shall not eat, and sleepless will ensue; it is better to enjoy a frugal-repast with my intimate friends. In the charms of their society, I shall forget the follies of the morning. He goes to the rendezvous; his dejection is apparent. His friends force him to drink to dissipate his melancholy. The moderate use of wine is a remedy for the diseases of mind and body.—Thus does the sage Memnon think, and he becomes intoxicated. After the repast, play is proposed. A moderate game with friends is a polite amusement. He plays; they win from him all the money in his purse, and four times as much on his word. A dispute arises relative to the game; one of his intimate friends throws a dice-box at his head, and deprives him of an eye. The sage Memnon is carried home in a state of intoxication, without money and with but one eye.

He throws himself on his couch; and as soon as the fumes of the wine he had imbibed are dissipated, he sends his valet to procure some money from the Receiver General of the Finances of Nineveh, to pay his intimate friends: he is informed that his debtor had that morning committed a fraudulent act of bankruptcy which reduced an hundred families to beggary. Memnon transported with rage, goes to court with a plaister on his eye and a petition in his hand, to demand of the King, justice against the bankrupt. In the salloon he meets several ladies, who with an air of ease wore hoops of the circumference of twenty four feet. One of them, who was slightly acquainted with him, looking askance at him, cried, ah the horrid creature! Another more intimately acquainted with him, said; good evening, Mr. Memnon; in truth, Mr. Memnon, I am extremely happy to see you; à propos, Mr. Memnon, why have you lost an eye? And she passed without waiting his answer. Memnon concealed himself in a corner, and waited for an opportunity of throwing himself at the feet of the Monarch. That opportunity presented itself. Thrice he kissed the earth, and presented his petition. His gracious Majesty received him very favorably, and gave the petition to one of his eunuchs; that he might communicate to him its contents. The satrap draws Memnon aside, and with an air of hauteur and smile of contempt, thus addressed him: Are you not a ridiculous blind man, to appeal to the King in preference to me; and still more ridiculous, to dare to ask justice against an honest bankrupt, whom I honor with my protection and who is the nephew of one of my mistresses's chamber maids! Abandon this pursuit, my good friend, if you have a wish to preserve your remaining eye.

Memnon having thus in the morning renounced the sex, intemperance, gaming, quarrels, and above all the court, had before the close of the day, been deceived and robbed by a beautiful lady, had been intoxicated, had gambled, quarrelled, lost an eye, and had been at court an object of contempt and ridicule.

Petrified with astonishment, and oppressed with grief, he returns to his mansion. He wishes to enter, but he finds bailiffs, employed by his creditors, in the act of plundering his house of its furniture. He throws himself almost lifeless under a palm tree; he then meets the beautiful lady whom he had seen in the morning, walking with her dear uncle; discovering Memnon with a plaister on his eye, she burst into a violent fit of laughter. Night came; Memnon reclined on a bed of straw near the walls of his house. He was attacked by a violent fever; during its action upon his exhausted frame, he slept, and a celestial spirit appeared to him in a dream.

Who art thou? cried Memnon. Thy good Genius, replied the other. Restore me then my eyes, health, my fortune, my wisdom, said Memnon. He then recounted the misfortunes, which had in a day deprived him of all these.

Those are adventures, said the spirit, which never happen to us in the world, which we inhabit: And what world do you inhabit? said the afflicted man. My country, said the spirit, is five hundred millions of leagues from the Sun in a little Star near Sirius, which thou seest from here.—The delightful country! said Memnon: what you have there no base woman who deceive a poor man, no intimate friend, who wins his money and put out his eye, no Bankrupts, no Satraps, who while denying you justice sneer at you? No, said the inhabitant of the Star, nothing of that kind. We are never deceived by women, because we have none; we are not intemperate, because we eat not; we have no bankrupts, because with us, there is neither gold nor silver; it is impossible to put out our eyes, because we have not bodies fashioned like yours; and Satraps never do us injustice, because in our little star there is perfect equality.

Memnon then said; my lord without women and without dinner, how do you pass your time? In watching said the genius, over the other globes, which are confided to your care; and I come to console you. Alas! said Memnon, why did you not come last night, to prevent me from committing so many follies? I was with thy eldest brother Hassan, said the celestial being. He is more to be pitied than thou.—His gracious Majesty the king of the Indies, at whose court he had the honour to be, ordered both his eyes to be put out for a trifling indiscretion, and he is now in a dungeon loaded hands and feet with chains. It is worth while, said Memnon to have a good genius in a family! One brother has lost an eye, the other is deprived of both, one is on a bed of straw, the other in prison! Thy lot, replied the spirit, will change. It is true that thou shalt always be deprived of one eye, but with that exception, thou shalt always be sufficiently happy, provided thou never conceivest the silly and vain prospect of being perfectly wise. Perfect wisdom is then unattainable? cried Memnon. It is unattainable, replied the other, as perfect skill, perfect strength, perfect power, perfect happiness. Even we are strangers, to those perfections. There is a globe were all these things are found; but in the hundred thousand millions of worlds which are scattered though space, there are different degrees of perfection. There is less wisdom and pleasure in the second than in the first, less in the third than in the second and so on to the last, where every one is completely mad. I much fear, said Memnon, that our little terraqueous globe is precisely the Beldam of the universe of which you speak. Not exactly so, said the spirit; but almost: every thing should be in its proper place. But, said Memnon, certain poets, certain philosophers are wrong in saying that 'whatever is, is right.' Considering the arrangement of the whole universe, said the ætherial Philosopher, they are perfectly right. Ah! replied poor Memnon I will not believe that, until I shall have recovered my Eye.

PLEASURES OF READING AND CONVERSATION.

From Dr. Aikin's Letters.

At the head of all the pleasures which offer themselves to the man of liberal education, may confidently be placed that derived from books. In variety, durability, and facility of attainment, no other can stand in competition with it; and even in intensity it is inferior to few. Imagine that we had in our power to call up the shade of the greatest and wisest men that ever existed, and obliged them to converse with us on the most interesting topics—what an inestimable privilege should we think it! how superior to all common enjoyments! But in a well furnished library we, in fact, possess this power. We can question Xenophon and Casar on their campaigns make Demosthenes and Cicero plead before us, join in the audiences of Socrates and Plato, and receive demonstrations from Euclid and Newton. In books we have the choicest thoughts of the ablest men in their best dress. We can at pleasure exclude dulness and impertinence, and open our doors to wit and good sense alone. It is needless to repeat the high commendations that have been bestowed on the study of letters by persons, who had free access to every other source of gratification. Instead of quoting Cicero to you, I shall in plain terms give you the result of my own experience on this subject. If domestick enjoyments have contributed in the first degree to the happiness of my life, (and I should be ungrateful not to acknowledge that they have) the pleasures of reading have beyond all question held the second place. Without books I have never been able to pass a single day to my entire satisfaction: With them, no day has been so dark as not to have its pleasure. Even pain and sickness have for a time been charmed away by them. By the easy provision of a book in my pocket, I have frequently worn through long nights and days in the most disagreeable parts of my profession, with all the difference in my feelings between calm content and fretful impatience. Such occurrences have afforded me full proof both of the possibility of being cheaply pleased, and of the consequence it is of to the sum of human felicity, not to neglect minute attentions to make the most of life as it passes.

Reading may in every sense be called a cheap amusement. A taste for books, indeed, may be made expensive enough; but that is a taste for editions, bindings, paper and type. If you are satisfied with getting at the sense of an author in some commodious way, a crown at a stall will supply your wants as well as a guinea at a shop. Learn, too, to distinguish between books to be perused and books to be possessed. Of the former you may find an ample store in every subscription library, the proper use of which to a scholar is to furnish his mind, without loading his shelves. No apparatus, no appointment of time and place, is necessary for the enjoyment of reading. From the midst of bustle and business, you may in an instant, by the magick of a book, plunge into scenes of remote ages and countries, and disengage yourself from present care and fatigue. 'Sweet pliability of man's spirit, (cries Sterne, on relating an occurrence of this kind in his Sentimental Journey) that can at once surrender itself to illusions, which cheat expectation and sorrow of their weary moments!'

The next of the procurable measures that I shall point out to you is that of conversation. This is a pleasure of higher zest than that of reading; since in conversing we not only receive the sentiments of others, but impart our own; and from this reciprocation a spirit and interest arise which books cannot give in an equal degree. Fitness for conversation must depend upon the store of ideas laid up in the mind, and the faculty of communicating them. These, in a great degree are the results of education and the habit of society; and to a certain point they are favoured by superiority of condition. But this is only to a certain point; for when you arrive at that class in which sensuality, indolence, and dissipation, are fostered by excess of opulence, you lose more by diminished energy of mind, than you gain by superior refinement of manner and elegance of expression. And, indeed, there are numbers of the higher ranks among us, whose conversation has not even the latter qualities to recommend it; but to poverty of sentiment adds the utmost coarseness of language and behaviour. There is a radical want of sense in debauchery, which even in the most elevated conditions of all, communicates the taint of vulgarity. To hear the high bred party loudly contending in the praises of their dogs and horses, and discussing gambling questions, in termixed with grosser topics, you could not possibly discover by the style and matter, whether you were listening to the masters above, or the grooms below. It is by no means unfrequent to find the best company the worst conversation. Should your character and situation forever exclude you from such societies, you need not repine at your loss. It will be amply compensated by the opportunities you are likely to enjoy of free intercourse with the most cultivated and rational of both sexes, among whom decency of manners, and variety of knowledge will always be valued, though very moderately decorated with the advantages of fortune.

I would not, however, inculcate too fastidious a taste with respect to the subject and style of conversation, provided it possess the essentials of sound sense and useful knowledge. Among those who have enjoyed little of the benefit of education, you will often find persons of natural sagacity and a turn for remark, who are capable of affording both entertainment and instruction. Who would not wish to have been acquainted with Franklin when a journeyman printer, even though he had never risen to be one of the most distinguished characters of the age? Information indeed, may be procured from almost any man in affairs belonging to his particular way of life; and when we fall into company from which little is to be expected with regard to general topics, it is best to give the conversation a turn towards the technical matters with which they may be acquainted, whence some profit may be made out of the most unpromising materials. Man, too, in every condition, is a subject well worthy of examination, and the speculatist may derive much entertainment from observing the manners and sentiments of all the various classes of mankind in their several occupations and amusements.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Quiet solitude, pleasant fields, serene weather, purling streams, and tranquillity of mind, seem to be absolutely essential to the poet, without which he could scarcely accomplish any work of permanent lustre. Yet nothing is better known in the annals of literature, than that many immortal works have been composed in sickness, in sorrow, in decrepitude, in chains, and in a prison. Such is the elasticity of the soul that, oftentimes when apparently bowed down to the earth, it will rise with a bound to heaven. In a state of utter blindness, MILTON found Paradise Lost, and in a state of mournful distraction, COWPER translated HOMER.

It is astonishing how soberly and considerably even wise men allow themselves to become intoxicated with the notion of our superior and almost exclusive fitness for liberty, knowledge of it, and security in its possession. The false idea of our own liberty, and the still falser idea of the liberty of all other nations, renders us very fierce, stubborn, and unteachable.

The Gazelles of the Asiatics often abound with the spirited figure of Iteration. The following, to an unknown fair, from Khakani, will afford the reader an example. It is beautifully rendered by Mr. J. M. Good, the recent and admirable translator of Solomon's Songs. The lyrics of every country, both sacred and profane, have been as attentive to this beauty as the pastoral poets. It occurs in a great variety of the Psalms, and other poetical parts of the Bible.

Who art thou? say: with cypress shape,
Soft, jasmine neck, but flinty heart;
Tyrant, from whom 'tis vain to 'scape,
O tell me who thou art?

I've seen thy bright narcissus eye,
Thy form no cypress can impart:
Queen of my soul! I've heard thee sigh—
O tell me who thou art?

Though vales with hyacinths be spread,
I've sought thee trembling as the hart;
O rose bud, nipp'd! thy sweets were fled,
Tell me, tell me who thou art?

Wine lights thy cheeks; thy steps are snares,
Thy glance a sure destructive dart;
Say, as its despot aim it bears,
What fatal bow thou art?

Thy new moon brow the full moon robs,
And bids its fading beams depart;
Tell, then, for whom each bosom throbs,
What torturer thou art?

Drunk with thy wine, thy charms display,
Thy slave Khakani bails his smart,
I'd die to know thy name!—then say
What deity thou art?

We understand that an alliance offensive and defensive is talked of between America and Algiers. It has always appeared a very grievous thing that these two republics should ever put at one another. They understand the rights of men on the Barbary shore as well as they are understood on the banks of the Potomac, and Christianity is not a part of the law of the land here, any more than in any of the Mahometan or Pagan territories.

SOMETHING CURIOUS, BUT NOT WONDERFUL.

At the Mayor's Court, now sitting, William Duane was indicted for an assault and battery on Joseph Scott; the former no less a personage than the celebrated Paddy Duane, successor of poor Benjamin Franklin Buche, and an Irish connection, "BY THE MOST DEAR AND ENDEARING TIES," of the descendants of Dr. Franklin; the latter also an Irishman, secretary to several democratic ward meetings, successor of John L. Leib, as clerk to the democratic common council of this city, editor, compiler, and publisher of a work intitled 'the United States Gazetteer,' celebrated for its accuracy and usefulness, and supposed author of the preface to that renowned work, and to which our readers will do well instantly to refer as a specimen of this Scott-Irishman's abilities in composition, &c.

An affair of honour between two individuals of such high and notorious character, was calculated to excite much of the sensibility of the by-standers.

The Scott asserted, on oath, that he had been to a democratic ward meeting, at the Beehive in South Fourth-street; that on his return from thence, without any previous notice, or any expectation 'of the like,' Duane gave him a kick, from behind, near his seat of honour, and followed it up with a blow, which brough him 'WITH ALL HIS WEIGHT' upon the pavement: that, after some moments, he rose, and Duane gave him another blow; that further violence was prevented by the interference of third persons; that his ankle was much strained by his fall, and he had given no provocation to justify the outrage. Scott's statement was confirmed by the evidence of Moore and Henderson, except as to the kick, which they did not see.

The defendant (Mister Duane), denied that he kicked Scott, but confessed that he had struck him, and proceeded to state 'for why' he had struck him: he alleged that attempts had been made to excite political divisions, by representing that he (Mister Duane) was inimical to Irishmen; that Scott, in his correspondence with a HIGH INFLUENTIAL CHARACTER, (whose name he would not preface. By coupling it with Scott's) had so represented him (Duane) that, if he had any bias, any body, who read the public papers, would see it was the other way; that he was proud of having an Irish heart, and was as good an American as any in the country, having been born here; that he had determined to chastise Scott, and just for this reason, because he was too contemptible to be treated in any other way; that he was a debased and degraded man, of bad character and low vices, &c. (the court interrupted him by stating that personal remarks were improper): he repeated much of what he had before stated, and was proceeding to say that for such conduct he would again chastise Scott, but was again stopped by the court's remarking that such threats were improper.

He put several questions to the witnesses, who agreed that they did not see him kick Scott; he asked one of them, Henderson, whether, upon the oath he had taken, he believed him (Duane) capable of kicking Scott from behind? The court declared the question improper, as it related to matter of opinion only. The by-standers doubted whether his question related to physical capability, or to the incapability which is imposed by a high and refined sense of honour, of striking assassin-like, from behind, without giving notice to your enemy; and yet that could not be very important to the defendant, as it was fully proved that he struck Scott from behind, without giving notice, although the witnesses did not see him kick. Duane asked Moore, whether he did not know that Scott, in his correspondence with a high influential character, had alleged certain things, derogatory to his character? Moore doubted the propriety of such a question, but at length said that Scott, in his letters to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, had made certain inquiries, &c. The court thought it irrelevant, and stopped the witness.

Scott asked permission to make a few observations in reply: he declared that Duane had told a DOWNRIGHT LIE (he was checked by the court); that he would defy him to shew that in his correspondence, with that high political character, he had said any thing derogatory to his [Duane's] character.

The court fined the defendant 12 dollars.

What think you, Americans, of a correspondence between Joseph Scott, and Thomas Jefferson, President of the United States?

From the Farmer's Cabinet we copy the following burlesque on the vulgar form of epistolary writing.

This opportunity I take
To write to you to let you know
That I am well; and, for your sake,
I hope these lines will find you so.

Thro' God's kind care, prais'd be his name,
This precious blessing I enjoy;
And may he still vouchsafe the same
Till life's last hour, without alloy.

Your letter I receiv'd last night,
And read the same with pleasure vast;
It gave me such profound delight,
As set my heart to beating fast.

'Tis long since I have seen your face,
And absence fills my heart with pain;
Ah! must I run thro' life's sad race,
And ne'er set eyes on you again!

News is so scarce, I've none to tell,
Except, (which sure must give you joy),
That all our friends are wond'rous well,
And aunt Jemima's got a boy.

I can at present write no more;
So must conclude for want of breath;
Remaining still, as heretofore,
Your loving uncle's son till death.

The following sprightly song has been lately introduced on the French stage. We hope that some votary of taste and tobacco will translate it in the gay measure of the original.

Contre les chagrins de la vie,
Que l'on crie ad hoc, ad hac,
Moi je me crois digne d'envie,
Avec ma pipe de tabac (bis)
Aujourd'hui, changeons de manie,
De boussole en d'almanac,
Moi je prefere fille joie,
Même a ma pipe de tabac (bis).

Les soldats baillent sous la tente,
Les matelots sur le tillac,
Bientôt ils ont l'ame contente,
Avec leur pipe de tabac (bis).
Mais des qu'ils trouvent une belle,
Aussitôt le cœur fait tictac,
Et l'amant oublie auprès d'elle,
Jusqua sa pipe de tabac (bis).

Je tiens cette maxime utile,
De ce fameux monsieur de Crac,
En campagne, comme à la ville,
Faisant l'amour et le tabac. (bis)
Quand ce grand homme alloit en guerre,
Il portoit dans son petit sac,
Le doux portrait de sa bergere,
Avec sa pipe de tabac. (bis)

CANZONET.

Spring, in gay and frolic hour,
Deck'd my love from many a flower,
Bade young hyacinths diffuse
On her locks their scented dews;
Plac'd the violets darker dyes
In her all imperial eyes.
Made her glowing cheek display
Roses just their prime attaining,
But reserv'd the buds for staining
Lips, as fresh and firm as they!

Dear one, he whose amorous suit,
Fain would turn thy blooms to fruit;
Does he merit thus from thee
Piercing thorns of cruelty?

The necessity of setting the world at a distance from us when we are to take a survey of ourselves, has sent many from high stations to the severities of monastic life; and indeed every man, deeply engaged in business, if all regard to another state be not extinguished, must have the conviction, though, perhaps, not the resolution of Valdesso, who, when he solicited Charles the Fifth to dismiss him, being asked, whether he retired upon disgust, answered that he laid down his commission, for no other reason, but because there ought to be some time for sober reflection, between the life of a soldier and his death.

There are few conditions, which do not entangle us with sublunary hopes and fears from which it is necessary to be, at intervals, disencumbered, that we may place ourselves in his presence, who views effects in their causes and actions in their motives; that we may, as Chillingworth expresses it, consider as if there were no other beings in the world, but God and ourselves; or, to use language yet more awful 'may commune with our own hearts, and be still.' Death says Seneca falls heavily upon him who is too much known to himself and too little to himself and Posterity, a man who had not learned the early lessons of Literature, that he had not of our own hearts of so much importance, that he recommended it in the epitaph on his tomb. Let every one therefore 'examine himself,' a precept, which the wisdom and virtue of all ages have concurred to enforce; a precept, dictated by philosophers, inculcated by poets, and ratified by saints.

THE BRITISH SAILOR.

BY THE LATE DR. CROSSFIELD.

Liquid mountains roll,
Shake from your heads the hoary spray;
Ye cannot daunt the Seaman's soul,
Though danger spreads the pathless way.

Vivid lightnings flash
Blow tempest, bellow thunder dire,
The Seaman braves the dreadful crash,
Though billows to the clouds aspire.

Rise, pointed rocks, arise,
Assaulted by the soaming surge;
Sailors your flinty sides despise,
When friendship, love, and honour urge.

Roar thundering cannons, roar,
Death-dealing bullets whistle round;
Let Cowards wish themselves on shore,
A British Sailor loves the sound.

Europeans must be excessively diverted at the circumstance in the history of our Cis-Atlantic Gentlemen, which could give occasion for the following earnest and imploring request, from the Managers of the Theatre in the Capital of the United States. In every play bill, now issued, Gentlemen are respectfully requested not to smoke any cigars within the wall of the Theatre. One of the Empresses of Russia, in a Gothic assembly room, ordered a paper to be affixed, in which, it was hoped, that 'no lady would get drunk with Brandy, after 11 o'clock.'

Epitaph in the north aisle of the church at Tottenham high-cross, near London.

Sacred to the memory of Michael Massey, Esq. who departed this life December 18, 1779, aged 79.

And pay that tribute here.

THE PROGRESS OF LOVE;

IN THE MANNER OF C. SMART.

Since nature first gave me a soul,
And breath'd the fond flame in my breast,
My heart boasts of many a hole,
And my head has oft ach'd for its rest.

When I'd scarce left my slobbering bib,
And my petticoates pester'd my gait,
I talk'd of the tender so glib,
That I soon pick'd me up a fond mate.

On a pilgrimage I did n't roam
With peas in my sandals to Mecca,
Bitter picking I sound nearer home,
In the kisses of amorous Becca.

But as suns and new seasons came round,
Now strutting in trowsers and jacket,
I left bonny Bec with a bound,
With Joanna the jolly to smack it.

But witness how fickle the flame,
The passion, though fierce, over soon is,
I suppose some may think me to blame,
That I could not help loving my Eunice.

But Eunice I found grew too fond,
And soon 'gan to fail in my fancy,
And scarce was I well of the wound,
When my heart would for none pant but Nancy.

Once I verily ventur'd to say,
That Ann should be always my déary.
Till an arrow, well aim'd, came one day,
From the languishing eyes of my Mary.

This penchant's now cooling quite fast,
And perhaps in a month it will fail,
And what lass will enchain me at last,
The tongue of time only can tell.

One morning last week, the following curious circumstance took place at Manchester: A tradesman suspecting a criminal correspondence betwixt his wife and a certain journeyman with a wooden leg, who wrought next door, went early that morning to the journeyman's room, and having surprised them together, deliberately carried away his wife's clothes and the journeyman's wooden leg, leaving the lovers to hop off at their leisure—the one naked, the other without a leg!

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The ironical oration from a learned and orthodox friend, shall be inserted in our next. We have perused this academical exercise with an attention, which did not tire, and with a smile, which was never languid.

Mr. Moore's minor poems have been extolled even by the zealots of criticism. They shall receive every honour, which is in the Editor's power to confer. The translator of ANACREON, like his countrymen, Parnell and Goldsmith, is endowed with the enchanting privilege of expressing the warmest and tenderest thoughts, in a style at once brilliant, and simple, like the wild flower of the mountains.

'Senex' shall be treated with that respect which age and experience demand.

'Time honored' is a venerable title; and in the effusions of Senex, we discover the moderation and good sense, but neither the garrulity, nor the imbecility of an old man.

'Fortunate Senex, hic inter flumina nota
Et fontes sacros frigis captabis opacum.'

If 'Philaxian' possess any more of the manuscripts of Mr. Hoyland, it will be very agreeable to the Editor to be the herald of productions of such ingenuity.

The letter from an ancient Gentleman, and a faithful friend; is most soothing to the Editor. Cheap praise from ordinary characters, and men of dim discernment and shallow judgment is easily obtained; and, in the estimation of all, who despise a vulgar popularity, is of no worth. But the commendation of one, who himself is constantly worthy of commendation, is 'sterling and salutary panegyric, and the most grateful homage to the human heart.

'Erat enim laus jucunda laus, quæ ab his procedit, qui non in laudem vixerunt. Cicero.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

Don Esteban Manuel de Villegas has used the Latin metres with great success in Spanish. The following ode to Zephyr is in the Horatian Sapphic. The version is by Mr. Southey.

Dulce vecino de la verde selva,
Haesped eterno del Abril florido,
Vital aliento de la madre Venus,
Z'eñro blando!

Si de mes ansias el amor supiste;
Tu, que las quejas de mi voz Uevaste,
Oye: no temas, y a mi Ninfa dile,
Dile, que muero.

Filis un tiempo mi dolor sabia,
Filis un tiempo mi dolor voraba,
Quisome un tiempo; mas agora temo
Temo sus iras.

Afi los dioses con amor paterno,
Asi los cielos con amor benigno,
Nieguen al tiempo, que feliz volares
Nieve a la tierra.

Jamas el peso de la nube parda,
Quando ama ecc la elevada cumbre,
Toque tus hombros, ni su mal granizo,
Hicra tus alas.

TRANSLATION.

TO ZEPHYR.

Thou, who dost love to wander in the woodlands,
Thou, who with April lovest to disport thee,
Hear me, O thou, the vital breath of Venus,
Hear me, O Zephyr!

If thou hast ever heard my sighs of anguish,
If thou hast ever heard my plaint of passion,
Hear now, and fly to that beloved damsel,
Tell her I perish.

There was a time when Phillis knew I lov'd her,
There was a time when Phillis, too, could pity;
Past is that time, and now, alas! I tremble,
Dreading her anger.

So may the Heavens, with their love benignant,
So may the high gods with their love paternal,
Suffer no snow to chill thee, as at evening
Gaily thou sportest.

So may no dark cloud, pregnant with the tempest,
Pour its rude waters heavy on thy plumage;
So may the hard hail never bruise thy pinions;
Go, gentle Zephyr!

SELECTED POETRY.

[The following translation of the well known dialogue between Horace and Lydia, was made by the celebrated Gilbert Wakefield. Few versions surpass it in energy, accuracy, or ease.]

HORACE.

While I, belov'd, enjoy'd thy charms,
Nor dar'd a youth, more favour'd, fling
Round thy fair neck his clasping arms,
I liv'd more blest than Persia's King.

LYDIA.

While glow'd thy breast with Lydia's flame,
Nor Chloe turn'd thy wandering eye;
Illustrious then was Lydia's name,
Not Ilia's self so blest as I.

HORACE.

My Chloe now enslaves my heart,
Her lyre, her tongue, enchanting fair!
I e'en from life itself could part,
If Fate my lovely maid would spare.

LYDIA.

Thurinus now calls me his own,
Bound in soft chains of love and truth:
E'en twice could I my life lay down,
If Fate would spare my charming youth.

HORACE.

Once more should Venus gracious prove,
Should those fond looks and smiles return?
Lie quench'd the torch of Chloe's love,
And Lydia's with fresh vigour burn?

LYDIA.

Tho' bright he be as brightest star,
Thou, angrier than the tossing sea,
And changing still, and light as air,
I fain would live and die with thee.

[The following excellent old song, as it is justly stiled by the Bishop of Dromore, is preserved in David Lloyd's memoirs of those that suffered in the cause of CHARLES I. Lond. fol. 1668. p 96. He speaks of it as the composition of a worthy personage, who suffered deeply in those times, and who was still living, with no other reward than the conscience of having suffered. The author's name he has not mentioned, but it is ascribed to Sir ROGER L'ESTRANGE.]

Beat on, proud billows; Boreas blow;
Swell, curled waves, high as Jove's roof;
Your incivility doth show
That innocence is tempest proof.
Though surly Nereus frown, my thoughts are calm,
Then strike, affliction, for thy wounds are balm.

That which the world miscalls a jail,
A private closet is to me;
While a good conscience is my bail,
And innocence my liberty:
Locks, bars, and solitude together met,
Make me no prisoner, but an anchorite.

I, while I wish'd to be retir'd,
Into this private room was turn'd;
As if their wisdoms had conspir'd
The salamander should be burn'd,
Or, like the sophists, that would drown a fish,
I am constrain'd to suffer what I wish.

The cynic loves his poverty;
The pelican her wilderness;
And 'tis the Indian's pride to be
Naked on frozen Caucasus:
Contentment cannot smart, stoics, we see,
Make torments easy to their apathy.

These manacles upon my arm,
I as my mistress' favours wear;
And still, to keep my ankles warm,
I have some iron shackles there.
These walls are but my garrison; this cell,
Which men call jail, doth prove my citadel.

I'm in the cabinet lock'd up,
Like some high prized margarite,
Or, like the great Mogul or Pope,
Am cloister'd up from public sight:
Retirement is a piece of majesty,
And thus, proud sultan, I'm as

Here, sin, for want of food must starve
Where tempting objects are not seen,
And these strong walls do only serve
To keep Vice out, and keep me in:
Malice of late's grown charitable sure,
I'm not committed, but I'm kept secure.

So he that struck at Jason's life,
Thinking to have made his purpose sure
By a malicious, friendly knife,
Did only wound him to a cure:
Malice, I see, wants wit for what is meant,
Mischievous oft proves favour by the event.

When once my Prince affliction hath,
Prosperity doth treason seem;
And to make smooth so rough a path,
I can learn patience from him:
Now not to suffer shews no loyal heart,
When Kings want ease, subjects must bear a part.

What though I cannot see my King,
Neither in person, nor in coin,
Yet contemplation is a thing
That renders what I have, not mine:
My King from me what adamant can part,
Whom I do wear engraven on my heart?

Have you not seen the Nightingale,
A prisoner-like, coopt in a cage,
How doth she chaunt her wonted tale
In that her narrow hermitage!
Even then her charming melody doth prove
That all her bars are traces, her cage a grove.

I am that bird, whom they combine
Thus to deprive of liberty;
But though they do my corps confine,
Yet, maugre hate, my soul is free:
And though immur'd, yet I can chirp and sing
Disgrace to rebels, glory to my King!

My soul is free as ambient air,
Although my baser parts immur'd,
While loyal thoughts do still repair,
To accompany my solitude:
Although rebellion do my body bind,
My King alone can captivate my mind.

THE BUTTERFLY AND BEE.

TO FLAVIA.

See, Flavia, see that fluttering thing,
Skim round yon flower, with sportive wing,
Yet ne'er its sweets explore;
While wiser the industrious bee
Extracts the honey from the tree,
And hives the precious store.

So you, with coy, coquetish art,
Play wanton round your lover's heart,
Insensible and free;
Love's balmy blessing would you try,
No longer sport a butterfly,
But imitate the bee.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 95.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

HOW evanescent is pleasure, how fleeting are the moments of terrestrial bliss! Such were the reflections that pervaded my mind, after spending an evening in the enjoyment of which every emotion, which can do honour to a man, was summoned to acknowledge the transcendency of the fair sex over my own. You must know, Mr. Saunter, that I am a fellow of that society, to each member of which, ladies attach the epithet of 'Old Bachelor,' but, with whatever justice the application may be made, in conjunction with my associates, I never could concur in opinion with them. It is, indeed, true that I have already passed the climacteric of thirty-five, and the majority of our club are on the verge of dissolution, if wrinkles may be considered as emblematic of old age. But as unexpected love has effected a total conversion of my former disrespect into the most implicit acquiescence in his divine will, and having sent a letter of resignation, whereby I expect an honourable discharge from the drudgery of the society, I will confidentially give some faint idea of the scene of dissoluteness, which is the invariable accompaniment of our periodical conventions, with this sole restriction, that, when you relate the story to others, my name may be deposited among the secrets of your heart, as the disclosure of our proceedings would bring inevitable disgrace on the author. No one is admissible as a member until the blooming epoch of twenty-five; for our worthy president has declared it to be his opinion, that if the zest for connubial pleasures is weak at that age, a life of celibacy is always the consequence. Moreover, it is enjoined on each individual, to secure the present members, and interest himself in obtaining new ones, by sedulously militating against the estate of matrimony, and, in order thereto, they hold as an incontrovertible axiom, that as liberty and free will are the greatest blessings this side of heaven, the true enjoyment of them can only be obtained by preserving the source of action independent of a wife's authority. It has been customary for the club to meet every evening, and at the motion of the president a few bottles of old Madeira and a proportionable quantity of cigars have been the right necessity to relax the mind after the fatigues of the day, and to dispose it for the more speedy and effectual dispatch of business. But as this impost would become peculiarly oppressive to any one of us, it has been judged expedient to assemble alternately at each other's house, so that now a regular circuit is established, and at the adjournment of every meeting, the next place for convention is proclaimed, in an audible voice, by the secretary. Whenever a member intends to leave the society, which, by the by, is very seldom, it is reckoned incumbent on him in honour, to send, by a safe conveyance, a letter expressive of his intention, enclosing a valedictory, and requesting that his name may be effaced from the list of subjects to our laws; this is always granted, as an advocate of Hymen is an object of ignominy, and the everlasting detestation of the club is the sure lot of such an adventurer. More could be said of this doleful group, but, not wishing to wound the feelings of modesty, by a detail of circumstances which could not be recited but with a mixture of levity, I will leave to the intuitive reader to judge, whether the deceitful fawnings of a profligate and meretricious woman can, in the course of a whole life, afford that pleasure, much less happiness, which the love of an affectionate wife can, in one moment create.

The evening, before alluded to, was spent in all the rapture which a man, sensible to the charms of a seraphic woman, could possibly enjoy. While sitting by her, my cares were allayed, the expansive powers of my mind were circumscribed by meditations, of which the object, on whom my eyes continued fixed, was the efficient; in fine, I thought nothing remained to realise my happiness, but the hand of her, who now possessed my undivided affection. After returning home, I endeavoured to assuage the contending passions of my soul by retiring to rest; but the narcotic balm of night, you may suppose, contributed but little to accomplish it. In this delirium I had a fair opportunity of estimating the anomalies of time, and of confirming the aphorism which heads this paper; the evening glided off like a phantom, but why every moment should be protracted now, I was unable, in the partial derangement of my senses, to decide. I knew I was in love, and determined to take advantage of the blissful passion, by declaring to the lady the sentiments of my heart. This I have since done, and received, in return, an assurance of equal affection, and her consent to an union shortly to be celebrated.

Now, Mr. Saunter, is it possible that men, whose breasts are susceptible of the happiness I only anticipate, can prefer the sordid pleasures of drinking and gaming, to the sweet enjoyments found only in the society of a virtuous consort. She is the counterpart of her maker, the true solace of her husband's care and anxiety. I find now, though too late for redemption, that ten years have been irrecoverably lost: for all that remains from the toils of that time are a broken constitution and emaciated person, the effects of riot and self-gratification, both of which I find recovering their pristine vigour, since my iniquitous practices have been superseded by worthier considerations. If my intentions had been laudably devoted to marriage in my youthful days, perhaps the misrepresentations of my confederates, who in vain wish to influence my conduct at this moment, would have produced a recantation, and on that account I will intercept their vile attempts, by giving timely admonitions to those young men, who have not yet enlisted under the flag of celibacy. Nothing is so desirable to a minor as free agency, and nothing so enchanting and fallacious as the prospects of lasting pleasure, painted by this club, to ensnare those who they think can be made the dupes of artifice. Without recurring to argument, let facts, attested by ocular demonstration, suffice to shew the apparent exuberance of a single life. Visit the resorts of these votaries of pleasure, these adepts in debauchery; observe how, under the garb of tranquillity, they conceal a mind lacerated by uncasiness and vexation, a sickly body, nearly consumed by dissipation; seldom employed, they seek entertainment by referring to their common anodyne; unaccustomed to opposition, no one can thwart their will, without incurring manifest displeasure; seldom in the company of ladies, they know not the dignity attached to them, their presence becomes irksome, their conversation disgusting. These are the chief occurrences in their lives, and such are the gratifications which may be expected from an observance of the exaggerated histories of those, who, from the good they do society, may be considered in a state of nonentity. Having been privy to the projects of the club, out of whose grasp I have been luckily extricated, I trust this relation will attract general attention, that their infectious example may not prove destructive to so many worthy men. But on a reversal of the picture, I find myself incapacitated to draw an exact delineation; yet from reasonable surmises, and trite observations, my pen shall form such transcripts of the married state, as the narrow limits of my ideas on this subject can justify.

Marriage is not only permitted by nature and respected by her subjects, but commanded by the express injunction of Providence; it is not solely a choice, but a duty we owe the Omnipotent and our country, to propagate mankind under the sanction of their holy ordinances. What sight can infuse such pleasure into the mind of a beholder, as the mutual love and unanimity of sentiment, existing between man and wife? In vain may the mischief-maker attempt to excite domestic faction, in vain may the slanderer seek food to quench his hellish desire. Stern defiance is impliedly bade to every extrinsic oppression, and has pledges of eternal affection. A healthy progeny is reared to administer consolation when the decline of life brings on its concomitant debilities. While one is attending to the concerns of business, the other, conducting the affairs of the family, anxiously inculcates into the tender minds of their innocent children, the strict honour of the father, and inviolate virtue of the mother.

The condolence of one is the sweetest and most acceptable antidote for the solicitude of the other. Thus, in one continued series of unaffected and uninterrupted bliss, their time passes merrily away, until age and infirmity predicts impending immortality, when their children's happiness affords a welcome passport to eternal felicity.

Having thus contrasted the two critical scenes of our existence, the alternative I leave for every man. But, for my own part, I know not what plea could imply a justification for the criminal conduct I have hitherto been guilty of, neither could I now, Mr. Saunter, reconcile it to myself, if the prospect of approaching happiness with my lovely Emilia did not yield ample compensation for the troubles, which, as an 'old bachelor,' I have certainly undergone. However, in the course of a month, I hope to settle my difficulties, by exclaiming, with as much elation as my name-sake in the play, 'I am married!...I am married.'

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

Section 1.....Of the difference of character between the eloquence of Demosthenes and that of Cicero, and of the relations of the one and of the other, with the people of Athens and that of Rome.

We have heard Demosthenes in the two kinds of eloquence, the judiciary and the deliberative, and we have seen that in both his logic was equally irresistible, and his movements of the same impetuosity. Cicero proceeds, in general, in a different manner: he bestows much on preparations; he seems to economise his forces by multiplying his materials; he neglects none of them, not only of those which might serve his cause, but even of those which serve only to the glory of his art; he is unwilling to lose any thing, and is not less occupied with himself than his causes. It was no doubt for this reason that Fenelon, whose discernment is so delicate, preferred Demosthenes, as marching more directly to his object. Quintilian, on the contrary, appears to prefer Cicero; and it is obvious that between two orators of such superiority, the preference is rather an affair of taste, than of demonstration. Such has ever been my manner of thinking, concerning this kind of parallels, so often introduced into conversation and literary discussions. I have always thought that the most important consideration was, not to decide a pre-eminence, which must forever be problematical, from the weight of motives so nearly equal on one side and the other, and the vanity of understandings; but to seize and appreciate correctly the distant characters and particular merits of both.

I had always preferred Cicero, and I prefer him still, as a writer; but since I have seen deliberative assemblies, I have thought I perceived that the manner of Demosthenes would, perhaps, be there more powerful in its effects than that of Cicero.

Observe that the one and the other are no longer for us but writers; we hear them not: we read them; they are no longer present to persuade us; but to please us. Philip and Eschines, Antony and Catiline, have been estimated long ago; it is Cicero and Demosthenes whom we judge, and their difference in the point of view is important; for the Greeks and the Romans the cause was the first object of consideration, and after that the orator. Both had the same success, and exercised the same empire over the souls of men; but at this day, I readily conceive that Cicero, who has all sorts of mental powers, and every species of style, must be more generally relished than Demosthenes, who has not such advantages. Cicero is before his readers; he gives them a greater variety of enjoyments; he may carry the prize; before hearers none could prevail over Demosthenes, because, on hearing him, it is impossible not to pronounce him in the right: and certainly this is the first object of the Art of Oratory.

May we not, further, observe other motives of disparity, drawn from the difference of governments; and of the character of the people with whom they had to act. There was in Athens but one single power, that of the people: it was an absolute democracy, such as Rousseau would prescribe exclusively for all small states: he believed it impracticable in large ones, and indeed there never had been any example.

The people of Athens were volatile, impatient of application, delighted with indolence, idolators of pleasure, confident in their power, and their ancient glory. It was necessary they should be forcibly impressed; and although the manner of Demosthenes was, no doubt, the result of the natural qualities of his talents, it must have been also modified to a certain point by the knowledge he had of his hearers; and this study was too important to escape a man of so excellent an understanding as his. He meditated, therefore, principally to strike powerfully upon this inattentive multitude, well knowing that if he gave them time to breathe, if he permitted them to occupy their attention upon the charms of his style, and the beauties of his diction, all was lost. The Athenians were capable of forgetting all that he said to them, while they were indulging in ecstasies at his phrases, and making a parade of their good taste, by admiring or criticising his. He knew it so well, that at the end of the Philippic, which I have translated, and which excited great applauses, he addressed to them these last words, 'Ah! applaud not the orator, but do what he advises; for I cannot save you by my words: you must save yourselves by your actions.'

Accordingly, when he had drawn the people into his vortex, he had done every thing: they charged him on the spot to draw up the decree, according to the ordinary formulary, which recorded for the orator both the honour and the danger of it: By the advice of Demosthenes, the people of Athens ordains and decrees, &c. We have yet a multitude of these decrees preserved in the historians and orators of Greece.

It was not so in Rome: there was a concurrence of powers, and a complication of various interests to be managed. Although the sovereignty resided, in fact, in the people, without being theoretically established, as it has been among the moderns, the habitual government belonged to the senate, except upon occasions when the tribunes carried an affair before the assembly of the people, and caused a plebiscitum to be passed, and in this case the senate itself was subjected to it. For any thing that they called a law, it was necessary to unite the consent of the people and the senate; and hence those frequent divisions between the two orders, in which the people had almost always the advantage, and, which is more remarkable, were almost always in the right. But that which proves that the theory of the sovereignty of the people was not very clearly understood, is that all the public acts were headed by Senatus Populusque Romanus, which was an inconsistency; the principles required that they should say, Populus Senatusque Romanus. But this difference between the sovereignty and the government was never sufficiently developed, but in the writings of Locke; and it was from them that Rousseau borrowed it, in his treatise on the Social Contract.

Affairs were then frequently treated at the same time in the senate and before the people; and the difference of the auditory must produce a variation of the eloquence. Again, there were citizens so powerful, that they made alone, by their particular credit, a considerable weight in the balance of public deliberations; and the orator ought to have regard to all these considerations.

The Roman people were much more serious, more considerate, more regular, more moral, than those of Athens. We may even say, that of all the free people of antiquity, there is not one who can be compared to them. They have given examples, without number, of that moderation, which does not seem to be attainable by any multitude, whose movements have ordinarily so much the less of regularity, as they have in themselves a greater force, and we know that moderation is nothing else but the just measure of all the affections, of all the duties, and of all the virtues. That which is rare in an individual, must be more so in a mass of men. Yet this is what we see, without interruption, in the Roman people, and which shews them, to observing eyes, as particularly destined to command over others. This truth, which might give a new face to the Roman history, if it were written at this day, by some one, who should unite the eloquence of the ancients with the philosophy which they have often wanted, is not very commonly perceived, because that all the Latin historians have more or less partiality for the senate. It was, undoubtedly, a very wise assembly, especially in their external policy, in which their passions did not predominate, at least before the period of their corruption; but in the interior government it would be easy to prove that the people displayed frequently much more of justice and virtue than they. Where shall we find, for example, any people resembling the Romans when their army quitted its camp, on the report of the death of Virginia, (the first individual crime of the decemviral tyranny, as it was the last), entered Rome, with their ensigns displayed, without committing the slightest violence, contented themselves to re-establish the legitimate authorities, to bring Appius before the tribunals; and when he is condemned, received his appeal to the people, although he himself had abrogated that right of appeal?

This people was lofty, and had reason to be so; they felt their own force, and abused it not; this is genuine energy: it is with this that great things are performed.

Corruption reigned in Rome in the time of Cicero; but it is just to acknowledge, that it was infinitely more sensible among the great than among the people. The immorality of principles had not been supported in the tribune of harangues. It was sometimes in the senate, and discovered itself frequently in their conduct. But at no time would the pride of the people, and the Roman severity, have accommodated itself to the bitter and humiliating reproaches, which Demosthenes addressed to the Athenians. Cato alone permitted himself sometimes, and they pardoned him on account of his acknowledged stoicism. They respected his virtue, without esteeming his politics, which, in fact, were but indifferent. He rendered little service to his country, because he wanted that moderation, of which I spoke a little while ago, and which Tacitus calls 'temeritas sapientis.' Cicero rendered very great services to his country during his whole life, and merited the appellation of the Father of his Country. I recollect to this purpose, that a man, who apparently knew nothing of Cicero, but what he learned in his class at school, and was ignorant of the Cicero of history, said to me one day, when I was making his panegyric: 'Pho! pho! your Cicero was but a moderate.' It was not, however, under that character that the Triumvirs assassinated him, I replied, but perhaps it was because they did not know at Rome the faction of moderates.

According to these observations, we shall not be surprised at the two prevailing characters in the deliberative eloquence of Cicero, insinuation and ornament: insinuation, because he had to manage, wheter in the senate, before the people, or in the tribunals, a crowd of cautions, which were unknown to Demosthenes; ornament, because that the politeness of style, which was not introduced at Rome till after the conquest of Greece, was a sort of attraction, which made itself felt more sensibly, in proportion as all the arts of taste and of luxury became more fashionable at Rome. In the midst of enjoyments of every kind, those of the mind and of the ear were become a real passion. A great importance was attached to diction, especially in the tribunals, where the pleadings were prolonged for the amusement of the judges, more than for their instruction.

Cicero, therefore, devoted himself extremely to elegance and harmony. He knew that they considered it as a feast to hear him in the Forum; that all his discourses were taken down in the senate, by the same method which we employ at this day, by Tachygraphes, whom they named in Latin, and Notarii and Librarii. Thus, although elocution was equally regarded by the Greeks and the Romans, as the most essential and the most difficult part of the art of oratory; because they comprehended in it, in the language of the rhetoricians, not only all the figures of diction, which are the ornaments of it, but all the figures of thought, which are the soul of it; I conceive that Cicero might have employed more care than Demosthenes, in what is called the finish of details, and that he had sought for the splendor and richness of expression, in proportion to what was expected of him. This is so true, that those who picqued themselves as lovers of Atticism, reproached Cicero with being too ornamental; and Quintilian, his passionate admirer, thought himself obliged to vindicate him on this point, and to refute those pretended Attics, who, in reality, went too far. Atticism consisted, chiefly, in a great purity of language, an entire banishment of all affectation, and a certain noble simplicity, which must have the ease of conversation, though it was, in fact, much more supported and elevated: it was in this that Demosthenes excelled. But this simplicity excluded not ornaments naturally introduced, as these delicate critics pretended, who would have rendered the diction meagre and naked by their zeal to make it simple. This simplicity excluded nothing but affectation; and Cicero never affected any thing. In him every thing flows naturally from its source, and if he does not appear, like Demosthenes, to forget himself altogether as an orator, that the public man alone may be seen, he knows how to conceal his art, and you perceive it only by the enchantment which his elocution obliges you to feel.

The gravity of the deliberations in the senate, necessarily different from those of the people, always somewhat tumultuous, did not commonly admit of all that vehemence, all that multiplicity of movement, which was necessary to Demosthenes to fix the attention and the interest of the Athenians. Accordingly the Philippics of Cicero are generally much less lively than those of the Greek orator. The second, which is the strongest of them all, was never pronounced: it is not of the same character with the others: it is a violent invective against Antony, in answer to that which the Triumvir had vomited against him, in his absence, in full senate. In the others, which had for their object a declaration against Antony as an enemy of his country, and to authorise Octavius to make war against him, Cicero had not so many obstacles to overcome as Demosthenes. The senate, or at least a great majority of them, were against Antony, and there was nothing to do, but to direct their measures, and inspire them with firmness and resolution, and to excite their confidence, instead of the distrust which they might have of Octavius. Cicero did whatever he pleased, and drafted all the decrees.

If he approaches sometimes, in the deliberations of the senate, the vehemence of Demosthenes, it is when he had declared enemies before him, such as Catiline, Clodius, Piso, or Vatinius. He reserved the thunders of his eloquence for the judiciary trials; there he had before him a career proportioned to the abundance and variety of his powers. There was the triumph of his talents. But even in this department he differs from Demosthenes, in this, that the latter marches always directly to his enemy, always cutting and slashing, whereas Cicero lays siege in form, seizes on all the avenues, and, employing his discourse as he would command an army, surrounds his enemy on all sides, and finally crushes him. But before we enter into the detail of his works, we must see what the Roman eloquence had been before him.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF CHATTERTON.

[CONCLUDED.]

Nor have the critical writers been backward in commendation of Chatterton.

Mr Warton speaks of him as 'a prodigy of genius,' as 'a singular instance of prematurity of abilities.' He adds, that 'he possessed a comprehension of mind, and an activity of understanding, which predominated over his situation in life and his opportunities of instruction.' And Mr. Malone 'believes him to have been the greatest genius that England has produced since the days of Shakspeare.' Dr. Gregory, to whom, in the course of this narrative, the present writer has had many obligations, says, 'he must rank, as an universal genius, above Dryden, and perhaps only second to Shakspeare.' Mr. Croft is still more unqualified in his praises. He asserts, that 'no such human being at any period of life, has ever been known, or possibly ever will be known.' He runs a parallel between Chatterton and Milton; and asserts, 'an army of Macedonian and Swedish mad butchers indeed fly before him; nor does my memory supply me with any human being, who at such an age, with such disadvantages, has produced such compositions. Under the Heathen mythology, superstition and admiration would have explained all, by bringing Apollo on earth; nor would the god ever have descended with more credit to himself.'

The testimony of Dr. Knox ('Essay' 144), does equal credit to the classical taste and amiable benevolence of the writer, and the genius and reputation of Chatterton.

'When I read the researches of those learned antiquaries who have endeavoured to prove that the poems attributed to Rowley were really written by him, I observe many ingenious remarks in confirmation of their opinion, which it would be tedious, if not difficult, to controvert; but I no sooner turn to the poems, than the labour of the antiquaries appears only waste of time, and I am involuntarily forced to join in placing that laurel, which he seems so well to have deserved, on the brow of Chatterton.

'The poems bear so many marks of superior genius that they have, deservedly excited the general attention of polite scholars, and are considered as the most remarkable productions in modern poetry. We have many instances of poetical eminence at an early age; but neither Cowley, Milton, nor Pope, ever produced any thing while they were boys, which can justly be compared to the poems of Chatterton. The learned antiquaries do not indeed dispute their excellence. They extol it in the highest terms of applause. They raise their favourite Rowley to a rivalry with Homer; but they make the very merit of the works an argument against the real author. It is possible, say they, that a boy could produce compositions so beautiful and so masterly? That a common boy should produce them is not possible; but that they should be produced by a boy of an extraordinary genius, such a genius as was that of Homer and Shakspeare; such a genius as appears not above once in many centuries; though a prodigy, is such an one as by no means exceeds the bounds of rational credibility.

'That Chatterton was such a genius, his manners and his life in some degree evince. He had all the tremulous sensibility of genius, all its eccentricities, all its pride, and all its spirit. Even his death, unfortunate and wicked as it was, displayed a haughtiness of soul, which urged him to spurn a world, where even his exalted genius could not vindicate him from contempt, indignance, and contumely.

'Unfortunate boy! short and evil were thy days, but thy fame shall be immortal. Hadst thou been known to the munificent patrons of genius—'Unfortunate boy! poorly wast thou accommodated during thy short sojourning among us;—rudely wast thou treated,—sorely did thy feeling soul suffer from the scorn of the unworthy; and there are at last, those who wish to rob thee of thy only meed, thy posthumous glory. Severe too are the censures of thy morals. In the gloomy moments of despondency, I fear thou hast uttered impious and blasphemous thoughts, which none can defend, and which neither thy youth, nor thy fiery spirit, nor thy situation, can excuse. But let thy more rigid censors reflect, that thou wast literally and strictly but a boy. Let many of thy bitterest enemies reflect, what were their own religious principles, and whether they had any, at the age of fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen. Surely it is a severe and an unjust surmise, that thou wouldst probably have ended thy life as a victim of the laws, if thou hadst sincerely finished it as thou didst; the very act by which thou durst put an end to thy painful existence proves that thou thoughtest it better to die than to support life by theft or violence.

'The speculative errors of a boy who wrote, from the sudden suggestions of passion or despondency, who is not convicted of any immoral or dishonest act in consequence of his speculations, ought to be consigned to oblivion. But there seems to be a general and inveterate dislike to the boy, exclusively of the poet; a dislike which many will be ready to impute, and, indeed not without the appearance of reason, to that insolence and envy of the little great, which cannot bear to acknowledge so transcendent and commanding a superiority in the humble child of want and obscurity.

'Malice if there was any, may surely now be at rest; for 'Cold he lies in the grave below.' But where were ye, O ye friends to genius, when, stung with disappointment, distressed for food and raiment, with every frightful form of human misery painted on his fine imagination, poor Chatterton sunk in despair? Alas! ye knew him not then, and now it is too late,—

For now he is dead,
Gone to his death-bed,
All under the willow tree.

So sang the sweet youth, in as tender an elegy as ever flowed from a feeling heart.

'In return for the pleasure I have received from thy poems, I pay thee, poor boy, the trifling tribute of my praise. Thyself thou hast emblazoned; thine own monument thou hast erected. But they whom thou hast delighted, feel a pleasure in vindicating thine honours from the rude attacks of detraction. Thy sentiments, thy verse, thy rhyme, all are modern, all are thine. By the help of glossaries and dictionaries, and the perusal of many old English writers, thou hast been able to translate the language of the present time into that of former centuries. Thou hast built an artificial ruin. The stones are mossy and old, the whole fabric appears really antique to the distant and the careless spectator; even the connoisseur, who pores with spectacles on the single stones, and inspects the mossy concretions with an antiquarian eye, boldly authenticates its antiquity; but they who examine without prejudice, and by the criterion of common sense, clearly discover the cement and the workmanship of a modern mason.'

'O! Genius,' elegantly apostrophizes Mr. Dyer, in his humane and sensible 'Dissertation on Benevolence,' 1795, 'art thou to be envied or pitied? Doomed to form expectations the most sanguine, and to meet with disappointments the most mortifying? To indulge towards others the most generous wishes, to receive thyself the most illiberal treatment? To be applauded, admired, and neglected? To be a friend to all, befriended often by none? Oh, thou creative, discriminating power, source of inexpressible delights, and nurse of unknown sensibilities, that perpetuate distress. Fancy shall embody thy form, and often visit the grave of Chatterton, to drop the tear of sympathy over that ingenious, unfriended, and unfortunate youth!'

MISCELLANY.

A STUDY FROM NATURE.

[The following article relates to a circumstance not infrequent at Rome, and sometimes, as the Editor has been credibly informed, occurring, in England, to the young painters in the Royal Academy.]

Returning one day from my usual excursions, I met, in the Strada del Corso, Onofrio Cazales, the sister of the person, part of whose house I occupied, attended by an elderly lady, her relation. This circumstance would have had nothing in it remarkable, had I not each day observed that at the same hour, in the same place, I was equally fortunate, for Onofrio was reckoned among the most beautiful women of Rome. At my approach she drew aside her veil, and, with a smile that did not entirely discourage my inclination to address her, gave me the salutation of the morning—Where are your steps directed, signora? I cried. She made me no answer, and would have proceeded, but I detained her, and, repeating my question, asked permission to accompany her in her walk. 'No, signior, she replied, the object of my errand is such, that I fear were I to communicate it, I should, in the eyes of an Englishman, not only be deemed reprehensible, but lose all claims to that innate modesty, which, however customs or prejudices may differ among nations, should ever be cherished in the female breast.' I lamented to her the double vexation I experienced in being denied the pleasure of attending her, and having my curiosity raised on a subject that she seemed averse to satisfy me upon. 'Well then, said she, if you are really anxious to know the cause of my matin excursions, I will to-morrow acquaint you with it.' Saying this, she waved her hand in token of a present adieu, and I, not a little disappointed, returned home. Anxious to hear the explanation she had promised, I took care on the following day to renew the subject. 'To tell you the truth then, signior, she replied, I have been selected by an eminent painter, at present in this city, as an object worthy of representing the Venus of Annibal Carrachi, which he prefers copying from life, rather than from the original painting. This custom is not unusual in Rome, and with the consent of my friends, and accompanied by a relation, I attend this artist for a pecuniary consideration, which is of essential service to my family.' 'And can the modest Onofrio really, for any consideration, consent to license the inquisitive regard of vulgar eyes, by exposing to view charms that no one can contemplate with indifference, and which must have the power to inspire even the studious artist, while portraying them, with sensations of admiration and delight, dangerous to the efforts of his pencil, and the steadiness of his ideas?' 'Undoubtedly, returned Onofrio, the painter I attend has not the most distant idea of violating decency or good manners; his character depends on the strictest observance of delicacy and decorum. Thus, you see, I am in every respect protected. Necessity and custom do away that which might otherwise be prejudicial to my character, and I trust, even in your eyes, I shall stand acquitted.' You have at least, said I, laid your cause before a partial judge, and since I can attach no degree of error to any action, which is influenced by a mind devoid of evil, I would no more condemn Onofrio for offering her beautiful figure as a model for study to the painter, than the uninstructed Indian, who, following only nature's laws, feels that outward forms can add nothing to the native modesty that dwells within her breast.

How far Onofrio may stand excused in the eyes of my fair country-women, I know not, but, I will venture to affirm, there is no Englishman who would not, like me, have exculpated the fair Roman, when she pleaded her own cause.

[Wolff's Sketches.

FROM THE LOUNGER.

One of the pleasures of which the idle are deprived, is that of relaxation from business. Those whom intricate and weighty affairs embarrass and fatigue, talk with envy of the leisure of the unemployed, of the bliss of retirement. But in their hours of occasional amusement, they know not the grievance of listless days, and months and years of idleness; nor, when they pant for rest from their labours, are they aware that it is from labour alone that rest acquires its name, and derives its enjoyment.

When, in the course of my usual walk, I passed the other morning through the place where but a few days before I had met so many busy faces, and been jostled by so many hurried steps; when I saw the court door shut, and heard no hum within; I confess it struck me with a melancholy sort of feeling. But the first lawyer whom I encountered had a smile of satisfaction on his countenance, and congratulated himself on the suspension of those labours which last week he said had lain so heavy on him. 'You are free from that plague,' said he; 'you have no session or term time.'—'But you forget, my friend, that I have no vacation.'

I contrive however, to get through the no business of my life with tolerable satisfaction; and if at any time an hour hangs heavy on me, I do not carry my misfortune into the streets, but like decent beggars, keep my distresses at home, and am relieved by the private contribution of the humane and the charitable.

It is not so with every one who labours under the afflicting hand of time. When I had got a little futher on my accustomed walk I was caught in a shower and took shelter in the house of an acquaintance in Prince's street. As I passed the coffee house and confectioner's shop, I was struck with compassion at the sight of the many vacant and melancholy faces which appeared at the doors and windows. It was but a little after mid day, and consequently the gentlemen to whom these faces belonged had a great while to look forward to the hour when they could with propriety pull of their boots, and dress for the business of the table. The weather did not permit of their getting rid of this interval by a gallop, which one of the happiest expedients for the purpose in the world, as it removes the headach of yesterday's dinner, gets thro' the time till the dinner of to day, and gives an appetite for enjoying that meal when it comes. But my poor friends in Prince's street had no hope of getting through the tedious interval in the society of their horses; they had before them the dismal prospect of spending three long hours in their own company or that of their fellow sufferers; and, after all, of sitting down to dinner with muddy heads, and squeamish stomachs.

'Mentem mortalia tangunt,' says the Poet. The distresses incident to humanity are the great nourishers of moral speculation. The mortals of Prince's street touched my mind, and I could not think, without a great degree of commiseration, of the difficulty they would find in passing the time till the arrival of that important era in the history of the day—the hour of dinner. The more I reflected, the more I was distressed on their account: For I suspect that it is not only when the morning is rainy that our gentlemen of fashion find their time heavy. The languor and restlessness which are so frequently to be observed united in their looks and behaviour, are too evident symptoms of this quotidian disorder, this malady of time, under which they have the misfortune to labour.

To say the truth, in spite of our complaints and the shortness of life, yet four and twenty hours returning every day are by far too much for persons who have no other object but amusement. It is almost impossible to continue longer in bed than eleven hours; few people are able to lie more than eight or nine. Here, then, upon the most moderate calculation, we have at least thirteen hours to be filled up every day by people who have nothing to do but to be amused. Now although a chace, a bottle of wine, a dance, and some other expedients, to which these gentlemen have recourse, may give occasional filips to their spirits, yet it is not in man, no even in a man of fashion, to be both idle and comfortable for thirteen hours together, day after day.

There seems to be here an incongruity which is not observable anywhere else in the works of Nature. All the other animals have their duration pretty well adjusted to the purposes for which they seem to have been intended, or to their capacity for filling up the time allotted to them with tolerable satisfaction. The gay fluttering tribe of butterflies, who have no other business under the sun but pleasure, do not live long enough to have any languid intervals, or fits of the vapours. Geese, on the other hand are very long lived: But then it is to be observed, that geese undertake the important and laborious task of rearing a family every season; they have likewise many enterprising excursions to make both by land and water in search of their food and besides, they can fill up their leisure hours agreeably by means of two very fortunate circumstances, their power of commanding sleep, when they please, and their talent for conversation. By these means, geese, when they are saved from the hand of the poulterer, are able to go on to a respectable old age, without ever being at a loss how to kill the time.

But men of fashion are an anomaly in the creation. Indeed, to adjust matters, one of two things is necessary; either to abridge the duration of their life, or else to improve their means of enjoying it.

With regard to the first method of abridgement, I humbly conceive, that if, from the time when our men of fashion break loose from their parents and preceptors, with the full command of money or credit, they were to sink quietly to rest in the course of nature at the end of a twelvemonth, their life would be pretty nearly sufficient for all they have to do. They would not fail within that space to run round the whole circle of pleasure again and again, which is evidently what they consider as the chief end of man. At the same time, they would be seasonably delivered from the insipidity of pleasure, when it becomes too familiar, from the unhappy devices which they fall upon to diversify their amusements, and to saunter away a tedious lifetime. Many of our young men of fashion seem to be sensible of the justness of this observation, for they do what they can to get the better of their constitution, and to abridge their life to a duration more suitable to the use which they make of it.

In this attempt, however, they are not always sufficiently expeditious; and, at any rate, it is always extremely unpleasant; most men of fashion, like most other men however disagreeable or useless they may find their lives, not chusing to die as long as they can easily avoid it. It would therefore be more acceptable, if it were possible to supply them with some means of passing more tolerably the thirteen or fourteen hours which they cannot lose in sleeping.

Here to be sure a moralist might assume a high tone of declamation, and call on those gentlemen to remember the duties which their country requires. He might tell them, that the eyes of mankind were directed to their conduct, and expected, from their station and fortune, examples of active and disinterested patriotism. He might tell them, that, if they were willing to take a share in the legislature, or if the happy season of peace gave them no opportunity to display their martial talents and gallantry in the field, yet they could not be at a loss for occasions to display their activity and enterprize by employing their wealth and influence to diffuse civilization and comfort, industry and good morals, among all ranks of their fellow citizens. He might tell them, that from such occupations they would derive the most honourable, heartfelt, and lasting pleasures, and be followed with the gratitude, the blessing of thousands. He might likewise intreat them to consider the opportunities which their riches and leisure afforded them of extending their researches into science, and encourage them with the prospect of utility and reputation united with the most interesting and endless amusement. He might also point out the delightful relaxation from their labours and solace to their carés which literature would afford them; he might tell them how much it would contribute at once to polish and elevate the character, and how admirably it would supersede those frivolous or pernicious entertainments in which they waste their hours.

But it would be cruel to harrass the poor gentlemen with these school declamations. The employments here pointed out require not only temporary exertions, but also continued industry, which we can scarcely expect from them. All that can be attempted with any reasonable hope of success, is to find some occupations which are more innocent, but which require no greater labour than the bottle or the gaming table, than low profligacy or treacherous intrigue.

Now, I have known several idle persons who contrived to amuse the vacant intervals between breakfast and dinner, and between that and supper, in a very inoffensive manner. According as the weather and season permitted, they employed all the first part of the day either in angling, shooting, hunting, or skating. When they could not go abroad with comfort, they always contrived work at home; such as weaving nets, plaiting lines, dressing fishing flies, cleaning guns, looking after the horses, and playing on the fiddle. In this manner, with the help of the newspaper, dressing for dinner, and now and then a game at whist or backgammon for a trifle in the evening, I have known some persons of no great fortune, who spent their time in the country from year's end to year's end, without much extraordinary sleeping, without much extraordinary yawning, without much extraordinary drinking, without doing any harm, and even without thinking on the amusements of the town.

I should therefore imagine, that the men of fashion, considering the accurate attention which it is proper for them to pay to their dress, and the superior advantages which they enjoy from the amusements of the town, excursions to watering places, and trips to the Continent, might contrive to occupy their time without hanging out their melancholy faces at coffee house doors or confectioners' shops, without exposing their own fortunes to be pilfered, or trying to pilfer others, at the gaming table, without weakening their constitutions, or injuring their fellow creatures. It is true, their occupations would frequently be rather more insipid and less respectable than might be wished. But since by some unaccountable irregularity in Nature the lives of men of fashion, although they have so much less to do than other men, are prolonged to fifty or sixty years; they might unquestionably contrive, by a succession of these little occupations, to pass thro' this long term far less uncomfortable, than by dividing their time between down right idleness, intemperance, and vice.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ORATION ON THE ABSURDITY OF GOOD-BREEDING IN A REPUBLIC.

It is a well known maxim in politics, that as there are different forms of government in different countries, so each particular form requires some laws and customs, peculiar to itself. In countries, for example, subject to monarchical government, where a distinction of ranks is essential to the good of the state, the laws may oblige a father of a certain fortune and station to leave the greatest part of his estate to his eldest son: but who would say that such a regulation would be proper in a republic? wherein we certainly adhere more closely to the law of nature, by dividing inheritances equally among the children, without regard to age or sex. In the former of these governments, there must be an order of nobility, and different degrees of honour hereditary in certain families: in the latter, it may be deemed expedient to withhold titles of honour, as tending to stimulate ambition, and to destroy that equality upon which it is founded.

And accordingly, these and many other similar distinctions have not escaped the observation, I will not say of our politicians only, but of the people of these United States in general. But, unless my self-partiality deceive me, it has not hitherto occurred to any philosopher, politician, or statesman, before myself, to remark, that what is commonly called good breeding is, in fact, a relic of monarchical government, and ought not to be countenanced in any well ordered republic. This assertion, I am sensible, may, at the first view, appear somewhat extraordinary; yet if this candid and enlightened audience will favour me with their usual indulgence, I do not despair of demonstrating it, in such a way, as will meet with their entire approbation.

That Good Breeding derives its origin from monarchical government, might be inferred from the very words by which we usually express it; the common language of mankind being, as the learned have well observed, a proof of the common sense of mankind. Do we not commonly call Good Breeding Courtesy, and even Courtliness? both which terms are evidently derived from the word court, which denotes the place where a monarch resides. But although there is, in my opinion, great weight in this circumstance, yet I shall not rest my cause solely upon it: but, making use of that species of reasoning which is termed in the schools argumentum ad judicium, proceed to draw my arguments from the nature of things.

And that what I shall say upon this important subject may be the better understood; I will begin by defining what is meant by good breeding. According to Dr. Beattie, whose authority I hope will not be disputed, 'Good breeding consists in showing by our looks and behaviour, that we respect our company, and that their happiness and convenience is the chief thing we have in view.' (See Elements of Moral Science, Dublin edition, page 170.) So then! to be well bred, we must shew by our looks and behaviour, that the happiness and convenience of others is the chief thing we have in view! But is this either natural or reasonable? Natural, I am sure, it is not; and therefore not reasonable. For I appeal to the feelings of every person in this assembly, whether it be not natural to him to consult his own happiness in the first place, and to desire that it should be rather well with himself than with another. So universal, indeed, is this experience, that, in Latin, it is a common proverb, Ego met sum proximus mihi; or, as we express it in English, 'Every man is nearest a-kin to himself.' Well then, suppose a man to show, by his looks and behaviour, that the happiness and convenience of others is the chief thing he has in view: either he is sincere in this exhibition, or he is not: if he is sincere, his conduct is unnatural; if he is not, he is a hypocrite. So that, in either case, there is, in this exercise of Good Breeding, nothing that we can commend, and much to censure. In a monarchical government, indeed, where there are different ranks and degrees of men; where some are superiors, and others inferiors, a man may think himself obliged, in point of prudence, to pay some court to those, whom he perceives to be thus elevated above him, and on whom he may conceive that he in some measure depends: hence courtesy; hence all those studied forms of deference and respect on the one hand, and of obliging condescension, forsooth, and affability on the other. But in a republic, where all men are equal, and where each man is a sovereign, it is obvious that there can be no foundation for such a practice.

It is true that in a book, whose authority is, indeed, most sacred, there is a precept, which enjoins, "that in honour we prefer one another. But who does not know, that there are many Christians who do not seem to think themselves bound to observe every precept contained in that sacred volume. And if they observe some things which it enjoins, though they neglect others; it is plain that it will do them some good, and not be useless: it is the very end for which the scriptures were written, that they might do us some good and not be useless: therefore they who obey some of the precepts contained in the scriptures, though they neglect others, comply with the very end for which they were written.

But let us see, whether, in imitation of some learned divines, we cannot explain this passage by comparing it, agreeable to their practice, with some others of a similar import. In the same sacred volume we are instructed to 'give honour to whom honour is due'; meaning, no doubt, that we should give honour to whom honour is due, and to no others. By parity of reasoning, we are to give preference to those to whom preference is due, and to no others. But in a republican government, all men are equal; and where all are equal, there can be no preference due to any one, and consequently, there is none to be given: but where no preference is given; or, in other words, where we do not 'in honour prefer one another'; there can be no such thing as Good Breeding: therefore in a republic there can be no such thing as good Breeding. Nothing surely can be more plain, clear and convincing, than this reasoning; and of course it is evident, that the text in question cannot refer to persons living in a republican, but to such only as are subject to monarchical, government.

Away then with all those groundless ideas of courtesy, respect, deference, and I know not what; which are quite foreign to our situation and circumstances. And on the contrary, let it be the chief care of every individual among us to assume such a look and demeanour, as shall the most unequivocally demonstrate that he looks upon no man to be superior to himself, and no man's convenience to be so much consulted as his own.

Entertaining, as I do, these sentiments, it gives me no small pleasure, as often as I walk the streets of this great metropolis, to observe the deportment of my fellow citizens. One droll fellow sticks a segar in his chaps, and puffs out the tobacco smoke, mixed with the effluvia from his lungs in the face of every one he meets; another, who was silent whilst at a distance, begins to hum a tune as he approaches you; a third whistles; and another consults his convenience in a way which I shall not mention: as if each were resolved to convince you, as is fit, that he has no respect for you, and that he regards nothing, but himself and his own gratification. But I shall perhaps be told, that the practices which I commend are confined to blackguards only, and to the lowest of the vulgar. This I am very ready to admit; that is, I admit that the practices I have mentioned are confined to those who are called blackguards, or at least to those whom one could not, without a breach of propriety, call gentlemen. But I am not for admitting such invidious distinctions. And besides, who does not know that every true democrat is in the habit of contending that these very persons are they who ought, properly speaking, to be termed the people; and that gentlemen and men of education should be regarded with jealous eyes, well watched, and kept in proper subjection.

But, be this as it may, I am very happy to find, that it is not among those only, who are termed the vulgar, that the practice of Good Breeding begins to be discontinued. No one surely will presume to deny that the medical students of this university are gentlemen. And yet any one, who has attended a medical lecture, must have observed that at least one half of these GENTLEMEN come into the presence of their professor, and attend upon the instruction which he gives, with their hats on; some munching apples, even as they are entering; whilst others, that their minds may not be wholly unoccupied during the discourse, indulge themselves either in the cracking of nuts, or in expressing, by an easy process, its aromatic juice from that far famed Indian herb, generally known by the name of tobacco. Some, indeed, I know there are who allege, that, as the professor appears with his hat off before them, and addresses them with his hat off, a sense of common decency should induce them to take off theirs in return. But I beg leave to be of a different opinion. For are not the professors the servants of the students, just in the same manner as his excellency the governor, or the president of the United States, is the servant of the people? And if so, is it not fit that these servants, like all other servants, should pay to their masters a degree of attention, which they are not intitled to expect in return.

Having mentioned the university, it might well be deemed an unpardonable omission, were I not to fortify my cause still further by an appeal to the example of—I wish I could say all, but I may certainly be allowed to say some—of you, my quondam school-fellows. Who does not know, that, as often as the schools are dismissed, it is your practice to break out with hideous shrieks and screams that may be heard over the whole neighbourhood. As an enemy to Good Breeding, I will exhort you to continue in this practice, to which you have long been accustomed. And if any of your professors, or other teachers, should chance to be on the pavement, let not this circumstance impede your career, caveat viator. Upon such occasions, they have one part to act; and you another: it is your part to dash on, and theirs to keep out of your way.

And here I am almost tempted to exclaim with Cicero 'adhuc video omnia constare.' My doctrine, I think, I have fully proved: and moreover I have also shown that among many of our fellow-citizens there exists a disposition very favourable for its reception. But, although my experience of human life has not as yet been very considerable, it has, however, been sufficient to convince me that the same arguments do not produce the same effects on all minds. Some bigots there always have been, and perhaps always will be, in society, who are backward in adopting new maxims, and who value themselves for being, as they love to express themselves, of the OLD SCHOOL. By these I may, probably, be asked, of what use this doctrine is; and whether, if Good Breeding were rejected, our intercourse with each other would be more easy and agreeable. Such questions I abhor: as proceeding from a cold imagination. For if the value of doctrines is to be estimated by their utility, what would become of many of those beautiful speculations, which have occupied the minds of philosophers in both ancient and modern times. What, for example, is the use of materialism, or the doctrine, which teaches us that the soul is not a distinct substance from the body? What is the use of the doctrine of necessity, whether it be considered as a doctrine in philosophy, or religion? Of what use was it to deny, as Bishop Berkeley and David Hume have done, the existence of matter; and to assert that the sun and moon, the sea and the mountains, men and other animals, and, in a word, the whole universe, has no existence but in the mind that perceives it? And lastly, of what use are the modern doctrines of Godwin and others, which teach that a man should not prefer his own to a foreign country, or his nearest relations to strangers of equal merit. No, my respected audience, every man who possesses no other faculty than that of judgment, can value a doctrine for being useful; but to invent and propagate such theories, as those I have mentioned, requires no small degree of genius: now every body knows that genius has ever been accounted a much higher faculty of the mind than mere judgment: as much, therefore, as genius is superior to judgment, so much are those theories in metaphysics, politics, religion, and the sciences in general, which have no use, superior to those which are useful.

Conceiving, therefore, that my position is fully established, and that there can be no reasonable objection made to it; I submit what has been said, without any farther defence, to your superior judgment.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

It appears that a Mr. Chouteau, said to be 'a French gentleman of the first respectability,' is now on his way to the city of Washington, with twelve warrior Indian chiefs, men and boys, on a visit to the president of the United States. This Monsieur Chouteau, it seems, has long monopolised the trade of the Osage nation of Indians, to which these chiefs belong, and has been prevailed upon by Captain Lewis to accompany them on this visit to an illustrious warrior, and sachem.

It is a great consolation to the people of the United States, that capt. Lewis is succeeding so well, in the very important object of his expedition. Not knowing precisely what he was going about, it was natural enough that we should grumble and be discontented at the appropriation of many thousands of dollars to defray his expenses, &c. but, notwithstanding all the secrecy and reserve which the administration have observed upon this subject, the truth has at last come out. This Monsieur Chouteau has been persuaded by captain Lewis to come all the way from the Osage river (500 miles up the Missouri), accompanied by twelve warriors, men and boys, besides several young French gentlemen, the whole party travelling, without doubt, at the expense of the United States, to enrich the president's cabinet with a DEAD TOAD. This toad is said to be of the form of a land tortoise, very flat, covered with scales, of a dark grey colour, a short tail, and a head like that of a buffalo, (mammoth probably) with six horns; and what is more wonderful than all, it lived a long time with Mons. Chouteau, on no other nourishment but a little water, but then it died.

Captain Lewis' success is, we must admit, very encouraging; and we doubt not that he will meet with many other curious toads, which will be acceptable to our philosophical executive, and should he go far enough, may perhaps come up at last with the great bull mammoth himself. To be sure it will cost us some more money, but then the treasury is full, and what a great curiosity the great bull mammoth would be!

We hope the public will be favoured by the National Intelligencer with the talks of the chiefs, and Mr. Chouteau and Mr. Jefferson, over this dead toad; and we doubt not that the mammoth cheese will be distributed liberally among the warriors, that Monsieur Chouteau will be permitted to continue in the enjoyment of his monopoly, and that the young French gentlemen will all be admitted into the Military Academy, even if we native Americans must be dismissed to make room for them. Gentlemen who have deserved so well, should not be disappointed, and it has long been our rule, and it is the rule of politeness, to give to strangers in preference to those who are at home.

MR. PITT.

We have the high authority of GIBBON for praising a man when he no longer dispenses the favours of the Crown. The writer of the following character certainly never owed, and never can owe, any obligation to Mr. PITT. The likeness will be admitted to be accurate; and it will soon be discovered, that the powers of the Author were fully equal to his subject. The few PERSONAL traits, were necessary to confirm the portrait of the MIND—neither, however, could be misapplied.

"He contemns trivial honours, and disdains, even in great things, to act a second part. He is slow in action, and adverse to exertion, except when great honour may be obtained, or great actions are to be performed: not busied about many things, but confined to those which are GREAT and SPLENDID.

"He is as open in his hatred as in his friendship; for concealment is the part of fear; he regards TRUTH more than opinion, and shews himself manifestly in his words and actions, declaring his mind with full freedom, which indicates both his own love of truth, and his contempt for the opinions of others: but this openness of character is liable to one exception, for he is much given to irony, dissembling his merits before the vulgar, who are unworthy to appreciate them.

"He can show undue complaisance for no one's humors, except those of his friends, for flattery is a low and servile vice. He is not prone to admire, for he deems nothing great. He is not mindful of injuries, which his magnanimity teaches him to despise. He has no man's panegyrist or slanderer; he talks not of himself, nor does he blame others, nor speak ill even of his ENEMIES, except when their insolence excites his indignation.

"His gait is slow; his tone of voice grave; his pronounciation firm. Haste and rapidity betoken too much solicitude. He therefore is seldom in haste, who deems few things worthy of his pursuit; nor is he often eager who thinks few things of importance: quickness and sharpness of voice proceeding from earnestness and eagerness."

Thus far the author of our portrait of Mr. PITT. But accurate as it is, it was written without personal knowledge. The man might derive some features from the character, the character nothing from the man. Not to keep the reader too long in suspense, we have made ANTIQUITY delineate Mr. PITT for POSTERITY. The writer is ARISTOTLE, and these are the characteristics of MAGNANIMITY!!

TO A LADY, WHO HAD A SCAR ON HER BREAST.

Oh! tell not me her heart is cold,
Soft, soft as Venus' dove;
Her heart the gentlest wish can hold,
Her heart is made for love.

For on her breast I chanc'd to spy
A scar from Cupid's dart;
A nest, where little Cupids lie
In ambush for the heart!

Oh! if to touch that hallow'd place
My happy lips might dare,
I would not wake a single Grace,
Or Love, that nestles there.

Should on my lips one love remain,
Fast clinging like a bee;
Sweetest, I'll kiss thy breast again,
And give him back to thee.

TRANSLATION FROM THE ANTHOLOGIA.

With simplest fare my cloth is spread;
Nor gold nor silver grace my board;
No tapestry round this humble shed
Enthrones in state its purple lord.

My friend, a soul at ease is mine,
I boast to serve a gentle muse;
And o'er my roof the clustering wine
Pours for that friend its mellow juice.

ANOTHER.

Loving, I was belov'd, and I enjoy'd:—
Still with strong tide my ready passions flow;
But who the lover, or the love,
Or where the theft—the powers above,
And you, my goddess, only know.

ANOTHER.

'Twas she—'twas she, the gentle maid,
At eve, beneath the myrtle shade,
Kiss'd me with moist and pulpy lip:
Even yet that rich, ripe, rapturous kiss,
That balmy breath and nectar'd bliss,
Feast of the gods! I seem to sip!
Love's honied draughts can never cloy:
But ah! it seems of passion tost,
Now, now, my madd'ning soul is lost,
Drunk with the mighty joy.

O tell me no more of the fir-shaded hill,
Where Contentment securely might grow;
Nor mention the murmur'ing sound of a rill,
Which bubbles so sweetly below.

The grove's smiling verdure no longer can please,
Though so gay and enchantingly fair;
Nor reason talk down a fond bosom to ease,
That is tortur'd with love and despair.

A wound, which the hand or the head may endure,
A relief from the lancet can find;
But say, what physician can e'er hope to cure
A latent disease of the mind!

In vain all the force and extent of his art
The medical blockhead applies;
For beauty will ever reign over the heart,
Till nature deprive us of eyes.

FRIENDLY COUNSEL.

When Foote to George Coleman his patent had sold,
One morn, he by chance up the Haymarket stroll'd, Took a peep at his quondam Palæstrum, and there he
The new manager found in a pleasant quandary.
'We're rehearsing, says George, 'Thé Upholsterer'

to-day, sir;
And, of all your old troop, he who personates Razor,
Who should gape till he sets in a roar all the house,
Will not open a mouth fit to swallow a mouse;
From morning to noon, and from evening to dawn,
I've been at him, but, zounds! I can't make the dog yawn.'

Sam look'd grave 'as a judge—' Coly, give me your hand!
I'm your friend, you shall soon see his grinders expand:
Go, read your new comedy† to him, d'ye hear?
And I'll bet you ten pounds that he'll yawn for a year.'

How I love the festive boy
Tripping wild the dance of joy!
How I love the mellow sage Smiling though the veil of age
And, when'er this man of years
In the dance of joy appears
Age is on his temples hung
But his heart, his heart is young!

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The biography of Chatterton, which has of late so much occupied our attention, is now concluded, and we cannot dismiss so interesting an article, without again exhorting every youth of genius and strong passions to meditate upon the habits, the fortune, and the fate of one of the most extraordinary characters of which the annals of literature make any mention. In this day's paper his character is fairly and faithfully delineated; and while admiring mortals mourn over his misfortunes, and regret his errors, let them gaze at the perennial column of his fame, and say this monument of genius was industriously and perseveringly erected by puerile hands, struggling with Poverty, with Pride, with Disappointment, and with Death.

In our department of Polite Literature, the article, which so learnedly and elegantly analyses the oratorical works of CICERO challenges the attention of every classical scholar.

We entreat 'ITHACUS' to correspond, as often as his liberal leisure will allow, and upon any topic, which his good taste may adopt, or his excursive fancy find.

In our next, we shall publish something, of an exquisite polish, from the pen of THOMAS MOORE, Esq. one of the politest scholars of Great Britain, who has emulated the Grecian graces of Anacreon, and who has warbled the songs of Festivity and Love, in a mode so faithful to feeling, and so responsive to taste, that WALLER himself is not more, enchanting.

The Oration upon the absurdity of Good Breeding in a republic was actually delivered, on a recent occasion, by a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania. The Editor will not omit this opportunity of expressing his cordial approbation of an ingenious satire, which so justly and so poignantly assails one of the shameful and savage effects of a form of government, and a system of manners, more execrable than even the canting commonwealth of Cromwell, or the grim despotism of Algiers.

* A farce by Arthur Murphy, the humour of which is chiefly confined to the character of Razor, a gossiping barber, who entertains the audience with gaping and grimace.

VERNAL ADDRESS TO W.

Clad in the varied robe of May,
Fair Spring unveil'd the humid hours,
O'er hills and meads, and valleys gay,
Her verdant path was strew'd with flowers:
But ah! my timid bosom beats
When nature opes her treasur'd sweets.

Charms, which deride the gloss of art,
In friendship's purest form were given;
And closely to my beating heart
I clasp'd the precious boon of heaven,
With whisper soft, and aspect mild,
'Twas nature that my heart beguil'd.

The lily pale, and blushing rose,
Their balmy odours breathe around,
And where the tepid zephyr blows
The drooping willow sweeps the ground:
But memory saddens every view,
And all is ting'd with sorrow's hue.

For lo! in yonder shelter'd scene,
The cherub Peace securely dwelt;
And tender Love, with brow serene,
Embosom'd all the bliss I felt:
How sweet its fragrance, and how fair,
Thy filial fondness can declare.

Yet he, who points the diamond's ray,
And bade the gold of Ophir shine,
Whom Evangelic hosts obey,
(Enthron'd in majesty divine.)
'Twas nature's God who taught my heart
With all created joys to part. E

SELECTED POETRY.

[In a very scarce miscellany, intitled 'Davison's Poems, or a poetical rhapsodie, divided into sixe bookes, the fourth impression, newly corrected and augmented, and put into a forme more pleasing to the reader, Lond. 1621, 12mo.' the following poem is found. It is intitled 'The Lye,' and is reported to have been written by Sir Walter Raleigh, the night before his execution. Of this tradition the evidence does not appear full nor satisfactory, but the ballad, inspired by whatever muse, is the sarcastic language of a disappointed man, and sometimes, in vigorous verse, conveys useful truth.]

Goe, soule, the bodies guest,
Upon a thanklesse arrant,
Feare not to touch the best,
The truth shall be thy warrant.
Goe, since I needs must die,
And give the world the lye.

Goe, tell the court it glowes,
And shines like rotten wood;
Goe, tell the church it shoves
What's good, and doth no good:
If church and court reply,
Then give them both the lye.

Tell potentates, they live
Acting by others actions;
Not loved, unless they give,
Not strong, but by their factions:
If potentates reply,
Give potentates the lye.

Tell men of high condition,
That rule affairs of state,
Their purpose is ambition,
Their practice only hate:
And if they once reply,
Then give them all the lye.

Tell them that brave it most,
They beg for more by spending,
Who in their greatest cost
Seek nothing but commending:

And, if they make reply,
Spare not to give the lye.

Tell zeal it lacks devotion;
Tell love it is but lust;
Tell time it is but motion;
Tell flesh it is but dust:
And wish them not reply,
For thou must give the lye.

Tell age it daily wasteth,
Tell honour how it alters;
Tell beauty how she blasteth,
Tell favour how she falters:
And as they shall reply,
Give each of them the lye.

Tell wit how much it wrangles
In tickle points of nicenesse;
Tell wisdom she entangles
Herself in overwisenesse:
And, if they do reply,
Straight give them both the lye.

Tell physicke of her boldnesse;
Tell skill it is pretension;
Tell charity of coldnesse;
Tell law it is contention:
And, as they yield reply,
So give them still the lye.

Tell fortune of her blindness;
Tell nature of decay;
Tell friendship of unkindnesse;
Tell justice of delay:
And if they dare reply,
Then give them all the lye.

Tell arts, they have no soundnesse,
But vary by esteeming;
Tell schools, they want profoundnesse,
And stand too much on seeming:
If arts and schools reply,
Give arts and schools the lye.

Tell faith, it's fled the citie;
Tell how the country erreth;
Tell manhood shakes off pitie;
Tell virtue least preferreth:
And if they doe reply,
Spare not to give the lye.

So, when thou hast, as I
Commanded thee, done blabbing;
Although to give the lye
Deserves not less than stabbing,
Yet, stab at thee who will,
No stab the soule can kill.

ON THE EXILE AND DEATH OF OVID.

FROM THE LATIN OF POLITIAN.

And finds the Roman bard a foreign grave
Where Euxine rolls the inhospitable wave!
Thy bard, O Love, by rudest hands inhum'd,
Sleeps he near Ister's gelid stream entomb'd!
Those charities, the Getan fierce supplies,
Which Rome, unblushing, to her son denies!
Far from his natal soil—ye Muses, say
What sympathies his dying pangs allay?
On the bland couch who bids his limbs repose?
Who, with sweet converse charms his lingering woes?

Tries with officious hand the salient vein?
Or with emollients, hastes to assuage his pain?
With death suffus'd, who closes now his eye,
And bending o'er him marks his panting sigh?
Ah! none—detain'd in regions far remov'd,
Each fond associate, and each friend belov'd.
Ah! none—the ill fated husband's—father's care,
His spouse—his offspring, Rome forbids to share.

Say, can the rude Sarmatian, school'd to steel
His savage breast, say can he learn to feel?
Of haggard aspect, who insatiate drains
Life's reeking current from his courser's veins;
'Neath those froze locks that shade his tangled brow,

Say, can that hollow eye with mercy glow?
—Blush, Romans, blush;—lo! Goths his fate deplore,
And pity meets him on that dreary shore:
His fate—those rocks that heard him, erst, complain,
And brutes, no longer fierce, that mark'd his pain.

See Venus, hastening from her favour'd isle,
Bids her plum'd flutterers light his funeral pile.
Then, when the self-exhausted flames decline,
His whitening ashes to their vase consign,
And thus inscribe the stone—'Lo here he lies,
Who sung Love's wiles, solicitudes and joys.'—
Herself ambrosial odours sprinkling round.
Thrice, and four times, bedews the hallow'd ground.

Ye too, Pierian maids! with plaintive strains
Beyond my flight, embalm your bard's remains.

[The low simplicity of the following ballad, will probably, render it acceptable to the village wooer.]

Did ever swain a nymph adore,
As I ungrateful Nanny do?
Was ever shepherd's heart so sore,
Or ever broken heart so true?
My cheeks are wet with tears, but she
Has never wet a cheek for me.

If Nanny call'd did e'er I stray,
Or linger, when she bid me run?
She only had the word to say
And all she wish'd was quickly done:
I always think of her, but she Does ne'er bestow a thought on me.

To let her cows my clover taste,
Did I not rise by break of day?
Did ever Nanny's heifers fast,
If Robin in his barn had hay?
Tho' to my fields they welcome were,
I ne'er was welcome yet to her.

If ever Nanny lost a sheep,
I cheerfully did gave her two;
And I her lambs did safely keep Within my folds in frost and snow:
Have they not there from cold been free?
But Nanny still is cold to me.

When Nanny to the well did come,
'Twas I that did her pitchers fill?
Full as they were, I brought them home?
Her corn I carried to the mill;
My back did bear the sack, but she
Will never bear the sight of me.

To Nanny's poultry oats I gave,
I'm sure they always had the best;
Within this week, her pigeons have
Eat up a peck of peas at least.
Her little pigeons kiss, but she
Will never take a kiss from me.

Must Robin always Nanny woo,
And Nanny still on Robin frown?
Alas, poor wretch, what shall I do,
If Nanny do not love me soon?
If no relief to me she'll bring,
I'll hang me in her apron string.

*Loquax—gracili modulante Thalia,

VIRGILII Culex.

A new and very witty correspondent has sent me the following mock criticism, which, far from plagiarising from the page of CANNING, has very happily emulated his celebrated analysis of the nursery ballad, 'The queen of hearts, she made some tarts,' &c.* I should be unjust to my brother Lounger, if I omitted to insert, that, in his private letter to me, he very modestly states that he recollects an essay on a similar subject, but is not conscious of the servility of an imitation; and that if either its length, or its nature, render it improper for insertion, the Editor may, without ceremony, like the shepherd of the divine poet,

Loquem stipulam crepetantibus ammis.

The article in question shall not be put to this fiery trial, and Mr. Saunter himself would deserve to be singed, should he burn a single sentence which Genius has given to Mirth.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

AMONG critical writers it is a common remark, that the fashion of the times has often given a temporary reputation to performances of very little merit, and neglected those, much more deserving of applause. This circumstance renders it necessary that some person of sufficient sagacity to discover and to describe what is beautiful, and so impartial as to disregard vulgar prejudices, should guide the public taste, and raise merit from obscurity. Without arrogating to myself these qualities, I shall endeavour to introduce to the nation a work, which, though of considerable elegance, has been strangely overlooked by the generality of the world. The performance to which I allude, has never enjoyed that celebrity to which it is entitled, but it has of late fallen into disrepute, chiefly from the simplicity of its style, which, in this age of luxurious refinement, is deemed only a secondary beauty, and from its being the favourite of the young, who can relish, without being able to illustrate, its excellence. I rejoice that it has fallen to my lot to rescue from neglect this inimitable poem; for, whatever may be my diffidence, as I shall pursue the manner of the most eminent critics, it is scarcely possible to err. The fastidious reader will doubtless smile when he is informed that the work, thus highly praised, is a poem consisting only of four lines; but as there is no reason why a poet should be restricted in his number of verses, as it would be a very sad misfortune if every rhymers were obliged to write a long as well as a bad poem; and more particularly as these verses contain more beauty than we often find in a poem of four thousand, objections to its brevity should cease. I must at the same time acknowledge that at first I doubted in what class of poetry it should be arranged. Its extreme shortness, and its uncommon metre, seemed to degrade it into a ballad, but its interesting subject, its unity of plan, and, above all, its having a beginning, a middle, and an end, decide its claim to the epic rank. I shall now proceed, with the candour, though not with the acuteness, of a good critic, to analyse and display its various excellencies.

The opening of the poem is singularly beautiful.

Jack and Gill.

The first duty of the poet is to introduce his subject, and there is no part of poetry more difficult. We are told by the great critic of antiquity that he should avoid beginning 'ab ovo,' but go into the business at once. Here our author is very happy: for instead of telling us, as an ordinary writer would have done, who were the ancestors of Jack and Gill, that the grandfather of Jack was a respectable farmer, that his mother kept a tavern at the sign of the Blue Bear; and that Gill's father was a justice of the peace, (one of the quorum), together with a catalogue of titles and aunts, he introduces them to us at once in their proper persons. I cannot help accounting it, too, as a circumstance honourable to the genius of the poet, that he does not in his opening call upon his muse. This is an error in which Homer and almost all the epic writers afterwards have fallen; since by thus stating their case to the muse, and desiring her to come to the assistance, they necessarily presupposed that she was absent, whereas there can be no sign of inspiration than for a muse to be unasked. The choice too of names is not unworthy of consideration. It would doubtless have comported to the splendor of the poem to have ended the heroes with long and sounding titles which by dazzling the eyes of the reader, might prevent an examination of the work itself. These aditious ornaments are justly disregarded by our author, who by giving us plain Jack and Gill has dared to rely on extrinsic support. In his choice of appellations he is however judicious. Had he, for instance, called the first character John, he might have given him more dignity but he would not so well harmonise with his neighbour, to whom in the course of the work, it will appear, he must necessarily be joined. I know it may be said, that the contraction of names savours too much of familiarity, and the lovers of proverbs may tell us that too much familiarity breeds contempt; the learned, too, may observe, that Prince Henry somewhere exclaims, 'Here comes lean Jack. here comes bare bones,' and that the association of the two ideas detracts much from the respectability of the former. Disregarding these cavils, I cannot but remark that the lovers of abrupt openings, as in the Bard, must not deny their praise to the vivacity, with which Jack breaks in upon us.

The personages being now seen, their situation is next to be discovered. Of this we are immediately informed in the subsequent line, when we are told,

Jack and Gill
Went up a hill.

Here the imagery is distinct, yet the description concise. We instantly figure to ourselves the two persons travelling up an ascent, which we may accommodate to our own ideas of declivity, barrenness, rockiness, landiness, &c. all which, as they exercise the imagination, are beauties of an high order. The reader will pardon my presumption, if I here attempt to broach a new principle which no critic, with whom I am acquainted, has ever mentioned. It is this that poetic beauties may be divided into negative and positive, the former consisting in the mere absence of fault, the latter in the presence of excellence; the first of an inferior order, but requiring considerable critical acumen to discover them, the latter of a higher rank, but obvious to the meanest capacity. To apply the principle in this case, the poet meant to inform us that two persons were going up a hill. Now the act of going up a hill, although Locke would pronounce it a very complex idea comprehending person, rising ground, trees, &c. &c. is an operation so simple as to need no description. Had the poet, therefore, told us how the two heroes went up, whether in a cart or a waggon, and entered into the thousand particulars which the subject involves they would have been tedious, because superfluous. The omission of these little incidents, and telling us simply that they went up the hill, no matter how, is a very high negative beauty. These considerations may furnish us with the means of deciding a controversy, arising from a variation in the manuscripts; some of which have it a hill, and others the hill, for as the description is in no other part local, I incline to the former reading. It has, indeed, been suggested that the hill here mentioned was Parnassus, and that the two persons are two poets, who having overloaded Pegasus, the poor jaded creature was obliged to stop at the foot of the hill, whilst they ascended for water to recruit him. This interpretation, it is true, derives some countenance from the consideration that Jack and Gill were in reality, as will appear in the course of the poem, going to draw water, and that there was such a place as

* See the 'Microcosm,' an ingenious periodical paper by the E. onians.

Hippocrene, that is a horsepond, at the top of the hill; but, on the whole, I think the text, as I have adopted it, to be the better reading.

POLITE LITERATURE.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 2.

Of the Roman Orators who preceded Cicero, and of the beginnings of this Orator.

Cicero, in his treatise of celebrated orators, where they maintain a dialogue with Atticus and Brutus, after having spoken of the Greeks who distinguished themselves, in eloquence, from Pericles to Demetrius Phalerius, who, with a great deal of merit, began, however, to introduce some alteration in the purity of the Attick taste, and marked the first degree in the decline of it, comes to those of the Romans, who, from the earliest times of the republic, had made themselves a name by the talent of speaking. He traces an enumeration, extensive enough to give us an idea, how this art had been a long time cultivated, without making any remarkable progress down to the time of Cato, the Censor, and to the Gracchi; the only ones whom he characterises in a manner to give us a great idea of them; not indeed that of perfection, (they were yet far from it), but that of genius not yet guided by art nor polished by taste. Vehemence and pathos, were the characteristics of Gracchi; gravity and energy, those of Cato: but all the three wanted still that elegance and harmony, that art of arranging words, and constructing periods, which occupy so great a space in the art of oratory, not less obliged than poetry, to regard the ear as the way to the heart. The Gracchi appear to have been in the number of those who were first instructed in the literature of the Greeks, which then began to be known in Rome. History informs us, that they owed this instruction, at that time very rare to the excellent education which they received from their mother Cornelia. But the Latin language, was not yet brought to perfection. This was not effected till the seventh century of Rome, at the epocha when Anthony, Crassus, Scaevola, Sulpitius, and Cotta flourished, all of whom we have seen make a great figure in the dialogues of Cicero, concerning the orator. The eulogium he makes of them is founded partly on a tradition which was easily preserved among so many auditors and judges; for several of them had written nothing, and those of them whose works were in the hands of Cicero, have not escaped the injuries of time. We know nothing of them but by the honorable testimony which he records in their favour. So that the whole history of Roman eloquence, and all the monuments of their orators which remain to us, are included in the writings of Cicero.

When he first appeared in the career of oratory, Hortensius held the first rank in it. He was called the prince of the bar. Cicero, in the first step which he took, encountered this illustrious adversary, had the glory to contend with him advantageously, and to merit his esteem and his friendship. But, he himself informs us, and his known impartiality renders him worthy of credit, that Hortensius, did not support his reputation to the end. He perceived not, that the splendor and ornaments which were the principal merit of his discourses, his action more suitable for the theatre than that for the tribunals, all those seductions which had excited the applauses of his youth, were less conformable to a more mature age; when more important qualities are expected, to give his sentiment all the weight and all the dignity which belongs to experience. Hortensius was seen to decline, in proportion as Cicero rose. This unequal competition, cast a cloud upon their connection. Cicero thought he had reason to complain of him in the time of his exile, which, however, did not hinder him from paying at his death, the tribute of regret, which so good a citizen as he, could not refuse to the merit of a rival, and to the interest of the state, which had so often united them in the same party.

The fairest triumph which he obtained over him, was in the affair of Verres, of which I propose to speak in detail. But it is necessary, for the glory of our orator, to observe beforehand, that in this cause, as in many others which he undertook, there was as much courage necessary to engage in it, as there was of honour in succeeding in it. It occurred in times of trouble and of corruption: intrigue, influence, power, frequently prevailed in the tribunals over equity. Frequently the oppressor was so powerful, that the oppressed could not obtain a defender. This had occurred, for example, in the prosecution against Roscius of Ameria, who, in those times, when the proscriptions of Sylla had silenced all the laws; had been despoiled of his fortune by two of his relations, who had murdered his father, although he was not in the number of the proscribed, and who, fearing that the son would reclaim his property, had dared to charge him with the assassination which they had committed, and instituted against him an accusation of parricide. They were supported by the credit of Crisogon, who had shared in the spoils. This was a freedman of Sylla, all powerful with his master, who was then dictator. None of the lawyers had dared to expose himself to the resentment of an enemy so formidable. Cicero, at the age of six and twenty, had this noble boldness. Full of that indignation which injustice inspires, and which a timid prudence too often damps in the age of experience, but which kindles the blood of a young man well born; transported also, perhaps, by that ardor to distinguish himself, one of the happiest attributes of youth, he, alone, dared to speak, when all the world was silent: a resolution so much the more astonishing, as it was the first public cause which he pleaded. Those were called public causes which were carried before the senators, or the Roman knights, and were distinguished from private causes, which were tried in the inferior tribunals.

Another merit, not less admirable, is, that he displayed in his pleadings, all that address and all that reserve, which courage does not ways possess. In attacking Crisogon with the force of which he was capable, and in rendering him as odious as possible, he preserves to Sylla all imaginable management, and takes part which is always the most prudent. When we contend against authority, that of suppositing that it is uninformed, and even that it could be informed. We are ignorant what was the event of this prosecution; but we know that little time afterwards, he had still the same conscience, and defended the right of certain cities Italy, to the citizenship of Rome, against an oppressive law of Sylla, which took it away from them. Plutarch, who wrote more than a century after Cicero, believes that his voyage into Greece, and his absence for two years, had for their motive, not the necessity for restoring his health as he gave out; but an apprehension of the resentment of Sylla. This opinion of Plutarch is contradicted by other testimonies much more authentic, from which we learn, that Cicero gained a year at Rome after the prosecution of Crisogon. The noble and courageous conduct which marked his entrance to the bar, was afterwards one of the most pleasing recollections that his old age. He speaks of it to his son with complacency, and cites to him, his own example as a lesson to all those who devoted themselves to the same profession; and who ought to be well convinced, that nothing is more proper, to merit for them early the public consideration, than such generous sacrifices which defy all danger when the question is, the protection of innocence. This is the sentiment which animates him in the accusation against Verres. It is true, that in this cause, he had great advantages. He was in the vigour of age, and in the career of honors. He had exercised the quaestor in Sicily with reputation, and had been designated as Edile. The Roman people, charmed with his eloquence, and convinced of his virtue, lavished their favours upon him on all occasions. Public applauses followed him wherever he went; but it is not less true, that in attacking Verres, he had great difficulties to overcome. Verres, guilty as he was, felt himself supported by the credit of a man that was most powerful in Rome. The grandees, who regarded it as one of their rights, to enrich themselves, in the government of the provinces, by the most crying extortions, made a common cause with him, and saw nothing in the punishment which threatened him, but an example to be dreaded by them. They employed all possible means to screen him from the severity of the laws. Cicero, to whom the Sicilians had addressed their complaints, as to the natural protector of this province, since he had been quaestor in it, was gone upon the spot to collect the testimonies which he wanted against the accused. He had requested three months and an half for this journey; but he learned that they were intriguing to draw out this affair into length, and until the following year, when M. Metellus was to be praetor, and Q. Metellus, and Hortensius, consuls. These were the very defenders of Verres, and such concurrence of circumstances would have furnished them with too many means of saving him. Cicero made so much diligence, that his information was all obtained in fifty days. He returned to Rome at a moment when they least expected him, and considering that his pleadings might take up a great number of audiences, and consume much precious time, he made them proceed directly to the examination of witnesses, and pronounced only one discourse, in which, upon every fact alleged he cited the witnesses whom he presented to his adversary, Hortensius, who was appointed to interrogate them. The proofs were so clear, the dispositions so decisive, the murmurs of the Roman people, who were present, were heard with so much violence, that Hortensius, thunderstruck, dared not to speak in opposition to the evidence, but advised Verres not to stand the trial, but to exile himself from Rome. When we read in Cicero the detail of his atrocious and innumerable crimes, any one of which alone would have merited death, we feel an indignation that the Roman jurisprudence, worthy of commendation in so many respects, had more respect for the title of a Roman citizen, than for that distributive justice, which proportions the punishment to the fault, and permitted that every citizen who condemned himself to banishment, should be regarded as sufficiently punished. Verres, nevertheless, had a miserable end but his crimes were only the occasion, not the cause of it. After having led in exile, a miserable life, abandoned and despised, he returned to Rome in the time of the proscriptions of Octavius and Antony; but having had the imprudence to refuse to the latter, the beautiful vases of Corinth, and the admirable Greek statues, which were the relics of his depredations in Sicily, he was placed in the number of the proscribed, and Verres perished like Cicero.

This was the only time that this great man, who was occupied incessantly in the defence of the accused, came forward as an accuser; and it is with this interesting remark, that he begins his first oration against Verres. The unexpected turn which this affair took, was the cause, that of seven harangues of which it is the subject, the two first only were pronounced. Cicero wrote the others, to leave a model of the manner in which an accusation ought to be pursued and supported in all its parts. The two last, commonly considered as master pieces, have for their object, the one, the robberies and rapines of Verres, the other his cruelties and barbarities. One is remarkable for the riches of the details, the variety and pleasantry of the narrations; for all that art which the orator employs to prevent satiety in relating a crowd of pillages, whose foundation is always the same; the other is admirable for its vehemence and pathos, and for all the springs he sets in motion to excite pity in favour of the oppressed, and indignation against the guilty. It is of this last, that I have thought it my duty to translate a few passages: while they make us feel the eloquence of the orator, they have moreover for us, the precious advantage of giving us an idea of the arbitrary power exercised by the Roman governors, in the provinces, confided to them; and of the horrible abuse which they too often committed, when the corruption of manners had prevailed over the wisdom of the laws. It is, in casting our eyes over these pictures, so disgusting to humanity, that in spite of all the splendor with which the Roman grandeur strikes the imagination. We render thanks to Heaven for the annihilation of a power so naturally tyrannical, that to whatever extremity she carried it, it was absolutely necessary to suffer until upon the expiration of the government, they might go to Rome to solicit a satisfaction, uncertain, feeble, tardy, which could not expiate the crimes, nor redress the wrongs. It is for this reason, that without attending to discourses relative to private causes, whose details cannot interest us on their own account, I have chosen all the examples with which I choose to recite, in those harangues in which the public interest is implicated, and eloquence and history combine together to instruct and affect us.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF WILLIAM WHITEHEAD.

[By that malignant tribe, who are naturally envious of the good fortune of those, who by chance or merit have acquired the favour and protection of greatness, the muse and memory of William Whitehead have been assailed with furious rancour. Because he was Poet Laureat to a Prince it has been thought necessary by the tools of faction to deny him his merit as a writer, and his independence as a man. Every grumbling patriot, every witting of opposition has endeavoured to tarnish his reputation and pluck the laurel from his brow. From the specimens, from the polished severity of Junius down to the gross abuse of the spur-gall'd hackney, this amiable poet has experienced all the varieties of invective. He has been ridiculed by some, and cursed by others; but sneers and banter and execration have had their brief reign, and it is time for TRUTH and REASON to vindicate their sway. From a careful perusal of his works, and from the subsequent honest record of his life it manifestly appears that he was neither a court parasite, nor a dull versifier. His 'Odes,' the peculiar object of much false and malignant criticism, are often very spirited and elegant specimens of Lyric Poetry. To the sarcasms of Churchill, who was probably biassed by the notorious John Wilkes, we may boldly oppose the better judgment of Gray. Mr. Mason too, who had acquired a right to decide, declared that he found, to the poet's honor, more variety of sentiment and expression than could be expected from the uniformity of his topics from which he composed in compliance with the forms of his office. I persuade myself, continues Mr. Mason, the reader must agree with me in thinking that no court poet ever had fewer courtly stains, and that his page is, at the least, as white as Addison's.]

William Whitehead was born in the parish of St. Botolph, Cambridge, in February 1714-15. He was the second son of Richard Whitehead, a baker, who lived in the parish of St. Botolph, and who in that capacity, served in the neighbouring College of Pembroke-Hall. He was of a very careless disposition, attending little to business, and employing his time chiefly in ornamenting, rather than cultivating, a few acres of land near the neighbouring village of Grantchester, which still goes by the name of Whitehead's Folly. At his death, he left considerable debts which his son very honourably discharged, by the profits arising from his theatrical productions. His mother was a very amiable, pious, prudent, and exemplary woman. Their eldest son, John, who was born fifteen years before the poet, was educated for the church, and by the interest of Mr. Bromley, afterwards Lord Montfort, obtained the living of Pershore, in the diocese of Worcester. They had also one daughter, who died in infancy.

He received the first rudiments of his education at some common school in Cambridge; but at the age of fourteen, he was removed to Winchester having obtained a nomination into that college, by means of Mr. Bromley, July 6, 1728.

At school, according to the information of Dr. Balguy, he was always of a delicate turn; and though obliged to go to the hills with the other boys, he spent his time there in reading either plays or poetry, and was also particularly fond of the 'Atalantis,' and other books of private history in character. He very early exhibited his taste for poetry; for while other boys were contented with showing up twelve or fourteen lines, he would fill half a sheet, but always with English verse. At sixteen he wrote a whole comedy. In the winter of the year 1732, he is said to have acted a female part in the 'Andria,' under Dr. Norton's direction. It is certain, that he acted Marcia in the tragedy of 'Cato,' with much applause.

In 1733, the earl of Peterborough, having Pope at his house, near Southampton, carried him to Winchester, to show him the college, &c. The Earl gave ten guineas, to be disposed of in prizes among the boys, and Pope set them a subject to write upon, viz. Peterborough. Prizes of a guinea each were given to six of the boys, among whom Whitehead was one. The remaining sum was laid out for other boys, in subscriptions. Pine's Horace, then about to be published.

He never excelled in writing epigrams, nor did he make any considerable figure in Latin verse though he understood the classics very well, and had a good memory. He was, however, employed to translate into Latin the first epistle of the 'Essay on Man;' and the translation is still extant in his own hand. Dobson's success in translating Prior's 'Solomon,' had put this project into Pope's head; and he set various persons to work upon it.

His school-friendships were usually contracted, either with noblemen or gentlemen of large fortune, such as Lord Drumlanrig, Sir Charles Douglas, Sir Robert Burdett, Mr. Tryon, Mr. Munday of Leidenham, and Sir Bryan Broughton, to whom, after he removed to Oxford, he sent a poeticalistle from Winchester. The choice of these pens was imputed by some of his school fellows to vanity, by others, to prudence; but it might be owing to his delicacy, as this would make him less disgusted with the coarser manners of ordinary boys.

He was school-tutor to Mr. Wallop, afterwards Lord Arlington father to the present Earl of Portsmouth. He enjoyed, for some little time, a lucrative place in the college, that of propositior of the hall.

He had not resided at Winchester above two years, before his father died. However, by his own frugality, and what small assistance his mother could give him, he was enabled to continue at school till he could appear a candidate for an election to New college.

At the election, in September 1735 he was treated with singular injustice; for, though the force of superior interest, he was placed so low on the roll, that it was scarcely possible for him to succeed to New College. Young, several years before, experienced the same fate.

Being now superannuated, he left Winchester of course, deriving no other advantage from the college than a good education, which he gratefully acknowledges, in the beautiful elegy addressed To the Reverend Dr. Lowth, on his 'Life of William of Wykeham.'

From the same fount, with reverence let me boast,
The classic streams with early thirst I caught,
What time, they say, the muses revell'd most,
When Bigg presided, and when Burton taught.

Two months after his disappoinment at Winchester, he removed to the place of his nativity, where the peculiar circumstances of his being the orphan son of a baker of Cambridge, gave him an unquestionable claim to one of the scholarships, founded at Clare-Hall, by Mr. Thomas Pyke, of that trade and town. His mother accordingly admitted him a sizer of this college, under the tuition of Messrs. Curling, Goddard, and Hopkinson, November 26 1735; and the scholarship, though it amounted only to four shillings a-week, was in his circumstances a desirable object.

The notice which Pope had taken of him at school, prevented the inferiority of his station from being any hindrance to his introduction into the best company. The ease and the natural politeness of his manners, added to an agreeable and pleasing countenance, would also facilitate the reception of a young man, who had only his ingenuity to recommend him. It was likewise very fortunate for him to find many persons who have since figured highly in the literary and great world, contemporary students in the university. Among the number of his immediate contemporaries were the honourable Charles Townshend, doctor Powell, doctor Balguy, doctor Ogden, doctor Stubbing, and doctor Hurd, the present bishop of Worcester, with all whom he contracted a particular intimacy.

The poetical faculties of Whitehead now began to make a rapid progress; and he has himself explained the cause, in his Elegy to doctor Lowth. He insinuates that he thought it rather fortunate than otherwise, that he was not removed from Winchester to Oxford, on account of the society of such men as it was his felicity to find contemporary students at Oxford.

And sure in Granta's philosophic shade,
Truth's genuine image beam'd upon my sight,
And slow-eyed reason lent her sober aid,
To form, deduce, compare, and judge aright,
Yes, ye sweet fields! beside your osier'd stream,
Full many an Attic hour my youth enjoy'd,
Full many a friendship form'd, life's happiest dream,
And treasur'd many a bliss which never cloy'd.

The first pieces he published, were verses on public occasions, the Marriage of the Prince of Wales, in 1736, inserted in the Cambridge Gratiulations. They little excel the prize-verses he wrote at school, which have but little merit, if we deduct from them that of mere easy versification, which he seems to have acquired by sedulously imitating Pope's manner. Neither his fancy nor judgment appear to have risen in any degree equal to what in common progress might be expected from a mind, which, a very few years after, exhibited both these qualities so strikingly.

Among the many pieces written at that early period, the Vision of Solomon is the only one that seems to indicate the future poet.

This, perhaps, would not have been the case, had he taken the versification of Spenser, Fairfax, Milton, and poets similar to them, for his model, rather than the close and condensed couplets of Pope; for in that way of writing, his fancy would have developed itself earlier, and perhaps have obtained greater strength and powers of exertion. But though he had read Spenser in his childhood with avidity, and was fully capable, as appears by the vision of Solomon, of catching his manner; yet the fashion of the time led him to exercise himself in that mode of composition, which was then esteemed the best. He began to write verses first before the school of Milton rose in emulation of the school of Pope, and had even become an author before Collins, Akenside, Gray, Warton, Mason, and some others had diffused just ideas of a more perfect species of poetry, by substituting fiction and fancy, picturesque description and romantic imagery, for wit and rhyme, sentiment and satire, polished numbers, sparkling couplets, and pointed periods.

In 1741, he published his beautiful epistle On the Danger of writing Verse, with which he only first commenced a poet. It exhibited such a specimen of elegant versification, such close and condensed expression, so much sense, enlivened with all the fancy the didactic species of its composition would admit, that it obtained general admiration, and was highly approved by Pope himself, of whose preceptive manner it is surely one of the most happy imitations extant.

In June 1742, he was elected fellow of Clare-Hall, about a year before he commenced master of arts. His mother dying in April before, had not the satisfaction of seeing her son thus fixed in a situation which was probably the height of her ambition. Yet his irreproachable conduct, as a collegiate, his great proficiency as a scholar, and his rising reputation as a poet, must have sufficiently removed her fears concerning his future advancement. To her, and indeed to both his parents, he seems always to have born the truest filial affection, as appears from the first of his epistolary poems To the honourable Charles Townsend, and the Verses to his Mother, on her Birth-day, which place his moral qualities in a pleasing light. A mother who impressed upon her son that early sense of a God and a Providence, which he retained through life, affords an example worthy of imitation.

In 1743, he published Atys and Adrastus, a pleasing and pathetic tale, taken from Herodotus, in which, with equal judgment, though not with equal force, he copied the narrative style of Dryden, in his "Fables."

The same year, he published an epistle in the manner of Ovid, from Ann Bullen to Henry the Eighth, in which, though he made a judicious use of the queen's original letter, and in his own additions preserved a true characteristic unity with it, yet it cannot with justice be ranked high among the numerous productions of this kind.

His next poem was his Essay on Ridicule, which also appeared in 1743. This is a studied performance, the parts of it put together with much care, and that chain of reasoning preserved in it, which the subject seemed to demand. In the edition of 1774, some lines at the conclusion of the poem, which he thought authorized too free a use of his talent, are omitted. In its first state, he had neither mentioned the name of Swift nor of Pope publicly, because he did not think either of them had employed it with sufficient reserve. Yet he had there held Lucian, Cervantes, and Addison as legitimate models. But in the last edition, the palm of just ridicule is given to Addison alone.

The publication of this poem was soon after followed by Nobility, an Epistle to the Earl of Ashburnham, written also in happy imitation of Pope's manner. This poem, for what reason is not known, he did not insert in either of the editions of his works.

During the time of his being an under graduate, he lived a very studious life, observing the strictest frugality possible, that he might be the less burdensome to an affectionate mother. After taking a very creditable degree, and being emancipated from those mathematical studies for which young men of his tribe seldom have much relish, he wrote rapidly, though not carelessly, for the press; but this rapidity, as it did not continue through life, probably arose at the time, rather from a laudable desire of self-maintenance, than any undue eagerness for poetic fame.

Possessed of a fellowship, it was now his intention to take orders, and with that view, he prepared himself for the church; but shortly afterwards, a circumstance occurred, which led him to defer putting this design into practice, and in the end occasioned his relinquishing the idea altogether.

The late Earl of Jersey was making inquiries after a proper person to take the private tuition of his second son, now become his only hope, from the death of his elder brother; on which account probably he durst not trust him to the dangers of a public education, as his constitution appeared to be very delicate. Fortunately for the young Viscount, Whitehead was recommended to his father, by Mr. Commissary Graves, as a person fully qualified for this important charge. His recommendation was successful; and Whitehead, when the offer was made, did not hesitate to accept it. He therefore in 1745, removed to the earl's house in London, where he was placed upon the most liberal footing. He had also the care of a young friend of the family, now general Stephens, who was brought up with lord Villiers, as the companion of his studies.

At Michaelmas, 1746, he resigned his fellowship, in compliance with lord Jersey's inclination, who wished him, while he continued in his family, not to take orders, which the statutes of Clarehall would have obliged him to do.

Having now many intervals of leisure for his own favorite studies, he employed himself almost entirely in dramatic compositions. He hewed an early talent, not only for writing in the way, but for acting. On his coming to town he wrote a ballad farce, intitled The Edinburgh kilt, in which the young pretender is the principal character. It was not represented, and is still MS.

But he soon attempted higher things, and began a tragedy, called the Roman Father on the subject of Corneille's "Horace," which was produced on the stage at Drury lane, February 24, 1750, and obtained the just approbation of repeated and numerous audiences. He inscribed it, when printed, to the honorable Thomas Villiers, afterwards earl of Clarendon. It has been so frequently exhibited with applause and has shown so many actors and actresses to advantage that it is almost unnecessary to say any thing more concerning it, than that it surely is a great improvement on one of the great Corneille's best tragedies, and may be ranked among the best of the dramatic pieces of this age. It is an improvement of Corneille's play only. The radical defect of the story is not absolutely removed; and after the Curiatii are killed the fable still drags, yet not in any degree as it does in the French tragedy. With respect to the unity of action and of time, the piece is not defective. In point of character, energy and discrimination truly point of style, considered only with respect to its effect upon the stage, it is well calculated for the actor's delivery. It is not perhaps sufficiently elevated for the closet; but there are, in general, more poetical beauties in his dramatic verse, than in that of Corneille.

In 1751, he published his Hymn to the Nymph of Bristol Spring, written in the manner of those classical addresses to heathen divinities, of which the Hymns of Homer and Callimachus are the archetypes. This poem is essentially different in point of style and manner from any of his other productions. The frequent summer excursions which he made to Bristol, with the earl of Jersey and his lady, furnished him with the subject; and the translations of Prior, as well as the poems of Armstrong and Akenside, then in general estimation, directed his taste to the manner in which that subject might best be treated.

He had before written a little fanciful burlesque poem, intitled the Sweepers, which has less of parody, and more of invention than the "Splendid Shilling" of Philips. In this ludicrous, and the other serious poem, he shows himself possessed of an ear well-attuned to that variety of pause and of cadence, which are as essential to the structure of blank verse as rhyme itself is to that species of heroic numbers, to which it gives its name.

The same year, he wrote the beautiful stanzas on Friendship, to a friend who had blamed him for leading a dependent life, and for not taking orders, or entering upon some stated profession. This delicate poem contains his own vindication, and is written with all the careless ease, but with more of elegance than we usually find in similar productions of Prior. It paints, in amiable colours, the character and feelings of the writer, which gives it a charm superior even to the singular felicity of its diction. Yet this latter quality must ever secure it the approbation of all those readers, who can admire pleasing sentiments, expressed with the purest simplicity.

Many other little epistolary compositions flowed with equal ease from his pen at this period, such as the Epistles to Mr. Cambridge, Mr. Garrick, and Mr. Hoadly, and some Tales in the manner of Montaigne and Gay.

When Moore began "The World," in 1753, Whitehead, among others, gave his assistance, and contributed the 12th, 19th, and 58th numbers.

In 1754, he collected his works into a volume, 12mo, among which he inserted his Fatal Constancy, or Love in Tears, a sketch of a tragedy in the high heroic taste, which made part of Foote's farce of "The Diversions of the Morning."

At the time of arranging that volume, he was engaged in preparing for the stage his tragedy Creusa, which was exhibited at Drury Lane Theatre, April 20, 1754, with considerable applause, though not so much as it merited. He inscribed it, when printed, to lord Villiers, now earl of Jersey. It showed the abilities of his favorite actress, Mrs. Pritchard, who performed the part of Creusa to great advantage; and as Garrick and Mossop also took parts in it, the performance was so perfect, that it was hardly possible for it not to succeed in the representation; yet it has seldom been revived, though it shows the dramatic powers of Whitehead to more advantage than the Roman Father, which takes its turn in the course of theatrical exhibitions. The play is founded on the Ion of Euripides, but the plot is extremely heightened, and admirably conducted; nor has there perhaps ever been a more genuine and native simplicity introduced into dramatic writing than that of Ilyssus, bred up in the service of the gods, and kept unacquainted with the vices of mankind. Whoever compares the two dramas, will readily allow, that to alter a story of so very fabulous a kind, in which the intervention of Pagan divinities, appear so necessary, into a probable action, and also where a connected train of natural circumstances resulting one from another, leads to an affecting catastrophe, must have been a work of extreme difficulty. This Whitehead has very successfully achieved. There is hardly a single tragedy of English manufacture in which the three unities are more accurately observed. The language of Creusa is also more elevated than that of the Roman Father; the catastrophe results naturally from the action that precedes it, but it does not satisfy. The crime of the queen, as she so very unwillingly consents to the poisoning of Ilyssus, seems hardly great enough to merit capital punishment. Euripides, who knew her much more criminal, suffers her to exist to the end, and by making Ion attempt to avenge on his unknown mother the crime she had been guilty of, in attempting to poison him, her unknown son, produces an incident truly theatrical. Whitehead, by not admitting this double project of parricide into his plan, has perhaps decreased the theatrical effect, of which the Greek poet had furnished him with the example, and which, had he improved upon it, as he has on all the other incidents of the Ion, might have made the last act much more perfect. It is certain, however, that for this purpose, the preceding plot of the whole piece must have been differently constituted.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[The ensuing letter to the Editor of a literary journal published in London, and conducted by scholars of celebrity, will convince the lovers of polite literature, who honour the Port Folio with a perusal, that the youthful lays of the celebrated Mr. Moore, even when published under the disadvantage of being the posthumous work of an anonymous writer, attracted the attention, and solicited the praise of the most scrupulous. We do not, however, and we know that our friend, Mr. M. does not, subscribe to the opinion of the Critic, respecting Waller. But the Editor owes it to an amiable man and a most accomplished scholar, to declare that the ensuing commendation is but a just tribute to one, who has unquestionably, in all his writings, attained the true secret of fine writing, and, like Addison, Goldsmith, Parnell, Prior, and La Fontaine, can unite highly polished elegance to archly smiling simplicity.]

The spirit of true poesy has been so long laid among the tombs of our literary fathers, that even the apparition of Genius is, and ought to be considered, in our days, highly 'miraculous.' The little volume containing the poetical works of the late T. Little, Esq. is a phenomenon of this kind. The editor, in a very ingenious preface, abounding with classical remark and polite criticism, gives a brief account of the author, who, as it appears, was his particular friend, and a young man of the most ardent sensibility and refined passion. His eulogium on Catullus is elegant and accurate; but I do not coincide in the too favourable opinion he seems to entertain of the 'sentimental levity, the grata protervitas of a Sedly.' The amatory writers of an earlier date were certainly more fanciful, and, at the same time, more natural; I shall only instance the names of a Randolph, or a Drayton, poets, with whose works I doubt not that Mr. Little himself was particularly intimate. To those I do not scruple to add Suckling, as much superior in delicate simplicity to his more famous contemporaries. In describing the warmer emotions of the heart, there is a chastity of expression required, which can alone give a durability of colouring to performances of a nature generally evanescent, or at least liable to decay with their subject. Who, at this period of comparative purity, is delighted with the mythological extravagance of Waller, or the polished pedantry

Lansdown? Their admirers are departed with our grandfathers, or only exist in maiden-aunts, and antiquated beauties who, happily, know very little of the matter. As for the so much celebrated elegies of Hammond, they are, though modern, even less sufferable; the stiff, affected exercises of a school-boy, not the spontaneous and animated effusions of a lover; and I can hardly determine, whether even the mad flights of the Della-crusca tribe, wild and inconsistent as they are, may not be more appropriate to the delineation of those sentiments which owe their very birth to the temporary frenzy of an overheated heart, and, sometimes, of an overheated head. Though some may style this apathy, it is certainly the apathy of reason; and cannot be refuted by the chimerical enthusiasms of any metaphysical inamorato, from the time of Petrarch himself to the present. After this short digression, I shall enter more minutely into a detail of the pieces which so forcibly demand our attention, first pointing out their peculiar characteristics.

Although they may, casually, betray the inconsiderate levity and effervescence of youth, they are, generally, correct and finished; there is much versatility of measure, but the diction and style are uniformly splendid. The playful archness of Matt. Prior has been, in some places, happily imitated, as in the lines, beginning 'Yes, I think I once heard of an amorous youth,' &c. in the song, p. 39; in the 'Kiss;' and in 'Fanny of Timmol.' Many poems, of a more sublime or affecting order, remind us of that simple sweetness which Langhorne once so frequently evinced. The 'Shield' is nothing inferior to the best of Gray's minor odes, and, consequently, will admit of no sort of comparison with the monstrous productions of the day, for which the editor expresses a commendable distaste. 'It screams for the guilt of days that are past,' is awfully true, and worthy of a poet, as is likewise,

While the damp boughs creak, and the swinging shield
Sings to the raving spirit of night.'

The song, p. 115, is infinitely beautiful, and contains much real wit, blended with exquisite tenderness. I shall present it as a specimen:

If I swear by that eye, you'll allow
Its look is so shifting and new,
The oath I might take on it now,
The very next glance would undo!
Those babies that nestle so sly,
Such different arrows have got,
That an oath on the glance of an eye,
Such as your's, may be off in a shot!
Should I swear by the dew on your lip,
Tho' each moment the treasure renews,
If my constancy wishes to trip,
I may kiss off the oath when I choose!
Or a sigh may disperse from that flower
The dew and the oath that are there,
And I'd make a new vow ev'ry hour,
To lose them so sweetly in air!
But clear up the the heav'n of your brow,
Nor fancy my faith is a feather;
On my heart I will pledge you my vow,
And they must be both broken together!

It would be easy to produce specimens of similar excellence, but I forbear to trespass upon the limits of your miscellany, and remain,

Yours, &c.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The phrase 'Enlightened government of France,' made use of in the late message of the President, has given rise to various constructions. The friends, as well as foes of the present administration, are left to conjecture the idea Mr. Jefferson meant it should signify. Though enlightened is not a very vague term, yet one half of the community seem to be in the dark respecting the intention of the author in making use of it. If it had been applied to an individual it would doubtless mean a man of an enlarged and well informed mind, possessing correct and extensive views of things; and we see no reason why the same signification should not be attached to it when applied to a government. But we cannot believe, or rather we hope that Mr. Jefferson did not mean to insinuate anything commendatory of the mode, or the administration, by which the affairs of France are conducted. If he did, it is a sentiment at which the minds of nine-tenths of his enlightened fellow-citizens revolt. The First Consul of France is undoubtedly a despot. In the language of scripture, 'having no law, he is a law unto himself.' The idea he has of justice or religion, is, in the one case, what he deems the aggrandisement of his country, and in the other what current circumstances may require. For a curious specimen of the former let the reader turn to the treaty between France and Spain, at the close of the 4th article, he will find written as follows: 'and the First Consul shall give as an indemnity to the king of Tuscany, the country of Piombono, which belongs to the king of Naples;' or in other words, for some favour I have received of Paul, I will give him the coat, which is the property of Peter.

In 'Ramah Droog, or wine does Wonders' a comic opera from the pen of the lively Cobb, we find the following tolerable specimen of dramatic wit. "Chellingoe, a retainer at an East India Court, asks Liffey, an honest Hibernian, if he ever heard the titles of the Rajah. The Irishman replies in the Negative. Chellingoe then informs him, that "He is the Mighty Monarch the Mahah Rajah, Surooj Seing; that is, the son of the lion, brother to the Son and Moon, and cousin to all the Stars in the Firmament." On which Liffey exclaims, 'what blessed weather you must have in this country, if he and his relations are on good terms together. I suppose a foggy day, or a dark night, is a sure sign of a quarrel in the family!'

Smoke Jacks are now vending in London, which, in the eloquent language of the maker, are on an entire new principle, applicable to all chimnies, will go years without once oiling, and will roast any number of joints, with or without spits. It is to be lamented, that, in addition to these wonderful properties of these marvellous smoke jacks, it could not have been said, that they would roast, without fire, and furnish dinners, without meat.

The United States Gazette observes that a Steer is advertised as having strayed away from Georgetown college. It is mentioned that a description of the animal is given, but that nothing is said about the proficiency he has made in his studies. It is probable that the government of the College having discovered him to be a mere calf, have rusticated him.

A Gentleman, speaking of those who marry pretty wives, said, that in six months a beautiful woman became ugly to her husband; and, what was worse, she continued beautiful to others.

Don Francisco Destuniga said of a lady, who was just married, and who, though very ugly, had a great fortune, that her husband had taken her by the weight, and paid nothing for workmanship.

The following humorous ode to Packwood, the man of razors, may be applied to Hopkins, who whether acute or blunt himself, certainly communicates sharpness to others.

Thou, who hast set at nought the grinders stone,
And rendered absolute the barber's hone:
Who, to a blunted penknife dost impart
The razor's keenness—such thy magic art
Oh, Packwood! smoothly could my verse begin
And finish, as thy strop has left my chin,
Thy praise on zephyrs' gentle wing should float
From Cornwall to the house of John o Croat.

When Cook, whose well-earn'd fame shall ne'er decay,
O'er southern climes pursued his vent'rous way,
A knife once shav'd an Otaheitan chief,
'Twas a knife, tar, that gave his chin relief;
Oh, Packwood! then had generous Britain known
Thy matchless arts she fondly calls her own,
The chief had danced for joy, nor car'd to stop
Rich with the present of thy paste and strop.

To victors, then, shall praise sublime be paid
For ruthless deeds, who whet the glittering blade:
The meed of verse shall Philip's son attain;
Or Cæsar wake the bard's heroic strain,
And Packwood live unsung; who gives to steel
A blameless edge 'tis almost bliss to feel!
For wit and razors will 'tis said, I ween,
Both pain us least, when exquisitely keen.

Ye, who have calmly felt the razor stray
Adown your cheeks, as Packwood smooth'd the way,
So smooth'd the way that hunters have not fear'd,
While bent on speed, to mow the bristly beard;
Ye sons of fashion, ever smart and sleek,
Ye sons of toil, who shave but once a week,
Stroke all your happy chins, your voices raise
A grateful chorus in your Packwood's praise.

And ye, alas! unblest, who joyless trace
A tedious progress on a pensive face,
As in the faithful glass too oft ye view
What blood-stain'd tracks the ill strop razor drew....
To Grace Church-street repair with half a crown,
For ease a monarch might the whole lay down.
Then spare your torrid chins, to Packwood haste,
And prove the virtues of his strop and paste.

The following extract from Sir Philip Sydney, will show why the attempt failed to naturalize in *England the hexameter of the Romans.

First shall virtue be true and beauty counted a blemish
'Ere that I leave with song of praise her praise to solemnize.
O no, no, worthy shepherd, worth can never enter a title
Where proofs justly do teach, thus matcht, such worth to be nought worth.
Let not a puppet abuse thy sprite, king's crowns do not help them
From the cruel head ach, nor shoes of gold do the gout heal:
And precious couches full oft are shakt with a fever.

Winstanley, in his account of Abraham Fraunce.
As soon as sun beams could once peep out from the mountains
And by the dawn of day had somewhat lighted Olympus,
Men, whose lust was law, whose life was still to be lusting,
Whose thriving thieving, convey'd themselves to a hill top
That stretch'd forward to the Heracleotica entry
And moult of hilus, looking thence down to the main sea
For seafaring men, but seeing none to be sailing
They knew 'twas bootless to be looking there for booty

* I have read somewhere, I believe in Dr. Beattie's very entertaining and useful Theory of Language, that Wallis, the famous grammarian, thus translated a Latin hexameter.

Quid faciam? moriar! et Amyntam perdet Amyntas?
in an English one
What shall I do? shall I die? shall Amyntas murder Amyntas?

Lord Orford in his Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, ascribes a very curious line to queen Elizabeth, who we may all remember, was in the habit of studying the ancients. Her majesty is supposed to be describing the peculiarities of some of the Latin poets.

Persius a crab staff, bawdy Martial, Ovid a fine wag

[Note by the Editor.]

The following will produce a smile on the face of every author, who remembers his indolence, and on the face of every Printer and Bookseller, who remembers his vexation at delay, and the procrastination of literary cares.

'Dryden's happy disposition of mind was, however, sometimes disturbed and ruffled by the importunity of his bookseller; on whom during the latter period of his life, he depended for a considerable part of his subsistence, and whose demands for what, in the technical language of the Printing house, is called Copie, he was not always able to satisfy.' [Malone's new Life of DRYDEN.]

From the letters, which passed between Tonsen and Dryden, we find that they had occasionally some slight bickerings, which however, do not seem to have produced any lasting ill will on either side. Booksellers, as the subordinate agents of literature might be expected to possess some of that softness of manners, which letters generally impart to those who cultivate the liberal arts; but by him, who is to live by the sale of books, I fear a book is considered merely as an article of trade; and the most learned or ingenious treatise ever written, when viewed in a commercial light too often appears only a volume, consisting of a certain number of sheets of paper, by the sale of which a profit is made. I may add that the conduct of traders in general, in the last century, was less liberal and their manners more rugged, than at present. [ibid.]

OBITUARY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

IMPERIAL HONOUR'S awful hand
Shall point his lonely bed.

This morning, the mournful intelligence of the death of Major-General ALEXANDER HAMILTON has saddened this city, and will long afflict the nation. He was killed by the Vice-President of the United States in a duel, fought on the Jersey shore, on the morning of the 11th of July. Whether General Hamilton was, or not, a victim to private malignity, fomented by party rancour, his untimely death will be permanently regretted by every American, who remembers the signal services, both in the cabinet and in the field, which this accomplished scholar, this valiant soldier, this sagacious STATESMAN, has rendered to a country, which, without his courage and counsels, would have long since mouldered into insignificance, or mad-dened into anarchy.

From various and well supported testimony it appears, that the cause of this fatal duel was a letter, some time since published, in which it was stated that General H. had said in conversation, he thought Col. Burr a dangerous man, and who ought not to be trusted. This letter, originally printed in Albany, was afterwards republished in New-York. Col. Burr, in the close of the month of June, wrote to Gen. Hamilton, requesting whether he had ever uttered any thing like the expressions attributed to him. The General replied that he had no remembrance of the conversation alluded to, and as no particular expressions were indicated in the letter, he could not undertake to say whether he had or had not held such a conversation, but that if Col. B. would specify any particular discourse, or state any particular words, they should be instantly either avowed or disavowed. Col. Burr replied that it was not in his power to specify the particular conversation; but insisted that General Hamilton should declare, whether he ever had, in any conversation, whatever, used any expressions, derogatory to the character of Col. Burr. To this comprehensive and peremptory demand General Hamilton declared he was not bound to answer, but expressed his willingness at once frankly to or disavow any particular conversation, which might be specified. Dissatisfied with this, Col. B. replied, that unless General Hamilton gave him a direct answer, he must fight him. General H. declared this improper, that he could give no other answer, and, therefore, must accept the challenge. But as his services had been engaged in several important causes before a court, then in session, he could not immediately fight, but, on the rising of the court, he would inform Col. Burr of the time of meeting. All this passed about a fortnight ago. General Hamilton then fulfilled, as usual, his duty as an advocate, on Monday made his will, on Tuesday attended at his office, was apparently serene and cheerful, and gave several elaborate law opinions. On Wednesday, at the dawn, he repaired to Hoboken, in New-Jersey, to meet Colonel Burr. On the way General Hamilton declared to his friend and second, that he should not fire at the challenger, nor had the slightest wish to molest him.

General H. received the fire of his antagonist, fell, pronounced himself a dead man, and being conveyed to the house of a friend at Greenwich, he immediately requested that Bishop Moore might be sent for. Meanwhile, he was attended by Mr. Mason of the Dutch church, with whom he conversed on the topic of his approaching dissolution, EXPRESSED HIS FIRM BELIEF IN CHRISTIANITY, and his fervent hope of forgiveness, THROUGH THE MERITS AND MEDIATION OF OUR BLESSED REDEEMER. He then added if he could receive the HOLY SACRAMENT, he thought he could die in tranquillity.

During the conversation, Mr. Mason wished that general H. would bear testimony against the practice of duelling, which would be a crowning service to those, which he had already rendered to his country. The general replied, that no man more abhorred the practice, and at his death it would be discovered, he had left a solemn Protest against a custom so ferocious and unprincipled. He then assured Mr. Mason that for a long period, he had been convinced nothing would appease his antagonist, and though he had strenuously and sincerely endeavored it was impossible to shun the encounter.

When the Bishop arrived, general Hamilton fervently expressed his gratitude to the weeping prelate, and again declared, that the doctrines of our religion enabled him to meet death with fortitude, and that if he could receive the sacrament, resignation would ensue, as he cherished a lively and holy hope of the mediation of GOD OUR SAVIOUR. The Bishop immediately administered the sacrament, and from that moment, the general averred himself happy.

On the 12th, at 2 o'clock, he died, surrounded by a multitude of sorrowing friends, anxiously surveying one, so dearly loved, and so fatally lost.

Solemn, beyond description, was the closing scene of his life. In the morning, he requested that his friends would be present at a conversation between him and the Bishop. General Hamilton then declared, with solemnity, that when he went to the field, he had determined not to fire at Col. Burr, that he retained against him no malice, that he was dying in peace with all men, and, he hoped, with his God; that he was perfectly reconciled to death, though he knew his friends would deplore its manner, which he did himself; as both from religious and political reasons, he held duelling in detestation.

The Bishop then prayed with the Christian sufferer, and if aught could have changed the Decree of Providence, it would have been these pious orgies, so fervent and so pathetic. All present on their knees and with many tears, implored heaven to bless, and preserve their friend.

While the rest were absorbed in grief, the general alone appeared tranquil. His intrepid soul was unappalled at the approach of death, and calmly bidding his friends farewell he intreated them not to mourn, for he was happy. He retained his senses to the last, and expired without a groan.†

Thus has perished, in the prime of life, and in the midst of his usefulness, ALEXANDER HAMILTON, the man of exalted sentiments, and extensive views, whose theories guided the statesman, whose eloquence influenced senates, whose delicacy might have polished courts, and whose versatile talents blessed mankind. He has fallen, not in the course of nature, not jeopardizing his life in the high places of the field, but by a private and petty hand, and his perplexed and sorrowing country makes the pathetic interrogatory of the royal Psalmist:

KNOW YE NOT THAT THERE IS A GREAT MAN, FALLEN THIS DAY IN ISRAEL?

In the POLITICAL REGISTER, a new and excellent paper, conducted by WILLIAM JACKSON, Esq. of this city, we find a character of general HAMILTON so tersely, energetically, and beautifully expressed, that we cannot refuse ourselves the pleasure of transcribing it, as most honourable to the head and the heart of the author.

Thus hath fallen, prematurely fallen, the HERO, to whose military ardour and accomplishments America confessed the highest obligations; the CIVILIAN, from whose luminous and correct mind proceeded that invaluable commentary on the Constitution of the United States, which essentially contributed to insure its adoption; the STATESMAN, to whose talents we are indebted for the organization of our finances, and the establishment of our public credit; the JURIST and the SCHOLAR, whose combination of intellectual powers formed the boast and ornament of our country; the PATRIOT, who gave, with glowing zeal, to that country, the unceasing efforts of his superior mind;—and the MAN, who, endeared to his friends by every tender and ennobled quality of the heart, received, in return, the truest affection, and the most respectful esteem.

† Upon opening the General's will, there was found enclosed in it a letter to his wife, written on the 4th inst. in which he tells her, that he had endeavoured, by all possible means, to avoid this duel, but that he found it impossible, unless by acting in a manner, which would justly forfeit her esteem. That he should certainly fall, and she should receive that letter, after his death. He begs her forgiveness for being the cause of so much pain to her, and earnestly entreats her to bear herself up under that load of grief, with which she would be overwhelmed, placing a firm reliance on a kind Providence, who would never desert her.

The friends of general Hamilton have joined in a request to Gouverneur Morris to deliver an oration at his funeral to-morrow. He has promised to do so, if he can sufficiently conquer his feelings. The funeral is to be to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[This brilliant specimen of the poetical powers of one, not more admired by his friends for the elegance of his literature, than for the goodness and glow of his heart, was written while the author was at Bermuda, that Summer island, which his favourite Waller has made to "live in description, and look green in song." Mr. Moore being in company with a lady of the place, she playfully proffered him a ring. He gallantly replied in the following gallant verses.]

THE WEDDING RING.*

By THOMAS MOORE, Esq.

The author of "Little's Poems," and the translator of ANACREON.

No—Lady!—Lady!—keep the ring,
Oh! think how many a future year
Of placid smile and downy wing
May sleep within its holy sphere.

Do not disturb their tranquil dream,
Tho' love hath ne'er the mystery warm'd,
Yet Heaven still sheds some soothing beam,
To bless the bond itself hath form'd.

But then that eye!...that burning eye!
O! it doth ask, with magic power,
If Heav'n can ever bless the tie,
Where love enwreaths no genial flower.

Away....away....bewildering look!
Or all the boast of virtue's o'er;
Go....hie thee to the sages book,
And learn from him to feel no more.

I cannot warn thee....every touch
That brings my pulses close to thine,
Tells me I want thy aid as much....
O! quite as much, as thou dost mine.

Yet stay, dear love!...one effort yet;
A moment turn those eyes away,
And let me, if I can, forget
The light that leads my soul astray.

Thou say'st that we were born to meet,
That our hearts bear one common seal;
O! Lady....think how man's deceit
Can seem so sigh, and feign to feel!

When o'er thy face some gleam of thought,
Like day-beams thro' the morning air,
Hath gradual stole, and I have caught
The feeling, ere it kindled there;

The sympathy I then betray'd,
Perhaps, was but the child of art;
The guile of one, who long hath play'd
With all those wily nets of heart.

O! thou hast not my virgin vow....

Tho' few the years I yet have told,
Can'st thou believe, I live till now,
With loveless heart, or senses cold?

No....many a throb of bliss and pain,
For many a maid my soul hath prov'd;
With some, I wanton'd warm and vain,
While some I truly, dearly lov'd!

The cheek to thine I fondly lay,
To theirs hath been as fondly laid;
The words to thee I warmly say,
To them have been as warmly said.

Then scorn at once a languid heart,
Which long hath lost its early spring;
Think of the pure, bright soul thou art,
And....keep the ring, O! keep the ring.

Enough....now turn thine eyes again....
What! still that look....and still that sigh!
Dost thou not feel my counsel then?
O no....and, I confess, nor I!

While thus to mine thy bosom lies,
While thus our breaths commingling glow,
'Twere more than woman to be wise,
'Twere more than man to wish thee so.

Did we not love so true, so dear,
This lapse, could never be forgiven....
But....hearts so fond! and lips so near!

Give me the ring, and now....O Heaven!

SONG

On the birth-day of Mrs.

Written in Ireland.

Of all my happiest hours of joy,
And even I have had my measure,
When hearts were full, and every eye
Has kindled with the beams of pleasure,

* Printed from the author's manuscript.

Such hours as this I ne'er was given,
So dear to friendship, dear to blisses;
Young Love himself looks down from Heaven,
To smile on such a day as this is!

Then, O my friends, the hour improve,
Let's feel as if we ne'er could sever;
And may the birth of her we love
Be thus with joy remember'd ever!

O! banish every thought to night,
Which could disturb our soul's communion;
Abandon'd thus to dear delight,
We'll even for once forget the Union.

On that let statesmen try their powers,
And tremble o'er the rights they'd die for;
The union of the soul be ours,
And every union else we sigh for!

Then, O my friends, &c.

In every eye around I mark
The feelings of the heart o'erflowing;
From every soul I catch the spark
Of sympathy, in friendship glowing.

O! could such moments ever fly!
O! that we ne'er were doom'd to lose 'em!
And all as bright as Charlotte's eye,
And all as pure as Charlotte's bosom.

But, O! my friends, this hour improve,
Let's feel as if we ne'er could sever;
And may the birth of her we love,
Be thus with joy remember'd ever!

For me, whate'er my span of years,
Whatever sun may light my roving;
Whether I waste my life in tears,
Or live, as now, for mirth and loving!

This day shall come with aspect kind,
Wherever fate may cast your rover;
He'll think of those he left behind,
And drink a health to bliss that's over.
Then, O my friends, &c.

PARODY OF POPE'S PROLOGUE TO CATO.

To catch the eye by sawning tricks of art,
To wake the passions, and to wound the heart;
To make each pretty coxcomb sigh and moan,
Act like a dunce, and think himself undone;
For this fair Celia first assum'd her airs,
And drew, from half-slain pedants, floods of tears;
Gay beaux no more their pretty faces kept,
But gaz'd on Celia's charms, and sigh'd, and wept.
Fair Celia scorns by common airs to move
Her suitor's fondness, or the courtier's love;
To pity love would much ill breeding show,
And wounded lovers well deserve their woe.
Tears now shall flow from some more noble cause,
Such tears as coquets shed o'er faded gauze;
She makes each breast with love's hot passion rise,
And calls forth rolling tears from coxcomb's eyes;
Beauty contest in her fair shape she draws,
How Juno look'd, and godlike Venus was;
No common object Celia now displays,
But what with rapture each fond top surveys.
A coquet smiling at her happy fate,
And gaining plaudits from each empty pate.
While thus she gives to each fond lover laws,
What bosom beats not for his own dear cause?
Who sees her move, but wonders at each air?
Who hears her laugh, and does not think her fair?
E'en when proud Anna, 'midst a splendid train,
The silks of India, and the gold of Spain,
Ignobly proud, and impotently great,
Expos'd her sable features, drawn in state,
While thus in pomp and splendor Anna past,
All joy was banish'd, and each face o'er cast

Her triumph ceas'd; scorn shot from every eye,
And haughty Anna past unheeded by;
But Celia's beauties soon attract the throng,
And, Celia, Celia, falter'd on each tongue;
This last of beauties every fop ador'd,
And charming Celia dwelt every word.
Coxcombs, attend! be charms like these approv'd,
And let your icy hearts, for once, be mov'd.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

[The following trifles from a modern poet are what the Italians style conceiti, the grace of them is lost in the translation. If they are inserted in the Port Folio, it is requested that room may be found for the original, with the expectation that some happier hand may give the playful grace which it possesses. But the most skilful will in vain seek a substitute for fancinletto, &c. The captivating suavity, the elegant softness of those conceiti in Italian, cannot be rendered in our ruder tongue.]

AMORE PITTORE.

Un di sorpreso, O Fille,
Vii Amor fancinletto,
Che squarciata la benda alle pupille,
Pingera attento inanri cavaletto:
Ma quando mi appresai
Al pittore novello,
Dopiamente sorpreso rimirai,
Che un dardo era il penello,
La tela era il mio core,
Ela tua imago dipingera Amore.

TRANSLATION.

LOVE A PAINTER.

Some days ago, with great surprise,
I saw a little love, dear maid!
He'd torn the bandage from his eyes,
And on his knee a pallet laid.
But my surprise was doubly great,
When I approach'd the painter's seat,
And saw his pencil was a dart,
The canvas he employ'd my heart,
And thy sweet image painted by his art.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[From the manuscript stores of a friend and amateur, we derive the following. It has a strong resemblance to the lively and caustic style of John Trumbull, Esq. If the author of M'Fingal woos in such a mode as this, every muse, if not every maid, ought to be propitious.]

A POETICAL LETTER,

FROM LOVE-SICK JACOB TO COY NANCY.

To thee, dear Nancy, thee my sweeting,
Poor prisoner Jacob sendeth greeting:
Whereas, so pleas'd the pow'rs above,
I'm fall'n desperately in love;
For Cupid took a station shy
In one bright corner of your eye,
And from his bow let fly a dart,
Which miss'd my ribs, and hit my heart.
Pierc'd thro' and through, and passing further,
Put all my insides out of order.
Nor this the only plague, I found
Love enter'd at the viewless wound;
As mice into a cheese will creep,
Through a small chink, and entering deep,
While all without looks fair and well.
They leave the cheese an empty shell:
Unlucky Jacob, full of smart,
Entreats you to return his heart;
Or else, to ease his ceaseless moan,
Make an exchange, and send your own.
O Nancy! thee I love more fully
Than ever Hudibras lov'd Trulla;
Nor Aeneas of old, nor Dido,
Could love one half so hot as I do.
I hold my Nancy more a goddess,
Than Venus fair, or Dian modest:
Throughout the world thy glories shine,
Nor hath the sun such powers as thine.

Thy looks make fair or cloudy weather;
Thy beauty keeps the world together,
And should a drought e'er come again,
Should you but frown, I know 'twould rain.
For you the earth produces flowers,
For you clouds drop in lovely showers;
Fruits only grow that you may eat,
And pigs and calves to find you meat.
Your charming smiles, which we observe,
Should you withhold the world would starve;
Earth would withhold her wonted store,
And plums and peaches be no more.
O Nancy! could you once but love me,
How mighty glad poor Jacob would be;
Nor time, nor fate, our love should sever,
I'd stick to you like wax forever.
Come love me, Nancy, for I tell you,
I am a pretty clever fellow;
And you must think so too, for (why?)
No one can tell so well as I.
Here follows then, without objection,
The rent-roll of poor Jack's perfection:—
Know then, all womankind, that I,
(When straight), am nearly six feet high;
Whence, by plain reasoning, it appears
I'm one of nature's grenadiers:
Yet I (to whisper this between us)
Serve only in the wars of Venus.
I'm brown, and one good thing (observe) is,
I have black hair, ma'am, at your service.
Of wit I brag not, yet with brains
Enough to walk in when it rains—
To know the odds 'twixt cheese and chalk,
And tell a handsaw from a hawk;
To cane a man that should abuse me,
And hang myself if you refuse me.
Now some, who judge of folks by book,
Tell me I have a hanging look.
You must direct me which to choose,
The gallows rope, or marriage noose:
I must, (as you and fate incline)
Hang round your neck, or hang by mine;
Your frowns or smiles can make or break me,
So Nancy! or the d...., must take me.
I have some faults, my foes will bawl,
But I've forgiven myself for all;
And so I'm ne'er the worse, I fancy,
If you can think so too, my Nancy;
And while I doat thus on your charms,
Pardon and take me to your arms;—
E'en as the pope (their sins forgiven)
Sends all his servants safe to heaven;
Unless they miss the way to glory,
And stop to dine at Purgatory.
Let Venus, and let Cupid hear,
And all the pow'rs by which we swear,
If you for better, and for worse,
Will take poor Jacob to be yours,
My love shall last so long, no doubt,
Eternity shall first run out;
And be so great (when I unfold it)
Immensity shall stretch to hold it.
And when death comes, in fire and thunder,
To cut the marriage knot asunder,
I'll hold you spite of wind and weather,
Death's dart shall nail us both together.
Then yield, my fair, and with me take up,
And I'll be yours, while I am Jacob.

SELECTED POETRY.

THE DOCTOR AND HIS APPRENTICE.

A pupil of the Esculapian school
Was just prepar'd to quit his master's rule:
Not that he knew his trade, as it appears,
But that he then had learnt it seven years.

Yet think not that in learning he was cheated—
All that he had to study still
Was, when a man was well or ill,
And how, if sick, he should be treated.

One morn he thus address'd his master:
'Dear Sir, my honour'd father bids me say,
If I could, now and then a visit pay,
He thinks, with you,
To notice how you do,
My business I might learn a little faster.

'The thought is happy,' the preceptor cries;
'A better method he could scarce devise;
So Bob, (his pupil's name), it shall be so,
And, when I next pay visits, you shall go.'

To bring that hour, alas! time briskly fled.
With dire intent,
Away they went,
And now behold them at the patient's bed.

The master-doctor solemnly perus'd
His victim's face, and o'er his symptoms mus'd,
Look'd wise, said nothing,—an unerring way,
When people nothing have to say.

Then felt his pulse, and smelt his cane,
And paus'd and blink'd, and smelt again,
And briefly of his corps perform'd each motion:
Manœuvres that for death's platoon are meant;
A kind of make ready and present,
Before the full discharge of pill and potion.

At length the patient's wife he thus address'd:
'Madam, your husband's danger's very great;
And, what will never his complaint abate,
The man's been eating oysters, I perceive,'
'Dear! you're a witch, I verily believe,'
Madam replied, and to the truth confess'd.

Skill so prodigious Bobby too admir'd;
And home returning, of the sage inquir'd
How these same oysters came into his head?
'Psha! my dear Bob, the thing was plain—
Sure that cap ne'er distress thy brain!
I saw the shells lie underneath the bed.'

So, wise by such a lesson grown,
Next day Bob ventur'd forth alone,
And to the same sufferer paid his court—
But soon, with haste and wonder out of breath,
Return'd the stripling minister of death,
And to his master made this dread report:

'Why, sir, we ne'er can keep that patient under—
Zounds! such a maw I ne'er came across!
The fellow must be dying, and no wonder,
For d—me if he hasn't eat a horse!

'A horse!' the elder man of physic cried,
As if he meant his pupil to deride—
'How came so wild a notion in your head?'
'How! think not in my duty I was idle;
Like you, I took a peep beneath the bed,
And there I saw a saddle and a bridle!'

BRIGHTEST, GREATEST, AND MOST STEADFAST

WORDS OF AN ELOQUENT ANCIENT:

TO THE AMERICAN PUBLIC.

THE shocking catastrophe which has recently occurred, terminating the life of ALEXANDER HAMILTON, and which has spread a gloom over our country, that will not be speedily dissipated, demands that the circumstances which led to it, or were intimately connected with it, should not be concealed from the world. When they shall be truly and fairly disclosed, however some may question the soundness of his judgment on this occasion, all must do justice to the purity of his views, and the nobleness of his nature. It will only here be added, that the authenticity of the documents, and the accuracy of the information, which we have at last obtained, are beyond any question; and must put an end to all mistake or misrepresentation.

The following is the correspondence that passed between General Hamilton and Col. Burr, together with an explanation of the conduct, motives, and views of General Hamilton, written with his own hand the evening before the meeting took place, and only to have been seen in the deplorable event that followed.

No. I.

New-York, June 18, 1804.

SIR,

I send for your perusal a letter signed Charles
D. Cooper, which, though apparently published some time ago, has but very recently come to my knowledge. Mr. Van Ness, who does me the favour to deliver this, will point out to you that clause of the letter to which I particularly request your attention.

You must perceive, sir, the necessity of a prompt and unqualified acknowledgment or denial of the use of any expressions which would warrant the assertions of Dr. Cooper. I have the honour to be your obedient servant,

A. BURR.

General HAMILTON.

No. II.

New-York, June 20, 1804.

SIR,

I have maturely reflected on the subject of your letter of the eighteenth inst. and the more
I have reflected, the more I have become convinced that I could not, without manifest impropriety, make the avowal or disavowal which you seem to think necessary. The clause pointed out by Mr. Van Ness is in these terms, "I could detail to you a still more despicable opinion which Hamilton has expressed of Mr. Burr." To endeavour to discover the meaning of this declaration, I was obliged to seek in the antecedent part of this letter for the opinion to which it referred, as having been already disclosed: I found it in these words, "General Hamilton and Judge Kent have declared, in substance, that they looked upon Mr. Burr to be a dangerous man, and one who ought not to be trusted with the reins of government."

The language of Dr. Cooper plainly implies, that he considered this opinion of you, which he attributes to me, as a despicable one, but he affirms that I have expressed some other, still more despicable; without, however, mentioning to whom, when, or where. 'Tis evident that the phrase 'still more despicable' admits of infinite shades, from very light to very dark. How am
I to judge of the degree intended; or how shall I annex any precise idea to language so indefinite?

Between gentlemen, despicable and more despi-cable are not worth the pains of a distinction;
when, therefore, you do not interrogate me, as to the opinion, which is specifically ascribed to me, I must conclude, that you view it as within the limits, to which the animadversions of political opponents upon each other may justifiably extend, and consequently as not warranting the idea of it which Dr. Cooper appears to entertain.
If so, what precise inference could you draw, as a guide for your conduct, were I to acknowledge that I had expressed an opinion of you still more despicable than the one which is particularized? How could you be sure that even this opinion had exceeded the bounds which you would yourself deem admissible between political opponents?

But I forbear further comment on the embarrassment, to which the requisition you have made naturally leads. The occasion forbids a more ample illustration, though nothing could be more easy than to pursue it.

Repeating that I cannot reconcile it with propriety to make the acknowledgment or denial you desire, I will add that I deem it inadmissible on principle, to consent to be interrogated as to the justness of the inferences which may be drawn by others from whatever I may have said of a political opponent in the course of a fifteen years competition. If there were no other objection to this is sufficient, that it would tend to expose my sincerity and delicacy to injurious imputations from every person, who may at any time have conceived the import of my expressions differently from what I may then have intended or may afterwards recollect. I stand ready to avow or disavow, promptly and explicitly, any precise or definite opinion, which I may be charged with having declared of any gentleman. More than this cannot fitly be expected from me; and especially it cannot be reasonably expected that I shall enter into an explanation upon a basis so vague as that which you have adopted. I trust, on more reflection, you will see the matter in the same light with me. If not I can only regret the circumstance, and must abide the consequences.

The publication of Dr. Cooper was never seen by me after the receipt of your letter. I have the honour to be, &c

Col. Burr.

A. HAMILTON.

No. III.

New-York, June 21, 1804.

SIR,

Your letter of the 20th instant has been this day received. Having considered it attentively
I regret to find in it nothing of that sincerity and delicacy, which you profess to value.

Political opposition can never absolve gentlemen from the necessity of a rigid adherence to the laws of honour, and the rules of decorum. I neither claim such privilege, nor indulge it in others.

The common sense of mankind affixes to the epithet, adopted by Dr. Cooper, the idea of dishonour. It has been publicly applied to me under the sanction of your name. The question is not, whether he has understood the meaning of the word, or has used it according to syntax, and with grammatical accuracy; but, whether you have authorised this application, either directly, or by uttering expressions or opinions derogatory to my honour. The time 'when' is in your own knowledge, but no way material to me, as the calumny has now first been disclosed so as to become the subject of my notice, and as the effect is present and palpable.

Your letter has furnished me with new reasons for requiring a definite reply. I have the honour to be, sir, your obed't,

A. BURR.

General Hamilton.

On Saturday, the 22d of June, Gen. Hamilton.
for the first time, called on Mr. P. and communicated to him the preceding correspondence.
He informed him, that, in a conversation with
Mr. V. N. at the time of receiving the last letter, he told Mr. V. N. that he considered that letter as rude and offensive, and that it was not possible for him to give it any other answer, than that Mr. Burr must take such steps as he might think proper. He said farther, that Mr. V. N. requested him to take time to deliberate, and then return an answer, when he might possibly entertain a different opinion, and that he would call and receive it. That his reply to Mr. V. N.
was, that he did not perceive it possible for him to give any other answer than that he had mentioned, unless Mr. Burr would take back his last letter, and write one which would admit of a different reply. He then gave Mr. P. the letter hereafter mentioned, of the twenty-second of June, to be delivered to Mr. V. N. when he should call on Mr. P. for an answer, and went to his country house.

The next day General Hamilton received, while there, the following letter.

No. IV.

JUNE 23, 1804.

SIR,

In the afternoon of yesterday, I reported to Colonel Burr the result of my last interview with you, and appointed the evening to receive his further instructions. Some private engagements, however, prevented me from calling on him till this morning. On my return to the city, I found upon inquiry, both at your office and house, that you had returned to your residence in the country. Lest an interview there might be less agreeable to you than elsewhere, I have taken the liberty of addressing you this note, to inquire when and where it will be most convenient to you to receive a communication. Your most obedient and very humble servant,

W. P. VAN NESS.

General Hamilton.

Mr. P. understood from General Hamilton that he immediately answered, that if the communication was pressing, he would receive it at his country house that day, if not, he would be at his house in town the next morning at 9 o'clock. But he did not give Mr. P. any copy of this note.

No. V.

New-York, June 22, 1804.

SIR,

Your first letter, in a style too peremptory, made a demand, in my opinion, unprecedented and unwarrantable. My answer, pointing out the embarrassment, gave you an opportunity to take a less exceptionable course. You have not chosen to do it, but by your last letter, received this day, containing expressions indecorous and improper, you have increased the difficulties to explanation, intrinsically incident to the nature of your application.

If by a "definite reply," you mean the direct avowal or disavowal, required in your first letter, I have no other answer to give, than that which has already been given. If you mean any thing different, admitting of greater latitude, it is requisite you should explain.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

ALEX. HAMILTON.

Aaron Burr, Esq.

This letter, although dated on the twenty-second of June, remained in Mr. P.'s possession until the twenty-fifth, within which period he had several conversations with Mr. V. N. In these conversations Mr. P. endeavoured to illustrate and enforce the propriety of the ground general Hamilton had taken. Mr. P. mentioned to Mr. V. N. as the result, that if colonel Burr would write a letter, requesting to know, in substance, whether, in the conversation to which Dr. Cooper alluded, any particular instance of dishonourable conduct was imputed to colonel Burr, or whether there was any impeachment of his private character, general Hamilton would declare, to the best of his recollection, what passed in that conversation: and Mr. P. read to Mr. V. N. a paper containing the substance of what general Hamilton would say on that subject, which is as follows:

No. VI.

"General Hamilton says he cannot imagine what Dr. Cooper may have alluded to, unless it were to a conversation at Mr. Taylor's, in Albany, last winter, (at which Mr. Taylor, he, and Gen. H. were present). Gen. H. cannot recollect, distinctly, the particulars of that conversation so as to undertake to repeat them, without running the risk of varying, or omitting what might be deemed important circumstances. The expressions are entirely forgotten, and the specific ideas imperfectly remembered; but, to the best of his recollection, it consisted of comments on the political principles and views of Col. Burr, and the results that might be expected from them in the event of his election as governor, without reference to any particular instance of past conduct, or to private character."

After the delivery of the letter of the 22d, as above mentioned, in another interview with Mr. V. N. he desired Mr. P. to give him, IN WRITING, the substance of what he had proposed on the part of general Hamilton, which Mr. P. did in the words following—

No. VII.

"In answer to a letter properly adapted to obtain from Gen. Hamilton a declaration whether he had charged Col. Burr with any particular instance of dishonourable conduct, or had impeached his private character, either in the conversation alluded to by Dr. Cooper, or in any other particular instance to be specified,

He would be able to answer consistently with his honour, and the truth, in substance, that the conversation to which Dr. Cooper alluded, turned wholly on political topics, and did not attribute to Col. Burr any instance of dishonourable conduct, nor relate to his private character; and in relation to any other language or conversation of General H. which Col. Burr will specify, a prompt and frank avowal or denial would be given.

On the 26th June Mr. P. received the following letter:—

No. VIII.

SIR,

The letter which you yesterday delivered me, and your subsequent communication, in Col. Burr's opinion, evince no disposition on the part of Gen. Hamilton to come to a satisfactory accommodation. The injury complained of and the reparation expected, are so definitely expressed in Col. Burr's letter of the 21st inst. that there is not perceived a necessity for further explanation on his part. The difficulty that would result from confining the enquiry to any particular times and occasions must be manifest. The denial of a specified conversation only, would leave strong implications that on other occasions improper language had been used.—When and where injurious opinions and expressions have been uttered by Gen. Hamilton must be best known to him, and of him only will Col. Burr enquire. No denial or declaration will be satisfactory, unless it be general, so as wholly to exclude the idea that rumours derogatory to Col. Burr's honour have originated with General Hamilton, or have been fairly inferred from any thing he has said. A definite reply to a requisition of this nature was demanded by Col. Burr's letter of the 21st inst. This being refused, invites the alternative alluded to in Gen. Hamilton's letter of the 20th.

It was required by the position in which the controversy was placed by Gen. Hamilton on Friday last, and I was immediately furnished with a communication demanding a personal interview. The necessity of this measure has not, in the opinion of Col. Burr, been diminished by the general's last letter, or any communication which has since been received. I am consequently again instructed to deliver you a message, as soon as it may be convenient for you to receive it. I beg therefore you will be so good as to inform me, at what hour I can have the pleasure of seeing you.

Your most obed't and very humble servt.

W. P. VAN NESS.

Nathaniel Pendleton, Esq.

June 26th.

No. IX.

26th June, 1804.

SIR,

I have communicated the letter which you did me the honour to write to me of this date to General Hamilton. The expectations now disclosed on the part of Col. Burr, appear to him to have greatly extended the original ground of inquiry, and instead of presenting a particular and definite case for explanation seem to aim at nothing less than an inquisition into his most confidential conversations, as well as others, through the whole period of his acquaintance with Col. Burr.

While he was prepared to meet the particular case fairly and fully, he thinks it inadmissible that he should be expected to answer at large as to every thing that he may possibly have said, in relation to the character of Col. Burr, at any time or upon any occasion. Though he is conscious that any charges which are in circulation to the prejudice of Col. Burr have originated with him, except one which may have been so considered, and which has long since been fully explained between Col. Burr and himself—yet he cannot consent to be questioned generally as to any rumours which may be afloat derogatory to the character of Col. Burr without specification of the several rumours, many of them probably unknown to him.

He does not however, mean to authorize any conclusion as to the real nature of his conduct in relation to Col. Burr, by his declining so loose and vague a basis of explanation, and he disavows any unwillingness to come to a satisfactory, provided it be an honorable accommodation. His objection is, the very indefinite ground, which Col. Burr has assumed, in which he is sorry to be able to discern nothing short of predetermined hostility. Presuming, therefore, that it will be adhered to, he has instructed me to receive the message which you have it in charge to deliver. For this purpose I shall be at home and at your command to-morrow morning from eight to ten o'clock.

I have the honour to be respectfully,

Your obedient servant.

NATHANIEL PENDLETON.

William P. Van Ness, Esq.

No. X.

SIR,

The letter which I had the honour to receive from you, under date of yesterday, states among other things, that in General Hamilton's opinion, Col. Burr has taken a very indefinite ground, in which he evinces nothing short of predetermined hostility, and that Gen. Hamilton thinks it inadmissible that the enquiry should extend to his confidential as well as other conversations. In this Col. Burr can only reply, that secret whispers traducing his fame, and impeaching his honour, are, at least, equally injurious with slanders publicly uttered. That Gen. H. had at no time, and in no place, a right to use any such injurious expressions; and that the partial negative he is disposed to give, with the reservations he wishes to make, are proofs that he has done the injury specified.

Col. Burr's request was in the first instance, proposed in a form the most simple, in order that Gen. Hamilton might give to the affair that course to which he might be induced by his temper and his knowledge of facts. Col. Burr trusted with confidence, that from the frankness of a soldier and the candour of a gentleman, he might expect an ingenuous declaration. That if, as he had reason to believe, Gen. H. had used expressions derogatory to his honour, he would have had the magnanimity to retract them; and that if, from his language, injurious inferences had been improperly drawn, he would have perceived the propriety of correcting errors, which might thus have been widely diffused. With these impressions, Col. Burr was greatly surprised at receiving a letter which he considered as evasive, and which in manner he deemed not altogether decorous. In one expectation, however, he was not wholly deceived, for the close of Gen. Hamilton's letter contained an intimation that if Col. Burr should dislike his refusal to acknowledge or deny, he was ready to meet the consequences. This Col. Burr deemed a sort of defiance, and would have felt justified in making it the basis of an immediate message. But as the communication contained something concerning the indefiniteness of the request; as he believed it rather the offspring of false pride than of reflection, and as he felt the utmost reluctance to proceed to extremities, while any other hope remained, his request was repeated in terms more explicit. The replies and propositions on the part of Gen. Hamilton have in Col. Burr's opinion been constantly in substance the same.

Col. Burr disavows all motives of predetermined hostility, a charge by which he thinks insult added to injury—He feels as a gentleman should feel, when his honour is impeached or assailed, and without sensations of hostility or wishes of revenge, he is determined to vindicate that honour at such hazard as the nature of the case demands.

The length to which this correspondence has extended only tending to prove that the satisfactory redress, earnestly desired, cannot be obtained, he deems it useless to offer any proposition except the simple message which I shall have the honour to deliver.

I have the honour to be, with great respect,
Your obedient and very humble servant.
W. P. VAN NESS.

Wednesday morning,
June 27th, 1804.

With this letter, a message was received, such as was to be expected, containing an invitation, which was accepted, and Mr. P. informed Mr. V. N. he should hear from him the next day as to further particulars.

This letter was delivered to Gen. H. on the same evening, and a very short conversation ensued between him and Mr. P. who was to call on him early the next morning for a further conference.—When he did so, Gen. Hamilton said he had not understood whether the message and answer were definitively concluded or whether another meeting was to take place for that purpose between Mr. P. and Mr. V. N. Under the latter impression and as the last letter contained matter that naturally led to animadversion, he gave Mr. P. a paper of remarks in his own hand writing to be communicated to Mr. V. N. if the state of the affair rendered it proper.

In the farther interview with Mr. V. N. that day, after explaining the causes which had induced Gen. Hamilton to suppose that the state of the affair did not render it improper, he offered this paper to Mr. V. N. but he declined receiving it, alleging that he considered the correspondence as closed by the acceptance of the message that he had delivered.

Mr. P. informed Mr. V. N. of the inducements mentioned by Gen. Hamilton in those remarks, for the postponing the meeting until the close of the Circuit: and as this was uncertain Mr. P. was to let him know when it would be convenient.

On Friday the 6th of July, the Circuit being closed, Mr. P. gave this information, and that Gen. Hamilton would be ready at any time after the Sunday following. On Monday the particulars were arranged and the public are but too well acquainted with the sad result.

The paper above alluded to is as follows:—

No. XI.

Remarks on the letter of June 27, 1804.

Whether the observations on this letter are designed merely to justify the result which is indicated in the close of the letter, or may be intended to give an opening for rendering any thing explicit which may have been deemed vague heretofore, can only be judged of by the sequel. At any rate it appears to me necessary not to be misunderstood. Mr. Pendleton is therefore authorised to say that in the course of the present discussion, written or verbal, there has been no intention to evade, defy or insult; but a sincere disposition to avoid extremities if it could be done with propriety. With this view G. H. has been ready to enter into a frank and free explanation on any and every object of a specific nature; but not to answer a general and abstract inquiry, embracing a period too long for any accurate recollection, and exposing him to unpleasant criticisms from or unpleasant discussions with any and every person, who may have understood him in an unfavourable sense. This (admitting that he could answer in a manner the most satisfactory to Col. Burr) he should deem inadmissible, in principle and precedent, and humiliating in practice. To this therefore he can never submit. Frequent allusion has been made to slanders said to be in circulation. Whether they are openly or in whispers they have a form and shape, and might be specified.

If the alternative alluded to in the close of the letter is definitively tendered, it must be accepted; the time, place, and manner to be afterwards regulated. I should not think it right in the midst of a Circuit Court to withdraw my services from those who may have confided important interests to me, and expose them to the embarrassment of seeking other counsel, who may not have time to be sufficiently instructed in their cause. I shall also want a little time to make some arrangements respecting my own affairs.

The following paper, in the hand writing of Gen. Hamilton, was inclosed with his will and some other papers, in a packet addressed to one of his executors, which was of course not to have been delivered but in case of the melancholy event which has happened. As it contains his motives and reflections on the causes that have led to this fatal catastrophe it is deemed proper to communicate it to the public.

No. XII.

On my expected interview with colonel Burr, I think it proper to make some remarks explanatory of my conduct, motives, and views.

I was certainly desirous of avoiding this interview, for the most cogent reasons.

1. My religious and moral principles are strongly opposed to the practice of duelling, and it would ever give me pain to be obliged to shed the blood of a fellow creature in a private combat forbidden by the laws.

2. My wife and children are extremely dear to me, and my life is of the utmost importance to them in various views.

3. I feel a sense of obligation towards my creditors, who in case of accident to me, by the forced sale of my property, may be in some degree sufferers. I did not think myself at liberty as a man of probity, lightly to expose them to this hazard.

4. I am conscious of no ill will to colonel Burr, distinct from political opposition, which, as I trust, has proceeded from pure and upright motives.

Lastly, I shall hazard much, and can possibly gain nothing by the issue of the interview.

But it was, as I conceive, impossible for me to avoid it. There were intrinsic difficulties in the thing, and artificial embarrassments, from the manner of proceeding on the part of colonel Burr.

Intrinsic, because it is not to be denied, that my animadversions on the political principles, character, and views of colonel Burr, have been extremely severe, and on different occasions, I, in common with many others, have made very unfavourable criticisms on particular instances of the private conduct of this gentleman.

In proportion as these impressions were entertained with sincerity and uttered with motives and for purposes, which might appear to me commendable, would be the difficulty (until they could be removed by evidence of their being erroneous) of explanation or apology. The disavowal required of me by colonel Burr, in a general and indefinite form, was out of my power, if it had really been proper for me to submit to be so questioned; but I was sincerely of opinion, that this could not be, and in this opinion, I was confirmed by that of a very moderate and judicious friend whom I consulted. Besides that colonel Burr appeared to me to assume, in the first instance, a tone unnecessarily peremptory and menacing, and in the second, positively offensive. Yet I wished, as far as might be practicable, to leave a door open to accommodation. This, I think, will be inferred from the written communications made by me, and by my direction, and would be confirmed by the conversations between Mr. Van Ness and myself, which arose out of the subject.

I am not sure, whether, under all the circumstances, I did not go further in the attempt to accommodate, than a punctilious delicacy will justify. If so I hope the motives I have stated will excuse me.

It is not my design, by what I have said to affix any odium on the conduct of colonel Burr, in this case. He, doubtless, has heard of animadversions of mine which bore very hard upon him; and it is probable that as usual they were accompanied with some falsehoods. He may have supposed himself under a necessity of acting as he has done. I hope the grounds of his proceeding have been such as ought to satisfy his own conscience.

I trust, at the same time, that the world will do me the justice to believe, that I have not censured him on light grounds, nor from unworthy inducements. I certainly have had strong reasons for what I have said, though it is possible that in some particulars, I may have been influenced by misconstruction or misinformation. It is also my ardent wish that I may have been more mistaken than I think I have been, and that he, by his future conduct, may shew himself worthy of all confidence and esteem, and prove an ornament and blessing to the country.

As well because it is possible that I may have injured colonel Burr, however convinced myself that my opinions and declarations have been well founded, as from my general principles and temper in relation to similar affairs—I have resolved, if our interview is conducted in the usual manner, and it pleases God to give me the opportunity, to reserve and throw away my first fire, and I have thoughts even of reserving my second fire—and thus giving a double opportunity to col. Burr to pause and to reflect.

It is not, however, my intention to enter into any explanations on the ground. Apology from principle, I hope, rather than pride, is out of the question.

To those who, with me, abhorring the practice of duelling may think that I ought on no account to have added to the number of bad examples, I answer that my relative situation, as well in public as private, enforcing all the considerations which constitute what men of the world denominate honour, imposed on me (as I thought) a peculiar necessity not to decline the call. The ability to be in future useful, whether in resisting mischief or effecting good, in those crises of our public affairs, which seem likely to happen, would probably be inseparable from a conformity with public prejudice, in this particular.

A. H.

On the foregoing letters and papers, the Editor will make no comment. He submits them to the heart and understanding of every reader.

WILL.

In the name of God, Amen, I, ALEXANDER HAMILTON, of the city of New-York, Counsellor at Law, do make this my Last Will and Testament, as follows:

First. I appoint John B. Church, Nicholas Fish, and Nathaniel Pendleton, of the city aforesaid, Esquires, to be executors and trustees of this my will, and I devise to them, their heirs and assigns as joint tenants and not as tenants in common, all my estate real and personal whatsoever, and wheresoever, upon trust at their discretion to sell and dispose of the same, at such time and times, in such manner, and upon such terms, as they the survivors and survivor shall think fit, and out of the proceeds to pay all the debts which I shall owe at the time of my decease; in whole, if the fund be sufficient, proportionably, if it shall be insufficient, and the residue, if any there shall be, to pay and deliver to my excellent and dear wife Elizabeth Hamilton.

Though if it should please God to spare my life, I may look for a considerable surplus out of my present property: yet if he should speedily call me to the eternal world, a forced sale, as is usual, may possibly render it insufficient to satisfy my debts. I pray God that something may remain for the maintainance and education of my dear wife and children. But should it, on the contrary happen, that there is not enough for the payment of my debts, I entreat my dear children, if they, or any of them should ever be able, to make up the deficiency. I without hesitation commit to their delicacy a wish, that is dictated by my own. Though conscious that I have too far sacrificed the interests of my family to public avocations, and on this account have the less claim to burthen my children, yet I trust in their magnanimity to appreciate, as they ought, this my request. In so unfavourable an event of things, the support of their dear mother, with the most respectful and tender attention, is a duty, all the sacredness of which they will feel. Probably her own patrimonial resources will preserve her from indigence. But in all situations they are charged to bear in mind that she has been to them, the most devoted and best of mothers.

In testimony whereof, I have herunto subscribed my hand, the 9th day of July, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and four.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

Signed, sealed, published, and declared as and for his last will and testament, in our presence, who have subscribed the same in his presence, the words J. B. Church being above interlined.

DOMINIC F. BLAKE,
GRAHAM BURRELL,
THO. B. VALLEAU.

New-York, Surrogate's Office, ss
July 16th, 1804.

I do hereby certify the preceding to be a true copy of the original will of Alexander Hamilton, deceased, now on file in my office.

SILVANUS MILLER, Surrogate.

The above statement, containing the facts that led to the interview between General Hamilton and Col. Burr, studiously avoided mentioning any particulars of what passed at the place of meeting. This was dictated by suitable considerations at the time, and with the intention, that whatever it might be deemed proper to lay before the public, should be made the subject of a communication. The following is, therefore, now submitted.

In the interviews that have since taken place between the gentlemen that were present, they have not been able to agree in two important facts that passed there—for which reason nothing was said on those subjects, in the paper lately published, as to other particulars, in which they were agreed.

Mr. P. expressed a confident opinion that Gen. Hamilton did not fire the first; and that he did not fire at all at Col. Burr. Mr. V. N. seemed equally confident in opinion that General Hamilton did fire first—and, of course, that it must have been at his antagonist.

General Hamilton's friend thinks it to be a SACRED DUTY he owes to the memory of that exalted man, to his country, and his friends, to publish to the world such facts and circumstances as have produced a decisive conviction in his own mind, that he cannot have been mistaken in the belief he has formed on those points—

1st. Besides the testimonies of bishop Moore, and the paper containing an express declaration, under General Hamilton's own hand, inclosed to his friend in a packet, not to be delivered but in the event of his death, and which have already been published, General Hamilton informed Mr. P. at least ten days previous to the affair, that he had doubts whether he would not receive and not return Mr. Burr's first fire. Mr. P. remonstrated against this determination, and urged many considerations against it, as dangerous to himself, and not necessary in the particular case, when every ground of accommodation, not humiliating, had been proposed, and rejected. He said, he would not decide lightly, but take time to deliberate fully. It was incidentally mentioned again at their occasional subsequent conversations, and on the evening preceding the time of the appointed interview, he informed Mr. P. he had made up his mind not to fire at Col. Burr the first time, but to receive his fire, and fire in the air. Mr. P. again urged him upon this subject, and repeated his former arguments. His final answer was, in terms that made an impression on Mr. P's mind which can never be effaced, "My friend, it is the effect of a RELIGIOUS SCRUPLE, and does not admit of reasoning; it is useless to say more on the subject, as my purpose is definitively fixed."

2d. His last words, before he was wounded, afford a proof that this purpose had not changed. When he received his pistol, and after having taken his position, he was asked if he would have the hair spring set—His answer was, "not at this time."

3d. After he was wounded, and laid in the boat, the first words he uttered, after recovering the power of speech, were, (addressing himself to a gentleman present, who perfectly well remembers it) "Pendleton knows I did not mean to fire at Col. Burr the first time."

4th. This determination had been communicated, by Mr. Pendleton, to that gentleman that morning, before they left the city.

5th. The pistol that had been used by General Hamilton, lying loose over the other apparatus in the case, which was open; after having been some time in the boat, one of the boatmen took hold of it to put it into the case, General Hamilton observing this, said, "Take care of that pistol—It is cocked—It may go off and do mischief." This is also remembered by the gentleman alluded to.

This shows that he was not sensible of having fired at all. If he had fired, previous to receiving the wound, he would have remembered it, and, therefore, have known that the pistol could not go off but, if afterwards, it must have been the effect of an involuntary exertion of the muscles, produced by a mortal wound, in which case he could not have been conscious of having fired.

6th. Mr. P. having so strong a conviction that if General Hamilton had fired first, it could not have escaped his attention, (all his anxiety being alive for the effect of the first fire), and having no reason to believe the friend of Col. Burr was not sincere in the contrary opinion, he determined to go to the spot where the affair took place, to see if he could not discover some traces of the course of the ball from General Hamilton's pistol. He took a friend with him the day after General Hamilton died, and, after some examination, they fortunately found what they were in search of. They ascertained that the ball passed through the limb of a cedar tree, at an elevation of about twelve feet and an half, perpendicularly from the ground, between thirteen and fourteen feet from the mark on which General Hamilton stood, and about four feet wide of the direct line between him and Col. Burr, on the right side; he having fallen on the left. The part of the limb through which the ball passed was cut off and brought to this city, and is now in Mr. Church's possession.

No inferences are pointed out as resulting from these facts, nor will any comments be made. They are left to the candid judgment and feelings of the public.

BISHOP MOORE'S LETTER.

Thursday Evening, July 12, 1804.

MR. COLEMAN,

The public mind being extremely agitated by the melancholy fate of that great man, ALEXANDER HAMILTON, I have thought it would be grateful to my fellow-citizens, would provide against misrepresentation, and, perhaps, be conducive to the advancement of the cause of Religion, were I to give a narrative of some facts which have fallen under my own observation, during the time which elapsed between the fatal duel, and his departure out of this world.

Yesterday morning, immediately after he was brought from Hoboken to the house of Mr. Bayard, at Greenwich, a message was sent informing me of the sad event, accompanied by a request from General Hamilton, that I would come to him for the purpose of administering the holy communion. I went; but, being desirous to afford time for serious reflection, and conceiving, that, under existing circumstances, it would be right and proper to avoid every appearance of precipitancy in performing one of the most solemn offices of our religion, I did not then comply with his desire. At one o'clock I was again called on to visit him. Upon my entering the room and approaching his bed, with the utmost calmness and composure he said, "My dear sir, you perceive my unfortunate situation, and no doubt have been made acquainted with the circumstances which led to it. It is my desire to receive the communion at your hands. I hope you will not conceive there is any impropriety in my request." He then added, "It has for some time past been the wish of my heart, and it was my intention of taking an early opportunity of uniting myself to the Church, by the reception of that holy ordinance." I observed to him, that he must be very sensible of the delicate and trying situation in which I was then placed; that, however desirous I might be to afford consolation to a fellow mortal in distress, still, it was my duty, as a minister of the Gospel, to hold up the law of GOD as paramount to all other law: and that, therefore, under the influence of such sentiments, I must unequivocally condemn the practice which had brought him to his present unhappy condition. He acknowledged the propriety of these sentiments, and declared that he viewed the late transaction with sorrow and contrition. I then asked him, should it please God to restore you to health, sir, will you never be again engaged in a similar transaction? and will you employ all your influence in society to discountenance this barbarous custom?" His answer was, "That, sir, is my deliberate intention."

I proceeded to converse with him on the subject of his receiving the Communion; and told him that with respect to the qualifications of those, who wished to become partakers of that holy ordinance, my inquiries could not be made in language more expressive than that which was used by our church—"Do you sincerely repent of your sins past? Have you a lively faith in God's mercy through Christ, with a thankful remembrance of the death of Christ? And are you disposed to live in love and charity with all men?" He lifted up his hands, and said, "With the utmost sincerity of heart I can answer those questions in the affirmative—I have no ill-will against Col. Burr. I met him with a fixed resolution to do him no harm—I forgive all that happened." I then observed to him, that the terrors of the divine law were to be announced to the obdurate and impenitent; but that the consolations of the Gospel were to be offered to the humble and contrite heart; that I had no reason to doubt his sincerity, and would proceed immediately to gratify his wishes. The Communion was then administered, which he received with great devotion, and his heart afterwards appeared to be perfectly at rest. I saw him again this morning, when, with his last faltering words, he expressed a strong confidence in the mercy of God, through the intercession of the Redeemer. I remained with him until two o'clock this afternoon, when death closed the awful scene.—He expired without a struggle, and almost without a groan.

By reflecting on this melancholy event, let the humble Believer be encouraged ever to hold fast that precious faith, which is the only source of true consolation in the last extremity of nature. Let the Infidel be persuaded to abandon his opposition to the Gospel, which the strong, inquisitive, and comprehensive mind of a HAMILTON embraced, in his last moments, as the truth from Heaven. Let those who are disposed to justify the practice of duelling be induced, by this simple narrative, to view with abhorrence that custom which has occasioned an irreparable loss to a worthy and most afflicted family; which has deprived his friends of a beloved companion; his profession of one of its brightest ornaments; and his country of a great Statesman and a real Patriot.

With great respect, I remain
Your friend and servant,

BENJAMIN MOORE.

FUNERAL OBSEQUIES.

On Saturday last the remains of ALEXANDER HAMILTON were committed to the grave with every possible testimony of respect and sorrow. That distant readers may form some idea of what passed on this mournful occasion, we shall here present them with a regular and correct account of the whole scene.

The military, under the command of Lieut. Col. Morton, were drawn up in front of Mr. Church's house, in Robinson-street, where the body had been deposited. On the appearance of the corpse, it was received by the whole line with presented arms, and saluted by the officers, with melancholy music by a large and elegant band.

The military then preceded the bier, in open column and inverted order, the left in front, with arms reversed, the band playing a dead march. At twelve o'clock the procession moved in the following order, through Beekman, Pearl, and Whitehall-streets, and up Broadway to the Church:

The Artillery.
The Sixth Regiment of Militia.
Flank Companies.
Cincinnati Society.

A numerous train of clergy of all denominations.

THE CORPSE,
With Pall Bearers.

The General's Horse, appropriately dressed.
His Children and Relatives.

Physicians.

Gouverneur Morris, the funeral orator, in his carriage.

The Gentlemen of the Bar, all in deep mourning.
The Lieut. Governor of the state, in his carriage.

Corporation of the city of New-York.

Resident Agents of Foreign Powers.

Officers of our Army and Navy.

Military and Naval Officers of Foreign Powers.

Militia Officers of the State.

The various officers of the respective Banks.

Chamber of Commerce and Merchants.

Wardens of the Port, and Masters of Vessels in the harbour.

The President, Professors, and Students of Columbia College, in mourning gowns.

St. Andrew's Society, mostly in mourning.

Tammany Society.

Mechanic Society.

Marine Society.

Citizens in general.

THE PALL WAS SUPPORTED BY

General Matthew Clarkson,
Oliver Wolcott, Esquire,
Richard Harrison, Esquire, Abijah Hammond, Esquire,
Josiah Ogden Hoffman, Esquire,
Richard Varick, Esquire,
William Bayard, Esquire, and His Hon. Judge Lawrence.

On the top of the coffin was the General's hat and sword. His grey horse, dressed in mourning, with boots and spurs reversed across the saddle, was led by two black servants, dressed in white, and white turbans trimmed with black.

The streets were lined with people; doors and windows were filled, principally with weeping females, and even the house tops were covered with spectators, who came from all parts to behold the melancholy procession.

When the advanced platoon of the military reached the church, the whole column wheeled backward by sections from the flanks of platoons, forming a lane, bringing their muskets to a reversed order, and resting the cheek on the butt of the piece in the customary attitude of grief. Through the avenue thus formed, the corpse, preceded by the clergy of different denominations and Society of Cincinnati, and followed by the relations of the deceased, and different public bodies, advanced to the church, the band, with drums muffled all the time, playing a pensive, solemn air.

FUNERAL ORATION.

On a stage erected in the portico of Trinity Church, Mr. Gouverneur Morris, having four of General HAMILTON's sons, the eldest about sixteen, and the youngest about six years of age, with him, rose and delivered to the immense concourse in front an extemporary oration, which, being pronounced slowly and impressively, was easily committed to memory, and, being very soon afterwards placed on paper, is now presumed to be correct even to the language. Being shown to several gentlemen who heard it, they all agree that it comes near enough to what was actually delivered, to be presented as the oration at length.

FELLOW-CITIZENS,

If, on this sad, this solemn occasion, I should endeavour to move your commiseration, it would be doing injustice to that sensibility, which has been so generally and so justly manifested. Far from attempting to excite your emotions, I must try to repress my own; and yet, I fear, that, instead of the language of a public speaker, you will hear only the lamentations of a bewailing friend. But I will struggle with my bursting heart, to pourtray that Heroic Spirit, which has flown to the mansions of bliss.

Students of Columbia—he was in the ardent pursuit of knowledge in your academic shades, when the first sound of the American war called him to the field. A young and unprotected volunteer, such was his zeal, and so brilliant his service, that we heard his name before we knew his person. It seemed as if God had called him suddenly into existence, that he might assist to save a world!

The penetrating eye of WASHINGTON soon perceived the manly spirit, which animated his youthful bosom. By that excellent judge of men he was selected as an Aid, and thus he became early acquainted with, and was a principal actor in the most important scenes of our revolution.

At the siege of York, he pertinaciously insisted on—and he obtained the command of a Fort. He stormed the redoubt; but let it be recorded that not one single man of the enemy perished. His gallant troops, emulating the heroism of their chief, checked the uplifted arm, and spared a foe no longer resisting. Here closed his military career.

Shortly after the war, your favour—no, your discernment, called him to public office. You sent him to the convention at Philadelphia; he there assisted in forming that constitution, which is now the bond of our union, the shield of our defence, and the source of our prosperity. In signing that compact he expressed his apprehensions that it did not contain sufficient means of strength for its own preservation; and that in consequence we should share the fate of many other republics, and pass through Anarchy to Despotism. We hoped better things. We confided in the good sense of the American people; and, above all, we trusted in the protecting Providence of the Almighty. On this important subject he never concealed his opinion. He disdained concealment. Knowing the purity of his heart, he bore it as it were in his hand, exposing to every passenger its inmost recesses. This generous indiscretion subjected him to censure from misrepresentation. His speculative opinions were treated as deliberate designs; and yet you all know how strenuous, how unremitting were his efforts to establish and to preserve the constitution. If, then, his opinion was wrong, pardon, O! pardon that single error, in a life, devoted to your service.

At the time when our government was organized, we were without funds, though not without resources. To call them into action, and establish order in the finances, Washington sought for splendid talents, for extensive information, and, above all, he sought for sterling, incorruptible integrity—All these he found in HAMILTON.—The system then adopted has been the subject of much animadversion. If it be not without a fault, let it be remembered that nothing human is perfect—Recollect the circumstances of the moment—recollect the conflict of opinion—and, above all, remember that the minister of a republic must bend to the will of the people.—The administration which Washington formed was one of the most efficient, one of the best that any country was ever blest with. And the result was a rapid advance in power and prosperity.

ich there is no example in any other age or ion. The part which Hamilton bore is universally known.

His unsuspecting confidence in professions, which believed to be sincere, led him to trust too much the undeserving. This exposed him to misrepresentation. He felt himself obliged to resign the care of a rising family, and the narrowness of fortune, made it a duty to return to his profession for their support. But, though he was compelled to abandon public life, never, no, never for a moment did he abandon the public service. He never lost sight of your interests—I declare to you, before that God, in whose presence we are so especially assembled, that in his most private and confidential conversations, the single objects of discussion and consideration were your freedom and happiness.

You well remember the state of things which again called forth Washington from his retreat to aid your armies. You know that he asked for Hamilton to be his second in command. That venerable sage well knew the dangerous incidents of a military profession, and he felt the hand of the pinching life at its source. It was probable that he would soon be removed from the scene, and at his second would succeed to the command. He knew by experience, the importance of that office—and he thought the sword of America might safely be confided to the hand which now is cold in that coffin. Oh! my fellow citizens, remember this solemn testimonial that he was not ambitious. Yet he was charged with ambition; and wounded by the imputation, when he laid down his command, he declared, in the proud independence of his soul, that he never would accept of any office, unless in a foreign war he should be called on to expose his life in defence of his country. This determination was immovable. It was a fault that his opinions and his resolutions could not be changed. Knowing his own firm purpose, he was indignant at the charge that he sought for office or power. He was ambitious only of glory. At he was deeply solicitous for you. For himself he feared nothing, but he feared that bad men might, by false professions, acquire your confidence and abuse it to your ruin.

Brethren of the Cincinnati—There lies our chief! Let him still be our model. Like him, after long and faithful public service, let us cheerfully perform the social duties of private life. Oh! he was mild and gentle. In him there was no offence; no guile. His generous hand and heart were open to all.

Gentlemen of the bar—You have lost your rightest ornament. Cherish and imitate his example. While, like him, with justifiable and undiminished zeal, you pursue the interests of your clients, remember, like him, the eternal principles of justice.

Fellow Citizens—You have long witnessed his professional conduct, and felt his unrivalled eloquence.—You know how well he performed the duties of a citizen—you know that he never courted our favour by adulation or the sacrifice of his own judgment. You have seen him contending against you, and saving your dearer interests, as it were, in spite of yourselves. And you now feel and enjoy the benefits resulting from the firm energy of his conduct. Bear this testimony to the memory of my departed friend. I charge you to protect his fame—It is all he has left—all that these poor orphan children will inherit from their father. But my countrymen, that fame may be a rich treasure to you also. Let it be the test by which to examine those who solicit your favour. Disregarding professions, view their conduct, and on a doubtful occasion ask, Would Hamilton have done this thing?

You all know how he perished. On this last scene, I cannot, I must not dwell. It might excite emotions too strong for your better judgment. Let not your indignation lead to any act which might again offend the insulted majesty of the laws. On his part, as from his lips, though with my voice—for his voice you will hear no more—let me entreat you to respect yourselves.

And now ye ministers of the everlasting God, perform your holy office and commit these ashes of our departed brother to the bosom of the grave!

The oration being finished the corpse was carried to the grave, where the usual funeral service was performed by the Rev. Bishop Moore. The troops who had entered the church yard, formed an extensive hollow square, and terminated the solemnities with three volleys over the grave.

During the procession there was a regular discharge of minute guns from the Battery, by a detachment from the regiment of artillery. The different merchant vessels in the harbor wore their colours half mast both this and the preceding day.

His Britannic Majesty's ship of war Boston, Captain Douglass, at anchor within the hook, appeared in mourning the whole morning, and at ten o'clock she commenced firing minute guns, which were continued forty-eight minutes. His Majesty's packet Lord Charles Spencer, Captain Cotesworth, also was in mourning and fired an equal number of guns. The French frigates Cybelle and Didon, were also put into full mourning both this and the preceding day, with yards peaked; they also fired minute guns during the procession. It deserves also to be mentioned that the French Surgeons of these frigates went out to Mr. Bayard's before his death and offered their services. These affecting marks of attention will be gratefully received by our fellow-citizens, as evidence how highly the deceased was respected & esteemed by the French and English officers.

As we presume many of our readers will be desirous of seeing in what manner the several morning papers speak of the melancholy subject which engrosses this city, we present our readers with what each of them have said of it.

The Mercantile Advertiser.

Last Saturday were interred, with all possible respect, the remains of general Alexander Hamilton the enlightened statesman, the skilful lawyer, the eloquent orator, the disinterested patriot, and the honest man. Never was the sensibility of the citizens awakened to such a degree, and never did they witness so mournful a scene. It renewed their grief for the death of Washington, to see his friend and counsellor cut off in the highest flower of his faculties, and the United States deprived of their great earthly stay.

Immediately after his decease the bells announced that he was no more. On the morning of the day of his funeral, all the bells were muffled, and tolled from six to seven o'clock. They began again at ten and continued until the procession reached the church. The ships in the harbour exhibited the usual tokens of mourning, and minute guns were fired from the forts, and from American and foreign armed vessels. The bells again tolled from seven to eight in the evening.

The procession consisting of the military, the Cincinnati, the clergy of all denominations, the gentlemen of the bar, and students at law, strangers, the different corporate bodies, the several societies, together with the citizens, was very large. All vied with one another in testifying their sense of the worth of the illustrious man deceased, and the irreparable loss which the country had sustained. The sides of the streets were crowded and the windows were filled with spectators, and many climbed up into trees and got on the tops of houses. Not a smile was visible and hardly a whisper was to be heard, but tears were seen rolling down the cheeks of the affected multitude.

When the front of the procession had advanced as far as Trinity church, they halted; and an oration was delivered by Gouverneur Morris, from a stage which had been previously erected in the portico of the church. The notice given to the orator was so short, his own feelings, and those of the audience so great, that he was able only to paint in an imperfect manner the character and services of the first and most beloved citizen. A little time hence, more justice can be done to his transcendent merits; and the future historian will seize them with eagerness to adorn his page.

The General, during his short illness spoke with the utmost abhorrence of the practice of duelling, and has left his testimony against it. This is known to have been long his sentiment. He declared that he had no ill-will against his antagonist, and had determined to do him no harm; professed his firm belief of the Christian religion, and his "tender reliance on the mercy of Almighty God, through the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ," he devoutly received the holy sacrament, at his own earnest request. The witness of a man of such extensive powers and information, will outweigh that of an host of infidels. This completes his character, and demonstrates that he was good as well as great. "How are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of war perished!" "As a man falleth before wicked men, so falseth thou: And all the people wept again over him."

The Daily Advertiser.

It is with sentiments of the deepest regret that we announce to the public the decease of the great and estimable General Alexander Hamilton. No event since the death of the illustrious Washington has filled the public mind with more painful solicitude, or so much called forth the general sympathy and grief, as the event we now record. The loss of a character, so much respected in his profession, so esteemed by the public, so beloved in the circles of private friendship, and of domestic life, is beyond the power of expression; and the manner of his death!—Alas! it can be remembered only with mingled horror and regret.

Vain were the attempt to give even a hasty sketch of the various, the unequalled merit of the illustrious deceased.—the task will be executed by an abler hand. Suffice it under the present impression of public regret, to state

That as a soldier through the whole of our revolutionary war, Gen. Hamilton was eminently distinguished. He was one of the few select friends of the commander in chief, often tried, and as often approved. His cool and active valour in storming the redoubt before York Town will never be forgotten. After such a splendid proof of bravery, was it necessary again to put it to the test, in compliance with a false notion of honour and a mis-conceived resentment?

As a statesman, Gen. Hamilton added still greater honour to his name. To him we are principally indebted for the national constitution and the system of laws under which we now live. It was his hand that traced the outlines of our most important municipal institutions. To him we owe the plans for the organization of our National Treasury, the provisions for the payment of the public debt, for the establishment of the banks, of the mint, and the whole revenue system of our country.

As a lawyer he was unrivalled at the bar. His talents and eloquence gave him a decided ascendancy in his profession, which however was softened by the most unaffected modesty, and the utmost courtesy and gentleness.

As a man no one was more highly esteemed for his perfect integrity, truth, candour, and public spirit, than the unfortunate deceased. He enjoyed, (and no man ever better deserved it) the unlimited confidence of his friends and fellow citizens.

As a christian we are happy to add he has not left the world to doubt of his faith and hope. In his last hours he has put a seal on his character by declaring his firm belief in the merits and atonement of a Saviour, by avowing his trust in Redeeming grace, and by requesting and receiving in attestation of his faith, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Hasty and imperfect as the foregoing outlines may be, they will recal to the public mind, those impressions of exalted merit which we are sure will never be obliterated, will never cease to be cherished with a melancholy pleasure. The soldier, the statesman, the man of pre-eminent talents and worth, is gone, but his virtues will be held in memory, will be admired and recorded wherever there is a heart to feel or a tongue to repeat the eulogy due to departed worth.

With the deeply afflicted consort, and the orphan children of the deceased General, the public will sincerely sympathise. Their loss is incalculable. May heaven support them on this trying occasion. May they enjoy consolations from above (for the world can now have few for them) consolations which are neither few nor small, beyond the reach of accident and change.

The remains of the late General HAMILTON were on Saturday afternoon deposited in the "house appointed for all living." The mournful procession moved from his friend Mr. Church's in Robinson street about eleven o'clock, in the order directed by the committee of arrangements; and it was not until near two that the rear reached Trinity church, so numerous were the citizens who joined in paying this last tribute to the memory of the illustrious dead. We never witnessed in this country, or in Europe, on any similar occasion, so generally a sorrow, such an universal regret, or a ceremonial more awful and impressive.

The arduous task of delivering an oration over the body of the deceased was committed to the splendid talents of Mr. Gouverneur Morris; and he executed it in a manner highly honourable to his feelings. He sought not, in the course of it, to inflame those passions in the people which had already risen to no ordinary height, but touched lightly on the circumstance which produced the lamentable event; and dwelt with peculiar felicity on the public and private virtues, the uncommon talents, the great usefulness, the inflexible integrity and the real patriotism of his departed friend. His discourse was necessarily short, for his sensibility sometimes almost deprived him of the power of utterance.

The American Citizen.

On Saturday last the remains of General Hamilton were interred, accompanied with military honours, in the family vault, Trinity Church yard. Although the period which elapsed between his death and his funeral was but short, yet the lively recollection of his Revolutionary services—his acknowledged superior genius—his transcendent talents—his private worth—his sterling integrity, and the amiable frankness of his heart, excited in our citizens an uncommon cordiality and vigor to testify their high sense of these virtues by every demonstration of respect. There was a very general suspension of business, and the streets were uncommonly crowded with spectators.

The scene was impressive; and what added unspeakably to its solemnity, was the mournful group of tender boys, the sons, the once hopes and joys of the deceased, who, with tears gushing from their eyes, sat upon the stage, at the feet of the orator, bewailing the loss of their parent! It was too much; the sternest powers, the bloodiest villain, could not resist the melting scene. I wish I could go on and describe the sensations I felt and those which were manifest on every countenance.

When all things were arranged and the din of arms and the bustle of the croud had subsided, the orator rose and approached the front of the stage under which the CORPSE of GENERAL HAMILTON was placed. Mr. Morris thus addressed the audience.

The editor then gives the oration to the best of his memory, and with very considerable accuracy.

The above documents are carefully copied from the New-York Herald, conducted by William Coleman, Esq. and well known as a paper most powerfully supporting the political doctrines of General HAMILTON. Mr. Coleman has evinced his signal sorrow for the loss of this Great Man, in a manner which reflects a powerful lustre on his genius, judgment, and sensibility.

The Editor of the Port Folio would do equal wrong to his warm feelings, and to his DELIBERATE OPINIONS, if he omitted to commend, with the strongest emphasis of praise, the magnanimity and piety of the dying HAMILTON, the pathetic and salutary letter of Bishop MOORE, the eloquent and appropriate panegyric of Gouverneur MORRIS, and the manly, explicit, and noble statement of Judge PENDLETON.

PHILADELPHIA, July 17.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT.....The citizens of Philadelphia, Southwark, and the Northern Liberties, assembled agreeably to public notice for the purpose of adopting proper measures for the expression of their grief at the untimely fate of their deceased fellow-citizen, major-general ALEXANDER HAMILTON—their admiration of his virtues and his talents—and their gratitude for the eminent services, which as a soldier and a statesman, he has rendered to his country.

Resolved, That a national tribute of respect to the memory of departed heroes and statesmen, not only excites an emulation of their glorious example, but constitutes the purest reward of their toils and their virtues; and that such a tribute is justly due to the memory of Alexander Hamilton:

That in imitation of the pious example of the deceased, in the closing scenes of his life, exhibiting an illustrious proof of the benign influence of the religion of our forefathers, the citizens, in their respective places of worship, on Sunday next, will render their prayers of thanksgiving to God, for his goodness in having blessed our nation with men of talents to discern, and virtue to pursue her safety, her honour and welfare; and especially for having thus long continued to us the eminently useful talents of the deceased.

That the clergymen of the several denominations be requested to expatiate on the same day upon the irreligious and pernicious tendency of a custom, which has deprived our country of one of her best and most invaluable citizens, and has proved so fatally destructive to the happiness of his family.

That arrangements be made for having the bells throughout the city muffled and tolled during the day, and that the merchants will direct the masters of their ships in the harbour to display their flags half mast high.

That, as a further demonstration of our grief for his loss and our respect and affection for his memory, such of the citizens, as may consistently with their peculiar religious principles, will wear black crape round their left arm for thirty days.

That a copy of the proceedings of this meeting be transmitted by the chairman to the mayor of the city of New-York—that the sincere and heartfelt condolence of the city of Philadelphia, Southwark, and the Northern Liberties, be tendered to him and to his fellow-citizens, for the loss which the state of New-York and the United States of America have sustained in the death of General Hamilton.

That a committee be appointed to carry the foregoing resolutions into effect and to make such further arrangements relative thereto as may be suitable to the occasion; and that the following gentlemen compose the committee:

John C. Stocker,
Thomas Fitzsimons,
George Latimer
Elias Boudinot,
Jacob Sperry,
John K. Helmuth,
Godfrey Haga, •

Joseph Marsh,
Thomas Haskins,
William Lewis,
William Rawle,
Manual Eyre, and Joseph Grice.

And, That the proceedings of this meeting be subscribed by the chairman and secretary, and published in all the papers of this city.

THOMAS WILLING, Chairman.

Attest,

WM. MEREDITH, Secretary.

At a meeting of the Members of the Bar of the City of Philadelphia, held at the County Court, on Monday, the 16th of July, instant, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That uniting in the general grief for the death of Alexander Hamilton, we feel it our duty to testify our deepest regret for his loss, as a member of the profession to which he had returned after a series of public labours, in which the eminence he had attained was only surpassed by the variety of his excellence, in which exalted genius, incessant industry, and disinterested patriotism, enlightened and defended, enriched and dignified a nation, which must ever feel for him the strongest obligations of gratitude, affection and regret.

To the general testimony of sorrow we claim the right of adding our peculiar tribute and of deploring the loss which the science of jurisprudence, resorted to by him for the concluding employment of his valuable life, has sustained by his untimely and unexpected end.

Resolved, That the members of the bar, in the city of Philadelphia, in testimony of their sorrow for the death of Alexander Hamilton, counsellor at law, will respectfully wear black crape on their hats for the space of thirty days.

JARED INGERSOL, Chairman.

JOSEPH HOPKINSON, Sec'y.

At a meeting of the Students of Law, in the City of Philadelphia, convened at the County Court on Monday, the 16th instant, for the purpose of adopting proper measures to testify their respect for the Memory of Alexander Hamilton, Counsellor at Law, it was unanimously

Resolved, That having long contemplated the virtues and talents of Alexander Hamilton, as a bright and eminent object of imitation, they sincerely deplore the loss which they have sustained in being deprived his example.

That as a memorial of the lively sensibility which has been excited by his death, they will wear black crape on their hats for thirty days.

JOHN E. HALL, Chairman.

GEO. CLYMER, jun. Sec'y.

From the Political Register.

The deplorable termination of General HAMILTON's career of usefulness to his country, and glory to himself, has excited, among all denominations of our fellow-citizens, the strong emotions of sympathy and grief, which his long and faithful public services, his great and splendid talents, his firm and inflexible integrity, his active and undaunted bravery, his noble, disinterested and magnanimous patriotism demanded from a just and grateful people.

The soldier of the revolution laments, in deep affliction, the loss of the HERO, who was the generous and affectionate friend of his youth—the unwearied and gallant associate of his toils:

and dangers—and under whose auspices the honours and glory of our country never would have faded, nor its independence and happiness have ever been subverted.

The Agriculturist, the Merchant, and the Artificer regret, with unaffected concern, the death of the STATESMAN, by whose indefatigable labor and exalted genius, our finances were restored to order and arrangement—public credit was established—commerce invigorated—manufactures revived—and the means of our present unexampled prosperity, and growing greatness brought into full and active operation.

The lawyer deplores the loss of a brother CIVILIAN, the purity of whose professional life, in all the rage for party defamation, has never been questioned—whose eloquence and learning had neither rival nor detractor—whose talents never were exerted in the cause of injustice—never yielded to the insolence of power, or justified the practice of oppression.

The friend of science mourns over our privation of the Scholar, whose mind was the seat of the highest intellectual endowments—whose genius had penetrated the inmost recesses of literature, and whose imagination was as brilliant and vigorous, as his judgment was intuitively strong.

The Moralist and the Christian, while indignant at the powerful but wicked and barbarous laws, which custom has prescribed and sanctioned, weep over the lamentable sacrifice, which a high and delicate sense of honour, a pure and ennobled regard to fame and reputation have yielded to jealousy and resentment.

The liberal and patriotic Ministerialist, with what ardor and violence he may have opposed the Founder of Federal politics, while living, is yet grieved, sincerely grieved, that our nation should be deprived, of powers which conferred honour upon man.

And the Federalist, who has long listened with wonder and delight to the just precepts of political science, which have issued from his lips—who has surrendered to his wisdom and integrity the post of his Protector, and most influential of his advisers, is overpowered with anguish for his friend, and sinks into despondence for his country.

AMICUS.

Poulson's Daily Advertiser.

When society has sustained a loss so severe as that of Alexander Hamilton, the occasion demands the most public expression of our grief.

The attempt to pourtray, for the information of the living, merits known so universally as his, is indeed a superfluous office; but posterity has a right to require of the contemporaries of a great man, even such a tribute, as the passing hand of a daily editor can bestow.

Mr. Hamilton united those qualities which separately distinguished the soldier, the statesman, the scholar, and the gentleman.

His early adherence to the American cause, his voluntary services in the field, the rare union of calm intrepidity and impassioned enterprise, the humanity which, when necessary, could suddenly check the uplifted arm, the precision which guided the ardor of combat and selected the moment of conciliation, recommended him to the confidence of one, whose esteem was truly honour, and whose employment conferred real praise.

Gen. Washington took Col. Hamilton from his regiment, and in the service of an aid-de-camp during the rest of the war, although he lost the opportunity of gradual increase of rank, he enjoyed the high advantage of an intimate connexion with one of the first of human beings, and of co-operating, perhaps not less than he had o rued his former course, in the effective termination of the war.

The peace, which succeeded, unfolded powers and energies adapted to civil life calculated for the benefit of nations, and by a happy coincidence of events, employed on those objects, for which they seemed to have been created.

In the formation of a constitution which combined the opposing interests of different states, and created a new political body from materials seemingly repulsive to each other, a constitution which, if wisely administered, and preserved from open, or insidious breaches, might confer prosperity on ages yet unborn; in this mighty work Mr. Hamilton was one of the principal agents.

His powerful and unwearied exertions in the convention of New-York secured its advantages to the state from which he had remained in the general convention the sole representative, and his luminous and forcible commentary, under the signature of a Federalist endeared it to the whole continent.

The disordered state of the public finances rendered the treasury department, at that time, the most arduous that could be undertaken. It was conferred upon him before whom difficulties had been accustomed to vanish, and the incongruous matter has been moulded into a system which those who envied his genius, and opposed his politics, have been compelled to pursue without alteration, or if alterations have been attempted, without improvement on the original.

Not enriched by public employments, he returned in 1795 to the labours of the bar, in which he soon regained and surpassed his former eminence, and his fellow citizens, particularly the commercial part of the city of New-York, accustomed to repose on his quick comprehension, sound judgment, extensive learning, commanding eloquence, and unremitting fidelity, will be among the first sufferers by his death.

That a man, in whose character even this imperfect sketch presents so much to admire, should fall a victim in the prime of life, to a custom so barbarous, almost the only relic of the middle age when ignorance, force, and superstition overwhelmed the polished forms and lettered refinements of society in the south of Europe, is much to be lamented. Duelling, which sprang from the single combats of the Goths, an imaginary and unhallowed appeal to Heaven, has survived almost all the other vestiges which the northern barbarians left.

The arts, the sciences, the graces of civilised life have resumed their empire and chased away the grosser habits of their former conquerors; but it still remains a principle, that a man of honour invited to expose his life, the interests of his family, the confidence, the trusts of his fellow-citizens reposed personally in him, to the unauthorised weapon of a private opponent, must incur the peril of the combat, or submit, in the opinion of many, to be deemed dishonored.

Is legislation then so weak as to be unable to substitute some greater disgrace on him who accepts than him who refuses the challenge? Can no mode be suggested by which the imputation of cowardice, which men fear so much, can be thrown upon the challenger? And is it not time to relieve ourselves from a slavery so odious, when we see that it now numbers, among its victims, one of the greatest ornaments of the age?

The elegant encomium, with the Signature of "Amicus," which we reprint from the Register, is an eloquent and affectionate tribute to the memory of the Illustrious dead. We add, with peculiar pleasure, that with one disgraceful and infamous exception the editors of the daily papers of Philadelphia, have manifested their respect for the memory of HAMILTON, in panegyric the most pathetic, liberal, ingenious, and sincere.

With respect to the city at large, its grief has been, by no means, limited in extent, or feeble in expression. Thrusting aside, as unworthy consideration, the rancorous Jacobin, the scoffing deist, the snivelling fanatic, and the imported scoundrel, we have heard the voice of deep lament from every side. All, who have a tear for pity, all good and true men, all genuine Patriots, the votaries of Christianity, the votaries of Genius, every magnanimous, every virtuous individual have bewailed private loss, and THE PUBLIC CALAMITY. On the Saturday, when this national misfortune was first reported in the city, the Editor, as he took his melancholy rounds, was struck with the contemplation of the general anxiety; and when he beheld those who wept for the fall of Hamilton, and those 'who were indignant at its cause,' he could not avoid remembering a picturesque description by a great historical Painter. Neque populi aut plebis ulla vox; sed attoniti vultus, et conversæ ad omnia aures. Non tumultus, non quies; sed quale magni metus et MAGNÆ IRÆ silentium est.

An animated and rhetorical writer in Major JACKSON's paper, among other striking topics of praise, introduces, with great feeling and effect, the following memorable sentences.

When we say that HAMILTON is DEAD! we can add nothing to the cause of grief—when we remember how he lived! we can add nothing to the lustre of his fame.

We have remarked, with signal satisfaction, that with very few exceptions, the respectable SOCIETY of FRIENDS have testified a sincere regret for the hapless lot of HAMILTON. Though their peculiar tenets preclude a Sad Ostent, in memory of the dead; though they wear no inky cloaks nor customary suits of solemn black, yet theirs is the sagacity to discern the value of a great Statesman, and theirs is the silent sorrow, which mutes at his loss.

*. The friends of the Editor are very respectfully notified, that the publication of the Port Folio has been postponed, that he might present a complete and accurate view of a most sinister event, which has overwhelmed America with affliction. Notwithstanding his utmost pains, and his fervent zeal to exhibit all that is plausible and respectful of that GREATNESS and GOODNESS, so conspicuous in the character of General HAMILTON, it is apprehended some omission or some error may appear from the very eagerness of the Editor to do ample justice to the subject. Hereafter, the COLUMN of HAMILTON'S FAME may be indicated by no random or feeble hand. Meanwhile, let us remember the pathetic prophesy of the classic Historian, which TACITUS has not applied with more truth to Julius Agricola, than it may be applied to ALEXANDER HAMILTON,

Quidquid ex illo amavimus, quidquid mirati sumus MANET, MANSURUMQUE est in animis hominum, in æternitate fama rerum. Nam multos veterum velut inglorios et ignobiles oblivio obruet. Ille Posteritati narratus et traditus, SUPERSTES ERIT.

[Criticism on Jack and Gill concluded.]

HAVING ascertained the names and conditions of the parties, the reader becomes naturally inquisitive into their employment, and wishes to know, whether their occupation is worthy of them. This laudable curiosity is abundantly gratified in the succeeding lines; for

Jack and Gill
Went up a hill
To fetch a bucket of water.

Here we behold the plan gradually unfolding, a new scene opens to our view, and the description is exceedingly beautiful. We now discover their object, which we were before left to conjecture. We see the two friends, like Pylades and Orestes, assisting and cheering each other in their labours, gaily ascending the hill, eager to arrive at the summit, and to fill their bucket. Here too is a new elegance. Our acute author could not but observe the necessity of machinery, which has been so much commended by critics, and admired by readers. Instead, however, of introducing a host of gods and goddesses, who might have only impeded the journey of his heroes, by the intervention of the bucket, which is, as it ought to be, simple and conducive to the progress of the poem, he has considerably improved on the ancient plan. In the management of it also he has shewn much judgment, by making the influence of the machinery and the subject reciprocal: for while the utensil carries on the heroes, it is itself carried on by them. In this part, too, we have a deficiency supplied, to wit, the knowledge of their relationship, which as it would have encumbered the opening, was reserved for this place. Even now there is some uncertainty whether they were related by the ties of consanguinity; but we may rest assured they were friends, for they did join in carrying the instrument; they must, from their proximity of situation, have been amicably disposed, and if one alone carried the utensil, it exhibits an amiable assumption of the whole labour. The only objection to this opinion is an old adage, 'Bonus dux bonum facit militem,' which has been translated 'A good Jack makes a good Gill,' thereby intimating a superiority in the former. If such was the case, it seems the poet wished to shew his hero in retirement, and convince the world, that, however illustrious he might be, he did not despise manual labour. It has also been objected, (for every Homer has his Zoilus), that their employment is not sufficiently dignified for epic poetry; but, in answer to this, it must be remarked, that it was the opinion of Socrates, and many other philosophers, that beauty should be estimated by utility, and surely the purpose of the heroes must have been beneficial. They ascended the rugged mountain to draw water, and drawing water is certainly more conducive to human happiness than drawing blood, as do the boasted heroes of the Iliad, or roving on the ocean, and invading other men's property, as did the pious Æneas. Yes! they went to draw water. Interesting scene! It might have been drawn for the purpose of culinary consumption; it might have been to quench the thirst of the harmless animals who relied on them for support; it might have been to feed a sterile soil, and to revive the drooping plants, which they raised by their labours. Is not our author more judicious than Apollonius, who chooses for the heroes of his Argonautics a set of rascals, undertaking to steal a sheep skin? And, if dignity is to be considered, is not drawing water a circumstance highly characteristic of antiquity? Do we not find the amiable Rebecca busy at the well—does not one of the maidens in the Odyssey delight us by her diligence in the same situation, and has not a learned Dean proved that it was quite fashionable in Peloponnesus?—Let there be an end to such frivolous remarks. But the descriptive part is now finished, and the author hastens to the catastrophe. At what part of the mountain the well was situated, what was the reason of the sad misfortune, or how the prudence of Jack forsook him, we are not informed, but so, alas! it happened,

Jack fell down—

Unfortunate John! At the moment when he was nimbly, for aught we know, going up the hill, perhaps at the moment when his toils were to cease, and he had filled the bucket, he made an unfortunate step, his centre of gravity, as the philosophers would say, fell beyond his base, and he tumbled. The extent of his fall does not however appear until the next line, as the author feared to overwhelm us by a too immediate disclosure of his whole misfortune. Buoyed by hope, we suppose his affliction not quite remediless, that his fall is an accident to which the way-farers of this life are daily liable, and we anticipate his immediate rise to resume his labours. But how are we deceived by the heart-rending tale, that

Jack fell down
And broke his crown—

Nothing now remains but to deplore the premature fate of the unhappy John. The mention of the crown has much perplexed the commentators. The learned Microphilus, in the 513th page of his 'Cursory remarks' on the poem, thinks he can find in it some allusion to the story of Alfred, who, he says, is known to have lived during his concealment in a mountainous country, and as he watched the cakes on the fire, might have been sent to bring water. But his acute annotator, Vandergruten, has detected the fallacy of such a supposition, though he falls into an equal error in remarking that Jack might have carried a crown or a half crown in his hand, which was fractured in the fall. My learned reader will doubtless agree with me in conjecturing that as the crown is often used metaphorically for the head, and as that part is, or without any disparagement to the unfortunate sufferer might have been, the heaviest, it was really his pericranium which sustained the damage. Having seen the fate of Jack, we are anxious to know the lot of his companion. Alas!

Here the distress thickens on us. Unable to support the loss of his friend, he followed him, determined to share his disaster, and resolved, that as they had gone up together, they should not be separated as they came down.*

In the midst of our affliction, let us not, however, be unmindful of the poet's merit, which on this occasion is conspicuous. He evidently seems to have in view the excellent observation of Adam Smith, that our sympathy arises not from a view of the passion, but of the situation which excites it. Instead of unnecessary lamentation, he gives us the real state of the case; avoiding at the same time that minuteness of detail, which is so common among pathetic poets, and which by dividing a passion, and tearing it to rags, as Shakspeare says, destroys its force. Thus, when Cowley tells us, that his mistress shed tears enough to save the world if it had been on fire, we immediately think of a house on fire, ladders, engines, crowd of people, and other circumstances, which drive away every thing like feeling: when Pierre is describing the legal plunder of Jaffier's house, our attention is diverted from the misery of Belvidera to the goods and chattels of him the said Jaffier, but in the poem before us the author has just hit the dividing line between the extreme conciseness which might conceal necessary circumstances, and the prolixity of narration, which would introduce immaterial ones. So happy, indeed, is the account of Jack's destruction, that had a physician been present, and informed us of the exact place of the scull which received the hurt, whether it was the occipitis, or which of the ossa bregmatis that was fractured, or what part of the lambdoidal suture was the point of injury, we could not have a clearer idea of his misfortune. Of the

* There is something so tenderly querimonious in the silent grief and devotion of Gill, something which so reminds us of the soft complaint of the hapless sister of Dido, that it must delight every classical reader:

Comitemne sororem
Sprevisti moriens? Eadem me ad fata vocasses:
Idem ambas ferro dolor, atque eadem hora tulisset.

bucket we are told nothing, but as it is probable that it fell with its supporters, we have a scene of misery, unequalled in the whole compass of tragic description. Imagine to ourselves Jack rapidly descending, perhaps rolling over and over down the mountain, the bucket, as the lighter, moving along, and pouring forth (if it had been filled) its liquid stream, Gill following in confusion, with a quick and circular and headlong motion; add to this the dust, which they might have collected and dispersed with the blood which must have flowed from John's head, and we will witness a catastrophe highly shocking, and feel an irresistible impulse to run for a doctor. The sound, too, charmingly 'echoes to the sense.'

Jack fell down
And broke his crown,
And Gill came tumbling after.

The quick succession of movements is indicated by an equally rapid motion of the short syllables, and in the last line Gill rolls with a greater sprightliness and vivacity, than even the stone of Sisyphus.

Having expatiated so largely on its particular merits, let us conclude by a brief review of its most prominent beauties. The subject is the fall of men, a subject, high, interesting, worthy of a poet: the heroes, men who do not commit a single fault, and whose misfortunes are to be imputed, not to indiscretion, but to destiny. To the illustration of the subject, every part of the poem conduces. Attention is neither wearied by multiplicity of trivial incident, nor distracted by frequency of digression. The poet prudently clipped the wings of imagination, and repressed the extravagance of metaphorical decoration. All is simple, plain, consistent. The moral too, that part without which poetry is useless sound, has not escaped the view of the poet. When we behold two young men, who but a short moment before stood up in all the pride of health, suddenly falling down a hill, how must we lament the instability of all things.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 3.

The orations against Verres.

At the time when Verres was charged with the prætorship of Sicily, the pirates infested the seas, which bathed this island and the coasts of Italy. His duty was to maintain the navy, which the republic had armed to fight them, and defend her commerce. But the avarice of the prætor saw in these means of defence only a new object of rapine and exaction. He made the soldiers and sailors purchase their discharges, who ought to have served in the galleys; he sold to the allied and tributary cities dispensations from furnishing what they were obliged to do by treaties, and leaving destitute of every thing the few men he thought himself obliged to keep on the few vessels he had at sea, he gave himself no concern about exposing Sicily to the incursions of pirates, provided he enriched himself at the expense of the state and the province. He placed at the head of this miserable squadron, not a Roman, but, what was without example, a Sicilian, named Cleomenes, whose wife was publicly the mistress of the prætor. The event happened which alone could be expected: the Roman fleet ran away at the sight of the pirates, and Cleomenes was the first to disembark. The other commanders of galleys, who had only a few men, half famished with want of necessaries, could do no other than follow the example of the admiral. The pirates burned the forsaken vessels in the sight of Syracuse, and entered even into the port. This affront to the Roman arms, this alarm carried by pirates into a city so powerful as Syracuse, soon resounded as far as Rome. Verres dreaded the consequences of such a vexatious report, and that he might not appear to be the guilty cause of this disaster, he formed the design the most abominable that ever entered the thought of any tyrant, equally cowardly and cruel. He plotted to accuse of treason the Sicilian commanders, whose innocence was well known, and who had it not in their power to do any thing but what they did; and, without the slightest proof, he condemned them to death. All Sicily shuddered at this outrage. Cicero demands vengeance for it. We shall see in what colours he knew how to paint it, and with what energy he details all the horrors of it.

"Verres marches out of his palace, animated with all the furies of crime and barbarity. He appears in the public place, and orders the commanders to be cited to his tribunal. They appear, without suspicion, and without fear. All on a sudden he causes to be laid in irons, these unfortunate men, who were in full confidence of their safety, as well as of their innocence, who appeal to the justice of the prætor, and demand the reason of this treatment. It is, said he, for having traiterously surrendered our vessels to the enemy. All the world cries out; all the world is astonished that he should have impudence enough to impute to any body, but himself, the cause of a misfortune, which was but the work of his own avarice; that a man like Verres, placed by the public opinion in the rank of robbers and pirates, should dare to accuse any one with being in intelligence with them; and, finally, that this strange accusation should not have been thought of till fifteen days after the event. Every one demanded where is Cleomenes, not, indeed, because they thought him more deserving of punishment than the others. What could he do with vessels destitute of all the means of defence? But yet his cause was the same. Where is Cleomenes? He was seen at the side of the prætor, whispering familiarly in his ear, as it was his custom to do. The indignation is general, that men the most honourable and the most distinguished of their city, should be put in irons, while Cleomenes, as a reward of his infamous complaisance, is the friend and the confidant of the prætor. There appears, however, an accuser: it is a wretch named Turpion, disgraced under preceding governors, well qualified for the abject part he had to act, and well known as the instrument of all the iniquities, of all the baseness, and of all the extortions of Verres. The relations, the neighbours, of these unfortunate victims flock to Syracuse, struck with the fatal news; they see their children, oppressed under the weight of chains, carrying, O! Verres! the penalty of your execrable avarice. They present themselves, demand their children, defend them with loud cries, implore thy faith, thy justice, as if you ever had any. There was seen Decion of Tyn-daris, a man of the first nobility, who had entertained you at his house, whom you had called your host. But neither hospitality, nor his misfortunes, nor the rank which he held in his country, nor his old age, nor his tears, were able to recal you one moment to any sentiment of humanity. There was seen Eubulides, not less considerable, and not less respected, who, for having, in his defence, pronounced the name of Cleomenes, saw, by your orders, his garments torn, and his person left almost naked upon the place. And what means of justification remained then? I forbid, says Verres, the mention of Cleomenes. But my cause obliges me to mention him.—You shall die, if you name him. But I had no rowers in my ship.—You accuse the prætor! Lictors, cut off his head with your axes. Judges! you hear the very language of Verres. The menaces were all of this violence. Hark! in the name of humanity! hearken to the outrages committed against our allies; hearken to the recital of their misfortunes. Among these accused innocents appeared also Heraclius of Segesta, a Sicilian of the highest birth, the feebleness of whose sight had hindered him from embarking in his ship, and who had orders to remain at Syracuse. Certainly, Verres, this man could not be guilty; he could neither surrender nor abandon a ship in which he was not. No matter! they enrol in the number of criminals, him, whom they could not accuse, even falsely, of any crime. Finally, of this number was also Furius of Heraclea, a man celebrated during his life, and who has become much more so since his decease: it was he who had the courage not only to address to Verres, in his presence, all the reproaches he deserved: (sure to die he had nothing more to fear) but even to write his apology in prison, in presence of his mother, who, drowned in tears, passed whole days and nights with him. All Sicily has read this apology, the history of your crimes and cruelties: we there see how many sailors each commander of a galley had received from the city which was to furnish them, and how many had purchased of you their discharge, and when at your tribunal he alleged his means of defence, your lictors smote him over his eyes with their rods, while this high spirited man, resolved upon death, and insensible to his pains, cried out that it was shameful that the tears of his mother should have less influence with you to save him, than the caresses of a prostitute had to save the infamous Cleomenes.

"Verres finally condemns them all by the advice of his council; but, however, in a cause of this nature, in a capital affair, he did not summon his questor Vettius, nor his lieutenant Cervius. This pretended council was but a mob of highway-men, whom he had at his beck. Judges! represent to yourselves the consternation of the Sicilians, our most faithful and our most ancient allies, so often loaded with benefits by our ancestors. Each one trembles for himself; no man believes himself in safety. They inquire of one another what has become of that mildness of the Roman government, now changed into this excess of inhumanity. How it is possible that so many men should be condemned in a moment, without being convicted of any crime? How could this unworthy prætor imagine that he could cloak his robberies by the punishment of so many innocent persons? It seems, indeed, as if nothing could be added to so much wickedness, madness, and cruelty. But Verres would surpass himself; he would excel his own peculiar crimes. I have spoken to you of Phalaris, excepted from the general condemnation because he commanded the ship which carried Cleomenes. Timarchides, one of the agents of Verres, was informed that this young man, not thinking his cause different from the others, had shewn some apprehensions. He goes and finds him, declares to him, that indeed he is secure from the axe, but that he runs the risk of being beaten with the rods, if he does not compound for his exemption: and you have heard him specify the sum which he counted down to redeem himself from the rods of the lictors. But why do I hesitate? Are these reproaches to be made to Verres? A young nobleman, a commander of a vessel, redeems himself from the rods for a sum of money. It is in Verres a trait of humanity. Another, at the same price, ransoms himself from the axe: Verres has accustomed us to such things: we are not to reproach him with common crimes. The Roman people expect from him new horrors, unheard of wickedness; they know it is not a common prevaricating magistrate that we have brought in trial before you, but the most abominable of tyrants. You will soon acknowledge it. The innocents, after their condemnation, were dragged into dungeons; preparations are making for their punishment. But the punishment must begin upon their unfortunate relations. The parents are prohibited the sight of their children. It is forbidden to bring them apparel or nourishment. These unfortunate fathers, who are here before you, were extended on the threshold of the prison; disconsolate mothers passed there the night in tears, without being able to obtain the last embraces of their children; they requested, as a precious favour, that it should be permitted them to collect the last sighs, but they requested it in vain. There watched the keeper of the prisons, the minister of the barbarities of Verres, the terror of the citizens, the lictor Sestius, who established a revenue upon the griefs and tears of all these unfortunate persons—So much for a visit to your son: so much for giving him any refreshment: not one could refuse it. What will you give me to put your son to death with one stroke of the axe? that he may not suffer long? that he may not be stricken several blows? All these favours were taxed. O! horrible condition! O insupportable tyranny! It was not life that they brought to market and put up for sale, but a more prompt death, and less cruel execution. The prisoners themselves compounded with Sestius to receive but one stroke: they requested of their relations, as a last expression of their tenderness, to pay for this favour to the inflexible Sestius. Have we not yet had torments enough? Will death at least put an end to them? Can barbarity extend itself further? Yes. When they shall have been executed, their bodies shall be exposed to wild beasts. If this is considered as a misfortune by their relations, let them pay for the privilege of sepulture. You know this; you have heard Onasus of Segesta relate what sum he had paid to Timarchides to be allowed to bury Heraclius. And who in Syracuse is ignorant that these bargains of sepulture were made between Timarchides and the prisoners themselves? That these contracts were public, that they were concluded in the presence of the relations, and that the price of the funerals was agreed on and paid beforehand?

POLITICS.

[Some staunch friend has sent us, for republication, the following just and indignant essay.]

POPULAR FANATICISM.

We have often expressed a confidence, that the present delusion which infatuates our countrymen cannot possibly last long; that a day must soon arrive when the people will spurn and turn from their deceivers with abhorrence; and that the nation must at no distant period once more learn to distinguish between honest friends and insidious flatterers, between tried patriots and treacherous pretenders, between the followers of Washington whom Washington trusted and "approved of," and the followers of Jefferson, of Jefferson by whom WASHINGTON has been slandered and belied, hypocritically mourned over, dreaded, envied, and hated. We have often expressed such confidence, we have fondly cherished it ourselves, we have endeavoured to inspire it in others, and we have contributed our mite towards the object of this confidence as a change "most devoutly to be wished for" by every lover of America. We begin to fear, that we have calculated too much on the good sense and the virtue of the land we live in, the land of our birth, dear to us as such, and we fear perhaps therefore overrated with the partiality of filial reverence. We begin to suspect that her foster sons, that the foreign outcasts she has received to her bosom, understand the disposition of our country much better than we do. We begin to fear, that the Duane and Cheethams, the Paines and Tony Pasquins, pestilent dregs of another clime, vomited on our shores, have not so greatly mistaken the public temper of these states, or the means of gratifying and guiding it for years yet to come. We begin to fear that they find something in that temper itself which fits a numerous mass not only to be dupes, but which renders them willing dupes, of whose vices there is as much advantage to be taken by the demagogue as of their ignorance. Every day's observation forces a reluctant belief, that the source of our present disorders, the root of our political evils, does not lie altogether in a momentary deceit, in a mere mistake or series of mistakes to which the frailty of man and the best of men has been at all times liable; but that it is fixed deep in a cause just as much more difficult to remove as it is easier to rectify the errors of weakness than to cure those of wilful and pre-pense depravity. There is reason more and more to apprehend that the moral principle of society is relaxed and tainted to the core; and that it is in the growing corruption of our national character that democracy, labouring still to increase that corruption, now feels her strength and hopes to preserve it. Or rather we might say she hopes and feels this not only in the corruption of our national character, but in its loss and total oblivion. Once, in the struggles of our revolution, at the era of the congress of independence, of the convention at Philadelphia, and of the constitution they framed as first put in trial in those hands who were immediately as it were by the voice of one general assent called to administer it, in those times we had a national character. It was a character for wisdom and integrity, for sober discernment, for constancy, for gratitude, for public spirit, for the glow and vigilance of rational liberty, and stubbornness and tenacity of right, for decent and temperate, and legal and solemn restraints, if not for the seriousness of hallowed piety and religious devotion. Such was, or such was deemed to be our national character, displayed, proved, and confirmed in the ordeal of twenty years of doubt, difficulty, and distress. Our republic appeared abroad to be once more realizing on earth the fables and dreams of history, or exemplifying its truths in an emulation and rivalry of Grecian and Roman worth. The continent seemed animated with one genius, pure and honourable as we have described, flowing as its vital blood through the whole body of the community in every vein and member to its very extremities. Scarcely a limb, or a joint, the lowest or most remote, but what looked sound, as if contagion could have no foot-hold to work with. In the various emergencies of that period, on the momentous questions which were, from time to time, submitted to the decision of all ranks and classes; when once informed right there was a surety they would decide right; and for the most part they decided with the promptness of intuition, of intuition whose judgment, never to be warped by passion, passion itself generally concurred with. Of every people as of every individual the interest, essentially valued, has never yet run counter to their duty: but with our people as they then were, interest, duty, and pleasure altogether did not only never run counter, they did not even run in different, but always in one and the same, channel. It was a proud day for

America, in whose most adverse hour the world in admiring her, could even forget she was not prosperous, because, and in so singular a degree, she stood virtuous. Virtue, indeed, might be called her national character, and justly so called by every rule according to which national character is determined. But all earthly virtue, like every other earthly possession, may decay or be impaired, it may cease entirely or be transformed to its very opposite, while retaining nothing but the name, the substance has all left us, till presently the name itself we are indifferent to retain or not, and yet a little longer even the name: we renounce and make our vice our boast. Is our country destined for this sad reverse? Or does she not already exhibit the worst part of it? What has become of the national character of America? Gone, we fear, to the tomb "of all the Capulets." Sunk, withered, and polluted. Dashed in the mire of low and sordid views; enervated with selfishness; infected with a poisonous sophistry; and debased with the importation of a putrid refuse, and an accumulating gang of "unhappy fugitives" who, happy enough to cheat the gallows and the gibbet in Europe, are received in this "asylum" with open arms, and, turning patriots of '76, are hailed, caressed, and exalted by the Powers that be. Those Powers themselves, who in turns support and are supported by every alien crew, are a proof, and a proof which promises to endure, that a revolution too must have happened to our national character, or else that revolution which fixed the Powers that be could not have happened to the union, or, if happened, could not endure. Had our people been what they were in '76, Jefferson would not have been president in 1801. Were they now what they were in '89, he could not be president in 1805. The people are changed, and the qualities for their trust are changed with them. When we speak of the people, we intend the bulk of numbers; for under a government where numbers, or a majority of numbers, must controul, numbers are sovereign, and sovereign is the people. There is an intelligent and undefiled portion of the whole, who form an exception and as yet a respectable exception not included in the present remarks; but they are not more than an exception, for they are a minority. We repeat then that the people are changed, and changed materially for the worse. In point of understanding, if experience adds to understanding, however it may be perverted, it cannot be supposed less now than it was formerly. If knowledge is neither retrograde nor stationary, it must progress with the progression of years; nor in these days which are emphatically termed enlightened will it be allowed that there is more of darkness over the public mind than in the days which are past. Yet in those days with not more but, as they will have it, with less information the people thought and acted right. If then, they are wrong now, it cannot be for want of sense enough to know, for with not a greater share of sense they did not know, what is right, but it must be for want of principle enough to prefer right to what is wrong. This truth may be unpalatable, and it is a truth not commonly told; but it is time it should begin to be told, and we choose to be among those who begin. The fever of democracy rages and spreads far and wide, because the corruption of manners, of morals, and of sentiments, spreading also far and wide, serves both to communicate the disease and predispose the victims. In every region where there is profligacy, there is Jacobinism, or materials for Jacobinism, and wherever folly is, Jacobinism will have subjects to act on, and tools to act with. Generally speaking, throughout the different divisions of this Empire, the quantity of Jacobinism, or of democracy refined and sublimated, of any part is already ascertained to be in the proportion of the profligacy and folly of that part. In our Southern States, negro slavery may be a necessary evil, but it is still an evil, among the worst effects of which is the baleful effect on the passions and habits of the whites. Now, it is known that the watch word of Jacobinism for licentiousness is liberty: And thus 'we hear the loudest yelps for liberty from the drivers of negroes.' In Virginia, where churches are out of fashion, democracy is most in fashion. In Connecticut, where they have yet more room for their Meeting Houses and Schools and less for whiskey shops and brothels, there is less of democracy and more of federalism. The position might be further verified by a train of examples, if of such examples there could be any end. Enough has been said to shew that it is cowardly and foolish to ascribe to popular simplicity alone, gulled and deceived, what is equally attributable to popular wickedness, greedy and designed.—If the multitude were to be brought back from their errors, merely by being convinced of them, it is impossible they should continue to uphold a man, whose errors, private and public, deep, flagrant and mischievous, glare on them in every print. It is in vain to urge that they heed not, because they believe not, the warnings that are given them. Of the facts, which will sometimes arrest their attention in spite of themselves, the most dull and headstrong do believe enough to set them straight, if it was not their resolved whim to be crooked. But with many, to expose the turpitude and knavery of their leaders, is only to enhance their favour, because turpitude and knavery are to their taste, and are the things which they prize. To prove their chief favourite wanting even in common fidelity to his friend or common honesty to his benefactor, is only to prove him like themselves, or as they would have been, if situated towards Walker and Jones as Jefferson was situated.—To prove him the employer of venal calumny against Washington, is to no purpose; because they think not of Washington at all, or think of him but with the invidious dislike with which meanness, whatever it may affect, does always in its heart revolt against transcendent excellence. To prove their President and Congress violators of the Constitution, is nothing to those who care not, who will scarcely trouble themselves to inquire, whether we have any Constitution. To prove that Justice is nodding to its fall, and the independence of courts sacrificed on the altars of party, is to them no matter of concern, who have no relish for justice, or Courts the instrument of justice, by which injuries are redressed and guilt condemned. To detect their vaunted economists in squandering, impairing and embezzling the public treasures, is of no account with a tribe who have no anxiety for the public but that themselves, as a part of the public, may forever elude the public's tax gatherer.—The promises of the Inaugural address, with the wanton and continued breaches of those promises, they mind not, because of their own promises they 'take no cognizance.' The cruel and rapacious work of persecution which still proceeds, disturbs them not an instant, for they are of the faction which persecutes and profits by persecution, and as individuals not less malignant than the faction they belong to. To talk to them of desertion of duty, of the flight to Carter's Mountain, only brings them to consider how they would have deserted and fled themselves. To dwell on the invitation to Paine, on the irreligion and the profanity of his host at the Prezidiad, must now be too late for the bounden disciples of a master, who has long been avowedly content, while ever his own leg is not broken and his pocket not picked, that there may be either twenty Gods or one or no God.

From the premises we infer that to rely as a last preventive on any community of American feelings is to rely on a phantom; for there cannot be any community of American feelings, to a majority which, composed of a medley of all nations, have not in fact the common feelings of any one nation. The greater part and far the greater part of that majority may be natives, but they are natives associated with and every day more and more led by foreigners, and foreigners too of the worst cast. If they have not yet altogether surrendered, they will soon surrender, all feelings but the feelings of party, of party rampant and vindictive and triumphant. To depend on the National Character to check and relieve the reigning disorder, is to depend for a remedy on a source which is the seat of the disorder. If we have any National Character left, it is a character for augmenting corruption, and our political complaint is nothing more than corruption, or the consequence of corruption growing with our growth and strengthening with our strength. Let us throw away therefore the 'flattering unction' of self-pride and self-deceit. Let us be men, and learn the extent of our evils, that we may not mistake the means to ward off the last extremity. While there is life there is hope—But if we suffer life to doze in the sleep of indolence, the time is at hand when we shall awaken in death. There is yet a body of principles surviving among us, which, though surviving in the lesser part, may save both lesser and greater from that yawn of destruction, which will not separate our fates, but if it swallows one must draw the other after it. The innocent and the guilty, whatever the guilty or the innocent may think, must, if they perish, perish in one grave, the grave which Anarchy is digging for our Commonwealth and has dug for so many Commonwealths before us. But the labours of Anarchy, though not immediately to be stopped, may yet be retarded by our exertions. Every day thus gained, is a respite in which fortune may do more for us than we can do for ourselves. Every pause of suspense is important, when a single pause may prove our salvation. Was there, at this moment, any thing in the nature of the predominant numbers for a pledge to us against a tragic catastrophe to our drama, it would be still important to put off the concluding act as late as we can, to give time for their fury to retire from the stage, and their virtue to step on. But if some more powerful corrective, than we have yet discovered, must be applied to their vices, before we can count any thing on their virtue, if their immoralities must first be extirpated, ere we can look for any help in their morals, there is still incalculable use in delay, because in delay there is chance. And there is no use in supinely submitting, and by supineness hastening instead of averting our doom but the use of slumber—Inactivity but weakens our weakness, without abating a particle of the rage, with which they trample on that weakness. Could we even be more passive than we have been, they would not be a jot less violent than they are. In time, perhaps, if we will but strive for time, accident may change or divert the mad course of the multitude; the multitude may themselves change; if not from their reason, they may change from their caprice; if not from their love of right, they may change from their love of novelty; if not because they believe their idols to be bad, possibly because they believe them not to be bad enough; or at least as they have changed once, so they may change back again, without troubling themselves for the why or the wherefore. But even time will be denied us, unless the remains of the faithful can be kept together steadfast, zealous, and alert. The law of physical gravity is not more certain, than our constant inclination for repose, negligent of the future; nor is any force more centrifugal than the guile which is ever tempting us from the centre of our duties. Every nerve must be strained with the patience of Sisyphus, to keep back the falling, if we cannot lift up the fallen. This task now principally consigned for our brotherhood of Editors, whom it certainly behoves to be among the foremost, is yet the province of all, who are well affected and undaunted. The Press in skilful and vigorous hands is an engine which in a good cause, and at a good season should undoubtedly do much. But the most it can now be expected to do, is to instruct its friends and flash indignantly on the foe, to prevent the vigilant from becoming lukewarm, and animate the lukewarm to become vigilant, to rouse the dreamer and incite the slug-gard, while it sets to all an example in its own efforts to harrass and impede the Jacobinism yet too strong to be disabled or disarmed, and occasionally 'like a rattling peal of thunder' to assault the Monster in his march.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM WHITEHEAD

The exhibition of this play was hardly over, before he was called upon to attend his pupil and Lord Viscount Nuneham, son to Earl Harcourt, in their travels, as their joint governor. The two young noblemen were nearly of the same age. They had been intimate from their infancy. He was therefore as well acquainted with the pleasing temper and disposition of the other lord as of him whose education he had more immediately superintended; and his own happy art of making instruction an amusement, had so won on the affections of them both, that they felicitated themselves mutually on his being appointed their joint governor.

In June 1754, they left England under his care, and passing through Flanders, resided the rest of the summer at Rheims, in order to habituate themselves to the French language, and then removing to Leipsic, passed seven months there, for the purpose of studying the Droit Publique, under the famous Professor Mascow, whom they found in a state of dotage, without being quite incapacitated from reading his lectures.

In the following Spring they proceeded to Dresden, and after visiting that, and most of the other German courts, repaired to Hanover in the Summer 1755, at the time when George II. paid his last visit to his electorate. There Whitehead had the pleasure of meeting his friend Mr. Mason, who had then lately taken orders, and attended the Earl of Holderness the Secretary of State, as his domestic chaplain. His elegant expostulation to Mr. Mason took its rise at this place, from certain amicable altercations which they there had, on the subject of public and retired life, to the latter of which Mr. Mason's disposition appeared to lean more than he thought consisted with the views of advancement which then seemed to open before him.

Having continued at Hanover the greatest part of the Summer, he proceeded with his pupils to Vienna, and from thence to Italy. On their return homeward, they crossed the Alps, and passed through Switzerland, Germany, and Holland, being prevented from visiting France by the declaration of war, and landed at Harwich in September 1756.

In the course of so complete a tour, a great part of which led through classic ground, he communicated to his friends at home many curious observations on the countries through which he rave lled. A few of his letters from Rome and elsewhere, are in the possession of Mr. Mason and Mr. Wright, rector of Birchin in Yorkshire, with whom he spent several of his college vacations, and to whom he addressed many of his smaller poems; and the executors of the late Dr. Goddard, master of Clare-Hall, and the Rev. Mr. Sanderson of Haslemere, have many more.

That his muse, now in her fullest vigour, frequently exerted herself, his striking Ode to the Tiber, and his six Elegies addressed to his two noble pupils, with him, and his more particular friends at home, Mr. Wright, Mr. Sanderson, &c. sufficiently testify. The sublime scenes through which he passed, and the grand historical events which they recalled to his memory, generally furnished the subject; and as they were executed on the spot, they are more replete with picturesque imagery, than any other of his compositions. They were published in February 1757, under the title of Elegies, with an Ode to the Tiber, 4to. and received with approbation proportioned to their merit.

During his absence, he had received the badges of Secretary and Register of the order of the Bath, procured for him by the interest of Lady Jersey, through the mediation of her relation, the Duchess of Newcastle; and in 1757, his finances were farther improved by the appointment of Poet Laureat, on the death of Cibber, upon the nomination of the Duke of Devonshire, as Lord Chamberlain. He has himself said on this appointment, in his Charge to the Poets, that,

Unask'd it came, and from a friend unknown.

Mr. Mason, in his 'Memoirs of Gray,' has acquainted the public, that the place was before offered to Gray, by his mediation, with permission to hold it as a mere sinecure. This was not the case when it was given to Whitehead, and 'I have often,' says Mr. Mason, 'considered why, as the late King would readily have dispensed with hearing music, for which he had no ear, and poetry, for which he had no taste.'

When Whitehead had accepted the laurel without such permission, Mr. Mason advised him to employ a deputy to write his annual odes, and reserve his own pen for certain great occasions that might occur, such as a peace or a marriage, and then to address his royal master with some studied ode or epistle, as Boileau and Racine had done in France, for their pensions.

This advice was not attended to by his friend. He set himself to his periodical task, with the zeal of a person who wished to retrieve the honours of that laurel, which came to him from the head of Cibber, in a very shrivelled, or rather blasted state.

His first Ode for his Majesty's Birth-Day, November 10. 1758, was calculated from the heroic genealogy that it contained, to be peculiarly agreeable to the monarch for whose birthday it was written; and its poetical merit had the very just approbation of Gray, and other good judges.

The laurel was said by the ancients to have the power of screening those under its shade from thunder; yet it cannot defend modern laureats from the artillery of their contemporaries. After Whitehead had accepted of this office, he received much illiberal treatment during the rest of his life, from the little fry of his own profession, who were fond of having a lick at the laureat. What he thought of these 'poets, who were mean enough to envy a poet laureat,' may be learned from his Poetical Apology for all Laureats, past, present and to come, which he wrote some years before his death, for the amusement of a few friends. By the motto Veniant ad Cæsaris aures, he seems to have wished it might reach the royal ear.

On his return to England, Lord Jersey pressed him strongly to continue in his family; an invitation which Whitehead readily accepted. Lord Harcourt gave him also a general invitation to his table in town, and to his seat in the country; and his pupils, who had now entirely sunk the idea of their governor in the more agreeable one of their friend, showed him constantly such sincere marks of affection, as greatly increased the felicity of his situation.

He resided in this family fourteen years, during which he found opportunities of leisure to do more in the literary way than merely write official odes.

In 1762, he made his first attempt in comedy, and brought upon the stage at Drury-Lane The School for Lovers, a comedy, which had its competent run, as to nights of representation, and received a just tribute of applause from the judicious few. It is formed on a plan of Fontenelle's, never intended for the stage, and printed in the eighth volume of his works, under the title of the La Testament, and inscribed To his Memory, by a Lover of Simplicity. The idea which Fontenelle had conceived of enlarging the provinces of the drama, is explained and controverted with much accuracy of criticism, by Dr. Hurd, in the second dissertation, annexed to his 'Commentaries on Horace.' What species of drama the School for Lovers ought to be placed in, is somewhat difficult to determine, since, though it is styled a comedy, the risible faculties have much less opportunity of exertion than the tender feelings of the heart; and the catastrophe, though happy in the main, and suitable to poetical justice, is not so completely as, since two amiable characters, Belmour and Araminta, are left, the one entirely unprovided for, and the other in a situation far from agreeable. What he, however, seems to have principally aimed at, delicacy, sentiment, and the consequence of instruction in the conduct of a generous and well-placed passion, he has undoubtedly most eminently succeeded in. His Celia, and Sir John Dorilant, especially the latter, are characters most perfectly amiable and worthy of imitation. The ease and purity of the dialogue, the incidents which arise so naturally, one from the other, the delicate markings of the different characters, and the artful arrangement of the scenes contribute to give this play a high station in the list of our genteel comedies; at the same time that its want of smart repartee and broad humour, will ever prevent it from being much relished by a mixed audience. This want he possessed a peculiar talent of supplying, had he thought the simplicity of his play would not have been injured by it. He was afraid to mingle with comedy, what he thought belonged to the lower species of the drama, farce; and chose rather to tread in the steps of Terence than of Moliere. They who put this play on a footing with the Dramas of France, and the sentimental comedies in England which have succeeded it, will do Whitehead much-injustice.

The same year, 1762, he published his Charge to the poets, 4to, in which, as laureat, he ludicrously assumes the dignified mode of a bishop, giving his visitatorial instructions to his clergy. The idea was new, pregnant with grave humour, and executed so successfully, that even the egotisms necessary to the subject, are among the most pleasing parts of the poem. Replete with good sense and good taste, it is still more to be admired for the amiable picture which it gives of his own mind, and his readiness to be pleased by poets of very different abilities, provided those abilities were employed on subjects that suited them; and for exposing that fastidious mode of criticism which admits no poems to have any merit, except that which accords with some particular preconceived idea of excellence which it has set up as its exclusive criterion.

Notwithstanding this liberal turn of the Charge, its publication brought upon him the vindictive resentment of Churchill, who had just about the time attracted the public notice, by his satire, intitled The Rosciad. He attacked the laureat almost in every one of those hasty productions with which he entertained the town, with an unjustifiable severity.

To have retaliated, was as abhorrent to his natural temper, as contradictory to that precept of "keeping the peace," which in his Charge, he had called "his first and last advice." Among his unfinished fragments, however, there are some Verses, in which he mentions his poetical enemy. They certainly had not his last corrections; but they come from a good heart, willing to commend whatever was commendable in Churchill's talents for strong expression and forcible imagery; at the same time, they justly reprobate his misuse of those talents.

Such at the time was the popularity of Churchill, that his abuse of Whitehead tended to lower his poetical merit so much with the town, that Garrick would not venture to bring on a new tragedy of his, which a little time after he offered to his stage. The public, therefore, for several years, saw nothing more that came from his pen, but those half-yearly odes which his office required him to write.

On the death of the late Earl of Jersey, in August 1769, he obtained an unwilling permission from his pupil, the present Earl of Jersey, to remove to private lodgings; but he still considered himself as a daily-invited guest to his table in town; and, during the rest of his life, he divided his Summers between Middleton and Nuneham.

In 1770, he made a present of his farce, called The Trip to Scotland, to Garrick, on condition of his producing it without his name. This was done; and it appeared on the Drury-Lane stage with the greatest advantage of good acting, and met with deserved applause. It shows that Whitehead had powers to write equally well in the manner of Moliere, as of Terence. The characters are not more overcharged in order to excite ridicule, than they are found to be in the best modern comedies, both in French and English; for surely his old Griskin is not so much filled with farcical humour as the 'Foresight' and 'Fondlewife' of Congreve. Indeed, had he extended his plan to five acts, and exiled his Cupid, as too mythological a personage, it would have been deemed a good comedy. As it stands, it is perhaps the only thing of the kind that can be put in competition with the charming petite pieces of Marivaux.

In 1774, he collected and published all his works, under the title of Plays and Poems, in two volumes, giving the Charge to the Poets, in the concluding pages. But though possibly, after he had arranged these two volumes he might think he had bid adieu to poetical compositions, so far as his office of laureat might permit; yet he had obtained, by long practice, so great a facility of versification, and had always taken so much pleasure in it, that he could not help occasionally throwing out his thoughts upon paper, and clothing them in appropriate verse.

In 1776, he published, without a name, his very pleasing little poem, intitled Variety, a Tale for Married People, 4to. which was so well received, that it speedily ran through five editions.

In 1777, he published The Goat's Beard, a Fable, 4to. which, though a more studied composition, and a most delicate satire on the times, did not so generally please, though it had also a very considerable sale. It is founded on the fable of the 4th book of Phædrus. From t fable, the English Phædrus (or rather Fontaine, for the fable is more in his manner), has given the sexes many ingenious documents. After an oblique reflection on the Bucolics of Virgil, intimating that the poet has assigned to Mantua, the scenery of Naples, he represents a coterie of the goats addressing Jupiter, to render them equal to the males, by honouring their obins with a beard. Jupiter in a frolic mood grants their petition, which occasions a remonstrance from the coterie of males, and obliges the god to convene the states, in order to determine the claims of both sexes. The majority of his precepts are less applicable to the males than to the females. His strictures on the modish department of the sexes, are a just, though severe comment on real life.

The refuge of an iron age, &c.

This lively fable occasioned an ill-natured and satirical attack on the laureat, in a fable, intitled 'The Asses Ears, addressed to the Author of The Goat's Beard,' 4to. 1777, which is not, however, void of pleasantry.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Salenches, November 3, 1804.

DEAR SIR,

Notwithstanding the exercise I had taken these two days past, I determined to come as far as this place on foot, which is about six leagues from Chamouny. I passed the foot of Mont Blanc just as the rising sun lighted up its white summit. I still retained Paccard as a guide, who soon conducted me out of the valley, by a very rough and steep road, which was, however, compensated by the variety of grand scenery which, at every turn, burst upon my view. We entered another valley, whose green fields and meadows presented a lively contrast to the high jagged mountains, which shut it in, and through which flowed the Arne, after we had crossed it several times by Alpine bridges, in its tortuous course among the rocks. Three leagues brought us to the little town of Servoz, near which is a copper and some lead mines, not worked at present. Just before we entered the town, I observed a rude pyramid of stones on the road side, and, on inquiry, found it was the grave of a young German, who was travelling a few months before in Switzerland with his friend, and who was unfortunate enough to fall into one of the clefts of the glacier of the Buet, in the neighbourhood of Servoz, being deceived by its being covered with snow, in the manner I have described. You may easily conceive the feelings of his friend, when he saw him disappear before him. He returned to Servoz, and sent guides to search for the body, which, after a great deal of difficulty, they recovered; but it appeared evident, from the position in which it was found, that the rapidity of the descent, and the compression produced thereby in the chasm, must have instantly killed him. The prefect of the department had it buried at this place, and means to erect a monument on the spot, with an inscription to warn travellers how they traverse the glaciers, without being accompanied by experienced guides.

The melancholy catastrophe of this young traveller, rendered me extremely thoughtful all the rest of my walk, and I could not help giving way to my imagination, and, supposing his fate to have been my own, pictured to myself the stress and sorrow of my friends in America, on learning this fatal termination of my travels. But, lest I should render you also serious, I will quit this gloomy subject.

I took some little refreshment at Servoz, and again set forward on my journey. I crossed a rapid stream, by means of a few stepping stones, which, when swelled by rains or the melting of the snows, would be impassable, as from the immense field of stones and sand on its banks it must be from forty to sixty feet deep.

I turned out of the road to see a very charming cascade, which fell in three falls from the summit of a rocky cliff. When seen from the bottom, it has the appearance of but one sheet.

Our road to Salenches lay along the Arne, which separated that town from the inn, where I passed the night, and is crossed at this place by a very noble stone bridge. From my windows I can see the Giant of the Alps, the majestic Mont Blanc; but, since I left him this morning, his summit has been covered with dark clouds, which, my guide says, forebodes bad weather. I am, therefore, lucky in having had, at this late season, such a favourable sky, as without it, I should never have seen the wonders of Chamouny.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Cervantes was born at Alcala on the 9th Oct. 1547, at Madrid, and died the 3d April 1616, the same nominal day as his illustrious contemporary Shakspeare.

In his Don Quixotte, there is such a variety of matter, and so many beautiful passages and allusions that it is impossible to travel in Spain, without their frequent recurring to the mind. This book, says Dillon, is one of those capital pieces only understood by those who can read them in the original.

TO JULIA.

Wake me no more with love's beguiling dream,
A dream I find illusory as sweet:
One smile of friendship, nay of cold esteem,
Is dearer far than passion's bland-deceit!

I've heard you oft eternal truth declare:
Your heart was only mine I once believ'd,
Ah! shall I say that all your vows were air?
And must I say my hopes were all deceiv'd?

Now then, no longer that our souls are twin'd,
That all our joys are felt with mutual zeal;
Julia! 'tis pity, pity, makes you kind,
You know I love, and you would seem to feel.

But shall I still go revel in those arms,
On bliss, in which affection takes no part,
No, no! farewell! you give me but your charms,
When I had fondly thought you gave your heart.

Friend of my soul! this goblet sip,
'Twill chase that pensive tear;
'Tis not so sweet as woman's lip,
But, Oh! 'tis more sincere.
Like her delusive beam
'Twill steal away thy mind;
But, like affection's dream,
It leaves no sting behind.

Come, twine the wreath, thy brows to shade,
These flowers were cull'd at noon;
Like woman's love the rose will fade,
But, ah! not half so soon.
For, though the flower's decay'd,
Its fragrance is not o'er;
But once, when love's betray'd,
The heart can bloom no more.

Sweet seducer! blandly smiling,
Charming still, and still beguiling;
Oft I swore to love thee never,
Yet I love thee more than ever.

Why that little wanton blushing,
Glancing eye, and bosom flushing?
Flushing warm, and wily glancing,
All is lovely, all entrancing.

Turn away those lips of bliss—
I am poison'd by thy kisses!
Yet again, ah! turn them to me:
Nay's sweet, when they undo me.

Oh! be less, be less enchanting.
Let some little grace be wanting,
Let my eyes, when I'm expiring,
Gaze awhile without adorning.

TO Mrs.——

If in the dream that hovers
Around my sleeping mind,
Fancy thy form discovers,
And paints thee melting kind.

If joys from sleep I borrow,
Sure thou'lt forgive me this;
For he, who wakes to sorrow,
At least may DREAM of bliss.

Oh! if thou art, in seeming,
All that I've e'er requir'd;
Oh! if I feel in dreaming,
All that I've e'er desir'd!

Wilt thou forgive my taking
A kiss, or—something more?
What thou deny'st me waking,
Oh! let me slumber o'er!

TO ROSA.

A far conserva, e cumulo d'amanti.

PASTOR FIDO.

And are you then a thing of art,
Seducing all and loving none?
And have I strove to gain a heart,
Which every coxcomb thinks his own?

And do you, like the dotard's fire,
Which, powerless of enjoying any,
Feeds its abortive sick desire,
By trifling impotent with many.

Do you thus seek to flirt a number,
And through a round of dangles run,
Because your hearts' insipid slumber
Could never wake to feel for one?

Tell me at once if this be true,
And I shall calm my jealous breast;
Shall learn to join the dangling crew,
And share your simpers with the rest.

But if your heart be not so free,
Oh! if another share that heart,
Tell not the damning tale to me,
But mingle mercy with your art.

I'd rather think you black as hell,
Than find you to be all divine,
And know that heart could love so well,
Yet know that heart would not be mine.

ELEGIAC STANZAS.

Sic juvat perire.

When wearied wretches sink to sleep,
How heavenly soft their slumbers lie,
How sweet is death, to those who weep,
To those, who weep and long to die.

Saw you the soft and grassy bed,
Where flowrets deck the green earth's breast?
'Tis there I wish to lay my head,
'Tis there I wish to sleep at rest.

Oh! let not tears embalm my tomb,
None but the dews by twilight given;
Oh! let not sighs disturb the gloom,
None but the whispering winds of Heaven.

[Moore.]

SONNET.

To a querulous acquaintance.

Thou! whom Prosperity has always led
O'er level paths, with moss and flowrets strewn;
For whom she still prepares a downy bed
With roses scatter'd, and to thorns unknown;

Wilt thou yet murmur at a misplac'd leaf?
Think, 'ere thy irritable nerves repine,
How many, born with feelings keen as thine,
Taste all the sad vicissitudes of grief...
How many steep in tears their scanty bread;
Or, lost to reason, sorrow's victims, rave!
How many know not where to lay their head,
While some are driven by anguish to the grave.
Think; nor impatient at a feather's weight
Mar the uncommon blessings of thy fate!

THE KISS.

Ille, nisi in lecto, nusquam potuere doceri.

OVID LIB. II. ELKO. 3.

Give me, my love, that billing kiss,
I taught you one delicious night
When, turning pictures in bliss,
We tried inventions of delight.

"Come gently steal my lips along,
And let your lips in murmurs move,
Ah! no—again—that kiss was wrong
How can you be so dull, my love.

"Cease, cease" the blushing girl replied
And in her milky arms she caught me
"How can you thus your pupil chide?
You know 'twas in the dark you taught me."

EPITAPH ON A BLACKSMITH.

HERE cool the ashes of MULCIBER GRIM,
Late of this Parish... Blacksmith;
He was born in Seacole-lane, and bred at Hammer-smith...
From his youth upwards he was much addicted to Vices,
and was often guilty of Forgery...
Having some talents for Irony.
He therefore produced many beats in his neighbourhood which he usually increased by blowing up the Coals...
This rendered him: so unpopular, that when he found it necessary to adopt cooling measures, his conduct was generally accompanied with a biss...
Though he sometimes proved a warm friend,
yet where his interest was concerned,
He made it a constant rule to strike while the iron was hot.
Regardless of the injury he might do thereby:
And when he had any thing of moment upon the Anvil,
He seldom failed to turn it to his own advantage.
Among numerous instances that might be given of the cruelty of his disposition, it need only be mentioned, that he was the means of hanging many of the innocent family of the Bells, under the idle pretence of keeping them from Jangling...and put great numbers of the Hearts of Steel, into the bottest Flames,
merely (as he declared,) to soften the obduracy
of their Temper.
At length, after passing a long life, in the commission of these black actions,
His fire being exhausted,
and his Bellows worn out, he fled off to that place, where only the fervid ordeal of his own Forge can be exceeded;
declaring, with his last puff...
That—"Man is born to trouble, as the Sparks fly upwards."

EPILOGUE

To a new British Comedy called "The Will for the Deed."—By Dibdin, jun.

Tho' we're not at a tavern, permit me to say,
We have dishes of all sorts for you every day;
Our table these boards, where I customs we scorn,
For we seldom begin till the cloth is withdrawn.
[Points to the curtain.]
When our dinner-bell rings...to attract each new guest,
Ev'ry part of our farce is most curiously dress'd,
Of which I am a sample, and what is more odd,
I've been oft served up here, a downright Ollapod.
We've friticased farces to banish the vapours,
We've Opera omlets, and Comedy capers.
Then for Tragedy treats...at our house you may look,
For the first in the world...and a very good Cook.
Our dancers find bops, and the malt we produce,
For John Bull is brown stout, while our beaux are all spruce,
Then we've true British spirits, up yonder who come
For our Pantomime Punch, and our Harlequin mum.

* An actor of this name.

We have cordials for care, we have Melo Dramas too,
And we often are cheer'd with a bumper from you;
Then for wine if you ask, 'tis a truth I'll maintain,
That our best acted sorrows are only Sham Pain.

The following translation of one of the most airy odes from Horace is from the pen of Mrs.
Brooke, the accomplished author of 'Rosina.' In her last opera, intitled 'Mariana,' she puts into the mouth of Sir Philip, as a song to a sheper-dess, the 'Vitas hinnuclome similis,' of Horace.
We do not remember to have perused a more faithful or spirited version.

Patty flies me like a fawn,
Which, thro' some sequester'd lawn,
Panting seeks the mother deer,
Not without a panic fear
Of the gently breathing breeze,
And the motion of the trees—
O'er the cool sequester'd lawn,
Patty flies me like a fawn.

If the the curling leaves but shake,
If a Lizard stir the brake,
Frighted, it begins to freeze,
Trembling both at heart and knees;
Thus alarm'd with causeless fear,
Fancy paints a lover near;
Whilst along the dewy lawn
Patty flies me like a fawn.

THE JACOBIN.

I am a hearty Jacobin,
Who own no God, and dread no sin,
Ready to dash through thick and thin
For freedom:

And when the teachers of Chalk Farm
Gave ministers so much alarm,
And preach'd that Kings did only harm,
I feel'd 'em.

By Bedford's cut I've trim'd my locks,
And coal-black is my knowledge box,
Callous to all, except hard knocks
Of thumpers;

My eye a noble fierceness boasts,
My voice as hollow as a ghost's,
My throat oft wash'd by factions' toasts
In bumpers.

Whatever is, in France, is right;
Terror and blood are my delight;
Parties with us do not excite
Enough rage.

Our boasted laws I hate and curse,
Bad from the first, by age grown worse,
I pant and sigh for universal suffrage.

Priestly I love, adore Horne Tooke,
With pride on Jones and Thelwall look,
And hope that they, by hook or crook,
Will prosper.

But they deserve the worst of ills,
And all the abuse of all our quills,
Who form'd of strong and GAGGING BILLS
A cross pair.

Extinct since then each speaker's fire,
And silent every daring lyre,†
Dum-founded they, whom I would hire
To lecture.

Tied up, alas! is every tongue
On which conviction nightly hung,‡
And Thelwall looks, though yet but young,
A spectre.

* This division of the word is in the true spirit of the English, as well as the ancient Sapphic. See the counter-scuffle, counter-rat, and other poems in this style.

† There is a doubt whether this word should not have been written LIAE.

‡ These words, of conviction and banging, have so ominous a sound, it is rather odd they were chosen.

The following parody is social and sentimental.

JOHN ANDERSON MY JOE.

REVISED FROM BURNS.

John Anderson my Joe, John, when nature first began,
To try her tannay hand, John, her master work was man;

And you aboon them a' John, sae trig frae tap to toe,
You prov'd to be na journey-wark, John Anderson my
Joe.

And you aboon them a' John sae trig frae tap to toe;
You prov'd to be na journey-wark, John Anderson my
Joe.

John Anderson my Joe, John, when first we were ac-quent,

Your locks were like the sloe John, your bonnie brow
was brent;

But now your brow is bald John, your locks are like the snow;

Yet blessings on your frosty pow, John Anderson my Joe.
But now your brow, &c.

John Anderson my Joe, John, what pleasure 'tis to see
The young, the lovely brood, John, bred up 'twixt you and me;

And ilka lad and lass, John, in our footsteps to go,
Just makes a heaven here on earth, John Anderson my Joe.

And ilka lad and lass, &c.
John Anderson my Joe, John, fates up and down we've kent,

Yet aye, whate'er our lot, John we with it were content;
And that's the best of gowd, John, it frae us ne'er can go, Though gear be scant, love, we'll ne'er want, John Anderson my Joe.

And that's the best of gowd, &c.
John Anderson my Joe, John, life's hill we clam the gether,

And mony a canty day, John, we've had wi an anither;
But now we're tott'ring down, John, hand in hand we'll go,

And sleep the gether at the fit, John Anderson my Joe.
But now we're tott'ring down, &c.

John Anderson my Joe, John, when we again awake,
Our bairns we'll collect John, and then our journey take;
For hearts devoid of guile, John, find friends whate'er
they go

And scraphs bright shall guide us right, John Anderson my Joe

For hearts devoid of guile, &c.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

'Miss in her teens' appears to be too knowing, for a girl of her years. She may seem to have just escaped from the boarding school of infancy, but we know she has taken many degrees in the school of experience.

'Crito' does not reason, but rail.

If we were to insert the 'Complaint,' by W. we are afraid many of our readers would complain also.

The vulgar style of wailing is derided by all men of sense, and is admired by none but the witless followers of your Calvinistic whiner.

Our attention has been strongly attracted by the topic which 'Vindex' has indicated, and although the discussion may be unpopular, yet that circumstance, far from appalling the Editor, is only a sharper incitement to his industry and zeal. He is satisfied with the consciousness of rectitude, and with the commendation of the few; and, in his right onward race, never stops to inquire whether the rascal rabble approve, or disapprove, his speed.

'Climenole' is very impatiently expected. From the mind of so ingenious a writer we hope that every cloud of depression has long since been dispelled.

In 'Pictor' there are some remarks, ingenious and pertinent, but its prolixity precludes its insertion. That concinnitas, which Cicero praises, is a most desirable quality in fugitive essays.

A compliance with the request of 'A constant reader' would militate essentially against our plan.

It is very seldom in our power, and is opposed to our inclination, to insert, in the Port Folio, articles which interest only a narrow platoon in society.

'A star gazer' has certainly looked with pur-blind eye at the celestial bodies. He has never enjoyed even a glimpse of Virgo; and neither oriental nor occidental Venus has ever darted a propitious ray upon so cold an astrologer.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO THE BOOK OF FOLLIES.

BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

Written in a common place book, called the "Book of Follies," to which every one that opened it should contribute something.

This tribute's from a wretched elf,
Who hails thee emblem of himself!
The book of life, which I have trac'd,
Has been, like thee, a motley waste
Of follies scribbled o'er and o'er,
One folly bringing hundreds more.
Some have, indeed, been writ so neat
In characters so fair, so sweet,
That those, who judg'd not too severely,
Have said they lov'd such follies dearly!
Yet still, O! book the allusion stands,
For these were penn'd by female hands;
The rest, alas! I own the truth,
Have all been scribbled so uncouth,
That prudence, with a withering look,
Disdainful flings again the book!
Like thine, its pages, here and there,
Have oft been stain'd with blots of care;
And sometimes hours of peace, I own,
Upon some fairer leaves have shone,
White at the snowings of that heaven,
By which those powers of peace were given,
But now no longer—such, O such
The blast of disappointment's touch.
No longer now those hours appear,
Each leaf is sullied by a tear!
Blank, blank is every page with care,
Not even a folly brightens there!
Will they yet brighten?—never—never;
Then shut the book, O God! forever.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

SONG,

BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

When Time, who steals our years away,
Shall steal our pleasures too,
The memory of the past will stay,
And half our joys renew.

Then, Chloe, when thy beauty's flower
Shall feel the wintry air,
Remembrance will recal the hour
When thou alone wert fair.

Then talk no more of future gloom,
Our joys shall always last;
For Hope shall brighten days to come,
And Memory gild the past.

Come, Chloe, fill the genial bowl,
I drink to love and thee;
Thou never can'st decay in soul,
Thou'lt still be young for me.

And as thy lips the tear drop chase,
Which on my cheek they find,
So Hope shall steal away the trace
Which sorrow leaves behind.

Then fill the bowl—away with gloom;
Our joys shall always last;
For Hope shall brighten days to come,
And Memory gild the past.

But mark, at thought of future years,
When love shall lose its soul,
My Chloe drops her timid tears,
"They mingle with my bowl!"

How like this bowl of wine, my fair,
Our loving life shall fleet;
Though tears may sometimes mingle there,
The draught will still be sweet.

Then fill the bowl—away with gloom,
Our joys shall always last;
For Hope will brighten days to come,
And Memory gild the past.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO A LADY, ON HER SINGING.

By Thomas Moore, Esq.

Thy song has taught my heart to feel
Those soothing thoughts of heavenly love,
Which o'er the sainted spirits steal
When listening to the spheres above.

When tir'd of life and misery,
I wish to sigh my latest breath,
O! Emma, I will fly to thee,
And thou shalt sing me into death.

And if along thy lip and cheek
That smile of heavenly softness play,
Which, ah! forgive a heart that's weak,
So oft has stol'n my mind away.

Thou'lt seem an angel of the sky,
That comes to charm me into bliss;
I'll gaze and die—who would not die
If death were half so sweet as this!

SONG.

By Thomas Moore, Esq.

Dear! in pity do not speak,
In your eyes I read it all,
In the flushing of your cheek,
In those tears that fall:
Yes, yes, my soul, I see
You love, you live for only me!

Beam, yet beam that killing eye,
Bid me expire in luscious pain;
But kiss me, kiss me, while I die,
And, O! I live again!
Still, my love, with looking kill,
And, O! revive with kisses still!

RONDEAU.

By Thomas Moore, Esq.

Good night! good night! and is it so,
And must I from my Rosa go?
O! Rosa, say 'good night' once more,
And I'll repeat it o'er and o'er,
Till the first glance of dawning light
Shall find us saying still 'good night!'

And still 'good night!' my Rosa say—
But whisper still 'a minute stay,'
And I will stay, and every minute
Shall have an age of rapture in it.
We'll kiss and kiss in quick delight,
And murmur while we kiss 'good night!'

'Good night!' you'll murmur with a sigh,
And tell me it is time to fly:
And I will vow to kiss no more,
Yet kiss you closer than before,
Till slumber seal our weary sight,
And then, my love, my soul, 'good night!'

SONG.

By Thomas Moore, Esq.

When the heart's feeling
Burns with concealing,

Glances will tell what we fear to confess:
O! what an anguish
Silent to languish,
Could we not look all we wish to express!
When half expiring,
Restless, desiring,
Lovers wish something, but must not say what,
Looks tell the wanting,
Looks tell the granting,
Looks betray all that the heart would be at.

Mr. Oldschool,

If the humble merit of the following trifle will entitle it to that attention, I should be gratified by its insertion in the Port Folio. I.

THE MERRY GONDOLIER.*

Wafted by the breeze to shore,
Do you those gay carols hear?
Singing to his dashing oar,
'Tis the merry Gondolier.

As he skims the bay along,
'Neath the moon-beams shining clear,
Gaily thus his evening song
Chaunts the merry Gondolier.

Haste, my Rosa, on the shore,
Now prepare my wonted cheer,
Haste, and, at our cottage door,
Meet your merry Gondolier.

Long the sun has left the sky,
Homeward now I gaily steer;
Bound my heart! for Rosa's sigh
To her merry Gondolier.

What to me are daily toils?
Evening bids them disappear,
When my Rosa sweetly smiles
On her merry Gondolier.

Tho' the hot sun pours his ray,
Tho' the winds should various veer,
Ever glad some, ever gay,
Is the merry Gondolier.

Balmy breezes, as ye pass,
Whispering tell to Rosa's ear,
Jocund o'er the stream of glass
Comes her merry Gondolier.

See, I almost gain the shore—
Soon my Rosa will appear
When she hears the dashing oar
Of her merry Gondolier.

Now my toil is fairly o'er,
Rosa haste, prepare my cheer;
Haste! and, at our cottage door,
Meet your merry Gondolier.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 3.

The orations against Verres.

"THE moment of the execution arrives: they drag their prisoners from their dungeons: they attach them to the block; they receive the mortal stroke: who was then the man stupid enough not to feel himself smitten with the same blow, not to be touched with the lot of these innocents, with their youth, with their misfortune, which became that of all their fellow-citizens? And you, in this general mourning, in the midst of these groans, you exulted no doubt; you gave yourself up to a thoughtless joy; you applauded yourself for having annihilated the witnesses of your avarice. You deceived yourself, Verres, in believing that you had effaced the stains in your character by washing your crimes in the blood of innocents. You accused yourself, by persuading yourself that you could, by the force of barbarities, make sure of impunity for your robberies. Those innocents, indeed, are dead, but their relations survive, they pursue the vengeance of their children, they pursue your punishment. What do I say? Among those, whom you had marked for your victims, there are some who have escaped; there are some whom Heaven has reserved for this day of justice. Behold here Philarchus, who did not fly with Cleomenes, who, happily for him, was taken by the pirates, and whose captivity has saved him from the fury of a robber, an hundred times more inhuman than those who are our enemies. Behold here Phalarus, who has paid for his deliverance to your agent Timarchides. Both of these depose, to the discharges sold to the sailors, to the famine which reigned in the fleet, and to the flight of Cleomenes. Well! Romans, with what sentiments are you affected? What do you expect more? To what refuge shall your allies fly? To whom shall they address themselves? Under what hopes can they still support life, if you abandon them? This is the harbour, the asylum, the altar of the oppressed. They come not to demand the restoration of their property, their gold, their silver, their slaves, the ornaments which have been pillaged from their temples, and their cities. Alas! in their simplicity, they fear that the Roman people will not consider it as a crime in their prætors to have spoiled them. They see, that, for a long time, we have permitted, in silence, certain individuals to absorb the riches of nations; that none of them even put himself to the trouble to conceal his cupidity and his rapines; that their country-seats are all filled, all splendid with the spoils of our allies, while for so many years Rome and the capitol have been ornamented only with the spoils of our enemies. Where are the treasures torn from so many people, who have submitted to us, and are at this day in indigence? Where are they? Do you ask this question, when you see Athens, Pergamos, Miletus, Samos, Asia, Greece, swallowed up in the habitations of certain unpunished plunderers? But no, Romans, I repeat it, this is not the object of our complaints and supplications. Your allies have no longer any property to defend. Behold in what mourning, in what destitution, in what abjection, they appear before you! See there Sthenius of Thermae, whose house Verres has pillaged; it is not his fortune that he demands again; it is his proper existence, which Verres has ravished from him, in banishing him from his country, where he held the first rank by his virtues and beneficence. See here Decion of Tyndaris. He will not insist upon what Verres has taken from him; he demands an only son; he wishes, after having taken a just vengeance on his executioner, to afford some consolation to his ashes. Behold Eubulides; that old man, borne down with years, who would not have undertaken this painful journey, but to see the condemnation of this monster, after having seen the punishment of his son. You would have seen here with them, if Metellus, the successor and the protector of Verres, would have permitted them, the mothers, the wives, the sisters, of those unfortunate men. One of them, I remember, as I approached Heraclea, in the middle of the night came to meet me, followed by all the mothers of families, by the light of torches, and calling me her saviour, and calling Verres her hangman, repeating the name of her son, she remained prostrate at my feet, as if I could restore him to her, and recal him to life. I was received in the same manner in all the other cities, where old age and infancy, equally worthy of pity, have equally solicited my care, my zeal, and my fidelity. No! Romans, this cause has nothing in common with any other. It is not a vain desire of glory, which has conducted me, as an accuser, to this tribunal; I am come here called by tears; I am come here, to prevent, for the future, the injustice of authority; that prisons, chains, axes, the punishment of your faithful allies, the blood of the innocent, finally, the sepulture of the dead, and the mourning of parents, from being, for the governors of our provinces, the object of an abominable traffic; and if, by the condemnation of this villain, by the decree of your justice, I deliver Sicily and your allies from the dread of a similar fate, I shall have satisfied their wishes, and discharged my duty."

Cicero, faithful to the rules of oratorical progression, reserves for the end of his different pleadings the greatest of the crimes of Verres, that of having put to death, or beaten with rods, Roman citizens; which was severely prohibited by the laws, at least without the judgment of the people, or a decree of the senate, giving to the consuls an extraordinary power. The orator enlarges principally on the punishment of Gavius. It is not easy to conceive, after what we have heard, that he should find any new expressions against Verres. But we may confide in the inexhaustible fertility of his genius. He seems to surpass himself in his eloquence in proportion as Verres outdoes himself in his crimes. That we may have a just idea of the indignation he excited, let us recollect the profound respect, the religious veneration, which was maintained in all the provinces of the empire, and, indeed, in almost all parts of the known world, for this title of A Roman Citizen. It was a sacred character, that no power might flatter itself to violate with impunity. The republic had been known more than once to undertake distant and dangerous wars, solely to avenge an outrage committed upon a Roman citizen: a sublime policy, which nourished that national pride which is always so useful to entertain, and which moreover imposed on foreign nations, and caused everywhere to be respected the Roman name.

"What shall I say of Gavius of the municipal city of Cosano? Where shall I find words enough, voice enough, and grief enough? My sensibility is not exhausted, Romans; but I fear that my expressions will not be adequate to it. The first time that they spoke to me of this atrocious action, I could not insert it in my accusation. I knew that it was but too real; but I felt that it was not probable. Finally, giving way to the tears of all the Roman citizens, who conduct the commerce of Sicily, supported by the testimony of all the city of Rhegium, and of several Roman knights, who, by accident, were then at Messina, I laid open the fact in my first pleading, and in such a manner as to support it by incontestible evidence. But what can I do at this day. It is already so long a time that I have fatigued you with the cruelties of Verres, I had not foreseen, I own, the effect which I must make to sustain your attention, and not exhaust your patience with such continued horrors. There remains to me but one course: that is to state to you the simple fact, it is such that the bare recital will be sufficient. This Gavius, thrown like so many others, into the subterraneous dungeons of Syracuse, built by Dionysius the tyrant, found, I know not how, the means of escaping from this gulf, and came to Messina. There, near the walls of Rhegium, and the coast of Italy, sprung out from the darkness of death; he felt himself revive on beholding the pure day of liberty; he was, as it were, reanimated by this beneficent neighbourhood, which recalled to him Rome and the laws. He spoke openly in Messina, and complained that a Roman Citizen had been thrown into irons. He was going, he said, directly to Rome; he was going to demand justice against Verres. The unfortunate man did not suspect that to express himself thus before the Messinians was as if he had spoken in the palace of the prætor. I have told you, and you know, Romans, that he had chosen the Messinians to be the accomplices of all his crimes, the receivers of his thefts, the associates of his infamy. Gavius is conducted immediately before the magistrates of Messina, and by ill luck Verres himself came there the same day. He is informed that a Roman citizen complains of having been plunged into the dungeons of Syracuse; that, at the moment when he was setting his foot on board a vessel, uttering menaces against Verres, he had been arrested; that he was detained that the prætor might determine his fate. He thanks them for their zeal and fidelity, and, transported with fury, he hastens to the public place: his eyes sparkle, all his features were expressive of rage and cruelty. All the world was in suspense at what he was about to do, when all at once he gives orders that Gavius should be seized, that he should be stripped, that he should be tied to the stake, and that the lictors should prepare their instruments of punishment. The unfortunate man cries out, that he is a Roman citizen, that he is a Roman citizen! that he has served with Pretius, a Roman knight, at this time in Palermo, and who can testify for him to these truths. Verres answers, that he is well informed that Gavius is a spy, sent into Sicily by fugitive slaves, relics of the army of Spartacus; an absurd imputation, of which there was not the slightest suspicion, or the smallest intimation. He orders the lictors to surround him and scourge him. In the public place of Messina they beat with rods a Roman citizen, while in the midst of his pains, in the midst of the stripes with which they overwhelmed him, he uttered no other cry, no other groan, than this single phrase 'I am a Roman citizen. He thought that this name alone ought to drive away from him all tortures and all executors; but very far from obtaining his release, far from relaxing the hands of the lictors, while he repeated in vain the name of Rome, a cross, an infamous cross, the instrument of punishment for slaves, was set up for this unfortunate man, who never had believed that there existed in the world a power from whom he could fear such treatment. O delightful name of liberty! O august rights of our ancestors! Porcian law! Sempronian law! Tribunitian power, so bitterly regretted, and which was finally restored to us! Is this your power! Have you then been established, that in a province of the empire, in the bosom of an allied city, a Roman citizen should be delivered to the rods of the lictors, by the very magistrate who holds only from the Roman people his lictors and his rods. What shall I say of the fires, and the red hot irons, which they employed to torment him? Verres, nevertheless, was not touched, neither with his complaints, nor with the tears of all those of our citizens, who were at Messina, and present at this dreadful spectacle. You! Verres, you! have dared to attach to a gibbet a man who declared himself a Roman citizen! I was not willing, (you are all my witnesses), I was not willing, on the first day, to indulge my just indignation; I was afraid of that of the people who heard me; I was afraid of a general tumult, which appeared to be preparing on all quarters; I restrained myself from an apprehension that the public fury, satiated upon this monster, might take him away from the vengeance of the laws. I applauded the prudence of the prætor Glabrio, who, observing this general convulsion, caused promptly to be taken away from the audience the witness they had just heard. But, on this day, Verres, when all the world knows the state of the cause, and what must be the issue of it, I will shut myself up with you upon a single point: I confine myself to your own acknowledgment. This confession is your mental sentence. You remember, judges, that, at the moment of the accusation, Verres, terrified with the cries which he heard around him, rose up on a sudden, and said, that Gavius had not pretended to be a Roman citizen, but to retard his punishment; but that in fact this Gavius was only a spy. I desire no more; I lay aside all the rest. I ask not upon what ground you found this imputation; I renounce all my own witnesses; but you say it yourself, you avow that he cried out 'I am a Roman citizen.' Very well! answer me, wretch! If you found yourself among barbarous nations, at the extremity of the world, ready to be conducted to punishment, what would you say? What would you cry, if it were not that you are a Roman citizen? And if it is true, that, in every country where the name of Rome has been heard, this sacred title would be sufficient for his safety, how could this man, whoever he might be, invoking this inviolable protection before a Roman prætor, not be able, I do not say to escape punishment, but even to retard it, a moment?

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESS. COLON AND SPONDER.

The subsequent beautiful epistle, in the happiest vein of originality and ease, is addressed by Thomas Moore, Esq. to Mr. Atkinson, one of the Royal Irish Academicians, whom the affectionate poet has characterised as one in whom the elements are so mixed, that neither in his head nor his heart has nature left any deficiency. This poetical tribute is eminently worthy of its brilliant author, a youth of genius, who though he has a roguish twinkle in his eye, yet has as clear a head, and as warm a heart, as we have known,

'With all good grace to grace a gentleman.'

Though long at school and college dozing
On books of rhyme and books of prosing,
And copying from their moral pages
Fine recipes for forming sages;
Though long with those divines at school,
Who think to make us good by rule;
Who, in methodic form advancing,
Teaching morality like dancing,
Tell us, for heaven or money's sake,
What steps we are through life to take,
Though this, my friend, so much employ'd,
And so much midnight oil destroy'd,
I must confess my searches past,
I only learn'd to doubt at last.
I find the doctors and the sages
Have differ'd in all climes and ages,
And two in fifty scarce agree
On what is pure morality!

'Tis like the rainbow's shifting zone,
And every vision makes its own.

The doctors of the porch advise,
As modes of being great or wise,
That we should cease to own or know
The luxuries that from feeling flow.

'Reason alone must claim direction,
And Apathy, the soul's perfection;
Like a dull lake the heart must lie,
Nor Passion's gale, nor Pleasure's sigh,
Though heaven the breeze, the breath supplied,
Must curl the wave, nor swell the tide!'

Such was the rigid Zeno's plan
To form his philosophic man;
Such were the modes he taught mankind
To weed the garden of the mind;
They tore away some weeds, 'tis true,
But all the flowers were ravish'd too!

Now listen to the wily strains,
Which, on Cyrené's sandy plains,
When Pleasure, nymph with loosen'd zone,
Usurp'd the philosophic throne;
Hear what the 'courtly sage's tongue
To his surrounding pupils sung.

'Pleasure's the only noble end
To which all human powers should tend,
And Virtue gives her heavenly lore,
But to make pleasure please us more!
Wisdom and she were both design'd
To make the senses more refin'd,
That man might revel free from cloying,
Then most a sage, when most enjoying.'

* Aristippus.

Is this morality? Oh! no!
Even I a wiser path could show.
The flower within this vase confin'd,
The pure, the unfading flower of mind,
Must not throw all its sweets away
Upon a mortal mould of clay;
No, no! its richest breath should rise,
In Virtue's incense to the skies!

But thus it is, all sects, we see,
Have watch-words of morality;
Some cry out Venus, others Jove,
Here 'tis Religion, there 'tis Love!
But while they thus so wisely wander,
While mystics dream, and doctors ponder;
And some, in dialectics firm,
Seek virtue in a middle term;
While thus they strive, in heaven's defiance,
To chain morality with science,
The plain, good man, whose actions teach
More virtue than a sect can preach,
Pursues his course, unsagely blest,
His tutor whispering in his breast:
Nor could he act a purer part,
Though he had Tully all by heart;
And when he drops the tear on woe,
He little knows or cares to know
That Epictetus blam'd that tear!
By heaven approv'd, to virtue near!

Oh! when I've seen the morning beam
Floating within the dimpled stream;
While nature, waking from the night,
Has just put on her robes of light,
Have I, with cold optician's gaze,
Explor'd the doctrines of those rays!
No, pedants, I have left to you,
Nicely to separate hue from hue;
Go, give that moment up to art,
When heaven and nature claim the heart,
And, dull to all their best attraction,
Go—measure angles of refraction!
While I, in feeling's sweet romance
Look on each day-beam as a glance
From the great eye of HIM above,
Wakening his world with looks of love!

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Extracts from the Letters of an American traveller in Europe, written in 1800 and 1801.

Geneva, November 4, 1800.

DEAR SIR,

When I rose this morning, the clouds threatened rain so much, as to oblige me to apply to my landlord for a vehicle to convey me to this city. As he was the post-master of the place, he furnished me with a one horse cart, covered by an oil cloth, stretched upon hoops, and having a seat hung upon leather, as a substitute for springs. I considered myself fortunate in obtaining so good a conveyance, as it soon after began to rain, and continued pouring the whole day. Being shut up in this close jolting cart, I saw very little of the country, and had only a slight glimpse of the celebrated cascade of the Nant D'Arpenas. I passed through Maglan and Cluse; the last of which is a very romantic little town, built in the gap of the mountains, through which the Arne passes. We again crossed the river by a fine bridge, and once more at Bonneville, a pretty little town, to which the young Genevese resort on holidays.

I was much pleased with the environs of Geneva, which are composed of well cultivated grounds, pleasure gardens, and handsome villas of free stone. Most of the commanding heights I passed, after leaving Chamouni, were crowned with the ruins of old castles; than which nothing more appropriate could be found to give the finish to the grand and picturesque scenery of this beautiful country. I regretted extremely the badness of the day, which lost me many a fine prospect.

I was set down at the inn of the Balances, where I had appointed my companion E..... to meet me. I was very happy to see him again, and never before knew the pleasure arising from meeting with a friend, in a distant country, and from whom you have been separated for a while.

November 6.

I am delighted with Geneva, and, was the society upon the same footing it formerly was, I could with pleasure spend the winter here; but the same complaints prevail here that I heard at Lausanne, and strangers no longer meet with that hospitality and attention, so much spoken of by former travellers. Some of the gentlemen, to whom we had letters, have been polite enough to accompany us about the town, to point out what is remarkable, or worth seeing, but their civility extends no farther; and they even condescend to make apologies for the 'unfortunate situation of their country, which has taken from them the means of rendering to strangers those polite attentions they were accustomed to do.'

We have been to see the cathedral of Saint Peter, where, in former times, the popular assembly of the republic met to vote. It had been fitted up very conveniently for that purpose just before the revolution.

The government of this little republic has, I think, been too much vaunted. The people may have been happier than they are now, as they carried on a commerce with all their neighbours, which the towns of France, Switzerland, and Savoy, were not permitted to do. By this means they acquired considerable wealth, as all the surrounding country came to them for certain articles. At present, from being part of the French republic, they are restricted to the same laws, and their city has dwindled to the same level with other French towns. Their fine lake gives them, however, some advantages, particularly by affording the means of carrying on the smuggling trade to a great extent, notwithstanding the vigilance of the custom-house officers. The boats employed in this business are well armed and manned, and almost always make resistance. Two nights ago one of them was attacked by the officers of the customs, who had one man killed, and another wounded. They however succeeded in securing a part of the contraband goods, but the rest were forcibly rescued and landed. The goods taken were lodged in the custom-house, and a guard placed over them; but, notwithstanding, the Genevese, (who encourage the practice of smuggling, from their having been forced to become a part of the French republic, and who conceive their rulers have no right to lay import duties upon them), assembled tumultuously round the place, insulted the officers and soldiers, and demanded the goods. They were of course refused, but it was so contrived that the mob should break into the custom-house during the night in spite of the soldiers placed there as a guard, (who, however, befriend the people very much), and triumphantly bore off the goods. This, you know, would in our country have met with the severest punishment, as flying in the face of all law, but the government is so inefficient in Geneva, that it was obliged to wink at the affair, and take no public notice of it.

There is no city in the world situated more charmingly than Geneva. It is built at the foot of the lake, on each side of the Rhone, where it issues from it. On the left, the chain of the Jura bounds the rich country of La Cote and the Pays de Gex; and on the right are the mountains of Savoy; behind is mont Saleve, to the top of which the Genevese make excursions to enjoy the grand prospect it commands. The whole neighbourhood of Geneva is beautifully cultivated, particularly the borders of the lake, which are covered with villages, gentlemen's seats, and white cottages.

All the lakes in Switzerland abound with fish; particularly trout and pike, the former of which grow to an amazing size. I saw one in our inn that weighed forty pounds, and I am assured some are caught that weigh fifty.

The buildings are of freestone, and in a good style, some houses are even magnificent. The public walk, called the Freille, is much frequented. It commands a noble view along the western shore of the lake.

The fortifications are very handsome, and the gates highly ornamental. From the city being commanded by neighbouring heights it could not hold out a siege, but the defence is sufficient to resist a coup de main, and give time for the Swiss, or other neighbouring troops, to come to their assistance.

We had the curiosity to go to see the house in which Rousseau was born, which bears an inscription to that effect. There is a lofty column in one of the public walks, supporting a colossal bust of the citizen of Geneva.

In our rambles about the town, we were struck with the manner in which all the fountains are supplied with water from the river. It is by means of a curious hydraulic machine, worked by the current of the Rhone. The large wheel is twenty-five feet in diameter. The waters of the river are clear and good, but, after flowing about a mile, they mingle with those of the muddy Arne.

The weather has been so bad, that I have not had it in my power to go to Ferney, or to make excursions in the neighbourhood, and we have determined to leave town to-morrow for Lyons. The information we have received from several travellers and French officers has induced us to alter our plan of entering Italy by mont Cenis, and to determine upon visiting the south of France first. I shall, therefore, probably not write you again, till I arrive at the shores of the Mediterranean.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM WHITEHEAD

[Concluded.]

The same year, he published a very elegant satire on the fashionable excesses and whimsies of female dress, intitled Venus attiring the Graces, 4to. addressed to the Duchess of Queensberry, which was the last performance, except his annual odes, he gave to the world. Had he possessed the powers of Mr. Bunbury's pencil, he would perhaps have given his idea to the public rather through the medium of the rolling, than the printing press; in its present state, humorous as it is, the comic painter would be its best commentator.

His health now began visibly to decline. He had almost through life been subject to palpitations of the heart, and occasional difficulty of respiration, which the heavy atmosphere of the town in winter always augmented; yet there, partly from habit, and still more from a desire of being near those whom he chiefly respected, he chose, in that season, constantly to reside.

In the Spring of 1785, a cold, accompanied with a cough, affected his breast so much, that it confined him at home for some weeks, though it was by no means so violent as to hinder him pursuing his united amusements of reading and writing. His death, happily for himself, as it must be for all who pass through this world, in the same blameless manner, with the same confidence in their God, and with the same confidence in his revealed will, so to die, was sudden, and without a groan. A few hours before his death, Lord Harecourt repeating his constant morning visit to him, found him revising for the press, a paper which he imagined to be his last Birth-day Ode, which was in part set to music, but not performed. That day at noon, finding himself disinclined to taste the dinner his servant brought up he desired to lean upon his arm from the table to his bed, and in that moment he expired. He died at his lodgings in Charles-Street, Grosvenor-Square, April 14. 1785. in the 70th year of his age; and was buried in South Audley Street Chapel.

Some years before his death, he appointed by will, his friend General Stephens, his executor. He left behind him in MS. the Tragedy which Garrick did not venture to bring on the stage; the first act of an Oedipus; an imperfect plan of a Tragedy founded on the historical part of Edward the Second's resignation of the crown to his son, also of another composed of Spanish and Moorish characters, and a considerable quantity of miscellaneous pieces, yet but few which he has transcribed in so fair a manner as to indicate that he himself thought them finished; and of these the greater part are occasional and local prolusions of his pen, which would chiefly, if not exclusively, be matter of amusement to his particular friends, more immediately connected with the two noble families in which he so long resided. His poems, uncollected by himself, together with three short unpublished pieces, On the late improvements at Nuneham; On the Death of the Hon. Catherine Venables Vernon; The Battle of Argoed Llwyfain, nine of his New-Year and Birth-Day Odes, from June 1776 to January 1785, and his Observations on the Shield of Achilles, first printed in Dodsley's 'Museum,' and afterwards with Pitt's and War-ton's translation of 'Virgil,' were formed into a third volume of his Works, by Mr. Mason, and published in 1788, with a dedicatory 'Sonnet' to the Earl of Jersey and Earl Harcourt, and 'Memoirs of his Life and Writings,' which have been chiefly followed in the preceding account.

His Poems, including all his annual odes, from 1758 to 1785, except the New year and Birth-day odes, for 1764 and the New-year odes, for 1766, 1769, and 1775, which do not appear in Dodsley's 'Annual Register,' were inserted in the edition of 'The English Poets,' 1790, and are reprinted in the present collection, with the addition of the Vision of Solomon; Verses to his Mother; A Pathetic Apology for all Laureats; verses To Mr. Stebbing, and fragments On Churchill, collected from Mr. Mason's 'Memoirs,' &c.

His character, which has few prominent features, may easily be collected from this account of his life. He appears to have been a very amiable man, and lived in intimacy with the great, virtuous, caressed and respected. All his friends bear ample testimony to his unaffected piety, unblemished integrity, engaging politeness, inviolable truth, steadiness in friendship, and the unassuming ease and sprightliness of his conversation. He was a man of good breeding, virtue, and humanity.

'He died,' says Mr. Mason, who knew him well, 'retaining all his faculties more perfectly than is usually the lot of those who live to such an age. Of these his memory was the most remarkable, which being always strong, continued to that late period with no diminution of vigour. And as his reading and observation had been far more extensive and various than he had occasion to exhibit in that mode of writing which he chiefly employed to convey his sentiments; this accurate retention of what he had by study acquired, made him a living library, always open to communicate its treasures to his acquaintance, without obtruding itself by any ostentatious display, or assumed superiority.'

As a poet, though he is far above mediocrity, yet neither his genius nor his writings are of the most brilliant or interesting kind. He is characterized by elegance, correctness, and ease, more than by energy, enthusiasm or sublimity. The most prominent feature in his poetry, seems an innocent and pleasant humour. He is never dull or absurd in his serious pieces; his taste and his judgment were too good to pardon insipidity, or impropriety, even in himself; but there is certainly more facility, as well as originality, in his humorous, than his serious pieces. His Elegies, on account of the affecting and pensive cast of the sentiments, the classical beauty of the imagery, the simplicity of the expression, and the harmony of the versification, may be considered as the most universally interesting of his compositions. Among his humorous pieces, Variety is a first-rate, in that mode of gay and easy composition which distinguishes the genius of Fontaine and Prior. Of his Songs, 'Ye Belles and ye Flirts', &c. has obtained the greatest popularity.

The principal poems which he himself published, have been already distinctly considered in the order of their publication. It only remains to give some account of his posthumous pieces.

'In the collection of poems,' says Mr. Mason, 'which Mr. Whitehead printed in 1774, he thought proper to select certain of his New-year, and Birth-day odes for republication. Beginning therefore, from that date, I have reviewed, with the assistance of some friends, whose taste in lyric composition I could depend on, all that he wrote afterwards, and those which we best approved are here inserted. In this review it is to be noted to the poet's honour, that we found more variety of sentiment and expression, than could well be expected from such an uniformity of subject. If we lamented the necessity he was under of so frequently adverting to the war with America, we generally admired his delicate manner of treating it. Should, therefore, the Odes here reprinted lead any person to read all that he composed, in compliance with the forms of his office (and all are to be found in the Annual Register, printed by Dodsley), I persuade myself he must agree with me in thinking, that no court poet ever had fewer courtly stains, and that his page is, at the least, as white as Addison's.'

The Odes, selected by Mr. Mason, are the Birth-day odes for 1776, 1777, 1778, 1781, and 1784, and the New-year odes for 1779, 1783, 1784, and 1785. The odes omitted by Mr. Mason, and Whitehead himself, have been very properly collected with the rest, and deserve the same commendation. Though they have undergone all the usual obloquy of such compositions, there is certainly in them more delicacy of panegyric, if not more genius, than in any compositions of the kind that can be found from Chancer to Cibber. If they are not equal to the odes of Pindar, they are not ridiculous, like those of Shadwell and Cibber. Their annual productions rendered the laurel contemptible; but Whitehead, as Ophelia says, 'wears his rue with a difference, and you may call it Herb o' grace on Sundays.'

The copy of verses On the late Improvements at Nancham, is a sportive and just eulogium on the place, and on the late Mr. Brown. Though the personification of nature has been common to several poets, when they meant to compliment the artist that rivalled her, yet the idea of making her behave herself like a modern fine lady, must be allowed to be a thought very bold, and truly original; and he has executed it with much genuine humour. As an epitaph, the lines On the Death of the Hon. Catherine Venables Vernon, are beautiful, particularly at the close, in the mention of Providence. The Battle of Argoed Llwyfain, is a translation of a poem of the Cambro-British bard, Taliessin, and is a description of the battle of Argoed Llwyfain, fought about the year 548, by Godden, a king of North Britain, and Brien Reged, king of Cambria, against Flamdwyn, a Saxon general, supposed to be Ido, king of Northumberland. It is inserted in Jones's 'Historical Account of the Welsh Bards,' published in 1784, and is thus introduced: 'I am indebted to the obliging disposition, and undiminished powers of Mr. Whitehead, for the following faithful and animated version of this valuable antique.' The version is wild, spirited, and characteristic; but it is inferior to those imitations which Gray made of the Scaldic odes. The wild mythology of the Edda, to which they perpetually allude, gives them a charm peculiar to themselves and sets them above what he himself has produced from Cambro-British originals.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Observations upon certain passages in Mr. Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, which appear to have a tendency to Subvert Religion, and established a False Philosophy.

The writer of the following observations remembers to have heard, from his childhood, of Jefferson's Notes on Virginia; although he never, till within a few weeks, had curiosity enough to peruse them. But upon reading them over, he was surprised that a book which contains so much infidelity, conveyed in so insidious a manner, should have been extensively circulated in a Christian country, for nearly twenty years, without ever having received a formal answer. It is not to be wondered at if no reply has come from Great-Britain. She is too near the putrid fen in which the first ugly monsters of infidelity were engendered, and has been too long stunned by their infernal yell, to heed the feeble voice of Mr. Jefferson; its sound, when compared with their cry, is as insignificant as the pattering of a shower to the thunder of Niagara. But in this country his authority is far more weighty. We hear him extolled by the majority of our people as a profound philosopher; he has been appointed the head of our country, and the guardian of our rights; his book has passed through several editions, and is silently doing its work, aided by the numerous friends and exalted station of its author; thousands read it who know nothing about the writings of Voltaire, or Buffon, or 'the constellation of French Encyclopedists;' and who are induced, by the snips of learning and show of reasoning with which it is set off, to think it a bright sample of the genius of our country. The intention of these pages is, to point out the passages, in the Notes on Virginia, which tend to the subversion of religion; and to examine whether, from brilliancy of invention, acuteness of investigation, or cogency of argument, they are entitled to the name of any other than modern French philosophy. And the writer of these observations humbly prays the Searcher of hearts, that if purity of intention deserve regard, his efforts may not, through their imbecility, do an injury to the cause which he desires to serve.

The first ambushade of infidelity, according to custom, is among the mountains. Whenever modern philosophers talk about mountains, something impious is likely to be near at hand. Not more numerous are the streams which flow from the Alps and the Andes, than the objections which they have afforded to these sophisters against the sacred history. When mountains are mentioned in their writings, the well-meaning reader has need to guard against some wicked insinuations with as much vigilance as he would against the lurking panther, if he were passing through the forests, which shade the sides of those mountains. Rousseau says, that on the summits of high mountains all our cares are forgotten. Whether this assertion be true or not, shall be left for Mr. Jefferson's investigation; but this is certain, that whenever these pigmy philosophers get perched upon their beloved heights, they seem not only to be insensible of their own insignificance, but to lose even their boasted reason. In Mr. Jefferson's description of the junction of the Potowmac and Shenandoah, this sentence occurs. 'The first glance of this scene hurries our senses into the opinion, that this earth has been created in time, that the mountains were formed first, that the rivers began to flow afterwards;' &c. Now, this is a theory of the earth in three words. Monsieur de Buffon tells us that our world was knocked blazing out of the sun by a comet; that it has since been some fifty thousand years cooling; that all the mountains on its surface have been formed by the ebbing and flowing of the sea; that all which is now dry land was once covered with water; and that in process of time, the ocean will quit its present bed, and again embosom the enormous masses which it before heaped up; thus going an eternal round. Mr. Jefferson's theory is diametrically opposite to that of his friend M. de Buffon; the latter supposing our mountains to have been formed long after the earth; the former making the original world a heap of mountains, which, in process of time, were washed down into their present state. In this, however, they agree; both are contrary to what is said in Genesis; 'And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so.' When the Count de Buffon was called to account for his impiety, he got off by a clumsy equivocation. But Mr. Jefferson may make a very safe retreat, in case of necessity. It is only 'the first glance of the scene which hurries our senses into the opinion:' this implies no premeditated theory; here is no positive assertion. If as much caution were observed through the whole book, it would be difficult to bring any decisive charge against it. After this first lisp of infidelity, till she raises her voice and speaks more courageously; we hear several hints of the convulsions of Nature. That there have been convulsions of nature, and violent ones too, is allowed on all sides; but do all agree as to the time when they happened, and the causes by which they were produced? No, truly; as will be seen before the end of these remarks.

But we must now prepare for a grand attack. 'I have received petrified shells,' says Mr. Jefferson, 'of very different kinds from the first sources of the Kentucky, which bear no resemblance to any I have ever seen on the tide waters. It is said that shells are found in the Andes, in South-America, fifteen thousand feet above the level of the ocean. This is considered by many, both of the learned and unlearned, as a proof of an universal deluge. To the many considerations opposing this opinion, the following may be added: The atmosphere, and all its contents, whether of water, air, or other matters, gravitate to the earth; that is to say, they have weight. Experience tells us, that the weight of all these together never exceeds that of a column of mercury of thirty-one inches height, which is equal to one of rain water of thirty-five feet high. If the whole contents of the atmosphere then were water, instead of what they are, it would cover the globe but thirty-five feet deep; but as these waters, as they fell, would run into the seas, the superficial measure of which is to that of the dry parts of the globe as two to one, the seas would be raised only fifty-two and an half feet above their present level, and of course would overflow the lands to that height only.* Now, this is an open denial of the universal deluge described by Moses, without an if or perhaps to save it. Mr. Jefferson, however, might have spared himself the trouble of offering this his additional consideration. The writers of the Universal History had published nearly the same thing many years before. Not that they wished to invalidate the scripture account, but to show that, if the deluge could be explained by natural causes, the heavens alone could not have afforded a sufficient quantity of water; but that the fountains of the deep must likewise have been broken up. The Rev. Mr. Jones also, in his Philological Disquisitions, which appeared several years before the Notes on Virginia, had mentioned not only the same difficulty, but one of still harder solution. The passage alluded to is as follows: 'The atmosphere, supposing its weight to be wholly owing to the vapour of water suspended in it, can contain but thirty-three feet of it: so that all the moisture of the atmosphere condensed into water and falling in rain, could overflow the earth to a depth no greater than that of thirty-three feet. If the ocean be allowed to occupy two-thirds of the earth's globe, and to be a mile in depth, one part with another, what will this do? If it were all to be converted into vapour, and to fall back in rain, it could only flow back again into its own channel. Where then shall we find a quantity of water to drown the earth to the height of two miles above its present horizon?' It is superfluous to add that the author from whom this is taken makes no use of it to serve the purposes of irreligion: no one who ever heard the name, will suspect, for a moment, that any harm can come from William Jones, of Nayland. It was really cruel that Mr. Jefferson's philosophy should have been put to the torture to discover what the world knew so long beforehand. But there is another reason why his pains might have been spared. Modern observations show, that if there be any connection between the weight of the atmosphere and the quantity of water contained in it, it is heaviest, ceteris paribus, when most free from moisture; consequently, it is impossible to calculate how much water the atmosphere can contain. Mr. Jefferson acknowledges that 'history renders probable some instances of a partial deluge round the Mediterranean Sea,' and shows how that sea 'may have been so raised as to overflow the low lands adjacent to it; as those of Egypt and Armenia, which, according to a tradition of the Egyptians Hebrews, were overflowed about 2300 years before the Christian æra; those of Attica, said to have been overflowed in the time of Ogyges, about five hundred years later; and those of Thessala, in the time of Deucalion, still three hundred years posterior.' 'But,' he adds, 'such deluges as these will not account for the shells found in the higher lands.† Here we see that Jewish history and Grecian stories, Lucian, Ovid, and Moses, are all considered as of equal authority. He then says that 'a second opinion has been entertained, which is, that in times anterior to the records either of history or tradition, the bed of the ocean, the principal residence of the shelled tribe, has, by some great convulsion of nature, been heaved to the height at which we now find shells and other remains of marine animals. The favourers of this opinion do well to suppose the great events on which it rests to have taken place beyond all the æras of history; for within these, certainly none such are to be found; and we may venture to say further, that no fact has taken place, either in our own days, or in the thousands of years recorded in history, which proves the existence of any natural agents, within or without the bowels of the earth, of force sufficient to heave, to the height of fifteen thousand feet, such masses as the Andes.‡ This opinion he seems to think somewhat more reasonably than the former, and that its 'favourers do well to suppose the great events on which it rests to have taken place beyond all the æras of history.' But even this, he owns, is not without its difficulty. A third opinion, one of M. de Voltaire, is then mentioned, which Mr. Jefferson himself thinks so trifling, that one is at a loss to imagine why it was introduced. We are then informed that 'there is a wonder somewhere.†' The Bible, indeed, tells of a wonder wrought by the immediate agency of the Almighty, next to the creation, the greatest in nature. This the humble Christian believes from other evidences than strata of earths and banks of cockle-shells; though the whole face of nature, and the united voices of all the nations upon the globe, both civilized and savage, proclaim it to be true. But Mr. Jefferson gives it no credit, for this very reason, that it is represented as a marvellous event: yet, after all his inquiries, he, with astonishing sagacity, discovers that 'there is a wonder somewhere.' This sweet-sounding concert of philosophy and infidelity is thus concluded: 'The three hypotheses are equally unsatisfactory; and we must be contented to acknowledge, that this great phenomenon is as yet unsolved. Ignorance is preferable to error; and he is less remote from the truth who believes nothing, than he who believes what is wrong.‡ But is it not surprising that when Mr. Jefferson was beholding the scene at the junction of the Potomac and Shenandoah; when his 'senses were hurried into the opinion, that this earth was created in time, that the mountains were formed first, that the rivers began to flow afterwards,' the following solution of this difficulty did not occur to him! When this earth was a huge and shapeless mass of mountains confusedly thrown together, the waters which were poured in among them must have been gathered into lakes and seas, from time to time, swelling over their banks, rending asunder their enclosures, and sweeping down the smaller mountains in their course. This scene of primeval confusion must have continued for ages, before the earth could be reduced to its present regular form. The waters in that time must have been abundantly supplied with inhabitants of every species. And when a body of water burst from its original bed, it must have left behind innumerable relicks of its productions. Thus might have been explained, without a wonder, the appearance of marine productions not only upon the summits of the highest mountains, but likewise of those which are found in the bowels of the earth. This theory seems to possess every qualification which the heart of a modern philosopher could desire; it is bold, plausible, and contrary to Scripture.

We must not omit to remark a passage, which, though not properly belonging to the sphere of these observations, deserves notice for its sagacity and the spirit of prophecy which it discovers. Speaking of Great Britain, it is said, 'the sun of her glory is fast descending to the horizon. Her philosophy has crossed the Channel, her freedom the Atlantic, and herself seems passing to that awful dissolution, whose issue is not given human foresight to scan.* If when this was uttered, her sun was indeed so fast declining, she must, like Joshua, have bid him stay his course. We have since seen her go out to battle, surrounded by the armies of Europe, against the common foe. We have seen her allies gradually drop from her. We have seen her, after each desertion, fight with renewed spirit, like a healthy trunk, more vigorous for every branch, which was lopped away. We now see her alone and unappalled, calmly looking from her snowy cliffs at the tigers, who are gnashing their teeth, and howling with impatience to devour her. And if we love light better than darkness; if we love our own happy country and our countrymen better than France and Frenchmen, we have reason to pray with unremitting fervour, that it may be long ere the sun of her glory reaches the horizon. Happy would she be, if long ago every particle of what is called her philosophy, had crossed the Channel, and every factious demagogue had left her shores. Her virtuous monarch would have been spared many a pang, and her loyal subjects many a sigh.

THE DRAMA.

[The following is an article of very recent criticism, on a new and beautiful Comedy by Cumberland.]

On Saturday night a New Comedy, entitled The Sailor's Daughter, was performed at Drury-Lane Theatre for the first time. It is the production of Mr. Cumberland's veteran Muse, and though the Prologue and Epilogue had not so unequivocally pointed out the parent, yet the child would be easily recognised from its strong resemblance to his numerous dramatic progeny. The following are the principal

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ:

Captain Sentamorn, . . .	Mr. Pope.
Sir Mathew Moribund, .	Mr. Wroughton,
Mandeville,	Mr. Dwyer.
Varnish,	Mr. Russell.
Doctor Hartshorn, . . .	Mr. Bannister jun.
Raven,	Mr. Downton.
Lindsay,	Mr. Bartley.
Louisa,	Mrs. Jordan.
Julia Clareville,	Mrs. H. Johnstone.
Mrs. Hartshorn,	Mrs. Sparks.

The part of the story, out of which the more interesting incidents arise, is simply this:

Julia is the daughter of Captain Clairville, who died from the wounds, which he received at the battle of Copenhagen. Clairville, on his death-bed, consigns her as a sacred trust to the care and protection of his friend Captain Sentamorn, insinuating at the same time a wish, that after a time, they may be both united in wedlock. Julia, on learning her father's death, takes shelter in the house of Dr. Hartshorn, who had been Surgeon on board Captain Clairville's ship, and for whose memory he retains the warmest affection, and the highest respect. Captain Sentamorn, whose professional duties keep him for a time abroad, contrives nevertheless, secretly to supply Julia with adequate means to answer all her wants. The merit however of his delicate generosity is assumed by Varnish, a young man of fashion, who, through the influence of this apparent sympathy, endeavours to captivate the affections of Julia, but with dishonourable designs. Sentamorn, however, soon returns home and arrives at Bath, where the scene of the play lies, and, anxious to find an opportunity of observing the character, and studying the sentiments of Julia, he prevails upon Lindsay, a young surgeon, who intends becoming the assistant or partner of Dr. Hartshorn, to permit him for a while to take his name and situation. Under this disguise he has frequent occasions of conversing with Julia, whose mind and disposition he is enraptured with, as he equally is with her person, kindness, and generosity. Varnish observing that Julia's prejudice in his favour is abated, attributes the change to the advice of Sentamorn, and insists upon satisfaction for this insult and injury; a meeting is appointed, but the duel is prevented, and a reconciliation brought about through the manly and forcible observations, with which Sentamorn reproves and ridicules that false delicacy and mistaken sense of honour which so frequently and fatally provokes the modern practice of duelling. An explanation afterwards ensues between Varnish and Julia; Sentamorn drops his disguise, and is immediately blessed with the hand and heart of the woman he admires; a similar union, which forms the under plot, takes place between Mandeville and Louisa.

Such nearly are the materials out of which Mr. Cumberland, though an acknowledged adept in the dramatic art, may appear not very artfully to have constructed or dexterously managed the plot; the denouement is too evidently discovered in the second act, and through the remaining acts the interest is but very feebly kept alive. It may also, perhaps, be objected, that the under-plot is rather annexed to, than connected with, the main one; and that there is no coincidence of event or interest by which they seem to be sensibly interwoven.—But these defects, if they really exist, are amply compensated by many other essential excellencies, more especially the elegance of the diction, the purity of the moral, the richness of the humour, and the poignancy of the sarcasm, which distinguish and pervade the dialogue. As to the characters, they cannot lay any very evident claim to novelty. The most prominent appears to be that of Dr. Hartshorn, which, though it be marked by a fine peculiarity, must, however, be pretty familiar with the amateurs of the drama. The part of Captain Sentamorn stands equally prominent for that unaffected frankness, that sedate courage, and unprompted benevolence, which constitute the generous ingredients of a British tar's disposition. The spirit of it was most happily seized by Pope, and he delineated it upon the whole, with his usual skill and judgment. In characters similar to that of Louisa, we have seen Mrs. Jordan a thousand times; but in all of them she still appears new, from the inexhaustible source of her ever varying playfulness, naivete, archness and whim. Here too, she introduces a song, the music of which very aptly accords with the pure and liquid tones of her fascinating voice.

Mrs. H. Johnstone was the heroine of the piece, and the simple, emphatic, and winning manner, in which she played the orphan child of Clairville, and delivered the epilogue which recommended the orphan and the author to the indulgence and protection of the audience, drew down those warm and repeated plaudits which British hearts are always ready to bestow on the solid and splendid services of our naval heroes. The other characters were very aptly sustained; and though at the close of the concluding scene (not a breath of censure had before betrayed itself), a small insignificant party seemed resolved to interrupt the performance, and mar the effect of the piece, yet the great majority was so decidedly in its favour, that when it was given out for a second representation, nothing could be heard but approbation and applause.

LEVITY.

BOB ROUSEM'S EPISTLE TO BONYPART.

This comes hoping you are well, as I am at this present; but, I say, Bony, what a damn'd lubber you must be to think of getting soundings among us English! I tell ye as how your anchor will never hold; it is n't made of good stuff; so luff up, Bony, or you 'll be fast aground before you know where you are. We don't mind your palaver and nonsense; for though 'tis all wind, it would hardly fill the stunsails of an English man of war. You 'll never catch a breeze to bring ye here as long as you live, depend upon it. I'll give you a bit of advice now; do try to lie as near the truth as possible, and don't give us any more of your clinchers. I say, do you remember how Lord Nelson came round ye at the Nile? I tell ye what, if you don't take care what you are about, you 'll soon be afloat in a way you won't like, in a high sea, upon a grating, my boy, without a bit of soft Tommy to put into your lantern jaws. I'll tell you now how we shall fill up the log-book if you come; I'll give you the journal, my boy, with an allowance for lee-way and variation that you don't expect. Now then:—At five A. M. Bonypart's cock-boats sent out to amuse our English men of war with fighting (that we like). Six A. M. Bonypart lands (that is, if he can); then we begin to blow the grampus; seven A. M. Bonypart in a pucker; eight A. M. Bonypart running away; nine A. M. Bonypart on board; ten A. M. Bonypart sinking; eleven A. M. Bonypart in Davy's Locker; Meridian, Bonypart in the north corner of —, where it burns and freezes at the same time: but you know any port in a storm, Bony, so there I'll leave ye. Now you know what you have to expect; so you see as how you can't say I didn't tell ye. Come, I'll give you a toast: Here's hard breezes and foul weather to ye, my boy, in your passage; Here's, May you be sea-sick! we'll soon make ye sick of the sea; Here's, May you never have a friend here, or a bottle to give him. And to conclude: Here's the French flag where it ought to be, under the English.

HIS BOB X ROUSEM.
MARK.

P. S. You see as I cou'd n't write, our captain's clerk put the lingo into black and white for me, and says he'll charge it to you.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A pathetic writer, and a real mourner in the Daily Advertiser of Mr. Poulson, thus tenderly bewails a NATIONAL MISFORTUNE. His bereaved countrymen, in humble submission to the will of Heaven, will bear, yet mourn their loss. They will cherish the recollection of the exalted energies of his mind, of the endearing attributes of his heart. They will consecrate his memory by their sorrows and their tears. We are often called upon to deplore the loss of men, whose amiable qualities have endeared them to the circle of their private friends. When the Hero falls, the tears of his country fall with him. The statesman, the senator and the patriot spread by their death a general affliction. But it is our lot to bear the aggravated grief that arises at the loss of all these characters.—HAMILTON, beloved, by his friends, endeared to his family; HAMILTON the statesman, the senator, the patriot, the Hero is gone. At the fall of such a man grief is silent, and eloquence mutes eulogiums, which cannot be expressed.

A Professor of Music from that cheerful and harmonious country, France, proposes to instruct ladies in his art, every evening with the pious exception of Sunday and Saturday, in judicious complaisance to the prejudices of our forefathers. The Professor however is not so much of a puritan, as to abandon all thoughts of love and gallantry, for after directing his fair pupils to inquire for him in a dark alley in Night's court, he engages with great sincerity, we doubt not, and a more perfect good faith than was ever manifested by his nation 'to reconduct every lady to their respective places of abode.' What amazing powers must this 'supple Gaul' possess to conduct all that variety of ladies, who frequent his school, and how safe and snug, and warm and happy must every 'Musical Lady' be under the fostering influence of so courtly a musician.

A Teacher of the French language in this city informs all such of his pupils as are in the dark that 'for the better convenience of the evening scholars, a light is kept in the entry of his house, which adjoining a certain fruit store, lighted every night, will be more easily seen.' A more agreeable and easy specimen of French philosophy is hardly to be found than is contained in this precious advertisement of the Aurora. This is the new and true light indeed, which, assisted and supported by another light, will be easily seen to shine more and more unto the perfect day of glorious illuminism. What a lantern to the feet of the stumbling scholars of this Frenchman must be this light under the bushel, and 'in the entry.'

"How far his little candle throws its beams."

The ensuing lines, from a mournful muse were written by Mrs. Smith, under the pressure of deep domestic affliction. They describe the woes of a bereaved Mother, and will not be read with indifference by those who can feel for misfortune, and have a taste for poetry.

SONNET TO NEPENTHE.

Oh! for imperial Polydamna's art,
Which to bright Helen was in Egypt taught,
To mix with magic power the oblivious draught,
Of force to staunch the bleeding of the heart,
And to Care's wan and hollow cheek impart
The smile of happy youth, uncurs'd with thought.
Potent, indeed, the charm that could appease
Affection's ceaseless anguish, doom'd to weep
O'er the cold grave; or yield even transient ease,
By soothing busy memory to sleep.
Around me those, who surely must have tried
Some charm of equal power, I daily see,
But still to me oblivion is denied,
There's no Nepenthe, now, on earth for me.

TO THE SUN.

Whether awaken'd from unquiet rest
I watch 'the opening eye lids of the morn,'
When thou, O Sun, from ocean's silver'd breast
Emerging, bidst another day be born—
Or whether in thy path of cloudless blue,
Thy noontide fires I mark with dazzled eyes,
Or to the west thy radiant course pursue,
Veil'd in the gorgeous broderie of the skies.
Celestial lamp! thy influence bright and warm
That renovates the world with life and light,
Shines not for me—for never more the form
I lov'd—so fondly lov'd—shall bless my sight,
And nought thy rays illumine, now can charm
My misery, or to day convert my night!

A NIGHT THOUGHT.

How oft a cloud, with envious veil
Obscures yon bashful light
Which seems so modesty to steal,
Along the waste of night.

'Tis thus the world's obtrusive wrongs
Obscure with malice keen,
Some timid heart, which only longs
To live and die unseen. [MOORE.]

A REFLECTION AT SEA.

See how, beneath the moonbeam's smile,
Yon little billow heaves its breast,
And foams and sparkles for a while,
And murmuring, then subsides to rest.
Thus man, the sport of bliss and care,
Rises on Time's eventful sea;
And, having swell'd a moment there,
Thus melts into eternity.

[Moore.]

One thing is clear, says an Irish print, that all things are very dark at present.

EPIGRAM.

To the landlord of an inn, near Bray.
I wonder, friend March, you, who live so near Bray,
Should not set up the sign of the Vicar;
Tho' it might be an odd one, you cannot but say,
It must needs be a sign—of good liquor.

ANSWER.

Should I set up the sign of the Vicar, I doubt
My drift might be misunderstood;
Who'd believe that the Vicar would dangle without,
If within doors the liquor was good?

IMITATION OF CATULLUS.

CHANSON BACCHIQUE.

Boy, who the rosy stream dost pass,
Fill up for me the largest glass;
The largest glass and oldest wine,
The laws of drinking give as mine;
Still must my ever thirsty lip
From large and flowing bumpers sip.
Ye limpid streams, where'er ye flow,
Far hence to water drinkers go;
Go to the dull, and the sedate,
And fly the god, whose bowers ye hate.

A Stranger, being much addicted to lying, was telling of the many countries and cities he had been in; when one of the company asked, if he had ever been in Cosmography. The stranger, thinking this the name of a city, said We saw it at a distance, but could not visit it, being in haste.

SONG.

Think on that look of humid ray,
Which, for a moment, mix'd with mine,
And for that moment seem'd to say,
'I dare not, or I would be thine.'

Think, think on every smile and glance,
On all thou hast to charm and move,
And then forgive my bosom's trance,
And tell me 'tis not sin to love.

Oh! not to love thee were a sin,
For sure, if Heaven's decrees be done,
Thou, thou art destin'd still to win,
As I was destin'd to be won.

[Moore.]

The late lord Botetourt, soon after voting for the cyder tax observed as he was travelling through Hereford, that the populace were burning him in effigy. Immediately stopping his coach and giving a purse of guineas to the mob, he said
'pray, gentlemen, if you will burn me, burn me like a gentleman don't let me linger. I see you have not faggots enough.'

TO JULIA.

Though fate, my girl, may bid us part,
Our souls it cannot, shall not sever;
The heart will seek its kindred heart,
And cling to it as close as ever.

But must we, must we part, indeed?
Is all our dream of rapture over?
And does not Julia's bosom bleed
To leave so dear, so fond a lover?

Does she too mourn?—Perhaps she may,
Perhaps she weeps, our blisses fleeting;
But why is Julia's eye so gay,
If Julia's heart, like mine, is beating?

I oft have lov'd the brilliant glow
Of rapture in her blue eye streaming—
But can the bosom bleed with woe,
While joy is in the glances beaming?

No, no! yet, love, I will not chide,
Although your heart were fond of roving;
Nor that, nor all the world beside,
Could keep your faithful boy from loving.

You'll soon be distant from his eye,
And, with you, all that's worth possessing,
Oh! then it will be sweet to die,
When life has lost its only blessing.

[Moore.]

From the Abbate Buondelmonte.

Under Friendship's fair disguise,
Love, in smiling frolic lies;
Or, affecting anger now,
Furls like scorn its wrinkled brow;
Nay, with hatred's sullen mien,
Crafty Love is frequent seen;
Pity's face, too, oft it wears,
Bath'd in subtle, well feign'd tears;
But beware Love's wanton wiles,
O! beware his tears and smiles,
Love, in every form, believe
Still is Love, and will deceive.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

'Isidore's Merry Gondolier is a sweet and cheerful composition. It will be perused with pleasure; and we hope that the industry of the correspondent will rival the genius of the poet.

The patriotic song, by Mr. Fessenden, will be echoed by the lovers of their country.

The nervous essay on 'Popular Fanaticism,' published in our last, originally appeared in the Fredericktown Herald, a paper, which we read often, and highly commend.

'Asmodeo' is not forgotten. We are anxious to hear from him, and our readers would be gratified, if they discerned his name in every number of the Port Folio. His rallery of the style of certain fashionable poets, will divert the public in our next. We will give Asmodeo the front place among the loungers.

The intelligent traveller, who has of late pretty regularly furnished us with 'Extracts of Letters,' written during his tour in Switzerland, is assured, that the public has received very favourably the remarks of such a tourist. They have been attentively perused, and uniformly approved of, by the Editor, who will have new reasons to be pleased with his ingenious correspondent, if he will, agreeably to promise, continue to transmit sketches either of European scenery, or European manners.

The gentleman, who has sent us, from New-York, an exposition of that spurious philosophy, which, in the Notes of Jefferson, is so detrimental to others, and so disgraceful to himself, is very respectfully informed, that we think so well of the salutary sentiments, and neat style of his pamphlet, we have resolved to devote to it no narrow portion of our paper.

Our friend C, is assured, that his request is not "at variance with our judgment," and, if practicable, would have been cheerfully and promptly granted.

The Laureat of Great Britain, in his ode on the King's birth-day, has justly and poetically described the state of a great kingdom.

The lines of 'Rosalind' are rumbling as the 'rustic waggon,' and cold and barren as the 'pine plain' she describes. We fancy this lady has been more accustomed to the hum of the wheel, and the music of the dairy, than to the tunable voice of the Muse. We cannot forbear applying the Clown's lines in Shakspeare,

Winter garments must be lin'd;
So must slender Rosalind.
They that reap must sheaf and bind,
Then to cart with Rosalind.

'Good reasons for good things,' an impromptu, from a literary and social friend, will appear excellent logic to all loungers, whose motto is sapias vina liques.

'Seneca,' in the intervals of political composition, and salutary invective, not unworthy of Junius, we hope will find inclination to exclaim

Awake, Eolian lyre: awake,
And give to rapture all thy trembling strings.

With our conviction of his satirical powers, we wish that he would bend his attention to the jacobinic foe, and employ his excellent poetry, in aid of sound and virtuous politics. We are assured of the salutary consequences of literary efforts, thus directed.

'Yes, from the depths of Pindus shall your rhymes,
Thro' this disorder'd world, these lawless times,
Be heard distinctly in our inmost state;
All that the good revere, and bad men hate,
In spirit and in substance, as of old,
Your Muse in her Asbestos shall unfold.'

We regret exceedingly we cannot reprint the eloquent essays in the Repertory, from the pen of a sound politician and fine writer. But the author's quill is so fluent, the tardy progress of our paper will not keep pace with him, nor is it in our power to gratify, in due season, the public curiosity.

We are glad to have so early an opportunity to indicate to our countrymen the merits of Cumberland's new comedy.

'Bothwell Castle,' from the original manuscript of Thomas Campbell, Esq. the author of the Pleasures of Hope, is received from a literary friend, to whom we are often indebted for the treasures of Genius; whether he consults the cabinets of others, or his own.

'The Withered Rose,' as described by Violetta, is not without beauty and fragrance. Whenever our fair friend chooses to rove through the flowery fields of fancy, she will always have an unbounded choice of pleasing forms and bright hues.

The translator of a splendid passage in Ovid, where that poet so finely enumerates the prodigies which portended the doom of Caesar, is thanked for such a classical allusion to the death of HAMILTON.

Various and beautiful tissues from the loom of Mr. Moore, shall soon be unfolded. Whether the Editor reflects upon the literary, the colloquial, or the musical talents of his friend, he cannot forbear to ask with Milton

What neat repast shall feast us light and choice,
Of Attic taste, with wine, whence I may rise
To hear thy lute well touch'd, or artful voice,
Warble immortal notes, and Tuscan air?
He, who of these delights can judge, and spare
To interpose them oft, is not unwise.

'Clarissa,' whether descended from her paragon namesake in Richardson, or the foundress of a new order of Chastity, is, incontestably, as 'staid a maiden' as ever shrieked at a salute, or shuddered at a marriage proposal.

'Ithacus,' in the course of his tour, must not forget an occasional excursion to Parnassus.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSHOOL,

If you deem the following translation from the fifteenth book of Ovid's Metamorphoses worthy of a place in the Port Folio, please to give it an early insertion.

If such signs, ominous and tremendous, as the poet here describes, were the precursors of the fate of a great man of antiquity, though a tyrant, what should have marked the day on which ALEXANDER HAMILTON fell!

Signa tamen luctus dant haud incerta futuri.
Arma ferunt inter nigras crepitantia nubes,
Terribilesque rubas, auditaque cornua coelo
Præmonuisse nefas.

OVID, Lib. xv.

Midst the black clouds tremendous scenes appear'd,
The horrid din of clashing arms was heard;

The shrill voic'd clarion heav'n's vast concave rent,
And sounding horns proclaim'd the sad event

Around the world. Imprest with dire dismay,
The mournful sun diffus'd a lurid day,

The low'ring sky with blazing meteors fill'd,
Black human gore in drizzling show'rs distill'd;

A sable veil obscur'd bright Hesper's light,
And blood distain'd the silver car of night.

The Stygian owl announc'd the dire portent,
And weeping statues mourn'd the sad event;

Dirges amid the sacred groves were sung,
With dreadful threats the echoing forests rung;

Ill-boding signs diffus'd horrific dread,
The smould'ring entrails shew'd a sever'd head;

The howling breed, while solemn silence reign'd,
In dol'rous accents to the moon complain'd;

The wand'ring shades Cocytus stream forsook,
And Rome imperial to her centre shook.

Yet these dire signs, by heaven in pity sent,
Could not deter them from their black intent,

Their swords they carry to the senate hall,
And stain the sacred dome with mighty CÆSAR'S fall.

TO A WITHERED ROSE.

How fair wert thou when first mine eye
Caught the light tint thy leaves that drest,
Just bursting from obscurity,
To court the zephyr to thy breast!

To me thou did'st recal the time,
When hope and fancy wing'd my days,
When, in my joyous, youthful prime,
No pensive note e'er mark'd my lays.

Thou too, like me, wert but half-blown,
Ere drooping for thy parent soil,
Thy richest fragrance far had flown,
And death had ta'en thee as his spoil.

He bow'd thy unassuming head,
And paler made thy modest glow,
Which boasted ne'er the brightest red,
But such a blush as pale cheeks know.

Thy lively green is faded too,
And thou dost not one trace retain
Of that sweet flower the Persians woo,
To waft its perfume o'er the plain.

Poor Rose, adieu! may I, like thee,
When 'death has laid my green head low,'
Have some fond friend to sigh for me,
And mourn for buds that never blow.

SONG,

BY T. G. FESSENDEN, ESQ.

THE GENIUS OF COLUMBIA.

Tune 'In a mouldering cave.'

Where the hoar Allegany towers o'er the cloud,
Thy genius, Columbia, reclin'd,
Her visage pale care and anxiety shroud,
And her locks wanton wild to the wind,

She weeps, lest her sons should by fatal mis-chance,

Or by jacobin frenzy be driven,
To fraternize with infidel, blood-thirsty France,
And thus be abandon'd by heaven.

The ground was bedew'd with her fast-falling tears,

When, lo! through the wide opening sky,
On a bright cloud descending, a seraph appears,
With a message of love from on high.

And thus he address'd the disconsolate dame,
Your despondence and wailing give o'er,
For I am a ministering spirit of flame,
Who guard blest Columbia's shore.

The storm of democracy soon will be past,
And cloudless again be your skies,
The true sons of freedom distinguish'd, at last,
From those, who assume its disguise.

For those who true liberty ever oppos'd,
And your Washington dar'd to revile,
In their native deformity shall be disclos'd,
And no longer your freemen beguile.

Though Genoa, Spain, Holland, and Switzerland bend

To their falsely call'd freedom's controul,
While no other freedom their tyrants intend,
Than to tyrannize over the whole.

Still if Europe all bow to dire jacobin sway,
To Columbians the charter was given,
That tyrants should never her freemen dismay,
And the franchise recorded in heaven.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Dr. Beddoes has just translated, with admirable energy, the famous Greek invocation to Health.

Invocation by Atriphron of Sicily.

O thou among the blissful host,
Deserving mortal incense most!
What yet of days remain to me,
Hygeia! let me pass with thee,
And thou my willing inmate be!
If ought of solace coffer'd hoards—
Whatever progeny affords—
Or sovereign away
Exalting mortals to the gods above,—
Or that sweet prey
Which struggles secret in the snares of love,
To toil worn man, by heaven's behest,
If balms unnam'd refreshment bring—
All owe, benignant power, to thee their zest,
Thou giv'st its radiance to the graces, spring,
Nor but with thee may child of earth be blest.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

GOOD REASONS FOR GOOD THINGS.

I love to drink; because my spirits rise,
And, mounting upwards, revel in the skies:
I love to smoke; for, as its curls ascend,
They kindly mix with others from my friend:

I love to laugh; for, starting at the noise,
Care, Grief, and Envy fly from merry boys—
I love to kiss—for beauty warms the heart,
And joys, no tongue can tell, her smiles impart.

TO ROSA.

Like one, who trusts to summer skies,
And puts his little bark to sea,
Is he, who, lur'd by smiling eyes,
Consigns his simple heart to thee.
For fickle is the summer wind,
And sadly may the bark be tost,
For thou art sure to change thy mind,
And then the wretched heart is lost. [Moore.]

ODE,

FOR HIS MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY,

June 4, 1804.

BY H. J. PYE, ESQ. P. L.

As the blest guardian of the British isles,
Immortal Liberty, triumphant stood,
And view'd her gallant sons with sav'ring smiles,
Undaunted heroes of the field or flood;
From Inverary's rocky shores,
Where loud the Hyperborean billow roars,
To where the surges of the Atlantic wave,
Around Cornubia's western borders rave,
While Erin's valiant warriors glow
With kindred fire to crush the injurious foe,
From her bright lance the flames of vengeance
stream,
And in her eagle eye shines glory's radiant beam.

Why sink those smiles in sorrow's sigh,
Why sorrow's tears suffice that eye;
Alas! while weeping Britain sees
The baleful fiends of pale disease
Malignant hovering near her throne,
And threat a Monarch all her own—
No more from Anglia's fertile land,
No more from Caledonia's strand,
From Erin's breezy hills no more
The panting legions crowd the shore:
The buoyant barks, the vaunting host
That swarm on Gallia's hostile coast,
The anxious thought no longer share,
Lost in a nearer, dearer, care,
And Britain breathes alone for GEORGE'S life her prayer.

Her prayer is heard—Th' Almighty Power,
Potent to punish or to save,
Bids Health resume again her happier hour;—
And as across the misty wave
The freshening breezes sweep the clouds away
That bid awhile the golden orb of day,
So from Hygeia's balmy breath
Fly the drear shadows of disease and death.
Again the manly breast beats high,
And flames again the indignant eye,
While, from the cottage to the throne,
This generous sentiment alone
Lives in each heart with patriot ardour warm,
Points every sword, nerves every Briton's arm,
'Rush to the field where GEORGE and Freedom lead,
Glory and fame alike the warrior's meed
Brave in their country's cause, who conquer or who bleed.'

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 97.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

DURING this warm season of love, you are no doubt pestered by the city Strephons with effusions in praise of their Celias, Chloes, Phillisses, &c. &c. dictated by the immediate inspiration of the namby pamby muse. Sonnets, odes, tales, and lyrical ballads, I suppose, are as plenty in your letter-box as apples in an orchard.

The style of the present day appears to run very much on the prurient and infantine. The former, as the profound Martinus Scriblerus hath said, is 'greatly advanced and honoured of late by the encouragement of the ladies;' the latter 'is when a poet grows so very simple, as to think and talk like a child;' and which may very properly be termed 'the gentle down-hill way to the bathos;' but when they are united, they perfectly form 'the bottom, the end, the central point, the ne plus ultra of true modern poesy.' This union is not unhappily ridiculed in the following French verses, which, for the benefit of your wishing youths and sighing maidens, I have done into English. A.

L'autre jour, Colin malade
Dedans son lit,
D'une grosse maladie
Pensant mourir.

De trop songer à ses amours
Ne peut dormir;
Il veut tenir celle qu'il aime
Tout la nuit.

Le galant y' fut habile,
Il se leva;
A la porte de sa belle Trois fois frappa:

Catin, Catos, belle Ber—
Gère, dormez-vous?
La promesse que m'avez faite,
La tiendrez vous?

La fillette fut fragile;
Elle se leva,
Tout nue, en sa chemise
La porte ouvra.

Marchez tout-doux, parlez tout-bas,
Mon doux ami,
Car si mon papa vous entend
Morte je suis.

Le galant, qui fut honnête,
Droit se coucha,
Entre les bras de sa belle Se reposa.

Ah! je n'ai pas perdu mes peines,
Aussi mes pas,
Pusique je tiens celle que j'aime
Entre mes bras.

J'entends l'alouette qui chante
Au point de jour,
Amant, si vous êtes honnête,
Retirez-vous.

Marchez tout-doux, parlez tout-bas,
Mon doux ami,
Car si mon papa vous entend
Morte je suis.

VERSION.

Poor Colin t'other day was sick,
Was very sick upon his bed,
And of his sickness he did think,
Thinks he, it sure will kill me dead.

Then ponder'd he so 'bout his love,
He could not sleep a wink for spite;
But wish'd, and sigh'd, and wish'd again
To have his little girl all night.

Then up he got him, ready drest,
(For lovers don't put off their clothes)
And at his mistress' chamber door
He gave three very little blows.

Catin, Catos, sweet shepherdess,
Tell me, said he, are you asleep?
The promise, Catin, that you made,
Say will you—will you—won't you keep?

Catin, alack-a-day! was frail,
And up she got, without her clothes,
(Oh, maidens, never do ye so!)
And to the door full quick she goes.

Oh step, step softly—whisper low,
My honey sweet, my Colin dear,
For if my daddy hears, I vow
He'll be the death of me, I fear.

The lover, who was quite polite,
Soon softly laid him on the bed,
And 'twixt Catin's two snowy arms
He gently pillow'd his head.

Ah! cried the swain, I care not for
The ditch I tumbled in to-night,
Since I have got within my arms
My only dear, my heart's delight.

Laws! Catin cried, I hear the lark!
He sings tit tit, tit tit, at dawn;
Oh! if you will do as you should,
You'll get you up, and get you gone.

Oh step, step softly—whisper low,
My honey sweet, my Colin dear!
For if my daddy hears, I vow
He'll be the death of me, I fear.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 3.

The orations against Verres.

— "Take away this protection from our citizens. take away this warranty of their safety; and the provinces, the free cities, the kingdoms, the whole world, in which they now travel in security, will be henceforward shut up from them. But why do I dwell upon Gavius, as if you had been the enemy of him alone, and not that of the Roman name, of the rights of Rome, of the rights and laws of nations, and of the common cause of liberty? This cross, which the Messinians, according to their custom, had erected on the Pompeian road, why did you order it to be taken up? Why did you remove it to the spot which overlooks the strait which separates Sicily and Italy? Why? It was, as you yourself have said, you cannot deny it, you said it publicly, it was to the end that Gavius, who boasted that he was a Roman citizen, might, from the height of the gibbet, behold, as he expired, his country. This cross is the only one, since the foundation of Messina, which has been placed upon the strait. You chose this place, that this unfortunate man, dying in torments, might see, for the perfection of bitterness, what a short space separated the residence where liberty reigns, from that in which he died as a slave; to the end that Italy might see one of its children attached to a gibbet, perish in the ignominious punishment reserved for servitude.

"To enchain a Roman citizen is an outrage; to beat him with rods is a crime: to put him to death is almost a parricide: what is it then to attach him to a cross! Expression is wanting for this atrocity, and yet this is not enough for Verres; let him die, says he, looking at Italy and the laws. No, Verres, it is not only Gavius, it is not a single man, a solitary citizen, that you have attached to this cross; it is liberty herself, it is the common right of all, it is the Roman people in a body. Be persuaded, that if he has not erected it in the middle of the forum, in the assembly of the comitia, in the tribunal of harangues, if he has not menaced all the Roman citizens, it was because he could not. But, at least, he has done what he could, he has chosen the place he most frequented of the province, the nearest to Italy, the most conspicuous to the sight; he has wished that all those, who navigate these seas, should see, even at the entrance into Sicily and as at the ports of Italy, the monument of his audacity and his crime."

The proration shows with what firmness Cicero armed himself against the pride and tyranny of the great, jealous of the fortune and elevation of those whom they called new men, that is to say, those who had no other recommendation than their merit. Cicero, who owed every thing to his, and to the justice done him by the Roman people, though he could not better demonstrate his gratitude, than by sustaining with courage that natural and interminable war, which subsists between the good man and the wicked. He menaces boldly the judges to summon them before the people, if they suffered themselves to be corrupted by the money of Verres. This audacious plunderer had publicly said, that he had made a partition of the three years of his government of Sicily, that there was one for him self, one for his advocates, and one for his judges. He had relied very much not only on the eloquence but on the influence of Hortensius, who was not near so delicate as Cicero, in the means he employed to carry his causes. Cicero addresses himself to him, and advertises him that he will have his eyes open upon his conduct, and that he will make him give an account of it. We should remember that these harangues, although they had not been pronounced, were made public, and that consequently the orator was not ignorant to what resentments and dangers he exposed himself by his incorruptible firmness.

"What! will any one say to me, will you then charge yourself with the burden of so many enmities? I answer, that it is neither in my character nor my intention to seek them; but that it is not permitted in me to imitate, to wait, in sleep and idleness, the benefits of the Roman people. My condition is quite different from theirs. I have before my eyes the examples of Cato, of Marius, of Fimbria, of Cælius, who have felt like me, that it was only by force of continued labour, by force of dangers surmounted, that they could arrive at those honours, to which these nobles, the favourites of fortune, are carried without costing them any thing. Such are the models that I glory in imitating. I see with what eyes of envy they regard the advancement of new men, that they pardon us nothing; that we must always be vigilant, always active. And why should I fear to have those for declared enemies, who are secretly envious of me, those, who by the difference of interests and principles are necessarily my adversaries and defamers! I declare then if I obtain the reparation due to the Roman people and to Sicily, I renounce the character of an accuser; but if the event deprives the opinion I have of my judges I am determined to pursue to the last extremity both the corruptors and the corrupted. Thus, let those, who would clear the guilty, whatever means they may employ, artifice, impudence, or venality, prepare themselves to answer before the people of Rome; and if they have seen in me any zeal, any firmness, and any vigilance, in a cause, in which I have no enemies; but such as the interest of Sicily has made me, let them expect to find in me much more vivacity and energy, when I shall contend with the enemies, whom the interest of the Roman people shall have made me."

He finishes by an apostrophe, as brilliant as it is pathetic, to all the divinities whose temples Verres had pillaged. This religious enumeration, the effect of which is founded upon the ideas which these names awakened among the Romans, cannot be of the same weight among us, who are not accustomed to respect Jupiter and Juno. I shall content myself, therefore, to quote the last phrases.

"And you, venerable goddesses, who preside over the fountains of Enna, over the sacred groves of Sicily, whose defence has been committed to me! You, against whom Verres has declared an impious and sacrilegious war; you, whose temples and altars have been spoiled by his robberies! you I attest and implore. If, in this cause, I have had nothing in view but the safety of our provinces, and the dignity of the Roman people; if I have concentrated in this single duty all my cares, all my thoughts, all my vigilance, grant that my judges, in pronouncing their sentence, may have in their hearts the sentiment which I have constantly had in mind; that Verres, convicted of all the crimes, which can be committed by perfidy, avarice, and cruelty, united; that Verres, condemned by the laws, as he is by his conscience, may find an end worthy of his transgressions; that the republic, contented with my zeal in this accusation, may not have occasion to impose upon me, a second time, the same duty; and that I may be permitted, henceforward, to occupy myself rather in defending the good citizens, than in prosecuting the wicked."

It was the usage among the Romans, as among us, that the party complaining should ascertain the estimation of damages which he demanded; apparently also the judges had a custom, as at this day, to diminish a good deal of this estimate, which it is natural enough to suppose somewhat exaggerated. But it is certain, that, according to the report of Ascanius, a contemporary author, from whom we have excellent commentaries on the orations of Cicero, Verres was condemned to restore to the Sicilians a sum equivalent to about five millions of French money; and that according to the valuation of Cicero, who had demanded twelve millions and an half, the damages he obtained were not one half of what Verres had stolen in Sicily.

SECTION 4.

The orations against Catiline.

Who would believe that, in our days, Cicero could still have, I will not say critics, (the glory of superior men is to engage the opinions of all men in all ages), but enemies, detractors, who calumniate his character, and depreciate his talents, with an injustice equally odious and absurd? I know that, happily for us, it may be answered, what enemies? what detractors? Their names alone is an answer to all their injuries. It is true, but nevertheless it is a melancholy observation to make upon human nature, that there should be in it this species of whimsical perversity, which enrages itself after two thousand years, against a great man, without any other interest or motive, than that hatred of virtue, which seems to be the instinct of the wicked. No doubt they say to themselves, as they read his writings, if we had lived in the time of this man he would have been our enemy. For the writings and actions of a good man accuse the consciences of those who are not so. Perhaps also we affect at this day more than ever that deplorable singularity of contradicting every thing that is the most generally acknowledged. How can we otherwise explain that which was printed a little while ago, that the conspiracy of Catiline was a chimera, which the vanity of Cicero had made the Romans believe? Certainly, since the father Hardouin, who, by dint of rising early in the morning, to labour at his researches into erudition, had brought himself to dream and rave when he was wide awake, and to believe one day that he had discovered that the most of the works of the ancients had been fabricated by the monks of the middle age; after that ridiculous fool, who was the scandal and the ridicule of the literary world, nothing has been imagined more strange, more incomprehensible than this giving of the lie to all the historians of antiquity, and particularly to Sallust, a contemporary author, an enemy of Cicero, and who to be sure must have amused himself, forming the history of an imaginary conspiracy. One knows not what name to give to this kind of madness; but it is as remarkable, as it is consoling, that the public is at this day so familiarised to this folly of paradoxes, that they no longer give any attention to them. This which has been recalled to my mind by the orations of Cicero against Catiline, which are now to engage our attention, has passed without any notice, and, by abusing every thing, we have at least obtained this advantage, that extravagance itself is no longer a means of making a noise. Of the four harangues of Cicero against Catiline, there are two which are so much the more admirable, as we see by the nature of the circumstances, that the orator, who pronounced them, had not been able to prepare himself for them: and although, on the publication of them, he no doubt revised them with all the care which he bestowed on all which proceeded from his pen, the great effect which they produced from the first moment, ought not to leave us any doubt concerning their merit, before the author had put to them his last hand. It may be demanded, perhaps, how he could recollect discourses, which his genius dictated to him on the spot, upon important occasions, discourses which were of such considerable extent. Historians inform us of the means that Cicero employed. He had distributed in the senate copyists, whom he had taught to write, by abbreviation, almost as fast as he spoke. This art was brought to perfection in the sequel, and we see that this invention, a long time lost, but revived in our days, belongs to Cicero, although we know not precisely what method he employed.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Observations upon certain passages in Mr. Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, which appear to have a tendency to Subvert Religion, and established a False Philosophy.

We now come to a pitfall, artfully covered over with conjecture and specious argument; into which an incautious reader, who dislikes the trouble of thinking attentively, would be very apt to fall. It consists of three parts. We will consider each separately. Towards the close of the Query, which treats of the American Indians, Mr. Jefferson says: 'But imperfect as is our knowledge of the tongues spoken in America, it suffices to discover the following remarkable fact. Arranging them under the radical ones to which they may be palpably traced, and doing the same by those of the red men of Asia, there will be found probably twenty in America for one in Asia, of those radical languages, so called, because, if they were ever the same, they have lost all resemblance to one another. A quotation from Dr. Barton, of Philadelphia, whose authority is certainly as good as that of Mr. Jefferson, will show how much this assertion is to be relied upon. 'The inference from these facts and observation is obvious and interesting: that hitherto we have not discovered more than one radical language in the two Americas; or, in other words, that hitherto we have not discovered in America any two, or more, languages between which we are incapable of detecting affinities (and those often very striking) either in America or in the old world. Nothing is more common than for Indian traders, interpreters, or other persons, to assert, that such and such languages bear no relation to each other; because, it seems, that the persons speaking them cannot always understand one another. When these very languages, however, are compared, their relations, or affinities are found out. It is by such comparisons that I have ascertained that the language of the Delaware is the language of such a great number of tribes in America. It is by such comparisons that future inquirers may discover, that in all the vast countries of America there is but one language: such inquiries, perhaps, will even prove, or render it highly probable, that all the languages of the earth bear some affinity to each other.' Thus says Dr. Barton; yet, before his work was published, it would doubtless have been esteemed presumptuous to disbelieve Mr. Jefferson's assertion. It has frequently been remarked, that the apostles of infidelity require stronger faith from their followers than the apostles of Christianity. Mr. Jefferson proceeds thus: 'A separation into dialects may be the work of a few ages only, but for two dialects to recede from one another till they have lost all vestiges of their common origin, must require an immense course of time; perhaps not less than many people give to the age of the earth.' The obvious deduction from this learned piece of information is this: Since it requires as much time for two dialects to become what are called radical languages, as many people give to the age of the world; and since nobody makes the world younger than it is said to be in the Bible; and as some of the vast number of radical tongues among the savages of America must have been formed long before the others, the world must necessarily be many years older, than is allowed by the Bible chronology. But, lest this opinion should appear too bold to some squeamish people, it is modestly accompanied by a 'perhaps.' Every one, however, who favours Mr. Jefferson's opinions, and confides in his judgment, can easily perceive the use to which he must apply it. These little doubting words are the passports by which modern philosophers introduce into their writings the wildest absurdities, and grossest impiety. They take away the appearance of any indecent attack against things which are generally esteemed sacred; and it would be hard if a man were not permitted to offer a simple conjecture. But these things, which we have been examining, are only the steps preparatory to this irresistible conclusion: 'A greater number of those radical changes of language having taken place among the red men of America, proves them of greater antiquity than those of Asia.' And as the natives of America are thus proved to be of greater antiquity than those of Asia, the continent of Asia must have been peopled from America; of course, the history of our first parents, and of the garden of Eden, and of the whole earth's being peopled from this original pair, is a pretty Eastern tale. But might not some such conjectures as the following have presented themselves to the philosophic mind of Mr. Jefferson? Supposing the Asiatic nations equal, or even superior in number to the tribes of savage Americans; but that for every distinct language in Asia, twenty may be found in America; may not various causes have contributed to produce this vast difference in the number of their languages? May not the different faces of the countries which they inhabit have rendered the intercourse between the tribes in the one, less frequent than in the other; and, of consequence, caused their languages soonest to vary? May not the difficulty of procuring sustenance have forced them to live more remote from each other in one country, than in the other? Nay, may not this greater affinity between the different languages in Asia have proceeded from the greater antiquity of those who speak them; because the original scattered tribes may probably have had more time to increase, to become better acquainted with each other, and thus blend together the languages which had become dissimilar? Would it not have been modest, would it not have been humane in the author of the Notes on Virginia had he permitted some such considerations as these to prevent him from publishing an opinion, which, if received as true, would pull down the religion of his country, and destroy the dearest hope of thousands?

It is a favourite object with modern philosophers to persuade themselves and others, that man is of the same nature with the rest of the animal creation; that he is not rendered distinct from them by an immortal soul, but merely by the superiority of his faculties; that he is to all intents of the same genus with them, but only of a higher species. They have observed how wonderfully minute the gradations are from the inanimate spar, up to man, the lord of the creation; how the three kingdoms of nature encroach upon each other, rendering it impossible to define the limits of each. They have perceived that an uniformity of design prevails in the structure of every part of the animal creation, from the skeleton of a man down to that of a mouse; that every creature which possesses the principle of life, whether animal or vegetable, contains a germ by which it gives being to another like itself; that all, not excepting man, one after another, quit the stage, and live only in their posterity. This view of nature, in which man is found so nearly to resemble, in his corporeal properties, the animals below him, offers a very delusive spectacle; and which doubtless has betrayed many a one, who regards the exterior, more than the interior of things, into the wretched belief that we are but little above the beasts, which perish. But the intellectual faculties of man were found to set him at such an immense distance from all other animals, that it was absolutely necessary to devise some scheme for filling up the chasm. The resemblance of the bodily structure of the orang-outang to that of the human species, and the consequent similarity in many of its actions to those of men, were not overlooked; but every art was employed to prove that it was endued with reason, and that it ought to be reckoned a lower order of man. But as there was still a long jump from an ape to a man, some happy geniuses bethought them of setting the Africans as a step which would make the transition perfectly easy. So that in the same proportion as the ape was raised above its proper sphere, the inoffensive negro was pulled down from his just rank in the creation. And thus was the golden chain of nature strained and new-linked, to serve the purposes of these gentlemen. The man with a high nose and fair skin was honoured with the first place among the beasts; the man with a flat nose and black skin with the second; Pongo, or the wild man of the woods, with the third; and then came the other animals in their proper order.

It is now proposed to show that the portion of the Notes on Virginia, which we are going to consider, is evidently intended to establish, if not the whole, at least a part of the foregoing theory; that if it does not openly exalt the orang-outang to the station of a rational being, it debases the negro to an order of creatures, lower than those who have a fairer skin and thinner lips. We will likewise, as we go along, examine the depth and fairness of argument, which is there displayed. Human patience could not endure to review it sentence by sentence; it would be worse than grinding chaff: it will fully answer our purpose to pick out some of the heaviest grains.* After mentioning the bill for the emancipation of slaves, Mr. Jefferson says, 'It will probably be asked, why not retain and incorporate the blacks into the state, and thus save the expense of supplying, by importation of white settlers, the vacancies they will leave?' In answer to this question, he offers several objections, which he says are political; and then adds a multitude of others, which he calls physical and moral. The first of these is the difference of colour; which, we are told 'is fixed in nature, and is as real as if its seat and cause were better known to us;' that is to say, it cannot be owing to any accidental cause, such as the difference of climate; but the blacks must have been originally created a distinct race. Every one knows that neither our knowledge nor our ignorance of the cause can affect the reality of the difference, if it exist, any more than our knowledge or our ignorance can affect the existence of a volcano in the moon: but it is a singular method of establishing a fact, to say bluntly, that although the cause be unknown, the fact is indubitable. It amounts to this; I can give you no reason for what I tell you; but because I say so, you must take it for granted. Another distinction between the blacks and whites is 'their own judgment in favour of the whites, declared by the preference of them, as uniformly as is the preference of the Oranootan for the black women over those of his own species.' Now, can any one who knows what candour is, deny that this sentence savours strongly of the afore-mentioned theory? The orang-outang prefers the female black, as being of an order superior to himself; and for the same reason, the negro shows a decided preference in favour of the whites. Where Mr. Jefferson learnt that the orang-outang has less affection for his own females than for black women, he does not inform us. No doubt, from some French traveller. If it be true that the negroes entertain so great an affection for us, the swarms of West-Indian mulattos testify that the regard is mutual, and that white people do not feel the abhorrence which they might naturally be expected to have for an inferior and ugly set of beings. We soon after come to a number of other distinctions, which tend to inspire the belief that they partake as much or more of the nature of brutes than of men. Among other things we are told, that 'they are at least as brave and more adventuresome than the whites. But this may perhaps proceed from a want of forethought, which prevents their seeing a danger till it be present.' In this respect, then, they are not superior to a war-horse, or a trained elephant. Among the numerous opportunities, which Mr. Jefferson must have had of observing the dispositions of these unfortunate people, did he never discover in any instance a nobleness of spirit, and delicate sense of honour, not exceeded by any hero of history or romance? Or did he always see through the fallacious medium of a darling theory? Did he never know of any incident like the following, which took place many years ago in the island of Jamaica? On one of the estates in that island, lived a faithful and experienced slave, whose bust it was that his skin had never been marked by the lash. A new Overseer, who was placed upon the estate, gave some directions in the boiling of sugar, which this negro, who was thoroughly acquainted with the process, told him were wrong. The Overseer, offended at the presumption of a negro, in opposing his directions, ordered him to be whipped. 'No,' cried the negro, 'my skin has never yet been broken;' and instantly aped into the boiler of melted sugar. Let it not be imagined that this anecdote is related without a just abhorrence of the crime of suicide. But if Roman Cato has been extolled for ages, because he could not endure to survive the lerty of his country, surely a poor untaught slave, whose only glory was an unbroken skin, should equal magnanimity when he chose to die in torment, rather than live and bear about him what he thought an indelible disgrace. Among other things, we are told that 'misery is often the parent of the most affecting touches in poetry. Among the blacks is misery enough, God knows, but no poetry.' That the contemplation of misery in others often gives birth to affecting poetry, is true enough: and many a wretched mortal, who has been left to reflection, has endeavoured to solace his grief by pouring forth his complaints in numbers. But one would have thought that modern philosophy herself could not have the face to declare that the wretch who is driven out to labour at the dawn of day, and who toils until evening with the whip flourishing over his head, ought to be a poet.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF THOMAS WARTON.

[What species of composition can be more agreeably received, what charming pages detain us by a stronger interest, than the memoirs of men, distinguished for their abilities, venerable for their erudition, and admired for their virtue? The life and the works of Thomas Warton exhibit a reclus scholar and a Poet, whose pages, composed in the shade of the cloister, may contribute to dissipate the languor, or soothe the agitations of worldly pleasures and cares. As a prose and a poetical writer he exhibited great elegance. His History of the poetry of his nation, will be frequently consulted, and his 'Progress of Discontent' will be learned by heart, by many a pupil.]

THOMAS WARTON, the 'Historian of English Poetry,' was born in the year 1728. He belonged to a poetical family. His father, Thomas Warton, B. D. was fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and afterwards Poetry Professor in that University, from 1718 to 1728, and Vicar of Basing-stoke in Hants, and of Cobham in Surrey. He married Elizabeth, daughter of the Rev. Joseph Richardson, Rector of Dunsfold, in Surrey, by whom he had two sons, Joseph, the present respectable Master of Winchester School, the poet, and one daughter, Jane. He does not appear to have published any thing in his lifetime; but after his death, which happened at Basingstoke, in 1745, a volume of poems was printed by subscription in 1748. Amhurst's 'Terræ Filius' contains some anecdotes of him. His mother died at Winchester, in 1762. His brother, Dr. Joseph Warton, is advantageously known to the world, by his 'Ode to Fancy,' and other ingenious poems in 'Dodsley's Collection,' 'Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope,' 'Translation of the Pastorals and Eclogues of Virgil,' and an edition of the 'Works of Pope,' with notes.

By his quotation from Gray's Ode, in his description of the City College and Cathedral of Winchester, and his Latin poem on Catharine Hill, we learn that he received his education at the seminary over which his brother now presides.

In due time he became a member of Trinity College, Oxford; took the degree of Master of Arts in 1750, of Bachelor of Divinity in 1767; but did not succeed to the Mastership of his college, as might have been expected, when it became vacant in 1776, though he continued to reside in it till his death.

In a life passed within the limits of a college, where the transitions from the study to the common-room, and from thence back to the study, mark the passing day with scarcely any variation, nothing of incident is to be expected, nothing will be found important enough to be recorded. Yet a life thus spent is not to be contemned. The writings of Wharton shew, that one at least has been productive of much entertainment, much usefulness, to the world.

He very early exerted his poetical talents, as may be seen by the dates of his several publications; which may be considered as the principal landmarks in his life.

In 1745, he published Five Pastoral Eclogues; the scenes of which are supposed to lie among the shepherds oppressed by the war in Germany. 4to. These Eclogues have not been collected in his works, and have eluded the diligence of the present writer.

In 1747, he published The Pleasures of Melancholy, written in 1745, 4to, reprinted in 'Dodsley's Collection,' which was followed by The Progress of Discontent, a Poem, written at Oxford in 1746, first printed in 'The Student;' and Newmarket, a Satire, fol. 1750, reprinted in 'Pearch's Collection,' and again in 'Dodsley's Collection.'

At a time when few are capable of distinguishing themselves in any extraordinary degree, he rendered a service to his Alma Mater, which could not but be acceptable.

It is well known that Tory, if not Jacobite principles, were suspected to prevail much in the University of Oxford, about the time of the Rebellion in 1745; and soon after its suppression, the folly and drunken extravagance of several young men belonging to one of the colleges, gave offence to the friends of the House of Hanover, in a manner which occasioned a prosecution in the Court of King's Bench, and a stigma on the Vice-Chancellor and some of the heads of houses.

In 1748, while this matter was the subject of conversation, Mr. Mason published his 'Isis, an elegy,' in which, after celebrating the worthies she formerly boasted, she laments her degenerate sons, that,

..... madly bold
To Freedom's foes infernal orgies hold.

In answer to Mr. Mason's elegy, which was much applauded, and with great reason, at the time of its publication, Warton published his 'Triumph of Isis, an elegy, 4to, 1749, which was equally deserving of praise. His eulogium on Dr. King is particularly worthy of notice. It was reprinted in Pearch's Collection.

It is remarkable, that though neither Mason or Warton ever excelled these performances, each of them, as by consent, when he first collected his poems into a volume, omitted his own party production.

In 1751, he published An Ode for Music, performed at the Theatre, Oxford, July 2. 1751, being the day appointed by the late Lord Crew, Bishop of Durham, for the commemoration of the benefactors of the university, 4to. In this Ode, Minerva, after having assisted Queen Bouduca in a battle, is feigned to request drink of the river Isis, and, in reward of the favour, to promise that her banks shall become the seat of learning, and the pride of Britain.

In 1753, he published The Union, or Select Scots and English Poems, 12mo.

These were only the lighter productions of Warton's genius. In 1753, he published Observations on the Faery Queen of Spenser, 8vo, which he corrected and enlarged in 2 vols, 12mo, 1762. He sent a copy of the first edition to Dr. Johnson, which he acknowledged in a letter to him, dated July 16. 1754, containing the following merited compliment: 'I now pay you a very honest acknowledgment for the advancement of the literature of our native country. You have shown to all who shall hereafter attempt the study of our ancient authors, the way to success, by directing them to the perusal of the books which these authors had read. Of this method Hughes, and men much greater than Hughes, seem never to have thought. The reason why the authors, which are yet read, of the sixteenth century, are so little understood, is, that they are read alone, and no help is borrowed from those who lived with them, or before them.'

Some time before, he seems to have taken orders, and to have become Fellow of his College; for, in his notes on Dr. Johnson's letter, preserved by Mr. Boswell, he mentions his design of publishing a volume of 'Observations on the best of Spenser's Works,' being hindered by his taking pupils. 'I am glad of your hindrance in your Spenserian design,' Dr. Johnson writes him, Nov. 28. 1754, 'yet I would not have it delayed.'

At this time his friend Collins was at Oxford, on a visit to him; but labouring under the most deplorable languor of body, and dejection of mind. 'Poor dear Collins!' says Dr. Johnson, 'would a letter give him any pleasure? I have a mind to write.' Soon after he writes him: 'I had lately a letter from your brother, with some account of poor Collins, for whom I am much concerned. I have a notion, that by very great temperance, or more properly abstinence, he may yet recover.'

In February 1755, he procured for Dr. Johnson the degree of Master of Art, by diploma, from the University of Oxford; which was considered as an honour of considerable importance, in order to grace the title-page of his Dictionary, which came out soon after.

In 1756, he published a pamphlet, intitled, The Observer Observed, 8vo, on the publication of Upton's 'Spenser.' This year he was elected by the university, Poetry Professor, on the death of Mr. Hawkins; which office he held the usual term of ten years.

In 1758, when Dr. Johnson began the 'Idler,' he gave his assistance, and contributed Nos. 33. 93. and 96. The same year he published Inscriptionum Metricarum Delectus, Accedunt Notulae, 4to, 1758, and wrote A Panegyric on Ale, printed in Dodsley's 'Collection.'

About this time he published A Description of the City College and Cathedral of Winchester, exhibiting a complete and comprehensive detail of their antiquities and present state, 8vo, without date or name.

In 1760, he contributed the Life of Sir Thomas Pope to the 5th volume of the 'Biographia Britannica.'

The year following, he published The Life and Literary Remains of Ralph Bathurst, M. D. Dean of Wells, and President of Trinity College, Oxford, 8vo. In the Life of Dr. Bathurst, he has supplied some defects, and rectified some mistakes in the account given of him in the 'Biographia Britannica.'

NEW AMERICAN EDITIONS OF THE CLASSICS.

Quid studiosa cohors operum struit hoc quoque curo.
Hor. Epist. ad Julium Florum.

The Proprietors of the Classic Press in this city, determined to publish American editions of the finest authors of antiquity, and such standard school books, as are in general use and celebrity, have commenced their labours with the Commentaries of Julius Cæsar.

In exhibiting this edition, the first care of the Proprietors was to print it, as correctly as possible. The next object was to render the book cheap and portable, by rejecting all extraneous and superfluous matter, and, by a careful choice and arrangement of type, to present a lucid page, not merely honourable to the Printer, but perspicuous to the student.

Of the choice of their Author, the Proprietors may speak with still more confidence. The purity of Cæsar's latinity, the sweet simplicity of his style, the artlessness, clearness, and modesty of his narratives have been themes of eulogy among the best critics in every succeeding age. He was not only the most valiant General, but the finest scholar of his time; and his bright and voluble periods, flow like the river, which he describes, incredibili lenitate, with surpassing gentleness. It is said that by a rare union of different abilities he excelled at once, in the elegance of polite letters, and in the severer department of military science. As an orator Cicero places him in the first rank, and Quintilian affirms he would have rivalled Cicero, had he devoted his abilities to the tribunal. He was even more attune than Cicero. So extensive was the capacity of this versatile commander, that he found both time and inclination to write two books dedicated to a consummate orator, on the arid topics of Grammatical analogy; and such was his ardour for astronomy that Lucan makes him say of himself,

.....media inter prælia semper
Stellarum cœlique plagis superisque vacavi.

His COMMENTARIES, the fairest monument of his literary renown, are, according to Dr. Knox, evidently formed on the model of the Anabasis of Xenophon. Their language is pure, and of such ease and perspicuity, all readers have unanimously compared it to a beautiful brook, whose surface is smooth, and whose waters are pellucid. He has nothing lurid or gorgeous, but always expresses himself, with the useful plainness of a man of business, and the frank simplicity of a soldier. Yet, as an elegant writer has remarked, with all the gracefulness of modesty, he has an air of grandeur, which commands respect; and, ornament would have been contemptible deform in comparison with his majestic air, ostentatious mity.

It may be observed of Cæsar as it has been observed of his Greek prototype, that no author has been more universally approved. Yet his writings display no extraordinary appearance of splendour or majesty; nothing elevated or adorned with figures; no affectation of superfluous ornament. His merit is an unaffected sweetness, which no affectation can obtain. The Graces seem to have conspired to form the beautiful texture of his composition. Yet, perhaps, a common reader would neglect him, because the easy and natural air of his narrative rouses no violent emotion. But more refined understandings peruse him with delight. His style, says Cicero is sweeter than honey, and the Muses themselves seem to have spoken from his mouth.

It is affirmed by Mr. Gibbon that we are in want of a good life of Cæsar. But though his Biography may have been imperfectly written, yet the leading incidents are so notorious that no repetition of their History seems necessary.

In perusing his Commentaries on the Gallic and civil wars we feel, says Urquhart, a considerable interest from the circumstance of his relating events which himself was personally concerned, and in the account of which he has always been acquitted of partiality. He is circumstantial in the detail of facts, and he is scrupulously delicate, in attributing to himself the merit he deserves. No one can be placed in a higher class as a credible Historian. TO HAVE FOUGHT AND TO HAVE WRITTEN SO WELL, HAS HAPPENED TO NONE BUT CÆSAR. His style is formed on that of Xenophon, and it possesses all the plainness and perspicuity of his model. It is the purest Latin, elegant without affectation, and beautiful without ornament. Where eloquence is required, Cæsar is always eloquent, for he was an orator before he became an author.*

If his Commentaries be considered only as notes or outlines of an history, what would have been the admiration of the literary world, had the author completed his work since the first draught exhibits, the general, the orator, the historian, and the scholar.

EDUCATION.

[The ensuing eloquent exhortation to the practice of what is most praiseworthy in nature and in life, is from the pen of the classical scholar who governs and instructs the first academy in Philadelphia. The doctrine and discipline of the Rev. Mr. ABERCROMBIE will be long held in grateful remembrance by his pupils; and the Editor would not be less careless of the essential interests of learning, than of the reputation of his learned friend, if it were not in this place distinctly asserted, that no school of English education, more useful to the middle and mercantile classes, has been hitherto attempted, than that, which is so judiciously pursued, in the seminary of which Mr. ABERCROMBIE has the direction.]

A CHARGE, DELIVERED AFTER A PUBLIC EXAMINATION, ON FRIDAY, JULY 27, 1804, TO THE SENIOR CLASS IN THE PHILADELPHIA ACADEMY, UPON THEIR HAVING COMPLETED THE COURSE OF STUDY, ENJOINED BY THAT INSTITUTION.

YOUNG GENTLEMEN,

Having conducted you through the course of study, prescribed by this institution, I consider it a duty, incumbent upon me, to offer to you a few sentiments, respecting the prosecution of your studies, and your future conduct through life. Sentiments suggested by a pleasing recollection of our past intercourse, and an affectionate anxiety for your future welfare.

Your minds have been, in some degree, illuminated and expanded by the first rays of science: they are yet to be invigorated and matured, by the same genial and exhilarating influence.

Those branches of knowledge, to which your attention has been particularly directed in this seminary, form, in my opinion, the outlines of a complete English education, accommodated to the circumstances of the country of which you are natives, and in which you will probably continue to be residents; whether the objects of commerce be your professional pursuit, or those of what are called the learned professions. In either case, the groundwork of a correct education should be formed of ENGLISH LITERATURE; and the arrangement, which has been accordingly adopted, though peculiar to this seminary, will, I doubt not, when time and experience have gradually overcome the prejudices, inspired by long established customs, receive the approbation of those, who are best qualified to judge of its merit and operation.

By Grammar you have been taught the nature, power, and construction of the English language; and that, not in a superficial manner, but by the most comprehensive system now extant, the larger Grammar of Mr. Lindley Murray, in which the delicacies, refinements, and peculiarities of our language are inculcated and exemplified, under the authority of Harris, Johnson,

The elegance of his language, says Dr. Knox, was the peculiar excellence, which distinguished him as an orator. If he had transmitted his best orations down to posterity, Cicero would not have stood, alone at the head of Roman orators. Cicero himself generously extols him, and thinks him equal to those who had made the study of eloquence the business of their lives.

Lowth, Priestly, Beattie, Sheridan, Walker, and other eminent writers, upon that subject.

After being made acquainted with the nature and power of words, and the necessary agreement and disposition of them, in a well constructed sentence, your attention was directed to the principles of Composition, or the correct disposition of sentences, so as to form discourse. In other words, the proper mode of conveying your ideas clearly to the minds of others, and, at the same time, of clothing them in an advantageous dress. Here you were taught the qualities and different species of Style, the various ornaments of which, languages are capable, and the established rules of Composition.

Having thus considered the matter of which language is composed, you were led to consider the manner, in which it is to be communicated to others with grace, propriety, energy, and ease. Your epitome of Elocution consequently comprised the art of Reading and the art of Speaking, including the management of the different inflexions of the human voice, the proper use of accent, emphasis, and pauses, and the power of expression, communicated by tones, looks, and gesture.

After thus endeavouring to make you acquainted with the principles of language, and the first method of delivering it, whether by reading or public speaking, it appeared proper that you should, in some degree, be made acquainted with the nature of the objects, which surround you, the construction of the earth, or those substances of which it is composed, its productions, inhabitants, and the atmosphere, which surrounds it. Information upon these subjects was obtained from the compend of Natural History.

Geography, or a knowledge of this 'great globe, which we inhabit,' its position in the solar system, the relative situation of the countries into which it is divided, their boundaries, rivers, towns, &c. formed another important object for your investigation.

But your attention has not been confined to externals alone, the powers and faculties of the human mind have been laid open to you, by a short though comprehensive epitome of Logic, in which its powers of apprehending, reasoning, judging, and methodizing its thoughts are displayed in the most easy and familiar manner: and though a minute acquaintance, with so abstruse a subject, could not be expected at so early a period of life as yours, yet the outlines of the science are useful, in giving you general ideas of the nature and operation of our intellectual faculties.

Your instruction in these important and necessary branches of English literature has been accompanied by daily application to reading, writing, arithmetic; and by those who were sufficiently advanced, and desirous of being made acquainted with them, merchants' accounts, and the elements of the mathematics.

To complete the system, and give dignity and solidity to its operation, the preservation and improvement of your morals has been, I flatter myself, effected by daily opening and closing the hours of tuition with an address to ALMIGHTY GOD, the source and fountain of wisdom, and the giver of every good gift; and with reading a portion of His holy word alternately from the Old and New Testament. These, together with the recital of your respective Catechisms, and a lecture upon some leading principles of Christianity every Saturday, not only communicated religious instruction, but had a tendency to keep alive in your minds a constant sense of the omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence of God.

Though such and so various have been your literary pursuits, yet you are, by no means, to rest satisfied with your present acquisitions.

* His talents as an orator, and his sagacity as a philosopher, were justly esteemed by his Contemporaries.

The most direct and certain road to the temple of fame is that, which leads through the gardens of literature, which you have indeed now entered: but you have only passed as it were the portal; their spacious avenues and most enchant-bowers are yet to be explored; and they will, I trust, be ranged and examined by you, with redoubled ardour, with more unwearied and closer application, and with increasing satisfaction and delight. For the farther you advance, the more powerful will be your conviction, 'that the ways of wisdom are ways of pleasantness, and that all her paths are peace.' 'Happy,' said Solomon, who was the wisest of men, 'happy is the man, that findeth wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding; for the merchandise of it is better, than the merchandise of silver, and the gain thereof than fine gold. She is more precious than rubies, and all the things thou canst desire, are not to be compared unto her; length of days is in her right hand, and, in her left hand, riches and honour. She is a tree of life, to them who lay hold upon her, and happy is every one who retaineth her.'

'Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom, and, with all thy getting, get understanding.'

Let the acquisition, therefore, of knowledge be the leading object of your attention and pursuit. Remember that your future enjoyment of life, your usefulness and respectability in society, and the formation of your respective characters depend altogether upon the proper employment, or neglect of the present period of your age. Time is a talent committed to us, for improvement, by the great author of our existence, for which we are accountable to him; and to every station, to every progressive age of man, peculiar duties are attached. To youth belongs, among others, that of assiduous exertion to cultivate the understanding in 'the spring time of life,' and induce, by constant application, such habits of study, as will qualify them to undertake, and enable them easily and successfully to encounter the peculiar difficulties attendant upon that profession, which they may make choice of, when emancipated from the fetters of a school. Resolve, then, wisely resolve, to let no day or hour pass by you unimproved. Now is the season, in which you have an opportunity of acquiring such an inestimable store of useful knowledge, as will excite the admiration, respect, and esteem of the wise, the virtuous, and the good, with whom you may associate, or who may be informed of your literary acquisitions: and you will thereby render your reception into general society in the highest degree honourable and satisfactory. The rapid flight of time cannot possibly be checked; nor can any portion of it, which is past, be recalled. What value, what importance should this consideration give to the present moment? Most particularly should it be prized by you, who have now the opportunity of devoting your whole attention, all the opening powers of your minds, solely to the attainment of learning. As you advance in age, the unavoidable cares, and serious anxieties, which an intercourse with the world gives birth to, will interrupt your eager pursuit of knowledge, and embitter that pure enjoyment of studious leisure, which is now your peculiar privilege. Having ceased to be children, you should cease to speak, to understand, to think, or to act as children; and now, that you are verging towards manhood, you should 'put away childish things.' To this you should be impelled, not only by a regard for your own interest and honour, but from a just sense of that high degree of duty, which you owe to your parents, who have hitherto affectionately cherished and supported you, to whom you are indebted for all the advantages of education, and who are anxiously solicitous for your future welfare.

You will, I am confident, neither so far neglect yourselves, nor disregard their happiness, as to disappoint their ardent and affectionate wishes. To this end, endeavour to render yourselves distinguished by a uniform and unremitting ardour in the pursuit of knowledge, by diligent application to the studies you may be engaged in, and by never suffering the allurements of pleasure or amusement to beguile you of those hours, which should be devoted to your daily progress in improvement.

Let your deportment be marked by a polite and respectful behaviour to all. Let nothing ever induce you to deviate, either in language or conduct, from the dignified character of Gentlemen. Endeavour to perform every thing you do, of however trivial a nature, in the best manner possible, and carefully guard against an accumulation of duty, by deferring till to-morrow, what should be done to-day.

Guard your morals vigilantly; remember that you are just entering upon the most dangerous path in the journey of human life; it is surrounded by the quicksands of Vice, which, at every step, endanger your safety; while the siren enticements of sensuality solicit your attention, and eagerly court your acceptance. But beware of their fascinating charms; they are false and delusive, treacherous and vain, and will, if favourably regarded, seduce you from the road of virtue, and inevitably 'lure you to destruction.'

Above all, study to recommend yourselves to the peculiar favour and blessing of God, by an ardent attachment to Religion, and a strict observance of the duties it enjoins. Diligently read the Holy Scriptures; they are able to make you wise unto ETERNAL SALVATION—Attend regularly to public worship. Offer up your prayers, morning and evening, to your Almighty Creator, Preserver, and Benefactor, imploring His mercy, and His grace—Cherish in your minds a constant sense of His all-seeing eye; that it regardeth all your thoughts, words, and actions. Remember that you must one day die: how soon you know not—that all those thoughts, words, and actions, are registered in Heaven; that you will be called upon to answer for them at the awful day of judgment, and that your happiness or misery in the world of spirits, to which we are all rapidly hastening, will depend upon the nature of your conduct here.

Adhere inviolably, under any circumstances, to the strictest truth. Let not fear, vanity, or any other motive, ever induce you to tell a lie. It is unmanly, ungentlemanly, and impiously wicked. Let no profane communication proceed out of your mouth; and never mention the sacred name of God, but with devout reverence and respect.

Carefully obey your parents in all things, however contrary their requisitions may be to your own inclinations; for be assured, the promotion of your real interest and happiness constitutes their motive of action; and their experience and knowledge of the world, of which you are yet altogether ignorant, enable them to judge what is best, while the powerful impulse of natural affection will always lead them to dictate such things only, as will ultimately tend to your highest advantage.

With the expression of these sentiments, I bid you an affectionate farewell; and, in testimony of my approbation of your diligence and attention, since you have been entrusted to my tuition, I shall now present you with that public attestation of your merit, to which you have proved yourselves to be justly entitled.

The following is a copy of the certificate given:

In testimony of the zeal and industry, with which A. B. has pursued, and the honourable proficiency which he has attained in, the studies of Grammar, Writing, Arithmetic, Composition, Elocution, Natural History, Geography, and Logic, in the Philadelphia Academy, under my tuition, of which he has given proof, by a public examination, this day.

And also, in testimony of my affectionate regard, and sincere wishes for his future prosperity and usefulness, I have granted him these presents. Dated at Philadelphia, the twenty-seventh day of July, Anno Domini, 1804.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The following respectful notice of a fashionable song, from a favourite author, was first published in an English Miscellany.

Oh Lady Fair, a ballad, for three voices, dedicated to the Right Honourable Lady Charlotte Rawdon. The words and music by Thomas Moore, Esq. The words of this ballad are written in a simple unaffected style, and the music, though it bears evident marks of the amateur, is natural, easy, and by no means unexpressive. The story is carried on in dialogue, and the Dramatis Personae, if we may so express ourselves, is well preserved in the distribution of the melody among the several voices, which are ultimately blended in the harmonization of the air, and by which an effect is produced highly advantageous to the composition.

We understand that Mr. Moore's bookseller is preparing for publication a very elegant collection of his musical works. This harmonious volume, the sweet performance of one, who is in a double sense the son of Apollo, will be very eagerly sought for, not only by British, but American amateurs.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

From 'The office of the Classic Press' we may soon expect a number of valuable books, which we have reason to believe have been judiciously chosen, and which we understand that Mr. POYNTELL and his partners have spared no reasonable expense to exhibit correctly. From our knowledge of the liberal fortune, liberal objects, and good judgment of Mr. Poyntell, we are justified in strong assurances to the public, that the works his company propose to publish will be those perennial productions, which adulescentiam alunt, senectutem oblectant.

Messrs. Manning and Morse, have published a most beautiful edition of Dr. Blair's Lectures on Rhetoric, which if it has not gained, has fairly deserved the prize. The materials of this American edition of a most useful author, are of the best quality, and the workmanship will bear a very scrupulous examination.

Mr. James Humphreys, who is always alert to obtain interesting books from England, and always indefatigable in reprinting them, has just published Dr. Wittman's Travels in Turkey, Asia Minor, Syria, and across the Desert into Egypt, during the years 1799, 1800, and 1801, in company with the Turkish army, and the British Military mission. This book is pleasant to the miscellaneous reader from its variety of anecdotes, and curious to the Bible reader from the information which it conveys respecting the present state of the Holy land.

Messrs. CONRADS, who appear to us constantly industrious, enterprising, and liberal, have just published Vol. I, of Pinkerton's Geography, a system, which will undoubtedly supersede the use of all prior compilations in this science. We have carefully examined the maps and the typography. The first from their novel design, and neatness of execution are highly honourable to the engraver, and the last from the press of Mr. Maxwell, is correct and beautiful. Mr. Pinkerton has been happily styled, the modern Strabo, and we find in Arthur Aikin's Annual Review, the following high testimonial of the talents of our geographer.

To our Statistical knowledge of the earth, Mr. Pinkerton's Geography is a contribution worthy of the country, of the age, and of the prophetic expectations of Gibbon. The research displayed is ubiquitary, the materials are judiciously proportioned, the antiquarian comments are full of originality, and the practical suggestions full of good sense.

S. Stansbury, of New-York, has printed a neat edition of FLEISCHER's famous Hudibrastic poem, carefully revised by the Author, with additional notes. This book is a banquet to the Literary epicures, who sit down with avidity to a feast, so highly seasoned; with Wit and Drollery for the attendants.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

It is not strange that no law has yet been made sufficiently strong to repress the practice of duelling. While men are solicitous for the esteem of their associates, however unpleasant it may be to confess the fact, the usage will continue. Courage has always been considered as the property of a noble mind, and with the least imputation of cowardice has always been connected disgrace and the scorn of mankind. The legislator will enact laws and descant on the pernicious practice, the same man, in a private relation, while he laments the individual mischief which it may occasion, gives the culprit his esteem. The matter is viewed in this light by four fifths of mankind. We declaim against the injury which it occasions, and at the same time we feel that we respect the man who is willing to deposit his life to defend his honour. While men cherish these sentiments, while no law can be made, which shall have annexed to it a penalty more disgraceful than the refusal of a challenge, it is idle to attempt to prevent it. Dr. Goldsmith, the well known author of the Vicar of Wakefield, (a work which every man should make his Vade mecum) gives a very just and lively idea of a conflict between this instinctive sense of honour and the suggestions of prudence, in the lecture of Sir William Thornhill to his nephew. The old gentleman, as a magistrate, commends him for his refusal to accept a challenge from the injured son of the vicar, and observes to him, 'you have acted in this instance, perfectly well, though not quite as your father would have done. My brother, indeed, was the soul of honour; but thou—' He here represses a sensation which it would be imprudence in him to avow, and proceeds, 'yes, you have acted in this instance perfectly right and it meets my warmest approbation.' These observations are not intended to defend a practice so prevalent, but as an analysis of the general sense of mankind on the subject.

[Farmer's Museum.]

Religious indifference, it has been said, is the fatal characteristic of the present age. It may be added, that political apathy, is the cardinal vice, in this country, of those, who profess themselves auxiliaries to government.

An account of a July celebration is thus headed by a distich, worthy the abilities of a bellman.

'This day, this very day gave birth
Perhaps to the greatest empire upon earth.'

These lays are certainly not inferior in sublimity to

'The princess steeped by chance into the mire,
—And dries her stockings at the kitchen fire.'

—From the mass of toasts, which were given on the commemoration of our political birth day, we could find but few, free from triteness of expression, or absurdity of thought. One would suppose that many were actually composed after the sixteen bumpers had been swallowed.

A gentleman lately boasting in London of the quickness of his sight, said, by way of confirming his remark, 'that he saw, at that moment, a mouse on the top of the monument.' 'I cannot say I see it,' replied a sneering and incredulous friend, 'but I plainly hear it run.'

In a late miscellany, conducted by a good man, and a profound scholar, the old and established English reviews are called with great justice 'admirable literary almanacks,' condensing into the narrowest compass much curious, important, and often original information.

That was an elegant compliment paid by Captain Topham to a Persian ambassador. As the latter was shewing the many wounds he had received in the wars with the Turks, the Captain said, that his Excellency's skin would sell for little or nothing, it had so many holes in it.

Mrs. Wrighten being one day rather indisposed with a cold, her husband came into the parlour, when she was practicing an air for Vauxhall, and observing a phiale of physic standing by her, he flung it at her head. Upon which it was drily observed by a punster that Mrs. W. was singing, and Mr. W. only accompanied her with the viol.

The following independent Uinam for the prosperity of an independent author is worthy of the spirit of the late high minded, and regretted BURNS.

I will not present you with the unmeaning compliments of the season, but I will send you my warmest wishes, and most ardent prayers, that Fortune may never throw your subsistence on the mercy of a knave, or set your character on the judgement of a fool; but that UPRIGHT AND ERRECT, you may walk to an honest grave, where men of letters shall say here lies one, who did honour to Science, and men of worth shall say, here lies one, who did honour to human nature.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

Gratitude is due to our numerous correspondents for the ingenious communications, which we now almost daily receive. Our files are often filled with essays both literary and political, of more than ordinary merit. This we think a decisive omen of the approbation of men of principle, reading, and leisure.

Seldom have we had occasion to commend a more true, forcible, manly and well-reasoned essay, than that of 'Lucullus.' The statements and deductions of this writer exhibit both the fairness of candour and the solemnity of truth. To the lukewarm party on the one hand, and to flagitious rogues and swindlers on the other, the remarks of a bold, sensible and honest man will sound both harsh and hateful. But they 'will discourse sweet music' to the lover of the true interest of America; to the man of honour and high mind; to him, who is far elevated above the vile mire of avarice, and who disdains to cheat even a rival or a foe.

The subject to which 'A' has directed our attention, has not escaped us. We shall give to that topic a very undissipated attention.

'Philo's' statement will be examined. If his assertions can be verified, we shall not hesitate a moment to impart them to the public.

'A Fact' may be very true, but is very dull. We may not tax the memory, and tease the patience of our readers with a barren recital, as void of beauty as of use.

The pointed essay of 'D' is of the very essence of a libel.

His plea is good, but still I say, beware! Laws are explain'd by..... so have a care. It stands on record, that in Richard's times A man was hang'd for very honest rhymes. Consult the statute..... Quart: I think it is 'Edwardi Sext,' or 'prim et quint Eliz.' See libels. Satires.....here you have it, read... Libels and satires.....lawless things indeed.

'Antiquarius,' instead of aspiring to climb the tree of knowledge, and gather, if not its fairest fruit, at least its wholesome leaves, ignominiously chooses to grovel below among the very chips and sawdust of literature.

The various gay and sportive writers, who furnish us with witty ode and epigram, at the expense of the jacobins, are entitled to our particular thanks. Nothing wounds a malignant democrat more, than the keen javelin of wit. The popular ballad is an admirable vehicle for satirizing knaves and fools. Horace well describes the terrors of the.....tota concubitor urbe.....and we exhort each trembling catiff of the democrats to remember,

Whoe'er offends at some unlucky time,
Slides into verse, or hitches in a rhyme,
Sacred to ridicule his whole life long,
And the sad burden of some merry song.

We are sorry that some of the best correspondents of the Lounger, prove themselves genuine relations of his family, by their habitual indolence. We hope, that even in the dog-days, these idlers will keep their eyes open long enough to write sometimes a brief essay.

'Lorenzo' reminds us of.

Hoc opus hoc studium parvi properemus et ampli,
Si patrix volumus, si nobis vivere cari.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE TEAR.

Sacred boon of favouring Heaven,
Test of reason, pearly tear,
In some bounteous moment given,
Soothing anguish most severe.

Melting child of mute affliction,
Misery's due, and feeling's gem,
Precious pledge of pure affection,
Fairest flower of pity's stem;

Reconcilement's sweet oblation,
Healing the distemper'd heart;
Friendship's dearest, best libation,
Balm of every anxious smart.

Oh! how near ally'd to sorrow
Are our transports most sincere!
Even delight is forc'd to borrow
Feeling's rich, expressive tear.

Humid eyes, that softly languish,
What do your full orbs declare?
Dew drop, formed of hope and anguish,
Love himself has plac'd thee there.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

EXCESS.

By M. G. LEWIS, Esq. M. P.

While so various our faculties, passions, and views,
How comes it so few can true happiness find?
'Tis because man, whate'er be the course he pursues,
Still aims to be more, than what nature design'd.
'Tis because with contempt moderation we see,
To be wise, happy, great, or good, none ever tries;
But, with ceaseless exertion, all labour to be Too great, or too happy, too good, or too wise.

To be man and no more, man should limit his care,
And hold the mid station 'twixt angel and brute;
Active virtue composing his every day's wear,
And harmless enjoyment his holiday suit.
But while, moderation despising, we strive
In pleasure, or virtue, perfection to gain,
From excess to excess thro' life's ocean we drive,
And the harbour of happiness seldom attain.

Some, holding that man but exists to enjoy,
Bid their days, wing'd with rapture, voluptu-
ously fly;
Others, finding that libertine pleasures soon cloy,
Reject the delight which their senses supply.
Like maniacs, the first wildly riot along;
Forlorn, to the last, seems their earthly abode:
Both fly to extremes; find, too late, they were wrong,
And have miss'd the true blessings, which chequer life's road.

The hermit, with man and with nature at strife, Shunning pleasure, and, careless who sink, or who swim,
Leads, alone and inactive, a dull selfish life,
Neither useful to others, nor pleasing to him.
Nor e'er by such cold flinty hearts can be prov'd
That sunshine which cheers his benevolent
breast,

Who, by loving his neighbour, has made himself
lov'd,
And, in blessing another, can make himself
blest!

The rake, from all conscience and prejudice
free'd,
God and man in pursuit of enjoyment defies;
Though prudence may warn him, tho' virtue may plead,
Invited by pleasure, still onward he flies.
But ne'er tastes the Libertine's lip that sweet
stream,
Unsullied, which flows in life's chrystalline bowl,
When love joins with nature, with passion esteem,
And the senses scarce equal in rapture the soul.

Despis'd be the hermit, detested the rake;
The last is a villain, the first is a fool:
Not theirs be the lives which for models I take;
Not theirs be the maxims my conduct to rule.
I aim not at virtues for man too sublime;
I'll pervert not my pleasures, by vicious excess;
But, while beauty and wine aid the progress of time,
May honour and sense their encroachment repress.

When remorse with my kisses its poison would blend,
May beauty's soft bosom ne'er rest upon mine;
When the grape proves my tyrant, no longer
my friend,
O lips, may I ne'er again bathe you in wine!
But, when fellow feelings have made my heart
melt,
Or my spirits are sunk by the pressure of
care,
May Love give me thanks, that for others I've felt,
And wine give me strength my own sorrows
to bear.

Let Honour the pleasures I covet approve;
Or never by me shall those pleasures be tried;
Let the kiss I solicit be granted by love;
Or still to my lips may that kiss be denied!
And when, for my sorrows a solace to find,
I bid in my goblet Champagne sparkle high,
May each globe on its surface recal to my mind
A tear, drawn by kindness from gratitude's eye.

TIBULLUS.

Loud sung the wind in the ruins above,
Which murmur'd the warnings of time o'er our head,
While fearless we offer'd devotions to love,
The rude rock our pillow, the rushes our bed!

Damp was the chill of the wintry air,
But it made us cling closer, and warmly unite;
Dread was the lightning, and horrid its glare,
But it show'd me my Julia in languid delight.

To my bosom she nestled, and felt not a fear,
Though the shower did beat, and the tempest
did frown,
Her sighs were as sweet, and her murmurs as
dear
As if she lay lull'd on a pillow of down.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

By THOMAS MOORE, Esq.
ELEGIAC STANZAS.

Supposed to be written by Julia, on the death of her brother.

Though sorrow long has worn my heart,
Though every day I've counted o'er,
Has brought a new and quickening smart
To wounds that rankled fresh before.

Though in my earliest life bereft
Of many a link, by nature tied;
Though Hope deceiv'd, and Pleasure left;
Though friends betray'd, and foes belied;

I still had hopes—for hope will stay
After the sunset of delight,
So like the star, which ushers day,
We scarce can think it heralds night!

I hop'd, that, after all its strife,
My weary heart at length should rest,
And, fainting from the waves of life,
Find harbour in a brother's breast.

That brother's breast was warm with truth,
Was bright with honour's purest ray;
He was the dearest, gentlest youth—
Oh! why then was he torn away?

He should have stay'd, have linger'd here
To calm his Julia's every woe;
He should have chas'd each bitter tear,
And not have caus'd those tears to flow.

We saw his youthful soul expand
In blooms of Genius, nurs'd by Taste;
While Science, with a fostering hand,
Upon his brow her chaplet plac'd.

We saw his gradual op'ning mind
Enrich'd by all the graces dear;
Enlighten'd, social, and refin'd,
In friendship firm, in love sincere.

Such was the youth we lov'd so well,
Such were the hopes, that fate denied—
We lov'd, but ah! we could not tell
How deep, how dearly, till he died!

Close as the fondest links could strain,
Twin'd with my very heart he grew;
And by that fate, which breaks the chain,
The heart is almost broken too.

EPIGRAM.

So long yon virgin has surviv'd her prime,
Her heart seems chill'd by the cold hand of
time,
The softer passions long have lost their power,
Scandal and cards waste now each joyless hour;
She, who by charms has ceas'd to wound the heart,
At reputation points the envenom'd dart;
And, in the gamester's skill profoundly school'd,
Our love she wins not—but she wins our gold.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 98.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

I NEVER once had an idea that I was a poet, till the other day, when I got a very pretty book to read, and found, that the author and I felt exactly alike. I always thought that to make verses, and them like, was right down hard; but it an't so at all. You wouldn't, perhaps, believe it, sir, but I declare I can write as fast as any of your correspondents; besides, what I write is so vastly natural, that I'm sure you'll like it. I'm sure its better than writing about things one don't understand. However, as it an't right to say too much for one's self, you shall have a specimen of my abilities.

A LYRICAL BALLAD.*

"Oh! could I put it into rhyme,
A most delightful tale pursuing!"

It was last night, dear brother Jim, (1)
Last night it was, as I may say,
Just when the watchmen lit their lamps,
To make the night like day.

It was last night when I did go,
All by myself towards the dock;
And it might be, but I'm not sure,
Just about eight o'clock.

It was last night, when I walk'd forth, (2)
All by myself, down Second-street,

* As I shall probably be accused of borrowing from a much admired author, I think, Mr. Saunter, that I may as well be beforehand with the critics, and acknowledge my having taken some hints from the following passages, which may be found in the writings of the celebrated Mr. W. Wordsworth.

[1] 'A simple child, dear brother Jim.' [Vol. 1. p. 110.]
[2] I believe no caviller will object to the repetition of its being last night, for this not only makes the thing narrated much more certain, but it is also the true ballad style, witness the following:

'My little boy, which like you more,
I said, and took him by the arm.' &c.
'And tell me had you rather be,
I said, and held him by the arm.' &c.
'In careless mood he looked at me,
While still I held him by the arm.' &c. [Ib. p. 10.]

And afterwards:

'And five times did I say to him
Why! Edward, tell me why?' [Ib. p. 11.]

And on the right hand way I went,
The right hand of the street.

I was, pasure, in a sweet mood,
And not at all to grief inclin'd,
Tho' well we know, that pleasant thoughts
Bring sad thoughts to the mind. (3)

My walking stick was in my hand,
And by my hand I held it fast,
I took it in my own right hand,
And so right on I past. (4)

It is a right down honest stick,
In truth I've had the stick so long,
'And 'tis so old, 'tis hard to say
If ever it was young. (5)

So on I went, foot after foot, (6)
Not thinking, onward did I go:
For animals that think, we're told,
Move always rather slow. (7)

And I did meet full many folks,
Who walk'd also, and I, alack!
Said how 'twould take a deal of time
For them all to walk back.

And then I thought of them I met,
Perhaps, indeed, there might be some,
Who were not going far away,
And others going home.

And so, thinks I, it may be so,
And on I went right merrily:
For all the lamps shone bright, and I,
In sooth, was full of glee.

When—how those things will come to pass,
When we would not dream of the matter!
Who, in the wonder, should I see,
But one as like, as like can be, (8)
To Molly, drawing water.

She had a pitcher in one hand,
It was—I saw it—made of tin,
Like those upon the shelf at home,
So round, and white, and thin.

[3] 'In that sweet mood, when pleasant thoughts
Bring sad thoughts to the mind.'
[Vol. 1. p. 115.]

[4] 'And fiercely by the arm he took her,
And by the arm he held her fast,
And fiercely by the arm he shook her,
And cried, 'I've caught you then at last!'
[Ib. p. 91.]

[5] 'There is a thorn; it looks so old,
In truth you'd find it hard to say
How it could ever have been young,
It looks so old and grey.' [Ib. p. 117.]

[6] 'The horse mov'd on, hoof after hoof,' &c.
[Vol. 2. p. 51.]

[7] 'But then he is a horse that thinks,
And, when he thinks, his pace is slack.'
[Vol. 1. p. 137.]

[8] 'As like, as like can be.' [Ib. p. 120.]

She stood by them there what d'ye calls,
From which they get the water,
Like pumps, but yet they are not pumps, (9)
That stand beside the gutter.

Them things like—like—I can't tell what,
They splash a body so; in fact,
I guess that they are very like
A mountain cataract. (10)

Them things that gush, gush, gush so much, (11)
And there, as sure as I'm alive,
By her good girls just one, two, three,
And men two, three, four, five. (12)

I gaz'd, and to myself I said, (13)
'Tis Molly! Molly! as I live!' (14)
But how she came there, I'll be hang'd
If I a guess could give.

Yet, though there were so many by,
I was not daunted, not at all;
Tho' passion! but I thought it strange
To see, just there, our Moll.

And so I jostled through the crowd,
Tho' I could scarcely get me through,
And slap'd her on the back, and cried,
'Why, Molly! how d'ye do?'

Oh, brother Jim! you would not guess,
No, I am sure you would not hit
The truth, if you would guess a month. (15)
It was not Moll abit!

No, 'twas some sulky, crabbed tike,
Who quickly turned round—ad switch her!
And, whap, she emptied in my face,
Oh misery! the pitcher. (16)

Well, whap, right in my face it came,
Or in my mouth, which was as bad.

[9] 'Once again I see
Those hedge-rows, hardly hedge-rows.'
[Vol. 1. p. 202.]

[10] 'And foaming like a mountain cataract.'
[Vol. 2. p. 3.]

But, what makes this the more wonderful, is, that it was a horse that foamed so excessively.

[11] 'The owlets hoot, the owlets curr,
And Johnny's lips they burr, burr, burr,' &c.

And again:

'Burr, burr, how Johnny's lips they burr!'
[Vol. 1. p. 156.]

[12] 'And fendish faces, one, two, three.'
[Ib. p. 142.]

I have somewhere else met with a beautiful example of this, which may be termed the numeric style:

'Ha! little nest, I have you fast,
And little birds, one, two, three, four.'

[13] 'I gaz'd and gaz'd, and to myself I said.'
[Vol. 2. p. 181.]

[14] 'Tis Johnny! Johnny! as I live!' [Ib. p. 173.]

[15] 'I guess
The panther in the wilderness
Was not so fair as he.'
'We love you well,
Joanna! as I guess,' &c. &c. &c. [Ib. 155.]

[16] 'Oh misery! Oh, misery!
Oh woe is me! Oh misery!' [Vol. 1. p. 121.]

And made me sputter, sputter, sputter—(17)
Odds me, I felt like mad.

But what was worse than all the rest,
At least as bad, and very Unkind of them, the men and girls
To see me mad, got merry.

The girls, I've said, were one, two, three,
Of men, two, three, four, five, I saw;
The former all laugh'd out te, he!
The latter, haw! haw! haw!

No sooner did they laugh te, he!
Than Dock-street echoed back the sound;
And Second-street replied haw! haw!
And so it went around.

The one still echoing te, he!
The other echoing haw! haw!
Haw! haw! te, he! haw! haw! te, he!
Te, he! haw! haw! haw! haw! (18)

Well, what could I do, brother Jim?
To tarry I had no desire;
So I went home my clothes to dry,
To dry them at the fire.

Well, home I went to dry my clothes,
Which didn't make it any better,
For, as my coat became more dry,
My shirt, alas! grew wetter. (19)

Now, wasn't it a wicked thing,
Only because I thought it Moll,
To throw her water in my face?
—I don't like it at all.

But, may be, I'd not thought it her,
But for that pitcher made of tin,
Like those upon the shelf at home,
So round and white, and thin.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

The orations against Catiline.

When the audacious Catiline appeared unexpectedly in the midst of the assembly of the senate, even in the moment when the consul was giving an account of the conspiracy, who

[17] 'That ever more his teeth they chatter, Chatter, chatter, chatter, still.'
[Vol. 1. p. 85.]

[18] I hope, sir, that nobody will object to my echo. An old schoolmaster told me, not long ago, that Ovid, and Virgil, and Homer, and several such outlandish names, have their echoes; and why, sir, should not I have my echo? Here are five men and three women, all laughing in chorus; and yet they do not, altogether, make as much noise, as has been made by one lady. If any married man doubts this assertion, thus I prove it:

'When I had gaz'd, perhaps two minutes space,
Joanna looking in my eyes, beheld
That ravishment of mine, and laugh'd aloud.
The rock, like something starting from a sleep,
Took up the lady's voice, and laugh'd again:
The ancient woman, seated on Helm-crag,
Was ready with her cavern; Hammar-scar,
And the tall steep of silver. How sent forth
A noise of laughter; southern Loughrigg heard,
And Fairfield answer'd with a mountain tone:
Helvellyn far into the clear blue sky
Carried the lady's voice—old Skiddaw blew
His speaking trumpet;—back out of the clouds
Of Glaramara southward came the voice;
And Kirkstone toss'd it from his misty head.'

[Vol. 2. p. 185.]

[19] 'And as her mind grew worse and worse,
Her body it grew better.'
[Vol. 1. p. 175.]

could have thought that he would have had the impudence to shew himself there? We can conceive it so much the less, as this desperate bravado had no object; that he could not flatter himself, that he could impose by it, either on the senate, or on the consul, and this foolish temerity could not turn but to his confusion. The historian, Sallust, whose testimony cannot be suspected, says, in so many words, 'it was then that Cicero pronounced that eloquent discourse, which he published afterwards.' If there had been any remarkable difference between the discourse pronounced, and that which was written, is it thus that an enemy would have expressed himself? The terms of Sallust are an eulogium so much the less exceptionable, as in the same place there escapes from him a trait of malignity, which betrays his enmity: 'whether,' says he, 'he dreaded the presence of Catiline, or whether he was moved by indignation.' The second motive is so evident, that there is very bad faith in supposing the other. If all the conduct of the consul, equally firm, enlightened, and vigilant, had not sufficiently proved, that he never feared the villain whom he opposed, was it in the midst of the senate, whom the Roman knights surrounded, with their swords in their hands, was it upon the very theatre of his power and authority, that Cicero could be afraid of Catiline? We shall soon see that he feared not even those dangers, which were too manifest, to which his patriotic fortitude exposed him, in future, that he was well acquainted with envy and expected ingratitude, and that he set at defiance the one and the other. Accordingly, in a beautiful work, in which this great soul is faithfully painted, where exaggeration is never connected with grandeur, nor declamation near the sublime, in the tragedy of Rome Saved, Cicero himself appears to have dictated that verse, admirable in its simplicity,

Let us save the Romans, tho' we know them ungrateful.

In fact, to judge correctly of these harangues, of which I shall extract a few passages, we must place before our eyes the state of the republic at that time. The ancient spirit of Rome existed no more: the degradation of their souls had followed the corruption of their manners. Marius and Sylla had shown that the Romans could suffer tyrants, and there were not wanting men, whose ambition and whose hopes were awakened by these examples. The love of liberty and of their country, founded upon equal laws, could no longer subsist with that monstrous power, and those enormous riches, which the conquest of so many countries had placed in the possession of the Romans. Cæsar, already suspected of having had a share in a conspiracy, wounded by the pre-eminence of Pompey, and the prediction which the senate had for him, thought of nothing but reviving the party of Marius. Pompey, without aspiring openly at the tyranny, would have wished that the troubles and disorders produced by the factious spirit, which reigned every where, might reduce the Romans to such a degree, that they might put themselves under his protection, by naming him Dictator. The great ones, to whom the spoils of three quarters of the world could scarcely suffice to assuage their luxury and cupidity, dreaded every thing, which could raise the authority of the laws, and restrain their extortions and robberies. A small number of good citizens, and Cicero at their head, supported the republic, on the brink of ruin, and this was enough to make him the secret or the declared enemy of all, who were interested in the overthrow of the state. In these conjunctures it was that Catiline, whose pretensions to the consulate had been disappointed by Cicero, ruined with debts and debauches, accused of crimes of every kind, and whose impunity proved to what an excess of licence and corruption they had arrived, associates with himself the whole collection of citizens, who were dishonoured like himself, and as destitute of resources, forms the project of setting fire to Rome, and cutting the throats of the whole senate and the principal citizens; sends Mallius, one of the best officers, who had served under Sylla, to excite the veterans, to whom the dictator had distributed lands, and who desired nothing more than a fresh pillage. Mallius forms them into a body of an army between Fesule and Arezzo, and promises to advance towards Rome on the day marked for the massacre and conflagration, to unite with Catiline in putting all to fire and sword, overturn the government, and divide the spoils. These horrid plots began to break out on all sides: the engagements of Mallius with Catiline were not known: it was known that the veterans had taken arms, that the conspirators had intelligence in Preneste, one of the cities that covered Rome. These were not such times as those, when, upon much smaller alarms, they put to death, without form of trial, a Melius, a Cassius, because then the first of laws was the safety of the country. Consternation seized upon Rome: every one exaggerated the danger; and Cicero alone laboured to prevent it. Armed with that decree of the senate, the formulary of which, reserved for extreme dangers, gave to the consuls an extraordinary power, he watched over the safety of the city, fortified the threatened colonies, caused troops to be levied in Italy, opposed to Mallius the few forces they had been able to assemble; for it must be acknowledged that Catiline and the conspirators had chosen the moment the most favourable for their enterprise. There was not in Italy any considerable body of an army: the legions were in Asia, under the orders of Pompey. These circumstances, the alarms already spread, the precautions already taken, all admonished Catiline that it was necessary to precipitate the execution of his plan. He convokes a nocturnal assembly of the most confidential of his accomplices, and gives them his last orders. They were scarcely separated, when Cicero was informed of the whole by Fulvia, the mistress of Curius, one of the conspirators, who, to give himself importance in her eyes, has confided to her the whole detail of the conspiracy. This woman heard it with horror, and went to reveal it to Cicero, who immediately assembled the senate in the temple of Jupiter Stator, well fortified: it was there that Catiline, who was far from suspecting that the consul had learned his last proceedings, dared to present himself. If we were not well informed of the manners of the Romans, and of the history of those times, we should be astonished that the consul had not arrested him: the decree of the senate gave him the power; but he would have revolted the whole body of the nobles, and even many other citizens, jealous to excess of their privileges, if he had made use of all his power, to arrest a patrician, who was not convicted, nor, indeed, accused. Such an extra-judiciary proceeding was then very dangerous. Cicero himself is going to explain the other motives, not less important, which regulated his conduct, and we shall acknowledge, in his vehement apostrophe, the orator, the consul, and the statesman.

'Catiline! how long will you abuse our patience? For what time to come will your fury dare to insult us? At what period will this unbridled audacity stop?... What! Neither the guard which watches through the night upon the Palatine, nor those which are distributed through the whole city, nor the people in alarms, nor the concourse of all the good citizens, nor the choice of this fortified place, where I have convoked the senate, nor even the indignation which you read upon the countenances of all who surround you here, in one word, every thing that you see has not admonished you that your plots are discovered, that they are laid open to day-light, and that they are checked on all sides!—Do you think, that any one of us is ignorant of what you did last night, and the night before it; in what house you assembled your conspirators, and resolutions you have taken! Such are the times we live in!—Such are the manners of this age! The senate is informed of all this, the consul sees it, and yet Catiline still lives!—He lives!—What do I say? He comes into the senate! He takes a seat in the council of the republic!—He marks with his eye those among us whom he has designed for his victims, and we, senators, we believe we have done enough if we avoid the blade, with which he intended to cut our throats!—It is long, Catiline, since the orders of the consul ought to have conducted you to death. If I should order it, at this moment, all that I should have to fear would be, that this justice would appear to be too slow, and not too severe. But I have other reasons to spare you yet longer. You shall not perish, but when there shall not be left a single citizen, however wicked he may be, however abandoned, however resembling yourself, who shall not agree that your death is legitimate. Till then you shall live; but you shall live, as you do at this hour, in such a manner besieged (thanks to my cares) with overseers and guards, in such a manner surrounded with barriers, that you cannot make a single movement, nor a single effort against the republic. Eyes always attentive, ears forever open, shall answer to me for all your proceedings, without your being able to perceive it. And what can you hope for still, when the night can no longer cover your criminal assemblies, when the noise of your conspiracy makes itself heard through the walls, within which you think you are shut up? All that you do is as well known to me, as it is to yourself. Shall I give you a proof? Do you remember that I said in the senate, that before the sixth of the calends of November, Mallius, the minister of your crimes, would have taken arms, and hoisted the standard of rebellion? Well! was I deceived, either concerning the fact, horrible and incredible as it is, or even concerning the day? I had announced, in full senate, the day you had designated for the murder of the senators; do you remember, that on the same day, when several of our principal citizens went out of Rome, much less to avoid your attacks, than to unite against you the forces of the republic; do you remember, that, on that day, I had known how to take such precautions, that it was not possible for you to attempt any thing against us, although you had publicly said, that, notwithstanding the departure of some of your enemies, there still remained for you victims enough? And the very day of the calends of November, when you flattered yourself you should make yourself master of Preneste, did you not perceive that I had taken my measures to put that colony in a state of defence? You cannot take a step, you have not a thought, of which I have not immediate intelligence. Finally, recollect the last night, and you will soon know that I have more vigilance for the safety of the republic, than you have for its ruin. I affirm, that this night you repaired, with a retinue of armourers, to the house of Lecca: Is this plain speaking? That a great number of those wretches, whom you associate with you in your crimes, collected there at the same time. Dare you deny it?—You are silent!—Speak: I can convict you. I see here, in this assembly, several of those who were with you.—Immortal gods!

where are we? in what city, O Heavens! do we live? In what a situation is the republic! Here! even here, among us, conscript fathers, in this council, the most august and the most holy in the universe, are seated those, who meditate the ruin of Rome, and of the empire; and I, the consul, behold them, and ask their opinion; and those, who ought to be dragged to punishment, my voice has not yet attacked! Yes this night, Catiline, it was, in the house of Lecca, that you made a distribution of the posts of Italy, that you named those of your creatures, whom you would take with you, those whom you would leave within these walls, and that you marked the quarters of the city, in which they were to set fire. You fixed the moment of your departure: you said, that the only thing which could detain you was, that I still lived. Two Roman knights offered to disembarass you of me, and promised to cut my throat in my bed, before day. The council of your robbers was not separated, before I was informed of the whole. I put myself in a posture of defence. I ordered the entrance into my house to be refused to those who should present themselves, to visit me, and these were the persons who appeared, whom I had previously named to several of our most respectable citizens, and the hour of their appearance was that which I had foretold."

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF THOMAS WARTON.

In 1761, he contributed to the 'Oxford Collection of Verses,' a poem on the Death of George II. addressed to Mr. Secretary Pitt, and verses on the Marriage of the King, and on the Birth of the Prince of Wales, 1762.

About 1762, he published A Companion to the Guide, and a Guide to the Companion, being a Supplement to all the Accounts of Oxford hitherto published, 12mo, without a date; burlesque on Oxford Guides, and Companions.

His next publication was the Oxford Sausage, or Select Poetical Pieces, written by the most celebrated Wits of the University of Oxford, 12mo, 1764. In this collection, the Newsman's Verses, and several other pieces of pleasantry, were contributed by Warton.

In 1768, he was presented to the Vicarage of Shalfeld, in Wiltshire.

In 1770, he published from the Clarendon Press, Theocriti Syracusii Cum Scholiis Græcis, Historicis Emendationibus et Animadversionibus in Scholia Editoris et Joannis Toupii Glossis selectis ineditis, Indicibus amplissimis. Premittuntur Editoris Dissertatio de Bucolicis Græcorum, Vita Theocriti Ionia Barnesio Scripta, cum nonnullis aliis auctoribus. Accedunt Editoris et variorum Notæ perpetuæ Epistola Joannis Toupii de Syracusii ejusdem addenda in Theocritum necnon Collectiones quindecim Codicum; Oxon. 2. vols, 4to. 'This,' says Dr. Harwood, 'is a very splendid edition; and, after a very careful perusal, I can pronounce it as correct as it is splendid. Every lover of Greek literature is under great obligations to the very learned and ingenious Mr. Warton, for this magnificent edition of Theocritus, and for several other immortal productions. Some additional notes and observations, by way of Appendix to Warton's edition of Theocritus, were published by Mr. Toup in 1772, Cursus Posterioris, sive Appendicula Notarum atque Emendationum in Theocritum Oxonii nuperim publicatum, 4to.

In 1771, he published an improved account of The Life of Sir Thomas Pope, founder of Trinity College, Oxford, chiefly compiled from Original Evidences; with an Appendix of Papers never before published, 8vo. The attention and research which he has lavished in composing the memoirs of the munificent and meritorious founder of Trinity College, evince his gratitude and ability; but it cannot but be considered as an unhappiness that he was called upon by his situation and connections to attend to a subject on which even the vigorous genius of Milton could stamp no considerable value.

The same year he was presented by the Earl of Litchfield to the Rectory of Kiddington, in Oxfordshire, and elected a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries.

In 1774, he gave to the world the first volume of his History of English Poetry, from the close of the eleventh, to the commencement of the eighteenth century; to which are prefixed two Dissertations, on the Origin of Romantic Fiction in Europe, and on the Introduction of Learning into England, 4to. The second volume appeared in 1778, and the third, which is brought down to the commencement of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in 1781. To the third volume is prefixed a third dissertation on the Gesta Romanorum. The fourth and last volume was announced, as 'speedily to be published,' in the end of his edition of Milton's smaller poems 1785, and it is said, a considerable portion of it was actually printed off at the time of his death. It is expected to be completed, and given to the world, with every possible advantage, by his brother, whose abilities, both in poetry and other literary provinces, have justly obtained the full sanction of public applause. A few mistakes and inaccuracies in these volumes were pointed out, with illiberal exaggeration, by Mr. Ritson, a writer of acknowledged, but misapplied talents, in a pamphlet, intitled 'Observations on the three first volumes of the History of English Poetry, in a Familiar Epistle to the author,' 4to, 1782. A vindication of Warton appeared in various communications in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' for 1782 and 1783.

In 1777, he collected his Poems into an 8vo. volume, containing Miscellaneous Pieces, Odes, and Sonnets. In this collection he omitted his Pastoral Eclogues, the Triumph of Isis, Newmarket, a Satire, The Progress of Discontent, and other pieces of humour. The publication may be considered as, in some measures, original, there being only seven pieces that had before appeared, and near three times that number which were then first printed. Alluding to this publication, Mrs. Piozzi, in her entertaining 'Anecdotes of Dr. Johnson,' reports the following conversation: 'Such a one's verses are come out, said I: Yes (replied Johnson) and this frost has struck them in again. Here are some verses I have written to ridicule them; but remember that I love the fellow dearly, now, for all that I laugh at him.'

Whereso'er I turn my view,
All is strange, yet nothing new:
Endless labour all along,
Endless labour to be wrong;
Phrase that time has flung away;
Uncouth words in disarray,
Trick'd in antique ruff and bonnet,
Ode, and elegy, and sonnet.

In 1781, he printed for private use, a few copies of A History of Kiddington Parish 4to, intended as a specimen of a history of Oxfordshire. A second edition was published, 'corrected and enlarged,' for sale, in 1783. This admirable specimen of parochial history, and of his general idea of such history, serves but to make us regret that he had not opportunity to execute more of such a plan. But why regret this exertion of his talents, when his History of Gothic Architecture, which he more than promised in the History of English Poetry, is now, it is to be feared, lost to the world?

In 1782, he engaged, as might be expected, on the side of Chatterton, in the Rowleian controversy, and published An Inquiry into the Authenticity of the Poems attributed to Thomas Rowley; in which the arguments of the Dean of Exeter and Mr. Bryant are examined, 8vo, which bears conviction with every unprejudiced mind. This year he was presented to the donative of Hill Farrance, in Somersetshire.

The same year he published his Verses on Sir Joshua Reynolds's painted Window at New College Oxford, 4to.

In 1785, he was elected Camden Professor of Ancient History, on the resignation of Dr. Scott; and the same year he was made Poet Laureat, on the death of Whitehead.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

Late last evening, as I was amusing myself with the poetry of DRYDEN, the following stanzas struck me as peculiarly applicable to the character of the magnanimous HAMILTON. If, in your opinion, the analogy is easy, and unforced, I shall be glad to see this extract in the Port Folio.

His grandeur he deriv'd from heaven alone;
For he was great ere fortune made him so:
And wars, like mists, that rise before the sun,
Made him but greater seem, not greater grow.

Fortune, that easy mistress to the young,
But to her ancient servants coy and hard,
Him, at that age, her fav'rites rank'd among,
When she her best lov'd Pompey did discard.

Nor died he, when his ebbing fame went less;
But when fresh laurels courted him to live;
He seem'd but to prevent some new success,
As if above what triumphs earth could give.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO..

Wherefore weep, my countrymen? Why this general gloom, which pervades our land—those saddened countenances, we every where behold? HAMILTON is no more!—A ruthless hand has shed his blood—By one cruel blow he has been severed from the world, and America, in tears, bewails her loss! Then weep, my countrymen. Your tears, generously shed to the memory of this first of patriots, bespeak the nobleness of your feelings, and loudly proclaim your grateful remembrance of his deeds and worth.

The spirit of Hamilton has taken its flight! In the mansions of bliss, united to that of our Washington, it rests—and America moans her loss irreparable! Irreparable? Yes—for where can virtue and talents, like Hamilton's, be found? America once might boast his equal. Washington, the friend of Hamilton, was her favourite son. But Washington, like Hamilton, now lies low! 'Again, in gladness and in triumph, they meet,' to enjoy the blissful rewards of their glorious lives.

All-gracious Providence, how have we merited this cruel affliction? In pious presumption! Dare we to murmur at the decrees of high Heaven? No. Thus Heaven has decreed, and to its decrees we must submit. Then dry up your tears, my countrymen; suppress your murmurs, and learn to profit by the life, and emulate the character of our departed friend. Tell to your children what Hamilton was: generous—brave—a stranger to every ignoble feeling—the friend of his country, and of his country's friends. In his bosom glowed the noblest sentiments of our nature. His life—But hold! Who will dare to undertake the arduous task of portraying his character and life? To such a task, talents like Hamilton's are equal, and, alas! such talents, like Hamilton's, are now no more! Is then the sad pleasure of recounting his noble deeds denied to us? No. To our children, and our children's children, we will tell what Hamilton did, and we will encourage them to do like Hamilton. And, O! if, in this, success should crown the efforts of any one of us, how proud would be our country! But dare we to hope that, in this our day, another Hamilton will be born? America has been kindly favoured by Providence—But this hope, even in America, would be presumptuous.

What was Hamilton? While yet an almost beardless youth, he was found in the foremost ranks of the gallant assertors of our rights and independence. While thought almost too young to receive counsel, he gave approved counsel to old age and experience. In the war of our revolution, he was one of the chosen friends of our chief. Yes.....Washington honoured him, while yet a boy, with his confidence, and that confidence was never withdrawn. Every where conspicuous, his military fame shone most conspicuously at York. It was there his brave compatriots attested his signal prowess—his gallant foe admired his unequalled humanity.

The war at an end, Hamilton's fame, as a soldier, was almost forgotten in our admiration of the virtues of the citizen, and the talents of the statesman. Of such a man, Americans might justly be proud; and now, indeed, Americans were worthy of the blessings of freedom. At this time they knew how to appreciate the talents and worth of their citizens. They bestowed their confidence, where confidence was due. They rejected, with proud disdain, the arrogant pretensions of flattery and falsehood. For such a time Hamilton lived. Hamilton, who lived for glory, not for power, who was ready at all times to devote himself to his country's service, but disdained the practice of unworthy artifices to obtain its favours. Accordingly, on any trying emergency, to Hamilton the eyes of his fellow-citizens would be directed, and such emergency speedily occurred. The want of an efficient constitution was about to produce all the horrors of anarchy and misrule: hence the appointment of a convention to frame a government of more energy, and Hamilton was one of its most shining ornaments. That convention offered to their country a government, which, in its operation, was found to answer the fullest expectations of its friends, and to which even its secret enemies dared not to deny the merit of having raised our country to the most elevated height of prosperity. Hamilton's great powers were exerted to procure its ratification; and his luminous essays, in defence of the Federal Constitution, and in refutation of the multiplied objections, which state pride and individual ambition raised against it, will ever remain imperishable monuments of the splendor of his talents, the grandeur of his genius, and the ardour of his patriotism.

The government was ratified, and went into operation under the highly favourable auspices of a Washington—A crisis of difficulty and danger to Hamilton! The first talents of our country being required to aid in the organization of our government, and to create a system of revenue, Hamilton was appointed, by Washington, to the high post of Secretary of the Treasury. Had he regarded his private ease, or maturely considered the dangers and hazards to which he was exposed, he would have declined the acceptance of it. But Hamilton was incapable of consulting his own interest, when put in competition with the public weal. For the good of his country, he readily put at hazard the reputation and honours which he had already acquired. And here again the secret hopes of Hamilton's and his country's enemies were disappointed. His fame shone forth with redoubled lustre. His talents rose superior to the embarrassments and difficulties of his high station. What was supposed to be above the reach of the greatest abilities, Hamilton appeared to accomplish with ease. In the infancy of our government, while thus the brightest worthies of America were labouring to establish order and tranquility, commenced the revolution of France; a revolution which aimed at the destruction of all peace and order in the civilized world; a revolution, hostile to religion and to government, and which, under the pretext of promoting reforms, and diffusing the principles of liberty and the rights of man, was endeavouring to pull down the political establishments of the world, and to procure every where the aid of other governments and other people, in their work of destruction. Now, indeed, a dark and portentous cloud had overcast our political horizon. France, eager to enlist us under her banners, had already excited in her favour the sympathies of our people, and every exertion was to be made to secure our government in support of their daring and unprincipled measures. But, blessed be God! Washington was our President, and Hamilton his most confidential adviser. The cloud, which was about to obscure forever our glory and fame, was dispersed. Neutrality was established, and the machinations of France defeated.

Having given a vigorous and successful support to the proclamation of neutrality; having provided ample resources for the fulfilment of our public engagements, and having established in the finances of our country a degree of order and arrangement, which seemed to bid defiance to the assaults of impotence and hostility, Hamilton withdrew from public life, to resume his profession, and to make provision for a growing family, whose interests, in his zeal for the welfare and happiness of his country, he had too long neglected.

The high rank, to which his talents entitled him at the bar, was quickly obtained. His integrity, equally with his resplendent abilities, secured to him the implicit confidence of his clients, and Hamilton was considered the proper model for those, who were emulous of fame and distinction in his profession.

But, although withdrawn from public life, he had not become indifferent to the public interest. His bosom glowed with unabated love for his country, and he stood ready, whenever public danger approached, to place himself between it and America. But a few years after his retirement from the treasury, the rapacious demands, and reiterated insults of France, obliged us to arm in defence of our rights and independence. Washington was invited from his beloved retreat, to take the command of our forces. In looking around him for associates in the honours and perils of warfare, his eyes fixed upon Hamilton; the man to whom he had often given his confidence, and on whose integrity and love of country he knew that he could implicitly rely. In the arrangement of officers, he was placed the second in command, because he was first in the affections of his chief. Washington demanded it, and Washington was obeyed.

France, discovering that America was determined upon resistance, dared not to attempt her subjugation. Peace being made, Hamilton joyfully sheathed his sword, to resume once more the labours of his profession. In the discharge of its duties, with satisfaction to his clients and honour to himself, he remained till the fatal day, on which, in the maturity of his fame, and in the fulness of his excellence, he was cut off by his ruthless foe!

Such was the man, for whose loss my countrymen mourn. The day of his death was a day of deep affliction, of unutterable woe. When Hamilton died, there fell a man, of whose equal all America, all Europe cannot boast. The qualities of his heart had endeared him to his friends. His unbending probity and inflexible love of country, had gained him the confidence of his most rancorous political foes. His brilliant talents and varied excellence had acquired to him the admiration of the world.

In the violence of party, it was not to be expected that worth, even like that of Hamilton, would shield its possessor from obloquy. But his integrity was far above the reach of malignity. He was said to be ambitious. Of what? Of his country's glory and his country's fame. To secure them he was ever ready to sacrifice even his life: that life, the value of which was so fully known, and the loss of which is so deeply regretted.

In the universal grief, which the fatal disaster of the 11th of July produced, the dissensions of party are forgotten, and all unite in bearing testimony of their respect for the exemplary worth of the departed patriot. When again shall Americans witness this pleasing melancholy spectacle? When again will the whole people of a great empire be bound down with affliction and sorrow, by the death of one of its great men? Never! For never again will a Hamilton die.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN BUTLER.

THOMAS GREEN FESSENDEN, Esq. a young lawyer and native of New Hampshire, who for three years past has resided in the city of London, is the Author of a singularly witty and ingenious poem, in the best manner of SAMUEL BUTLER, under the title of 'Terrible Tractoration!'. A Poetical Petition against Galvanising Trumpery and the Perkinistic Institution. In four cantos most respectfully addressed to the royal College of Physicians. By Christopher Caustic, Esq. M. D. L. L. D. A. S. S. Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, Aberdeen; and honorary member of no less than nineteen very learned Societies.

In England, such has been the celebrity of this humorous Poem, that within two months from the publication of the first edition, a second has been called for by the partiality and taste of the public. The satire and irony of the burlesque Poet are not employed solely against the enemies of the Institution, which it is his principal object to defend. In his excursive flight of poetry, and in the well written and amusing notes to his merry cantos, he has very successfully ridiculed many of the disciples of the new school, who, either by Jacobin politics, or atheistical philosophy, or perverted literature, have, during the reign of republican delusion, attempted to disturb the peace, and deface the felicity of mankind. The author, whom we know to be a staunch disciple of the old school, and who has always proved himself an anti-gallican, anti-jacobinical, and anti-fanatical partizan, has acquitted himself with great ability in that part of his work, which is occupied in satirizing the upstart innovators of the time. He has attracted the notice of WILLIAM GIFFORD, Esq. who has liberally praised the poet, and testified his friendship for the man. The suffrage of the author of the Baviad and Mæviad, one of the first critics and poets of his age, at once silences every cavil, and supersedes even the commendation of partial friendship. We exult to find, that a large impression of this work, published by Mr. Stansbury, of New-York, is nearly sold; and we hope, that the well-principled wit, who has so severely lashed the foolish and the flagitious in the old world, will brandish his scourge against the culprits of the new. If jacobinism and fanaticism provoked a just indignation abroad, what emotions in such a mind, will those hateful powers excite at home?

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The public attention has been for some time directed to a resolution, proposed and adopted in the legislature of Massachusetts, by Mr. Ely, in the following words:

"Whereas by the constitution of the United States it is provided, that the representatives shall be apportioned among the several States, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons; and further, that for the choice of the president and vice-president of the United States each state shall appoint a number of Electors, equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the state may be entitled in Congress.

"And whereas the said provisions were so manifestly unequal at the time the constitution was formed, that they could have resulted only from the spirit of conciliation and compromise which influenced the eastern states; because, in consequence thereof, a representation of the states is produced, unjust and injurious in its operation, both as it regards the number of free inhabitants in the several states, and their property.

"As in a state where a slavery of men is established by law, the slaves have no voice in the elections—but a Planter, possessing fifty slaves, may be considered as having thirty votes, while a farmer of Massachusetts, having equal or greater property, is confined to a single vote.

"And whereas the effect of these provisions has been rendered still more unequal and injurious, by the course of events, since the constitution was established, by an augmentation of the number of slaves in the southern states, and also by an increase of personal property in the eastern states, arising from the commercial spirit of its inhabitants.

"And whereas the said provisions have been rendered more injurious by important political changes, introduced during the present administration, in the purchase of Louisiana, an extensive country, which will require a great number of slaves for its cultivation, and when admitted into the Union, agreeably to the cession, will contribute, by the number of its slaves, to destroy the real influence of the eastern states in the national government, and also in the alteration of the original mode of electing the President of the United States, whereby, in the appointment of that important magistrate, the weight of the small states, (among which are most of the eastern states, where there are few or no slaves), is greatly diminished.

"And whereas the apportionment of the direct tax, the only compensation proposed by the constitution to the states, not holding slaves, for the aforesaid unequal principle in representation, is now merely nominal, as the national revenues are, principally derived from commercial imposts, the present administration having repealed the excise laws, which operated, in some measure, by a tax on luxuries, to equalise among the several states the contributions to the public burdens; and having also recently assessed additional millions on commerce, of which the eastern states must pay much more than their due proportion—so that instead of contributing less than their proportionate share of public expense, as was contemplated by the constitution, as a counterpart to unequal representation, they contribute more.

"And whereas a union of the states, a measure so important in its consequences, cannot, harmoniously, exist for a long period, unless it be founded on principles, which shall secure, to all free citizens, equal political rights and privileges in the government, so that a minority may not govern a majority—an event, which, on the principles of representation now established, has already happened, and may always happen.

"Therefore, to preserve the union of the states upon sound and just principles, and to establish a foundation of general harmony and confidence among all the citizens of the United States, by securing to them now, and at all future periods, equal political rights and privileges,

MOVED,

"That the senators of this commonwealth, in the congress of the United States, be instructed to take all proper and legal measures to obtain an amendment of the constitution of the United States; so that the representatives be appointed among the several states, according to the number of their free inhabitants respectively, and for this purpose that they endeavour to obtain a resolution of two thirds of both houses of congress proposing such amendment to the legislatures of the several states in the union, and that a committee be raised to bring in a resolve for that purpose."

The passing of this resolution, must be regarded as a measure of the first and greatest importance. In its fate are involved consequences, which are intimately connected with our peace and union; and, as it will, probably, be ere long submitted in a constitutional manner to the decision of the people, it imports them to discuss with calmness and temperance, before it becomes their duty to act upon it. Superficial thinkers will pass it by; and, indeed, considering the spirit of the times, and that it is intended to diminish that overgrown power, which is now in its full blaze, consuming the vigour and the resources of the complaining state; its success can hardly be hoped for. But reflecting men will give it their best and most profound consideration; that, should it be rejected, they may be able to foresee, and to know, upon whom to charge the consequences that may ensue. It imports the state of Virginia too, which now wields the sceptre of empire, to deliberate: to divest herself for a little while of her pride and her loftiness, and to reflect upon the tendency of the measures, she has pursued and is pursuing.

The constitution of the United States has been declared, by the framers of it, to have been 'the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession, which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable.' Great indeed were the difficulties which impeded its formation, and the obstacles, to be surmounted previously to its adoption. The members of the convention were not only embarrassed by differences of opinion, as to the theory of government, but 'the difference among the several states, as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests,' was so great, as to call for sacrifices and concessions, which, in any other less favourable state of things than that, which then presented itself, might in vain have been hoped for or expected. Every thing however contributed to make the occasion favourable to the great object, which we had in view, 'the consolidation of our union.' The harmony and the mutual attachment of the different states, excited, by their having been engaged in one common struggle for national independence, and the dangers and the hardships which they had encountered together; the general complacency, produced by their success; the manifest insuiciencies of the confederation, which had, for a time, under the pressure of external circumstances, kept them together, and the physical languor too, which succeeded the violent efforts they had made. All these contributed greatly to the success of the attempt. They were peculiar to the time, and, perhaps, can hardly be expected ever again to concur.

Under these favourable auspices the convention assembled: and perhaps an assemblage of more enlightened statesmen, or of truer patriots, never was witnessed in any age, or in any country. They came together under a sense of common danger, and determined to sacrifice local interests and prejudices, their private opinions too, as far as they might conscientiously, upon the altar of their country. The difficulties, however, which presented themselves, were great, and sometimes produced despondency in the most sanguine. After a session of many months, a form of government was agreed upon. It was indeed the result of a spirit of amity, mutual concession, and deference. In it were supposed to have been nicely balanced the power, the population, the situations, the extent, habits, and particular interests of the different states. These differences too, it is to be recollected, seemed to distinguish the United States into four divisions, Northern, Southern, Western, and Atlantic. The plan of government proposed, was admirably contrived to reconcile them. The constitution of the Senate, and the mode of electing the chief executive magistrate, were the prominent features of the system which conciliated the affection and attachment of the Eastern and smaller states. These, in the existing state of things, were supposed to provide sufficiently for their security, and for giving them that weight in the national government, to which they justly supposed themselves to be entitled. The Southern and larger states, on the other hand, were not unmindful of their interests. They took care, that these should not be sacrificed or disregarded. About the future and prospective operation of the government, they were less anxious; well knowing, that their extensive territory, inviting a rapid increase of population by emigration, admitted of the formation of new states, which would gradually diminish the influence of the Eastern and smaller states in the senate. They knew, that these advantages must insure to them all they could wish or desire. One sacrifice, however, to the lordly pride of Virginia was required and granted. The wealth and the greatness of her citizens were measured by the number of slaves, who were cheered by their smiles, or depressed at their frowns. These could not be disregarded; and the ancient dominion demanded, that their weight should be cast into the scale, against that of the freemen of the North. A proposition so repugnant to the feelings, the spirit, the prejudices, the education, the habits, the independence of the North, would, probably, at any other time, have been received with contempt and indignation. These emotions were in some degree produced; but at length a compromise was made, by giving to Virginia a representation of three fifths of her slaves—a compromise, which at the time was thought to involve little more, than a sacrifice of opinion, to pride; and to be sufficiently balanced by the permanent provisions of the constitution: but, these being essentially changed, it has proved, as will be shewn in the sequel, the source of the most incalculable injuries and wrongs to the Eastern states; has become an enormous evil, and must be removed, to afford any chance for a continuance of the union of these states.

Not to weary the patience of my readers, I shall defer the further investigation of this subject to future numbers. What is now submitted, will, I hope, be candidly weighed and considered. No man more honestly appreciates the importance of our union, to our prosperity, felicity, safety, and perhaps our national existence, than myself. That these may be vigilantly guarded, is my motive for submitting to my countrymen the reflections of no hasty or hypochondriacal hour. I am neither a factious partizan, nor a growling malecontent, but utter the sincere opinions of an intemperate zeal. Happy, if my motives be candidly appreciated, and happier if my arguments can check the effervescence of civil commotion.

HORTENSIVS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

LEVITY.

The following fragment of a journal was picked up by a traveller, while tantiing along the banks of the Patoinac.

Monday, 8 o'clock, 20th February, 1804.

Left Sally—damn'd bore, to rise early—but must seem industrious, though nothing to do. Met Madison at breakfast—don't much like him—talked of virtue and conscience—thought he looked hard at me—Gallatin's the man—never hear such stuff from him—no danger too of his pushing me out—good fellow! pay him well, and he'll do any thing—point d'argent, point de suisse."

10 o'clock. Wrote half a page of my dissertation on cock-roaches—servant came in to say, people below wanted to see me on public business—cursed their impertinence—sent word, I was out. Why don't they go to Gallatin or Madison—office of President must be sinecure—trouble enough to sign bills and messages—returned to my cock-roaches, in a fret, and could not write. Received note from Gallatin, inclosing bill I told him to read yesterday—says, it's all right—signed it, and sent it to the senate. Mem. to ask Gallatin, what's its purport.

Took up Port Folio—saw the name of Gabriel Jones—found myself in a cold sweat; and threw it into the fire. Wonder folks will talk of old stories—better mind their own business—troublesome fellow that Editor—worries me cursedly—lets nothing escape him. Beau Dawson lounged in—had on pair of new breeches—devilish proud of 'em—thought more of them than of me—mentioned pretty mulatto girl at —'s—made my mouth water—take a peep at her—Sally's growing stale—told him to bring her in the back way. Beau talked of manufactures of France, famous hair-powder, and almond-paste—stock he brought with him almost out. Mem. must make another errand for him.

12 o'clock. Randolph came in—looked rather queer—found he'd been trying to answer that damn'd fellow Griswold—desperate case—made many bold assertions, but was detected in all—got into a cursed scrape, and was obliged to sit down—damn'd provoking, can't find any one to cope with Griswold—Jack's flippant enough, but quite on the surface, better than any of our side—though—tried Giles, found he wouldn't do—been looking out some time to buy over a Fed of talents—can't meet with one who'd take a bribe—very strange that.

Ordered my horse—never ride with a servant—looks proud—mob doesn't like it—must gull the boobies. Adams wouldn't bend so—had rather lose his place—knew nothing of the world. Pass'd Merry and his wife—saw her whisper and smile—look'd foolish—thought she was laughing at me—Why do women of fashion come to this country?—wish she had staid in England—heard her jest once about my dirty stockings—must cringe to 'em now though!— hope he hasn't written home about my first reception of them—only did so to please our party, and to shew the world, that republicans affect not to conduct themselves by the rules of gallantry and politeness.

Stopp'd at Judge K—'s, to be qualified to a deposition—swore on a volume of 'Devil on two Sticks,' by mistake—pretended to make a fuss about it—afraid I overacted my part—K. was seized with a coughing fit—believe him to be a sneering son of a bitch. Found Paine waiting to dine with me—sorry I invited him from France—nothing gained by him—people despise him—all owing to his imprudence—gave him some hints—a man may be an atheist without proclaiming it to the world—pleasant fellow tho'—several good jokes on the new testament—talked of the vision of Machiavel—outrageous about the restoration of the clergy in France. To put him in good humour, drank success to the invaders of England—plied him well with brandy, and, as usual, left the stay-maker under the table.

Received letter from Lewis, giving account of the Osage Indians—wonderfully curious terrapins—dare say it's a fine country—must have a breed—send commissioners to make a treaty with 'em. Dr. Mitchell came to tea—spoke of his new method of drying frogs—his new chemical nomenclature—folks cursed obstinate—will stick to Lavoisier's—all of a piece with preferring America to Fredonia—Read me a part of his letter to king of Naples—wonder who he got to do it into Latin—good thing his signature of Centumvir—a prig of a fellow—glad to get rid of him—no bad plan tho' of drying the frogs.

10 o'clock. Went to bed—could not sleep—took up National Intelligencer—found myself getting drowsy—began one of Cæsar Rodney's speeches, and soon fell into a slumber.

[To be Continued.]

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

We are glad to perceive that the 'Philadelphia Company of Booksellers' have Perrin's French Fables in the press. Among the elementary books of a polite and almost universal language, this deserves the attentive perusal of the tyro, who will find much useful and correct information in the various tracts of Perrin. His grammar is still advantageously consulted, and his 'Exercises' have strengthened the mind of every pupil.

Mr. John West, of Boston, is publishing Wanostrucht's 'Recueil,' which is another useful school book.

Mess. P. W. and L. Blake have published, at Boston, a beautiful edition of Johnson's Dictionary, in miniature, of the English language.

Mr. H. Caritat of New-York has, at length, completed an 'Explanatory Catalogue' of his very extensive and valuable Circulating Library. This useful pamphlet is modelled after the Catalogues Raisonnés of the French, and occasionally presents a slight analysis, or a brief character of the most curious or valuable books. Some of the criticisms are derived from foreign journals of celebrity, and some appear to be formed by the proprietor, either from a deliberate, or hasty perusal of the books under review.

Mr. Samuel F. Bradford has published the five first volumes of Mavor's Universal History, is industriously proceeding with the series, and will soon complete, to the advantage of the general reader, a work not unworthy of the title of an excellent abridgment.

Mr. Mathew Carey has published several cheap, correct, and valuable editions of the Holy Bible. These editions, as appears by the liberal testimony of many clerical scholars, are, for accuracy and beauty, highly honourable to the publisher.

A new work, under the title of 'The Literary and Scientific Almanac,' is announced, in a late London publication, as intended to be issued at the close of the present year.

The object is, to present to students and lovers of literature such correct lists and tables, both literary and scientific, as may serve the purposes of reference and inquiry on every subject. Among other lists there will be the following:

1. Of all contemporary living authors, specifying their names, age, residence, and works.
 2. Of books published within the year.
 3. Of literary journals and newspapers, foreign and domestic.
 4. Of learned societies, and the names of the members of the most considerable.
 5. Of book societies, book clubs, and permanent libraries, with the name of their president, steward, secretary, or librarian.
 6. Of names of booksellers in the United Kingdom, and of eminent publishers abroad.
 7. Of universities, and the names of their professors; with other useful particulars relative to students, the university business, &c.
 8. Brief sketches of the annual progress of the various arts and sciences, with the new improvements and discoveries in each, and lists of new patents.
 9. Notices of eminent literary characters, who have died in the course of the preceding year.
 10. Curious and important tracts in physics and in science, depending on numbers, with brief tables of latitudes and longitudes, a chronology, table of dynasties and contemporary sovereigns; chemical tables, &c. &c. &c.
- Communications are invited from all persons, who may be interested in the correctness of either of the foregoing lists, to be addressed to Mr. Phillips, No. 71. St. Paul's Church-yard.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Wood, describing the Seekers, who came to preach at Oxford in 1647, says, with the sneer of an orthodox Oxonian, "The generality of them had mortified countenances, pining voices, and eyes commonly, when in discourse, lifted up, with hands lying on their breasts. They mostly had short hair, which, at this time, was commonly called the committee cut."

The classic GIFFORD, expressing his virtuous contempt for a late French novel, the licentious spawn of a jacobin hussar, declares, that 'if this gallant gentleman wield his sword no better than his pen, he must afford equal disgust to his colonel and his critic.' We do not remember a finer example of easy alliteration.

Preston, a beautiful poet of Ireland, is the author of the following Anacreontic.

I love the friend, I love the lass,
That freely takes the circling glass.
I love to see the dancing eye,
With the wine in lustre vie;
Or the coral lip combine
With the ruby of the vine.
Fill it, fill the mantling bowl,
Pledge me every thirsty soul;
'Tis Perdition to old Care,
Pleasures to the young and fair.
Pleasures teeming, rising, flowing,
Never cloying, ever growing,
Pledge me now, ye young and fair,
'Tis perdition to old Care.

Of I've heard Francisco say,
Wine was but a bottled ray,
From the blessed orb of light,
Giving sunshine in the night,
Giving summer's genial heat,
When December tempests beat.
Give me light, the gloom to cheer;
Quick, a bowl of sunshine here—
Let meridian bumpers pass,
The sun delights to shine thro' glass,
If claret bottled sunshine be,
Eternal torrid zones for me.

I twine the wreath my brows to bind,
And Love among the roses find;
Find him lurking like a bee,
On harm intent, and harm to me—
By the wings I held him fast,
And in the racy goblet cast.
'Little cause of mighty ill!
Little urchin drink thy fill!' I thought him dead, and drain'd the bowl,
And drank down Love, alive and whole.
Fatal, fatal to my rest!
He lives, he moves, within my breast;
His pinions flutter at my heart,
I feel within a thrilling smart! [Ibid.]

A Lady once asking a French Ambassador, who had resided a long time in Poland, whether it was true, that the Polish ladies were as white and as cold as the snow, which covered their plains; he replied, 'It is so true, Madam, that I have often caught cold, by conversing with them.'

ANTIPATHIES.—Erasmus, though a native of Rotterdam, had such an aversion to fish, that the smell of it threw him into a fever. Ambrose Paré mentions a gentleman, who could not see an eel, without fainting. Joseph Scaliger and Peter Abano never could drink milk. Cardan was particularly disgusted at the sight of eggs. Uladislau, king of Poland, could not bear to see apples. If a pear were shewn to Chesne, secretary to Francis I. his nose would bleed, from exertion to restrain his displeasure. Henry the third, of France, never could sit in the room with a cat. One of the bravest of officers, never dared to look at a mouse, unless he had a sword in his hand. The philosopher Chrysippus had such an aversion to be saluted, that if any one bowed to him, he would fall down.

As the servant maid of Mrs. H. of the Dublin theatre, was following her mistress on a cast to Cork, where she had gone a few days before to join a strolling company, she was overtaken by three ruffians, who brutally violated the unfortunate girl. When she arrived at the theatre, the violated damsel ran immediately to her mistress behind the scenes, and told the dismal tale. At the conclusion of the story, Mrs. H. who was dressing for the Queen in Hamlet, exclaimed with a solemn voice, in the language of Shakespeare, 'Aye, it had been so with us, had we been there!'

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The poetry of 'B' is received, and we shall cheerfully print it, without mutilation. We hope this writer will continue to contribute to this Journal. We have expected, for some time, another sketch from the tourist. We have not forgotten either the vivid tints of his landscape, or his striking likeness of a 'good and great man. So correct a pencil, and such pleasing colours, will always recommend the artist.

'A Philosopher' appears to have wholly forgotten to what sect he belongs. He neither laughs with Democritus, nor weeps with Heraclitus.

* Mr. JAY.

A correspondent, who has sent us a splendid specimen of Spanish poetry, with a spirited translation, is entitled to our particular thanks. Few literary communications will be more agreeable to the Editor, than elegant extracts from the Spanish classics, with a version either literal or free.

A criticism upon a recent pamphlet is rejected, because it would excite a temporary attention to a juvenile crudity, of which the author himself, at a maturer age, will be ashamed.

The poem, in our last, though from the free muse of Mr. Lewis, is not merely pure and decorous, but philosophical and true. It is a rational scheme of innoxious pleasure, and Ethics might sanction what Epicurus has thus sung.

'The Rambler' has roved excursively, but has not even approached the lofty castles of Doctor Johnson. He wanders, it is true, but like a vagrant, not like a liberal and curious speculator.

'Y,' is better calculated for a newspaper than a magazine.

The verses to 'Emma' are flowing, and deserve a smile of approbation from the lady.

'Rowland' has studied Martial and the French epigrammatists sedulously; and translation or imitation of such originals will be alike admired by the lover of the Classics, and the laughter at Drollery.

In the poem of 'Sancho' there is a sort of pert vivacity, but it is like the briskness of bottled beer. Even his heaviness does not entirely sink him, according to the simile of Pope,

As forc'd from wind-guns lead itself can fly,
And pond'rous slugs cut swiftly thro' the sky;
As clocks to weights their nimble motion owe,
The wheels above urg'd by the load below:
Him Emptiness and Dulness both inspire,
And are his elasticity and fire.

The ardent admirers of Mr. Moore cherish a lively hope, that the fascinating friend, and the sweet poet, after enjoying the hospitality of his countrymen in the British provinces, will shortly return to gladden the social and literary circle on the banks of the Delaware. The Editor will greet him, with that warmth of welcome, which the presence of such a friend inspires, and many an Horatian spirit will exclaim,

.....Hinc tibi copia
Manabit ad plenum benigno
Kuris honorum opulenta cernu.
Hic in reducta valle, Cariculae,
Vitabis aestus, et fœc Teia
Dices laborantes in uno
Penelope, vitæque Circen.

'Asmodeo,' with the most smiling good humour, has at once complimented and criticised the familiar ballad style of Mr. Wordsworth. There is no malice in the wit of our valued correspondent, and his laugh is the mirth of a gentleman, not the grin of a rustic.

'Florian,' who has frequently evinced his acquaintance with Spanish literature, is requested to translate, for the Port Folio, whatever he may find interesting in the works of the scholars of Valladolid or Salamanca. Some of the fables of Yriarte, to whom Florian has often alluded, will be highly agreeable to the Editor, who is anxious that this paper should almost constantly reflect the literary beauties of the European continent.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

BOTHWEL CASTLE.*

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL, ESQ.
Author of the "Pleasures of Hope."

Thou hoary warrior, bent with years,
And swiftly mouldering to decay,
Faint-gleaming on my raptur'd sight,
As through the vale of Clyde I stray,
And view thy pine-wav'd, rocky steep,
The morn with mellow ray adorning!
Pouring her beams o'er hill and dale,
Far sweeter than the smiles of morning!

Behold, she flings her lustre wide,
And calms the brownness of the wood:
Where, tow'ring high in stately pride,
Thy walls frown awful o'er the flood:
Thy walls, from pristine grandeur chang'd,
How sullen o'er the wave impending!
And with the ivy's mantling green
Their hoary, moss-grown fragments blending.

While on thy turret's airy height,
With awe-transported thoughts I gaze,
Recall'd by fancy's magic power,
I see the sons of other days!
Their aspect bold, their stately mien,
To every breeze their banners streaming,
Their moony shields, with living blaze
Irradiate from the turret gleaming.

But hark! through every spacious hall
The bugle's long-protracted sound!
And see the courser's proudly prance,
With proud impatience paw the ground;
Lo! from th' expanding portal wide,
Horsemen and horse in order sally,
Glance through the forest's deepening gloom,
And sound along the bosky valley!

High Honour's dazzling reign, farewell!
Ye days of chivalry adieu!
On you my earliest thoughts were bent,
Still do my wishes tend to you—
Oh! still your poet's dreams delight
The visionary pomp displaying,
Till fancy's living hues shall glow
With scenes far brightest in decaying!

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[Mr. Younge has lately published select odes of Anacreon. We copy one, that the reader of taste may compare it with the elegant version of Mr. Moore. It will be immediately seen that the latter is incomparably the best. In justice to Mr. Younge, it must be declared, that, if Mr. Moore's version did not set all competition at defiance, Mr. Younge's translation of this ode might be perused with pleasure.]

Master of the rosy art,
Try the pleasing, friendly part,
Paint my beauty all divine,
Colour you, and I'll design.
Make her tresses easy lie,
Softly touch'd, and black the dye;
If your tint so far prevails,
Paint them breathing odorous gales.
Next her forehead, smooth and fair,
Gently raise beneath her hair.
Form a brow on either side,
Mix them not, nor yet divide;
Let no eye distinctly see
Where they part, or where agree;
Then her eye-lids must arise
Black and circling o'er her eyes.

* Published from the author's manuscript.

Now her eyes your hand require;
Paint them sparkling as the fire,
Awful, as the queen of arms,
Lively as the queen of charms.
Next attempt her cheeks and nose;
Blend the fairness thro' the rose;
Then her lips persuasive grace
Softly courting an embrace;
Let a thousand graces deck
All her Parian marble neck.
Painter! now, to clothe the rest,
Form a purple, slender vest,
Clear, pellucid, that her skin,
Half observ'd, shall lye within;
Prying fancy thus may know
Wond'rous beauties are below.

Hold! enough! I see the fair:
All her charms confess'd appear,
Such the work in every feature,
Voice would make it real nature.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.
IMITATION OF CATULLUS.

BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

TO HIMSELF.

Miser Catulle, desinas ineptire, &c.

Cease the sighing fool to play;
Cease to trifle life away;
Nor vainly think those joys thine own,
Which all, alas! have falsely flown!
What hours, Catullus, once were thine,
How fairly seem'd thy day to shine,
When lightly thou didst fly to meet
The girl, who smil'd so rosy sweet—
The girl thou lov'dst with fonder pain
Than e'er thy heart can feel again.
You met—your souls seem'd all in one—
Sweet little sports were said and done—
Thy heart was warm enough for both,
And hers, indeed, was nothing loath.
Such were the hours that once were thine,
But, ah! those hours no longer shine;
For now the nymph delights no more
In what she lov'd so dear before;
And all Catullus now can do,
Is to be proud and frigid too;
Nor follow where the wanton flies,
Nor sue the bliss that she denies.
False maid! he bids farewell to thee,
To love, and all love's misery.
The hey-day of his heart is o'er,
Nor will he court one favour more;
But soon he'll see thee droop thy head,
Doom'd to a lone and loveless bed,
When none will seek the happy night,
Or come to traffic in delight!
Fly, perjurd girl!—but whither fly?
Who now will praise thy cheek and eye?
Who now will drink the syren tone,
Which tells him thou art all his own?
Who now will court thy wild delights,
Thy honey kiss, and turtle bites?
Oh! none.—And he, who lov'd before,
Can never, never love thee more!

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.
TO EMMA.

I've travers'd the grove, where the woodbine has twin'd
And the wild note of melody greeted my ear,
Where soft-flowing rivulets gracefully wind,
And moss-cover'd banks, deck'd with lilies, appear.

* Chi più diravvi allora
Che v'ama, che v'adora?
Chi più suo ben sua speme
Allor vi chiamerà?

Metastasio. L'Amor Prigionero.

I've tasted the joys of each rural delight,
The beauties of spring have enchanted my eye,
The dew-drop of morn, and the stillness of night,
Had pleas'd me, before thou had'st taught me
to sigh.

But groves, with their woodbines, nor melody wild,
Nor soft-flowing rivulets graceful to view,
Nor moss-cover'd banks, where the lilies have smil'd,
Have half the delights that are center'd in you.

Nor rural enjoyments, nor beauties of spring,
Nor dew-drop of morning, so pearly and bright,
Nor yet the soft stillness, which evening doth bring,
Without thee, my Emma, can yield me delight.

For, Oh! with what rapture and transport of bliss,
I dwell on those graces, which round thee
entwine,
And oft where thy steps have imprinted a kiss,
With ecstasy trace all the charms that are thine.

TO JULIA.

BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

I saw the peasant's hand unkind
From yonder oak the ivy sever;
They seem'd in very being twin'd,
Yet now the oak is fresh as ever.

Not so the widow'd ivy shines,
Torn from its dear and only stay;
In drooping widowhood it pines,
And scatters all its blooms away!

Thus, Julia, did our hearts entwine,
Till fate disturb'd their tender ties:
Thus gay indifference blooms in thine,
While mine, deserted, droops and dies.

SONG.

By Thomas Moore, Esq.

A captive thus to thee, my girl,
How sweetly shall I pass my age,
Contented, like the playful squirrel,
To wanton up and down my cage.

When death shall envy joy like this,
And come to shade our sunny weather,
Be our last sigh, the sigh of bliss,
And both our souls exhal'd together!

EPIGRAM.

Frank once ask'd a friend 'don't you think I speak well,
Though I ne'er take a book from its shelf?'
'How the talent you've gain'd,' said his friend, 'I can't tell,
But, I own, you speak well.....of yourself.'

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

IN one of those rare but interesting societies, where amusement can be obtained without the intervention of play, where reigns the free interchange of sentiment so grateful to a cultivated intellect, where the only desire is to please, and the only solicitude to instruct, our conversation accidentally turned on the difference between real and visionary objects. We endeavoured to trace their analogy, and ascertain the relation that subsists between a continuous dream and a long meditation, between the enthusiastic contemplative, and the cool observer. It was suggested, that a fervid imagination sometimes creates a belief of reality, equally strong with the evidence of actual vision. This position was generally controverted, and the discussion continued with some warmth, when a French officer remarked, that he believed a single fact more satisfactory than a whole volume of abstract reasoning, and would, therefore, with the assent of the company, relate an event calculated to throw some light on the subject. He added, that the circumstances he was about to narrate, had happened to a captain of his regiment, that they had fallen under his own observation, and that all his brother officers could vouch for their authenticity. He promised to observe the most scrupulous exactitude in his recital, except in the substitution of fictitious names, and claimed indulgence for some minutiae of detail that he had heard too often to be able to omit, and for the reflections he might occasionally interweave with a subject in which he felt deeply interested. The company acquiesced, as may be supposed, without much difficulty. His story was as follows—

"After a severe engagement in Italy, during the course of the last war, our wounded officers were transported to Milan. Dorville, one of the number, was carried to the hospital. His wounds left but small hopes of his life; but the powerful assistance of art, together with the still more operative aid of a youthful and vigorous constitution, snatched him from the jaws of death. On resuming the use of his reason, after an alternate delirium and stupor of more than a month, he made numberless inquiries as to his situation, the symptoms of his disorder, and all those particulars so interesting to a man, who is in some manner restored to existence, who experiences new sensations, and who feels the buoyancy and vivifying energy of nascent health, a delight only known to those, who have recovered from dangerous indispositions.

A nun, of the order of Charity, answered him with as much modesty as if she had not essentially contributed to his cure, and as circumstantially, as if she had never left him for a moment. He opened his curtains to view the person, who gave him such affable and satisfactory replies. Judge of his astonishment, when he saw, at his bed-side, a young woman of about eighteen years of age. He remarked a pair of eyes beaming with candour and beneficence; he caught an affectionate but timid glance; he surveyed one of those tender, intelligent, and pensive countenances, which excite a more lively interest, and are more powerfully attractive, than even consummate beauty. He was struck with the elegance of her form, and the dignity of her demeanour, and, captivated by an assemblage of graces, veiled under a habit that added new stimulus to desire, by holding out insuperable obstacles to enjoyment.

Dorville, amazed to find so many charms in an asylum of misery, was still more so, when he understood that Adelaide, the name of the nun, had been his only attendant, during his illness, that she had watched over him both night and day, with the most admirable patience and tender solicitude, that she had scarcely allowed herself a moment of repose, and in fine that he owed her his life. Born with one of those ardent tempers, which render a man, at the same time, so amiable and so unhappy, which augment our miseries, by amplifying our affections, Dorville sublimated every sentiment into a passion. He immediately abandoned himself to the utmost excess of sensibility. He no longer dared to accept of the services which she unceasingly proffered. He conjured her, upon the approach of night, to retire, and it was upon that condition alone that he himself could be induced to take repose. But repose was not long reserved for him. He was seized with a passion too violent to be misunderstood. The deference due to Adelaide's habit, gratitude for her benevolence, and the awe inspired by the purity of her manners, bound him to conceal an attachment, which every effort to hide only served to disclose. He soon perceived this effect by her sudden reserve. Fearful of losing all, he then hazarded an avowal of what he had secretly sworn never to reveal. He expected a repulse, met with it, and was almost overwhelmed. Every topic of consolation which she suggested, only operated to heighten his despair: every motive adduced to conquer his love, only increased its intensity: every endearment of condolence appeared an additional torment. His mistress, agonized by her own feelings, resolved to leave him, and was upon the point of abandoning her patient to a sister nun, when one of his wounds broke out afresh, and her compassion forced her to remain.

Our regiment was about that time ordered into winter quarters at Milan. I visited my friend every day. I there found Adelaide, and witnessed her assiduities. She sometimes dressed the wound before me, and I have frequently seen tears fall, which she in vain laboured to suppress. Dorville never spoke; but his eyes were piercing, and his silence full of passion. So much delicacy, united to such vehemence of affection, a language so irresistibly eloquent, the sympathy of misfortune, that persuasive energy of soul, which characterises true love, all combined to inspire Adelaide with a passion equally ardent. She trembled at its approach, but did not hesitate to entrust him with her sentiments. She knew him to be generous, and thought her virtue less endangered by implicating his honour in her defence. In making the most solemn vows that it should be inviolably respected, he calculated too little on the infirmity of human nature. He soon disclaimed their obligation, and lavished caresses, prayers, and tears. Adelaide reminded him of his promise, and a tender word from her usually calmed his transports. 'What!' would she say, 'must my ruin be the price of my attachment? Would you entail infamy on her whom you love?' He threw himself at her feet, renewed his protestations of repentance and respect, and felt that the repulses of innocence, however irksome at the moment, are not altogether devoid of pleasurable ingredients for the man, who respects the object of his love. When he reflected on the sanctity of her habit, on her artless innocence, on her many and poignant sorrows, he accused himself of a want of generosity, and resolved to abandon his pursuit forever; but no sooner did his mistress appear, than every resolution was instantly forgotten.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF THOMAS WARTON.

His next publication was Poems on Several Occasions, English, Latin, and Italian, with Translations by John Milton, viz. Lycidas, L'Allegro Il Penseroso, Arcades, Comus, Odes, Sonnets, Miscellanies, English Psalms, Elegiarum, Liber, Epigrammatum Liber, Sylvarum Liber, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, and other Illustrations, 8vo, 1785. A second edition, with corrections and improvements, appeared after his death, in 1790. The chief purpose of the Notes is to explain Milton's allusions, to illustrate or to vindicate his beauties, to point out his imitations, both of others and of himself, to elucidate his obsolete diction, and by the adduction and juxtaposition of parallels universally gleaned both from his poetry and his prose, to ascertain his favourite words, and to shew the peculiarities of his phraseology. His commentary is enriched with some occasional illustrations by his brother Dr. Warton. In the second edition, the Notes appear to have undergone an entire revision. Some notes, which were in the first edition, he has omitted in the second; intending, as is evident by the references, to introduce them, and probably with considerable additions, in his edition of Milton's larger poems, which he was preparing for the press. Many of his own notes, not to be found in the first edition, are inserted in the second, together with some which are marked with the initials of the names of Warburton and Hurd. A multitude of corrections are also made, in which he probably availed himself of the hints of friendly criticism.

This was the last publication he gave to the world, except his official Odes, and many excellent notes in the variorum edition of Shakspeare 1786, which are distinguished by his name.

His health began to decline a little time before his death, but not in such a manner as to give much alarm to his friends. He had been some time ill with the gout; but was thought in a fair way of recovery. On Thursday, May 20. 1790. he appeared remarkably cheerful, and supped, and passed the evening in the common-room. Between ten and eleven o'clock he sunk in his chair. His friends thought him only dozing; but on approaching, found him struck with the palsy, and quite dead on one side. He was immediately conveyed to his room, and continued insensible till his death, on Friday, about two o'clock, in the sixty-second year of his age. On the 27th of May, in the afternoon, his remains were interred in the Chapel of Trinity College, with the highest academical honours.

A new edition of his Poems, including the pieces emitted in the edition 1777, and the New-Year and Birth-day Odes, for 1786, 1787 and 1788, was printed in 1791. They are now, reprinted from the edition 1791, with his Birth-Day Odes for 1789 and 1790, Sonnet in imitation of Spenser, and his Latin poems ad Somnum and Qui fit Mæcenas, omitted in former editions, received for the first time into a collection of classical English poetry.

His character was truly amiable and respectable. To his friends he was endeared by his simple, open, and friendly manners; to the University of Oxford by his long residence and many services; and to the public by the valuable additions which have been made by his talents to English poetry, antiquities, and criticism. His mind was more fraught with wit and mirth than his outward appearance promised. His person was unyielding and ponderous, and his countenance somewhat inert; but the fascination of his converse was wonderful. He was the delight of the jovial Attic board, anniversaries, music meetings, &c. and possessed beyond most men the art of communicating variety to the dull sameness of an Oxford life. With eminent abilities, and scholastic accomplishments, he united those conciliatory talents, that amiable sociability of manners, which could, to the claim of respect for the author, add that of esteem for the man. He was a liberal scholar, an agreeable companion, a warm philanthropist, a disinterested Christian, and an amiable man.

His social qualities, says a writer in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' for 1790, 'had long endeared him to the members of his own society, among whom he constantly resided. The brilliancy of his wit, the solidity of his judgment, and the affability of his temper, gave to all who had the happiness of his acquaintance, the most pungent regret for his irreparable loss. His literary productions have rendered him peculiarly eminent as an annotator, a biographer, an antiquary, and a poet; and he may be deservedly considered as the ornament, not only of the university, but of the literary world at large. Such, indeed, was the vigour of his mind, the classical purity of his taste, the extent and variety of his learning, that his memory will be forever revered as a profound scholar, and a man of true genius. Learning must deplore him as one of her best and most valuable ornaments.'

As an author, he has chiefly distinguished himself as a biographer a historian, a critic, and a poet.

In his Lives of Dr. Bathurst and Sir Thomas Pope, we find that art, propriety, and ease, which characterize the productions of those whose talents have been carefully cultivated by reflection and study. But they will not, perhaps, by the generality of readers, be deemed either instructive or entertaining. Of the memorials of Dr. Bathurst, which have been transmitted to posterity, few are at this time interesting or affecting enough to engage the attention of the public; but he may be credited for his industry, and the difficulties he surmounted in attaining the necessary information to complete his work. The insufficiency of the materials which time has preserved concerning Sir Thomas Pope, has engaged him to enter occasionally into historical digressions. Among other national transactions, he gives an interesting relation of the persecutions of the Princess Elizabeth. But on losing sight of Sir Thomas Pope, he detracts from the merit of his performance, considered as a composition. The principal figure in the picture being eclipsed by the decorations that surround it, the eye is fixed on the latter, and neglects the former. Indeed, the life of a person whose capacity was slender and limited, who never sustained or merited any important office, and whose sphere of action was narrow, is not properly an object of curiosity. The mind does not willingly bestow its attention on insignificant circumstances; its sensibilities can only be awakened by what is shining and illustrious. The literary toil which should be employed in narrations concerning those who have displayed valour in the field, or wisdom in the cabinet, should never be wasted in inquiries concerning men who have acted in inferior or subordinate stations. The portion of the laborious drudge, who is put in motion at the command of a master, and who neither plans nor thinks, is silence and obscurity.

As an historian, his reputation is founded on his History of English Poetry; the very name of which warms the heart of every man of taste and elegance. An history of English poetry has long been a desideratum in the learned world. A plan of this kind had been agitated by Pope, in which our poets were classed under their supposed respective schools. It was afterwards adopted by Gray. The substance of Gray's plan, which was that of Pope, considerably enlarged, extended, and improved, is given in his 'Life.' Both these plans Warton has rejected, and has chosen to conduct his work in a chronological series; for this obvious reason, that it exhibits, without transposition, the gradual improvements of our poetry, at the same time that it uniformly represents the progression of our language. Yet he has not always adhered so scrupulously to the regularity of annals, but that he has often deviated into occasional digressions. His reasons for commencing his annals with the Norman accession, rather than the Saxon government, seem conclusive; the former being the era when our national character began to dawn. His work is introduced by a Preface, which is at once elegant and instructive, and two dissertations, on the Origin of Romantic Fiction, and, on the introduction of learning into England; in which are discovered such exquisite and genuine elegance, such profound and extensive erudition, such acute and rational deductions, that we are at a loss to determine what is their prevailing beauty; yet the analogy between European and Arabian legends, and the probable accounts how the same spirit and genius of fiction might be transferred from Asia to these northern climes, are not, as it should seem, a probable solution, even with the assistance of the Crusades, for the nature and variety of European romances. Much we conceive, must still be left for the native exertions and the original product of invention. The innumerable hords that migrated from the North-East, and overflowed the West, were not without their romantic fictions; of a different species, indeed, from the Arabic fabling; but the latter came quickly to incorporate with them; and the romance of the Arab seemed only as a splendid caparison to the chivalry of the Goth. To his opinion with respect to the peculiar influence of women under the Gothic establishment, we readily subscribe; but the small degree of attention and respect with which the Greeks and Romans treated the fair sex, and that inconsiderable share which they were permitted to take in conversation, and the general commerce of life, seem carried to an extreme which the classical writers (to whom he appeals) will scarcely warrant. Had the female insignificance and seclusion, ascribed to classic times, been predicated of the women of modern Greece, the remark had been just. But fixed on the eras of Sophocles and Alcibiades, of Propertius and Tibullus Brutus and Cato, it loses all manner of propriety. In regard to the second dissertation, and that on the Gesta Romanorum, prefixed to the third volume, we have nothing to do but to approve and admire. The period of antiquity at which he commences his work, is by no means a field for popular recreation. Some of the flowers, indeed, which may be collected in a scene so vast and uncultivated; are neither without fragrance nor beauty; but these are not to be enjoyed by a taste formed upon modern composition. The obsolete terms, and uncouth numbers, through which the few rays of genius which appear in that remote era must appear, almost eclipse their lustre; and leave it entirely indiscernible, except to such eyes as are accustomed to derive pleasure from a long and distant retrospect. These observations will apply to the various extracts given of metrical romances, and other legendary performances, from the commencement of the history till the days of Chaucer. We do not deny, but that Langland has merit; his descriptions are picturesque, his characters just and natural, and his satire poignant; but the harsh versification, and antiquated style in which he writes, must render these beauties imperceptible to the greatest number of readers; and we must still denominate the age of Chaucer not only the era of refinement in English versification, but even the dawn of poetical genius. How glorious the meridian at which it arrived, under the auspices of Spenser, Shakspeare, and Milton, we need not attempt to describe.

The predominant features of this agreeable and instructive work, are elegant composition, acute and genuine criticism, and literary research. But it is not Warton's principal merit, that he investigates his subject with the patience of an antiquary, and the acuteness of a critic; from his accurate delineation of character, it is evident that he has inspected the manners of mankind as they, occasionally pass before him, with the penetrating eye of a philosopher. This praise he has merited by his preliminary Dissertations by his elaborate account of Chaucer and his poetry, and by his reflections tending to establish a full estimate of the genius of the poetry of Queen Elizabeth's reign; which compose the concluding section of his third volume. The History of English Poetry has rare and striking merits, and may be justly considered as a valuable accession to English literature. But it is not without its defects. He has shown, it would seem, more solicitude in collecting his materials, than perspicuity and accuracy in arranging them. Hence it has been found so dry and oppressive, as to subdue the eagerness of the generality of readers; and hence nearly one fourth of the second volume is filled with errata and amendments to the first; a circumstance the more remarkable, as he was not tied down to precipitate publication by a subscription; as his business was literature; as he had been long accustomed to the use of the press; and as he was equally possessed of learning and leisure.

MEDICAL.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

DISSERTATIO MEDICA INAUGURALIS,

MENTIS LITERARUM STUDIOSE INCITAMENTIS,
MALIS ET REGIMINE.

AUCTORE ANDREA STEWART.

EX conditione ista quæ homini obigit, ratio naturæ intelligentis undique enitet.

Corporis ipsius forma vel ad usum accommodatior, vel ad speciem pulchrior fingi non potest. Sensus, tanquam animi speculatores, ex conformatione situque suo, et ad res percipiendas, et à periculo cavendum, callidissime sunt accommodati. Membrorum structura artuumque nexus, stabilitatem simul facilemque motum corpori præstant. Intestina fabricam insuper ita machinata est natura, ut, dum pulmones apertissimi sunt ad ducendum spiritum istum, qui sanguinem vi sua vitali identidem imbuunt, liquore gastrico, motuque ventriculi et intestinorum concoquatur cibus; unde à lactiferis secernitur et resorbetur succus iste, quo nutrimur, qui tunc ad cor fluit, et inde in omnes partes permanat; et ex fluido isto corpus subinde reficitur, et ad omnia ejus munera aptum evadit. Huic machinæ tam multiplici etiam, quo homo ex omni parte instructus, consilioque naturæ dignior existat, præfectus est animus, variis facultatibus et dotibus præditus. Et inde fit ut longè inter cætera animalia emineat. Hic enim dum aliorum corpora prona sunt, sublimis oris aspectus, sensusque latè rerum interpretes dati fuerunt. Dum cætera corporis tantum, hic et mentis ingenii oblectatione perficitur. Hujus igitur causa, terra condita et ornata fuisse videtur; et in ea, si fortè legum rationisque naturæ interpret fieri, aut ingenii vim insitam pulchritudinem ejus contemplando polire cupiat, quanta rerum et ad cultum (ne dicam usum) delectationemque ejus comparata est ubertas! Nam ut mentis ipsius dotes nunquam satis mirandas præteream,....quis unquam vel rei minutissimæ fabricam speciemque; vel mundi ipsius ordinem, venustatem et amplitudinem perlustraverit, qui in iis solertiam, et rationem prorsus divinam, non agnovit? Qualia sunt vis et sapientia ista, ex quibus non solum materiæ brutæ planè et inertis atomi mutationes subire, et chemicè seipsos disponere queant, sed constantes etiam fiunt astrorum motus, quorum si vel unum fuerit deturbatum, ingentem secum traheret ruinam?

Quisnam putet, ni mens ista divinior desit, annum cursum et quotidianam terræ conversionem, efficientes tam ratas tempestatum dieique noctisque vicissitudines, et unde tanta et tam varia hominibus proveniunt commoda, rem esse indignam, cui studium impenderet? Et si animum ad orbem ipsum, quem homines incolæ teneant, ex omni parte instructum, et in usum eorum accommodatum verteremus, quanta et quam latè accedunt mentis rerum studiosæ incitamenta!...Quam justum libramen istud, quod oceanum inter et tellurem intervenit! et quantum, ut alia præteream, vel in forma ipsa orbis agnoscitur! notum est enim iis, qui operam physicæ dederint, terras, si iste omnino rotandus esset, mari oppletas et obrutas fore.

Quis porro non videt, ut aër iste tenuis, qui nos undique, velut oceanus quidam æthereus involvit et circumfluit, dum aliter vitam foveat, animanti cuique spiritum salutiferam largiatur! Et quoniam usu multo noxius paulatim fieret, natura instituit, ut frigus acre et venti agitantis qui mare summum tractusque virentes præstringunt, continuo vim ejus renouent, et ad munera sua idoneum reddant. Hujus insuper talis est natura, ut circum orbem fusus subinde, præsertim quum venti æquora soli subdita perfiant, magna vi aquæ imbutus evadit. Hæc primò per campos longè liquentes diffusa, deinde in nubes coacta, iterum in terras pluvia effunditur. Hinc fiunt fontium perennitates, fluminum lapsus et humus latè mollis et segeti apta. Ex sole caloris luminisque fonte etiam speciem ornatiorem induit natura, et volente anno quasi vita et lætitia perfunditur undique terra. Hinc verè novo, cæli imbris et solis calore fotæ, gemmas protrudunt arbores, et campi longe virescunt. Lætæ hinc sub æstate proveniunt segetes, fervet latè opus, pecudes pastu gaudent, et arident omnia circum. Hinc denique autumnus flavis vestit agros aristis, et dum lætum ubique conciliat animum, cuique animanti victum copiosè largitur.

Quàm varia præterea et exploratu digna est, ista morum, vitæ, et conformationis, quæ in singulis animantium generibus agnoscitur, ratio! Horum alia gradiendo, alia serpendo, aves volando, et pisces denique nando apta, natura effinxit. Mirè quoque iis regionibus, quas singula incolunt, accommodata fuerunt; sub septentrione enim villorum aut lanæ vestitus est contra frigus tutamini; dum meridiem versus, pilosus et tenuior pellis, ne corpus æstu lædatur efficit. Sunt etiam plerumque armis, præsidii causa instructa; et ne plura dicam, instinctibus istis gaudent, quibus quodque eorum etiam si ratione expers in seligendo idoneo cibo, et procreando atque conservando genere suo, certissimè regitur.

Sed dum hæc singula quasi jure suo, animum ad scientiam et studia humaniora ducunt; species rerum universa vix minùs eodem tendit. Quis enim unquam, naturæ mutationes indentidem subleant copiam, decus et amplitudinem, præsertim si ingenium ad musas proclivius esset, perlustraverit, cui non erat voluptati?

Si ad terræ interiora spectes, ibi vis magna metallorum recruduit,....ibique natura immania semper et inexplandanda molitur. Facilis humus undique dum cælum æstiva luce recluditur, flores, fruges, fructusque fundit; et inter hyemem cum etiam, folia deciderint, et terræ ornatus latè senuerit,....vastitas immanis, nubila, tenebræ et fulgura coruscantia, dum cordi humano aliter terrorem incutiunt, menti ingenuæ voluptatem quandam præaltam subministrant. Natura quidem nunc speciem augustam potiùs, vel etiam horrendam, nunc verò lenem, cultam, et venustiore inquit. Pulchritudo et majestas quædam abnormis ubicunque regnant.

Hic montes silvestres attolluntur, illic valles jacent per quas errant amnes. Hic arva segete læta patent, illic saltus et lustra ferarum. Huc adde lenes rivorum strepitus, vestitus riparum, concentus avium, nemorumque comas.

'Speluncæ,' etiam, 'vivique lacus, et frigida Tempe,'....mugitusque boùm, mollesque sub arbore somni,....non absunt.

Has inter amenitates, cum cælos latè patentes, cum mare ingens subinde refluens, et terras tanta varietate distinctas, lustremus, tanquam liquida voluptate perfunditur animus. Numen aliquod persentire videmur, quod naturam universam pervadit, conservat, quasi anima imbuunt, et latè pulchritudine ornat. Et in hac tanta rerum ubertate, quomodo fieri potest, quin animus ingenuus, si locus modò doctrinam excolendo datus fuerit, amore ejus corripere?

Plura autem restant. Literæ enim istæ, quibus artes atque res hominum gestæ, poetarum munera, et quicquid unquam de naturæ ordine et ratione compertum fuit, memoriz fuerunt prodita,....fiunt etiam quasi cognitionis fontes, et studiorum incitamenta.

Et inde, prout sua quemque trahat indoles, vel cultum, vel scientiam abunde haurire licet. Hoc modò vetustas reviviscit, et cum viris istis clarioribus, quorum vitæ et exempla nobis sunt proposita, colloquimur. Ortus et provector ætas Scientiarum, cum divitiis, ut ita dicam, mentis humanæ cunctis, nisu multo, et per longinqua tempora comparatis, recluduntur. Cultum, sapientiam, incepta, et quodcunque vel hominum singulorum, vel gentium memoria dignius fuerint intuemur, et intuetu suscipimus. Quum homines igitur sese ad studia humaniora contulissent, innumera ferè, si ingenio saltem acriore sint, animum percipiunt. Scientiæ fontes undique patent. Dulcedo quædam gloriæ sese subdit; atque proventus fructus simul et delectationis quam plurimus, dum ulteriora petunt, remuneratur ita ut, quò plùs scient, eò plùs scire cupiant. Doctrinam excolendo quidem, animus, haud aliter quàm corpus inter cibum et exercitiationem, validus et potens fit; et revera, homines isti, qui animum ita disciplina quadam rationis altiore conformarunt, et ditaverunt, vix minùs ab aliis, quàm hi à cæteris animalibus distant. Dotes, quibus ad consilium, imperium, cæteraque vitæ munera difficiliora pollent, excelsiores sunt, et quæ præmia honoris sibi, quasi jure suo, vindicant. Et ubinam genitum, quidem, fuit iste unquam tam ferus et immensuetus repertus, qui etiam si nequam possideret, tamen possidendas et laudandas esse censeret?

Sin verò delectatio sola peteretur,....unde aptius vel uberius, quàm ex Studiorum cultu, quæ homines semper, 'esse animi remissionem liberalissimam et humanissimam judicant,' haurire liceat? 'Cætera enim,' ut ait Cicero, 'neque omnium hominum sunt, neque temporum, neque locorum: sed hæc studia adolescentiam alunt, senectutem oblectant; secundas res ornant, adversis perfrugium et solatium præbent; delectant domi, non impediunt foras, pernoctant nobiscum, peregrinantur, rusticantur.'

Sed, quum vita, rerum literarumque studiis decita, ita incitamentis et deliciis suis abundet,....ex altera parte fatendum est, eam sæpe etiam malis et incommodis stipari. Et, quoniam omnes, in re tantæ magnitudinis versatos, eniti oportet, ut qualia sint et quomodo effugienda compertum habeant,....de causis atque naturâ eorum fusius aliquid disserere erit necesse.

Mala igitur, quibus studiorum amantiores sunt obnoxii, et fonte vario proveniunt; atque eò semper graviora sunt, quod mens culta et expolita acris persentit. Furtim plerumque obrepunt; et molestiæ aliquid, potiùs quàm damni, sub initio præ se ferunt. Si quando autem diutius invaluisse, sævitiam quandam insolitam, ni fortiter iis obviam itum fuerit, sibi adiscunt; et tandem eò usque nonnuquam, ut et animi corporisque vires labefactarint et perdiderint, evaserunt.

Sed ut altius omnia repetamus:....cum homines operam literis dederint, nulla forsitan res est, quæ sese malis ubertiorum præstat, quàm doctrinæ nimia et intempestiva coactatio. Et in hanc plerumque necessitate quadam incidunt.

Ubique animus in studia humanitatis et scientiæ proclivior est, vi alta ingenii ac rationis ferè semper gaudet: et dum ordinem naturæ perquirat, vel opes vetustatis recolit, delectatur, non solum propterea quod doctrina locupletatus fuerit, sed etiam quod usus et honores, quibus doctrinæ ista inserviat, præspicit. Et inde fit, ut, quo plus comperiat, eò vis major accedat incitamenti. Siquis igitur, facultate quadam philosophiæ præditus, et hoc modo concitatus, in studia sua totus incubuerit, vix aliter in iis versabatur, quin tandem animus ejus in nisum cogitationis perpetuum sese daret. Et, ex hujusmodi consuetudine, si forte usu diuturniore obfirmata fuerit, quanta et quam varia proveniunt mala! Modus est in rebus quem nemo unquam impune transgressus est. Mens ipsa, fortasse, ita snapte natura fuerit conformata, ut vim cogitandi facile perferre queat. Sed, dum corpori, quod planè inexcitabile est, multisque casibus obnoxium, præsît, ex mutuo eorum et mirando quidem nexu et consensu, altera alterius habitui semper obtemperatur. Et quoniam, inter nisum mentis nimium vel diuturniorem, corpus, dum motibus ejus paret, labefactatur, mens ipsa, haud aliter, ut ita dicam, quàm arcus, qui tensus diu manserit, elasticitatem ejus simul incumbendo perdit. Huic etiam accedit, quod menti contemplationi deditæ, cum in ulteriora semper nititur, quodcunque munus ab hac vitæ ratione alienum, sese obtulerit, invisum ferè erit. Et, siquando res aliqua cogitationes ejus subito dimoverit, et delectationem, qua jam potitura erat, surripuerit, fieri non potest, quin tædii ac perturbationis multum ei exinde conciliaretur.

Quinetiam hæcce literarum aviditas studiosos facile in secessum urget. Domi fere sese abdunt, quod locus ibi minùs interpellationi datur: Et, si modo mentis ingenique voluptate perfruantur, et doctrinæ opes, paulatim fortassè vel sibi ipsis inutiles futuras, undique comparent, omnium, quæcumque ad corporis sanitatem pertineant, juxta sunt improvidi. Dum alii inter suos latantur, vel, per agros fortassè vagantes, subinde vires ex aère puro et exercitatione repetunt, illi suâ sponte ab his omnibus exulant. Sed, quoniam sese impune à naturâ diu alienare nequeunt, malis paulatim obidentur. Tenebrosus aliquid mentem suffundit; et, sine dôtibus istis salutiferis, quas aër et exercitatio ministrant, sanguis quasi venis moratur, nervi soluti fiunt, et systema totum rapidum, laxum, et effæctum evadit.

In consuetudine autem mentis rerum literarumque studiosæ, alia, præter nisum intempestivum, ferè nocent.

Commercium vitæ solitum plerisque est voluptati. Sed, quo res ita sese habeat, multa quidem, quæ docti rariùs sunt, veluti morum comitas urbanior, et sales quidam, vel levis saltem sermonis facilitas, debent accedere. Exulanti verò, ut ita dicam, ab aliis, et contemplationi altæ perpetuò dedito, nec locus idoneus ferè nec indoles, quæ ad hujusmodi cultum cum adducerent, scientiæ amantiori adsunt. Cultus externus etiam, graviore diu posthabitus, paulatim spernitur: et, quum hic desit, siquando in cœtu solitò versetur, brevi ferè constat dotes, quibus ad scientiæ munera præalta valeat, cum ingenio istius, levis, ac festivi, minimè convenire.

Sed dum solito colloquio ita parum aptus sit, ex altera parte, sæpiùs ab eo suâ sponte abhorret. Diu nova et recondita exquirere et mirari assueti, quod aliis in aperto est, et communis equidem sermonis consuetudo, vix oblectamenti aliquid offerunt. Et revera, dum, scientiæ amore inexplabili percitus, spatium cogitationis suæ undique ampliare conatur, respicere, et cum aliis, de his rebus, quæ jam amplius mentis complexum adimplere, vel novi aliquid subministrare nequeunt, colloqui, est, quod rariùs sine inquietudinis sensu conceditur.

Ita ipsum vitæ commercium, quod, ut jam dixi, plerisque est voluptati, sæpe doloris potiùs quam remissionis conciliatrix evadit. Sub noctis adventum, è negotiis suis elapsi, mercator et artifex sese queunt in gremium consortionis pergratæ, ubi, inter nugas fortassè risusque hilaritatem, curæ mordaces citò aufugient, recipere. At post nisus mentis validos, dieique labores quantoslibet, ubi reperiri potest cœtus iste, ni fortè paucissimorum quidem, unde doctus, sese non potiùs pertæsum, et cum desiderio adamatæ solitudinis multo, eriperet?

Sed, fortasse, cultus et amplificatio mentis ipsa, sunt aliquando causæ infelicitatis ejus gravissimæ. Cæteris præjacet undique spatii inexploranti quædam amplitudo, diu inter progrediendum, novi, pulchri et excelsi aliquid, cum delectationis inde provenientis plurimo, subinde largitura. At, cum naturæ studiosi, ab altâ contemplatione destiterint, et intra limites cogitationis solitæ, ut ita dicam, sese receperint, res ferè notæ, et communes, complexui mentium suarum vix sufficiunt; ideoque, vacui, vexati, et miseri fiunt.

Est etiam, ubi, innumera ista, quæ vel recensuerunt, vel recensuri sunt, circumspicientibus, animus, vix aliter quàm si per mare altum, vastum et ignotum tenderent, obstupet et quodammodo deficit.

Ex alterâ parte, si studiosi musis operam suam potiùs dedissent, ratio mentis est nonnihil diversa; vim istam enim, quæ poetæ innascitur, contemplando speciem rerum, vel quicquid decoris et aptitudinis iis insit, quæ mens ipsa effingit, subinde expolunt. Et inde fit, ut mores ingenique hominum, vel etiam literarum, gustu quodam facillè dignoscant.

At sensus iste cultior, qui in secessu deliciarum iis plurimum præbet, foras prodeuntibus, propterea quod multum à vitæ consuetudine solita dissidet, haud rarò multum infelicitatis conciliat. In eo rerum statu, quem fictrix imaginatio simulat, quodcunque sese offerat, est ex omni parte cultum, decorum, et amabile. Concinnitas et elegantia ubique enitent. Homines, quibuscum colloquuntur, et quasi hominorantur, dôtibus ornatissimi sunt. Ingenio, cultu, et honoris atque amicitiae consuetudine quadam præaltâ et insolitâ, valent. At siquando è somniis istis excitati, prodierint, et in hac rerum hominorantur turbâ sese versari animadverterint; nihil ferè est, gustui mentis acriori conveniat. Dissimilitudo quædam, molestiæ et doloris causa uberrima, undique agnoscitur. Amicum vix inveniunt; et tædio, vel etiam fastidio, nonnunquam ducti, tandem à vitæ commercio et officiis sese ex magna parte alienarunt.

Ex hac mentis indole aliâ etiam proveniunt mala; quicquid enim illis vel molesti, vel adversi, in vitæ decursu inciderit, ab eâ ferè vim novam et aliquando sævitiam mutuât.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Observations upon certain passages in Mr. Jefferson's Notes on Virginia, which appear to have a tendency to Subvert Religion, and established a False Philosophy.

[Concluded.]

In the course of this curious train of evidence against the blacks, Mr. Jefferson says 'It would be unfair to follow them to Africa for this investigation. We will consider them here, on the same stage with the whites, and where the facts are not apocryphal on which a judgment is to be formed.' What! would it be unfair to view them in their own country and native condition, where the better sort live fearless and unrestrained? And does justice bid us examine their mental powers, while in a state of servitude, rendered sullen by ignominy, and broken down by labour? And although in large and civilized communities there never appear more than a few scattered geniuses who deserve attention, does impartiality command us to criticise the talents and literary productions of a few negroes who have escaped the unhappy lot of their brethren; and because they fall far short of European excellence, to degrade their whole race below the rest of mankind? This may be modern equity, taught by modern philosophy. Mr. Park, however, who seems not to have been actuated by such refined notions of justice, has very ungenerously visited them in their own country; and he has discovered, without submitting them 'to the anatomical knife, to optical glasses, to analysis by fire or by solvents,' that almost every feature of the mental portrait which Mr. Jefferson has attempted to delineate, is as unlike the original, as the most fantastic appearance which his curious looming mountain ever assumed, was to its real figure. Mr. Park has clearly shown, in the account of his adventures, that their love is not 'more an eager desire than a tender delicate mixture of sentiment and sensation.' They appear not only susceptible of the purest love, but many of them to possess hearts so generous and compassionate, that civilized nations might profit by their example. Although they have not 'been liberally educated,' nor 'lived in countries where the arts and sciences are cultivated to a considerable degree,' they have carried their arts to a much higher degree of excellence, than to 'crayon out an animal, a plant, or a country.' And there is every reason to suppose that they are not inferior in oratory to the native Americans. This, at least, is certain, that their thoughts are often far, very far, 'above the level of plain narration.' We find, too, that misery can produce poetry among them: not their own misery, but the misery of a disconsolate and nearly famished traveller, whom their kindness relieved. And while they have subjects like the story of Denman and Abdulkader, we must acknowledge that, however rude their compositions, the heroes of their songs are not inferior in magnanimity to any in the Iliad or Æneid. The last argument which is brought against their being of the same species with the whites, is a comparison between them and the slaves of the Romans. A great deal of trouble is taken to show that the condition of the ancient slaves was much more deplorable than that of the enslaved Africans; and we are told that, 'notwithstanding these and other discouraging circumstances among the Romans, their slaves were often their rarest artists. They excelled too in science, inasmuch as to be usually employed as tutors to their master's children.' Every classical reader must be astonished that a person who presumes to quote so freely from the ancients as Mr. Jefferson has done, could, even while he was treading on classic ground, overlook this obvious distinction between the ancient and modern slaves. The negroes who are brought to this country are poor uncivilized creatures, as ignorant as they are unfortunate, and the greater part of them brought up in servitude before they come: but the ancient slaves, all know, were captives in war, oftentimes equally civilized with their conquerors, and frequently far superior to them in all the fine arts and useful sciences. No wonder, then, that they should be often freed, and even employed as instructors.

Græcia capta ferum victorem cepit, et artes Intulit agresti Latio.

A precious sample this of philosophical reasoning: because the uncivilized Africans are not as good sculptors and poets as were the enslaved Greeks, they are not worthy to be called men. Mr. Jefferson, however, very tenderly advises us not to draw a hasty conclusion, as that 'conclusion would degrade a whole race of men from the rank in the scale of beings which their Creator may perhaps have given them.' Very pretty truly! the scale of beings which their Creator may perhaps have given them. Now let the reader add to this piece of tender advice the following passage; and if prejudice has not cast a veil before him darker than night, he cannot but perceive that the whole drift of what we have been examining is to establish the brutal theory mentioned at the beginning of this long paragraph. The passage is this: 'It is not against experience to suppose, that different species of the same genus, or varieties of the same species, may possess different qualifications. Will not a lover of natural history, then, one who views the gradations in all the races of animals with the eye of philosophy, excuse an effort to keep those in the department of man, as distinct as nature has formed them? Here let us leave the black men. And the reader, no doubt, is as happy to quit this tiresome investigation as is the writer.

We will say nothing of Mr. Jefferson's seventeenth Query, in which he treats of the different religions in the State of Virginia. The principal arguments in it are adduced to prove the impropriety of a religious establishment; the merits or demerits of which it is not our business to discuss. And as to the unbecoming levity with which religion in general is there treated, William Smith, Esq. of South-Carolina, in the Letters of Phocion, has already exposed it so judiciously and so handsomely, that every body who is displeased with Mr. Jefferson's book must regret that Mr. Smith himself did not undertake to 'scrutinize and strip it of its borrowed garb.'

Thus have we gone through the principal parts in the Notes on Virginia which appear hostile to the religion of our forefathers. And it is hoped that no misrepresentation has been made, and nothing indecorous uttered. If, however, these observations be guilty of any injustice, the writer of them solemnly declares that he is unconscious of it; and, as an honest man, would rejoice to be corrected.

It is easy enough to deny any thing. The axioms in mathematics have been denied; even our existence has been doubted. But can any person who believes the testimony of his senses and reason, deny that the book which offers a theory of the earth contrary to the scripture account of the creation; which denies the possibility of an universal deluge; which considers the Bible history as no better than ordinary tradition; which extols Voltaire and the French Encyclopedists, the imps who have inspired all the wickedness with which the world has of late years been infested; which says that the natives of America are older than those of Asia, though scripture says that the world was peopled from one pair, placed in Asia; which considers it as a doubtful matter whether the blacks be really men, or only an intermediate grade between us and the brutes; and which esteems all religions 'good enough;' can he deny that this book is an instrument of infidelity? Surely not: it bears the stamp of modern philosophy as palpably as Le compère Matthieu; not from its learning or ingenuity, but from the insidious manner in which it conveys what are called its philosophical doctrines. At all events, if by twisting and glossing over the passages quoted, a doubt can possibly remain as to the justice of the charge brought against them, it must be confessed that the author of the Notes on Virginia is one of the most confused and unintelligible writers that ever the world produced. And all good Christians should ardently hope that he would prefer the imputation of being a bad composer, to the suspicion of being an humble follower of modern French philosophers. Wretched, indeed, is our country, if she is to be enlightened by these philosophers; philosophers whose industry is equalled by nothing but their vanity, whose pursuits are impeded by no danger nor difficulty; by no law, human or divine; who think nothing too great for them to grasp, and nothing too minute to be observed: they dig into the bowels of the earth, and climb the loftiest mountains; they traverse the ocean, and explore the regions of air; they search the written records of antiquity, and the traditions of savages; they build up theories of shells and bones and straws. And for what? Is it to render more stable the uncertain condition of man? Is it to alleviate one of the miseries which afflict his nature? No; it is to banish civilization from the earth, that we may be reduced to the state of savages; to pluck from the wretched their sweetest consolation; to extinguish the only light by which the Christian hopes to cheer the gloomy hour of death; to quench the thirst for immortality which the Creator has attached to our nature; to degrade us from the rank of angels, to which we are taught to aspire, that we may complete the catalogue of brutes. In Great Britain, thanks to her pious and learned divines and philosophers, they have been silenced and put to confusion. There, a veteran band has met them face to face; has given them blow for blow, fact for theory, solid reason for superficial gloss, and contempt for ridicule. But in this country, though no one has genius to write like Voltaire, and though party squabbles engross the principal attention of the community; yet, when the business of regulating the commonwealth affords leisure for other considerations, there is hardly a young spark to be found who is not a profound pollician, and a philosopher into the bargain. The newly licensed attorney, who can scarcely draught a declaration; the merchant's clerk, whose highest knowledge is to get a note discounted; the young doctor, who does not know the difference between the 'skin and scarf skin;' and the young buck, who knows nothing at all; can all talk, by the hour, about the rights of man, and about mammoth bones and oyster-shells; they can make it as plain as an axiom, that all mankind are as equal as a set of ninepins; and that Moses knew no more about the age of the world than a Mohock.

The writer cannot conclude these remarks without expressing his regret that more of the well-disposed among his young countrymen do not devote their leisure hours to the attainment of useful learning, rather than to frivolous amusements or political wrangling. If more took pains to understand the nature of the subjects about which they pretend to dispute, there would necessarily be more thinking, and less talking; and we might reasonably expect that sober investigation would take place of that illiberal and individual abuse which is so prevalent; more becoming the Moors of Ludamar than civilized Americans. If but a few young men of talents would devote their spare hours to the attainment of true knowledge, and join hand and heart together, they might in time become a Spartan phalanx, which would, at least, make a noble, if not a successful stand against the barbarian host, who, it is to be feared, are silently plotting to throw off the restraints of religion, and to bear down the essential principles of government.

REV. MR. ABERCROMBIE'S SERMON.

We understand, from valid authority, that, in consequence of the request of many of the literary and political friends of the Rev. JAMES ABERCROMBIE, that gentleman intends, in the course of a few weeks, to publish his sermon on the death of General HAMILTON. Themes so copious and interesting, as the baneful practice of duelling, and the last mournful consequence of this Gothic vice, will not only excite, but, we may take leave to add, will display the powers of the reverend orator, as a Christian minister, and an eloquent panegyrist.

NEW TRANSLATION OF VOLNEY'S TRAVELS IN AMERICA.

The celebrated author of Travels through Syria, has very lately published at Paris Tableau du Climat et du sol des Etats Unis, &c. For the honour of our country, we are happy to learn that a translation of this interesting work is now in a state of great forwardness, by Mr. CHARLES B. BROWN, of this city, whose talents as an author in various walks of literature have been long advantageously known to the public, and whose scrupulous purity of style, industrious habits, and knowledge of the French idiom, render him fully adequate to the task of a translator. We have had the double opportunity of seeing a portion of Mr. Brown's translation, and that published for Mr. Johnson, the British bookseller. It gives us pleasure to add, that the domestic version is fully equal, if not superior, to the foreign; and, for the reputation of a very ingenious man of letters, and the emolument of one of the most respectable booksellers in America, we sincerely wish that these travels may be purchased with avidity, and criticised with candour.

LEVITY.

[From Gray's Norfolk Register.]

CIRCULAR LETTERS—Are not more common from our knowing members of congress to their constituents, than they are from the kind, attentive, and intelligent merchants of the Hans-Towns to their friends in America. These latter, also, never fail to print their circulars, which they generally send in duplicate and triplicate; with price-current and other papers inclosed, in such quantities, as to amount to no trifling sum for postage in the course of a year. Another circumstance attends the receipts of those communications; from ignorance of the topography of this country, or carelessness of the expense occasioned, the writers frequently send them to that port most distant from their address. Many acts of retaliation have been practised; a merchant of Baltimore once inclosed to Rucker and Wortmann of Hamburg one hundred of their own letters, by way of Spain—and a wag in Philadelphia, some years ago, addressed the following letter to another Hamburg house, which we republish as a specimen of good practical humour.

Philadelphia, Dec. 10, 1797.

To Mr. J. Amberg, a merchant in Hamburg.

I had the peculiar satisfaction of receiving, on the 7th instant, by the way of Baltimore, your very respectable favour of the first of January last, covering a price-current of Hamburg, and a state of your market for articles of import as well as export.

Having been honoured with several like communications from you, by the way of Boston, New-York, &c. for which I have paid several dollars postage, I thought it but just and grateful to make some handsome acknowledgements of such singular favours, and have, therefore, inclosed, for your perusal, Poulson's Almanac, for the present year, in which you will find some very shrewd prognostics of the weather; and although the year will in a few days expire, yet it will, no doubt, afford you great pleasure to know that we mostly have some kind of weather in this outlandish country; and, furthermore, it must prove very agreeable to be informed of the kind we have had even in times past.

For your further information, I have sent herewith 'Gale's Independent Gazetteer,' for Jan. 3, 1797; in it you will perceive advertised for sale, 'twenty thousand weight of rappee snuff, fit for exportation;' a capital job; and several other advertisements and articles of equal value and present utility.

I have annexed, for your particular government, a list of several articles of domestic produce and manufacture, which, I have no doubt, will also contribute much to your advantage.

This goes via England, and you may expect to have the benefit of frequently hearing from me in the same way. Waiting your very agreeable commands, I am yours, &c.

PRICES-CURRENT,

INCLOSED IN THE ABOVE LETTER.

Potato's—Small ones, 2s. 10d. to 3s. 3d. per bushel; large and mealy, 3s. 9d. to 4s. 6d.

Cabbage—Small and rough, 2d. to 4d. per head; large, fit for sour-croute, 6d. to 10d.

Onions—Red and strong 5d. to 10d. per rope; white and comfortable, 1s. 3d. to 1s. 10d.

THE CONVENIENCE OF COUGHING.

[From the Sentimental Magazine.]

SIR,

There are few disorders incident to the human frame, which people seem more desirous of curing than a cough. For their timidity, in this respect, I never could obtain a proper reason. Coughing is, unquestionably, in some cases, attended with a degree of pain; but, have we actually arrived at an age of light, and reason, and philosophy, and yet cannot endure a little pain? Admitting that the pain is on some occasions troublesome; or granting that it is, on those occasions, much greater than it has been represented; is there nothing to balance it? Is not the possession of a cough, and the liberty of using it when we please, an advantage of the first importance? It is, indeed, so valuable a substitute for speech, that I do not see how we can part with it, without suppressing those opinions, which we are not allowed to give in words.

The great utility of coughing appears principally in the senate, the pulpit, and at the bar. To begin with the senate. Suppose a member had made a speech so long as to become tiresome, and so dull as to create no interest, and that he still persists in wearing out the patience of his hearers, what are they to do? None of them dare to interrupt him in words; not even the Speaker of the house himself can request him to conclude before he pleases. What then is to be done? Why, sir, half a dozen, or a dozen of his brethren begin a coughing chorus, which they repeat until he is completely put to silence. And it very fortunately happens that this venerable assembly hold their sittings in winter, when coughs are more frequent than at any other season, and when, consequently, a member may provide himself with this method to reply, at a very easy rate.

In the church, coughing is of considerable service. If the rev. Mr. A—, or the dean of B—, or the bishop of C—, happen to say any thing which seems to allude to a person or persons present, they can immediately communicate their opinions to one another, by a gentle, tickling cough, ay, and understand each other through a whole dialogue, at the expense of the preacher, who thinks, poor man! that their lungs are touched; whereas it is only their consciences.

At the bar, during the harangue of some able and eloquent lawyer, I have often heard a clandestine cough between his opponent and the jury, which was translated into very plain English when they came to give their verdict. Winks and nods any person may detect, but the language of coughing is confined to your old practitioners.

In the private intercourses of life, the advantage of coughing have, I dare say, been experienced by most persons who will honour this letter with a perusal. At the tea-table, when characters come to be discussed, upon which occasion it may not be always safe to speak out, a cough supplies the want of words. Praise an absent character, and accompany your words with a proper intermixture of coughing, and the company will immediately understand that you mean the very reverse of what you say. In another case, when a person advances any thing to which you are not disposed to assent, but which, for certain reasons, you do not choose to contradict, a cough will explain your intention very fully. This is particularly useful when listening to what old aunts and uncles advance, from whom we have great expectations, and who, therefore, must not be thwarted. It will likewise often happen that we are tempted to laugh, and yet must suppress it: this is exceedingly painful, especially when we see another person in the same situation. The laugh begins involuntarily; but any expert person may soon change it into a fit of coughing; and when he is black in the face, who will dare to dispute the severity of the disease?

In playing at cards, I know, from experience, that coughing is much resorted to, although I can by no means defend any practice that is unfair. The Tabithas and Dorothys, however, do not scruple to inform each other of the state of their hands by means of a gentle coughing duet, intelligible only to themselves, I am convinced I have lost many a game because my opponents were not provided with pectoral lozenges, or sat with their back to the door, or slept with a window open, or some other cause; while I well know they would not have parted with their cough for five shillings per night.

I have thus, Sir, set down at random some of the advantages of coughing; and I hope that the ingenious gentleman who executes the medical department of your Magazine, will hereafter mention this disorder with a becoming tenderness, and not hint at a cure, which, I am persuaded, would be to all the personages above mentioned a very great misfortune.

I am, Sir, &c.

SECOND VOLUME OF

PINKERTON'S GEOGRAPHY.

Messrs. CONRAD have, with great care and expense, at length completed an edition of a most valuable scientific work, and vol. II, of Pinkerton's Geography, exhibiting a view of our own country, will probably be perused with still more interest, than the first. During the progress of this work through the Press, we have had leisure to examine the criticisms of every Literary Journal which deserves attention, either for its age, accuracy, or reputation. We find an universal suffrage of the critics, in favour of these volumes, and the Edinburgh Review which is not less remarkable for its rigour of analysis, and the severity of its strictures, than for sparkling wit, and ingenuity of illustration has very liberally extolled our author. Even the Anti-Jacobin, a journal which is austere to that party in politics, of which, it is supposed, Mr. Pinkerton is a member, has, on this occasion, omitted all acrimony of invective, to give place to the most candid commendation. It appears, therefore, that this ingenious, copious, and useful system of a science, at once popular and indispensable, is eminently entitled to the patronage of the American Public, and we have the satisfaction to state that the enterprising booksellers, who have embarked in an expensive undertaking, will not be reluctantly rewarded for their useful labour.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AMERICAN EDITION OF FERGUSON'S ROMAN HISTORY.

Messrs. Poyntell and Co. will shortly put to press Dr. FERGUSON'S History of the Progress and Termination of the Roman Republic. Few books of the historical class abound more in sterling good sense, and practical wisdom, than this instructive narrative of the exploits and dissensions of a great people. The style of Dr. Ferguson is manly, nervous, perspicuous and simple. It is not perpetually 'ambitious of ornament.' It does not so much resemble the tawdry purple of Gibbon and Gillies, as the more modest array of Xenophon and Cæsar. It is the style not of declamation, but of business; and to adopt a fine allusion from HORACE, Splendat usu.

This excellent work has passed through five editions, by the last of which the American copy will be regulated. The Publishers, studious of the reader's economy and convenience, intend to compress the five volumes into three. These will be carefully and elegantly printed, in a manner, which will not dishonour the American press, nor tarnish the reputation of a book, which the soldier may study for its military, and the statesman, for its political, science; a work, whose lessons, if they do not inspire additional confidence in the old theories of Government, will, at least, deter the most outrageous Patriot from rashly tempting the new.

Mr. H. Maxwell, has printed in a very beautiful manner, a small edition in octavo, of Campbell's 'Pleasures of Hope,' together with many fugitive Poems, some of which have never before appeared, except in ephemeral publications. This edition is rendered still more valuable to the lover of fine Poetry, in consequence of the agreeable addition of that charming Poem, 'The Pleasures of Memory.' This elegant volume is

* This is a new Journal of Literature, published quarterly in the capital of Scotland; and, as we are informed from the most correct and respectable authority, is conducted by a club of Oxford and Edinburgh scholars, who have displayed so much Genius, Learning and industry in their critical researches, that their Review, though still in its infancy, rivals in extent of public patronage, the most favoured of the old and established Journals. In the front of these Scottish Critics, we find the name of H. Brougham, Esq. who has recently distinguished himself by a profound and eloquent work, on the Colonial Policy of Great Britain. We have had an opportunity, which we eagerly enjoyed, to peruse some of the initial numbers of the Edinburgh Review, and, with the exception of a very few articles, either of dangerous latitude, or fastidious and merciless censure, we had every reason to admire the wit, and acuteness of the ingenious young men, who, under 'the shelter of academic bowers' so ably analyse the Literature of the age.

a favourable specimen of American typography; and we are assured by one, whose professional employment demands a diligent scrutiny of the pages, and who has brighter eyes to detect the moles of error, than we, that this is nearly an immaculate edition.

Mr. James Humphreys, has published an excellent, and greatly improved edition of Montefiore's Commercial Dictionary. The Publisher has obtained the assistance of some ingenious American, who has manifested great industry, as well as ability, in the useful task of correcting and enlarging this work. It is incomparably superior to the London edition, and in its present reformed state, ought to be the manual of every merchant. The nature, extent, and use of the various alterations in these volumes are very well indicated in a Preface by the American editor, written with perspicuity, spirit and elegance.

LAW INTELLIGENCE. COURT OF KING'S BENCH

THE KING V. STEPHENS AND AGNEW.

This case was argued to-day at great length, and with universally acknowledged ability, by Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Erskine, Mr. Garrow, Mr. Adam, Mr. Wood, and M. Abbott on one side; and by Mr. Dallas, and Mr. Gibbs, on the other. To detail all the arguments which the ingenuity of Counsel suggested on so apparently simple a point, as the legal definition of the word 'until,' would occupy at least three columns of a newspaper; for the arguments exhausted three hours of the time of the court, but without tiring at all the patience either of the Judges or the Jury. We shall endeavour to shew the importance of the word 'until,' in the present case with as much conciseness as perspicuity will admit of.

By the 33d. George 3. cap. 52, certain penalties are inflicted on British subjects, in the service of Government, or of the East-India Company, residing in the East-Indies, for taking bribes, &c. To constitute the completion of the offence against which the statute is directed, it is requisite that the bribe shall be taken, whilst the party taking it is resident in India, and in the service of Government, or the East-India Company. No person in a different situation comes within the meaning of the statute. The averment in the information on which the defendants were found guilty is, that they were in the service of the East-India Company, for a great length of time, to wit, from the 1st of January, 1794, until the 29th of November, 1795; and that they committed the offence, &c. on the 29th of November, 1795. On all sides it is admitted, that they could not commit the offence (as servants of the East-India Company, &c.) when divested of that character and description which is incorporated with the substance of the crime. Mr. Dallas had moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that until was a word of exclusion of the 29th November, 1795. By being described as servants, &c. until that day, they could not, he contended, commit that offence, as servants, &c. on that day. Many learned arguments were urged; many cases cited; and even some pleasantry found way into the discussion. Said the Attorney General, 'If I ask a friend to dine with me and stay until the next day, is he to order his carriage a twelve at night, before the next day?'

Mr. Erskine repeated the line—

As chaste as ice until the marriage day.

Are you to exclude the marriage day, and to presume the lady unchaste at the close of the preceding day? Yet such is the consequence of the doctrine of exclusion.

Mr. Dallas. If my friend, the Attorney General, insists on until being an inclusive term, were I to ask him to dine, and knowing his time to be precious, should say, 'I'll not send for you until dinner is ready,' I should fulfil my invitation were I to send for him when dinner is over. And Mr. Erskine's illustration is still more unfortunate, for if until be inclusive, the bride must be 'chaste as ice,' the entire of the marriage day; which my learned friend, some years ago, would not, I think, have contended for.

The Court for the present, postponed their decision.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

"Ruricola's wood is 'exempt from public haunt,' and he finds 'tongues in the trees.' We know him to be blest with that genuine independence,

..... Whose wish and care
A few paternal acres bound,
Content to breathe his native air,
In his own ground.

The political remarks and salutary cautions of HORTENSIVS claim an attentive and dispassionate perusal. The style of this writer, like his sentiments, is manly and pure, neither ranting, like the demagogues of the day, nor tawdry, like the orations of the hour. In our next number, we shall resume the thread of his speculations, and it is peculiarly agreeable to the Editor, at this time, to call the attention of his countrymen to the things which belong to their peace. It may not be dissembled, it may not be suppressed, and it shall not be spoken, in a voice craven or low, WE ARE ON THE EVE OF GREAT DISASTERS. We approach rapidly to the crisis of political fever. It imports us, therefore, vigilantly to regard and boldly to indicate the symptoms; and to act with a decisiveness, promptitude, and spirit, proportioned to the peril of the hour. The example of our correspondent, and the wishes of the Editor, are fully justified by the authority of Sir WILLIAM JONES, who was, indeed, a free, sovereign, and independent man, and who has said with truth and eloquence. "It has long been my opinion, that, in times of national adversity, those citizens are entitled to the highest praise, who, by personal exertions, or active valour, promote, at their private hazard, the general welfare; that the second rank in the scale of honour is due to those, who in the great council of the nation, or in other assemblies, legally convened, propose and enforce with manly eloquence, what they conceive to be salutary or expedient on the occasion; and that the third place remains for those persons, who, when they have neither a necessity to act, nor a fair opportunity to speak, IMPART, IN WRITING, to their countrymen such opinions as their reason approves, and such knowledge as their painful researches have enabled them to acquire.

With these restrictions, the sword, the tongue, and the pen, which have too often been employed by the worst passions to the worst purposes, may become the instruments of exalted virtue; instruments, which it is not the right only, but the duty of every man to use, who can use them."

It is our anxious wish that 'ASMODEO,' a correspondent not more a favourite with the Editor than with the public, will promptly accede to our proposition, that he would present our readers, in the form of essays, comprising two or three of the Idylls, an entire poetical version of Solomon's Songs, on the model which A. so judiciously adopted, in the charming specimens inserted in our second volume. If this exhortation of the Editor be lightly regarded by his respectable correspondent, or if a poet's indolence, or a country gentleman's occupation, interfere, still ASMODEO may be stimulated to the accomplishment of this task, so much desired by the Editor; by the assurance, that, in the opinion of the accomplished Mr. MOORE, no pastoral poetry, in any American publication, is comparable to the above specimens, versified from the elegant Epithalamium of the Ovid of Judea. In a late interview with Mr. M, a critic whose taste and judgment in polite literature would hardly be denied by the most arrogant Zoilus, we listened, with a cordial assent, to the most liberal encomium upon the peculiar qualifications of A, for this enamelled walk of tender and amatory poetry, beautiful for its happy union of the graces of nature, and simplicity with all the splendor of oriental ornament.

We hope soon to have a favourable response from A; and, meanwhile, if he wish to consult the new version, and, above all, the elegant notes of John Mason Goode, appended to this Hebrew pastoral, we can furnish him with the volume. We strenuously advise A to preserve the metre he originally adopted, as one of the principal objections to Mr. G's translation is the heaviness which his choice of stanza sometimes imposes; while, on the contrary, the vivacity and fluency of Asmodeo's measures are finely adapted to represent the Loves and Graces of Eastern Poetry.

'Harcourt's complaint of the coquetry of his Amanda, and of her visible partiality to a weak and coxcombical rival, would not be interesting even to our gayer and lounging readers. The case is not a new one, and, though it may deserve compassion, will be pronounced, by every woman, too common and trite. He, and his favoured rival are the Edwin and Sir Topaz of Dr. PARNELL.

He felt the charms of Edith's eyes,
Nor wanted hope to gain the prize,
Could ladies look within;
But, one Sir Topaz, dress'd with art,
And, if a shape can win a heart,
He has a shape to win.

'FLORIAN's correspondence is resumed, and the literary amusements of this author are not less pleasing to many, than useful to him. We gladly accept his proffer. A series of papers of that classical cast, to which he alludes, is not only highly agreeable to the Editor, but interesting to that description of scholars, which he is most solicitous to enrol on the list of his judicious friends. Critical canons, derived from the immortal work of the Poet of Mantua, must always combine beauty with use.

'Retrospect, from the moral pencil of 'E' will be regarded with great complacency by every contemplative mind. Themes of sorrow do not always weaken, they often fortify the spirit, and it refreshes the eye to be sometimes averted from the gaudy tulips of life, and to repose on the sober cypress.

An ironical 'Eulogy on the Times,' by the comic author of 'Terrible Tractoration,' is derived from a volume of original Poems, which Mr. Fessenden has very lately published in London. They add to the fair fame of this ingenious writer, and their claims to public notice are fully sanctioned by the decisive approbation of W. GIFFORD, Esq. who, we know, examined and revised the manuscript, which was submitted to his friendly criticism. We have very often manifested our respect for the opinions of the translator of JUVENAL. We venerate his principles, and we repeat his Poetry. If he has praised the Poems of our American Bard, this is a sufficient reason for their favourable reception at home and abroad.

RETROSPECT.

ADDRESSED TO W**

When youth's soft paths, by fancy's feet were worn,
And joy's gay carol wak'd the blue-ey'd morn;
'Twas mine to pour on memory's lucid stream
The sunny radiance of hope's golden beam:
To watch, with timid glance, each sparkling ray,
And, raptur'd, mark the 'vivid reflex' play—
To cull Hyblean fragrance from the bower,
The snowy blossom, and the blooming flower,
With myrtle wreaths the olive leaf to twine—
For friendship and the balm of peace were mine:
Till wisdom's voice breath'd softly in mine ear,
'Thy place of rest, Eliza, is not here;
Lean not on earth, 'twill pierce thee to the heart,
Arise! and on the wings of faith depart.'
Truth's starry seal attests the solemn sound,
And nature, trembling, felt her keenest wound;
Round my frail breast her plastic hand had wove
The soft, endearing ties of filial love;
All that was sweet, or delicate, or fair,
All that was feminine, in voice or air;
Each look, each gesture, mildly beam'd on me,
And all, my sainted mother! died with thee!
In heaven's pure image was thy virtue form'd,
By wisdom cultur'd, and by kindness warm'd;
Meek piety, with soft maternal grace,
Shone on thy brow, and smil'd upon thy face;
Thou wert the guiding star, serenely bright,
That shed on life's dim vale its mellow light.
God is my witness, that I ask'd not wealth,
Nor human honours, nor the glow of health—
But, Oh! my bursting heart! what pangs were thine!
Each treasure'd blessing calmly to resign!
Yet HE, who taught the lightning where to rise,
And heard his thunder rend the stormy skies;
That Power, who bade the foaming billows roll,
Their force can temper, and their rage control:
Can'st bind the whirlwind, bid the earthquake cease,
And, in the wreck of nature, whisper peace.

FROM THE PALLADIUM.

MESSRS. EDITORS,

If the following extract from a volume of 'Original Poems,' published in England, by THOMAS GREEN FESSENDEN, Esq. (and of which, perhaps, the writer of this article is the only person in the United States who is possessed of a copy), meets your approbation, you will please to give it a place in your useful publication. It may be well, however, for the sake of your whimsical innovators in religion and politics, whose heads are generally as weak as their hearts are wicked, to premise, that this little poem is ironical, its author no disorganizer, nor a disciple of Paine or Godwin, but indulges himself in a sneer at the expense of those, who are sedulously employed in sapping the foundations of civilization and social order.

EULOGY ON THE TIMES.

Let poets scrawl satiric rhymes,
And sketch the follies of the times,
With much caricaturing;
But I, a bon-ton Bard, declare
A set of slanderers they are,
E'en past a Job's enduring—

Let crabbed cynics snarl away,
And pious parsons preach and pray
Against the vices reigning;
That mankind are so wicked grown,
Morality is scarcely known,
And true religion waning—

Societies, who vice suppress,
May make a rumpus; ne'ertheless,
Our's is the best of ages;
Such hum-drum folks our fathers were,
They could no more with us compare
Than Hottentots with Sages.

It puts the poet in a pet,
To think of THEM, a vulgar set;
But WE, thank G—, are QUALITY!
For we have found the eighteenth century,
What ne'er was known before, I'll venture ye,
Religion's no Reality.

Tom Paine and Godwin both can tell
That there is no such thing as hell!
A doctrine mighty pleasant;
Your old wives tales of an hereafter
Are things for ridicule and laughter,
While we enjoy the present.

We've nought to do, but frisk about,
At midnight ball and Sunday rout,
And Bacchanalian revel;
To gamble, drink, and live at ease,
Our great and noble selves to please,
Nor care for man nor devil.

In these good times, with little pains,
And scarce a penny worth of brains,
A man with great propriety,
With some small risk of being hung,
May cut a pretty dash among
The foremost in society.

Good reader, I'll suppose, for once,
Thou art no better than a dunce,
But wishest to be famous;
I'll tell thee how, with decent luck,
Thou may'st become as great a buck,
As any one could name us.

When first in high-life you commence
To virtue, reason, common-sense,
You'll please to bid adieu, sir;
And, lest some brother rake be higher,
Drink, till your blood be all on fire,
And face of crimson hue, sir.

Thus you'll be dubb'd a dashing blade,
And, by the genteel world, be said
To be a man of spirit;
For stylish folks despise the chaps,
Who, think that they may rise, perhaps,
By industry and merit.

With lubric arts, and wily tongue,
Debauch some maiden, fair and young,
For that will be genteel;
Be not too scrupulous; win the fair;
Then leave the frail one to despair:
A rake should never feel.

When wine has made your courage stout,
In midnight revel sally out,
Insulting all you meet;
Play pretty pranks about the town,
Break windows, knock the watchmen down,
Your frolic to complete!

Besides exhibiting your parts,
You're sure to win the ladies' hearts
By dint of dissipation;
Since 'every woman is a rake,'
A fool may know what steps to take
To gain her approbation.

By practising these famous rules,
You'll gain from wicked men and fools
A world of admiration;

And, as we know, from good authority,
Such folks compose a clear majority,
There needs no hesitation.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

While loudly blows the hollow blast,
And all without is dark and drear,
Fond memory points to pleasures past,
And calls forth warm affection's tear.

Bright fancy oft recalls the hours,
Which stole on downy wings away,
When friendship twin'd her fairest flowers,
To deck my brow with colours gay.

Remember'd joys, like pleasing dreams,
Leave sweet impressions on the heart;
When through life's clouds affection beams,
It takes from woe its keenest dart.

SELECTED POETRY.

VERSES ON SHAKESPEARE.

On a biforked hill, with fame's ever-green crown'd,
Encircled with azure serene;
Whilst the sylphs of his fancy play'd wantonly round,
Willy Shakespeare enliven'd the scene.

As all-pensive he sat, keen-ey'd Wisdom drew near,
Just sent from the regions above;
And smiling she whisper'd this truth in his ear,
Thy lays breathe the spirit of Jove.

To his side came the muse of the bowl and the blade

To hail him great prince of her art;
Whilst Comedy round all those dimples display'd,
That give a brisk pulse to the heart.

Bright Genius approach'd him with pleasing respect,

In her arms a young eagle she bore,
To shew, if unshackled with icy neglect,
To what wonderful heights she could soar.

Recumbent before him, straight dropt the sweet maid,

And expanding the wings of her bird,
'Take the quill of Sublimity, SHAKESPEARE,' she said,

'And go fashion the tear-starting word.'

To Genius he bow'd, as he pluck'd forth the quill,

To the breeze were his vestments unfurl'd,
Like a sun-beam, with fancy he fled from the hill,

To charm and illumine the world.

For the good of mankind he rare precepts convey'd,

And his strains had such power o'er the ear,
That, whenever he pleas'd, from the concourse
that stray'd,

He could draw forth a smile or a tear.

Old Time knew his worth, with the sigh of esteem

From the earth bid sweet Willy arise;
With his genius he fled, but has left us his theme,
Which shall ever be dear to the wise.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 100.

Story of Dorville and Adelaide concluded.

Adelaide, supported by her piety, by the recollection of her vows, and by the retrospect of a life, until then irreproachable, for a long time successfully combated the violence of her passion. Her triumph was, however, embittered by that secret and corrosive sorrow, which 'sheds no tear,' 'but consumes the heart.' The idea particularly that she rendered him miserable, for whom she would have sacrificed her life, became too oppressive to be endured. This impression, which no love truly ardent can ever withstand, determined her fate. She yielded: and the day that crowned the wishes of her lover, was for her a day of unutterable despair. From that moment she thought she read her shame in every eye. Her religious principles agitated her conscience with all the terrors of remorse. That love, which had enslaved her, which had cost her so much, she no longer regarded, but as the most atrocious of crimes. When she fulfilled the duties of her order, the most noble and the most useful, but at the same time the most melancholy and appalling, that a religious society could impose, or human beneficence select, the scenes of death continually present to her eyes, deadened the fire of sense, and excruciated a mild and timorous mind with all the agonies of the bitterest compunction.

Adelaide's griefs became every day more and more poignant. Her violent struggles between love and duty, and the fatigue of incessant attendance on Dorville, soon overpowered a weak frame. She was attacked by a fever which, from the commencement, was predicted to be mortal, and which hurried her rapidly to the grave.

Dorville who had carefully concealed his passion from the world, could not dissemble his sensibility for her loss. The most fatal consequences were apprehended from the first transports of his despair: but the effervescence of the moment, soon subsided to give place to a gloomy and morbid melancholy. He foretold that he would soon follow her; no longer slept; and refused to take nourishment of any kind.

We were deeply affected with his deplorable situation, and used every endeavour, but without effect, to rouse him from his dejection. Alarmed at the futility of our efforts, we one day in the course of conversation, expostulated with a warmth which from the motive, could not be displeasing. We tenderly reproached him for his want of confidence, conjured him to listen to our intreaties; we even had recourse to tears, when he hastily interrupted us and replied: 'My friends, your attempts are fruitless; it is impossible to soften my sorrows; they must last as long as my life. What can console a man for such a loss? Absence—but I have not that resource.'

He stopt. We waited in silence for an explanation of these strange words—his countenance suddenly became more animated; he rose and exclaimed, 'Adelaide is dead! dead indeed! but not absent! She is there,' added he, pointing to an arm-chair in the room. 'Yes, she is there! I see her just as I see you. She looks at me; listens to me; if I approach, she retires, but never disappears.'

He was again silent and we forbore reflections, which could be productive of no beneficial effect on a malady too far removed from the common stamp to yield to ordinary remedies. Chance, oftentimes the most propitious on such occasions, inspired us at least with some hopes of saving our friend. A public festival happened to be given at Milan. All those detestable women, who, as it is said, preserve the morals of a city by corrupting them, attended as usual. In traversing the place, I was attracted by the remarkable resemblance which one of them bore to Adelaide. I mentioned the circumstance to a brother officer, and asked him if he wished to see a portrait of Dorville's mistress, probably more exact, and certainly more substantial than the Phantom which haunted his imagination. His surprise was soon equal to mine. On examining her features more narrowly, we found the likeness almost perfect. We immediately determined to take advantage of this singular encounter for the recovery of our friend. Convinced that the 'ideal vision' must vanish before the reality, and the force of imagination cede to the testimony of sense, we formed a plan to present this woman to Dorville in Adelaide's dress. Having agreed with her on her disguise, on the rendezvous, the signal on which she was to present herself, and every thing requisite for the performance of her part, we went in search of Dorville, and pressed him to give us a last mark of friendship. 'We are about to part,' said we, closely embracing him, 'and we shall never perhaps meet again.' Seeing him moved, we continued our importunities, and exacted as the proof required, his company to supper that evening. He could not refuse—he arrived in due time and sat down to table. Not a word escaped him until the end of our repast, when, in order to excite those emotions we thought necessary to a total revolution of ideas, we spoke to him of the fatal day, on which he inhaled the last sigh of his mistress. Without making a reply, he fixed his eyes stedfastly on an obscure part of the room, arose, and extended his arms, as if about to embrace the object, that his fancy thus realized. We then gave the appointed signal. The fictitious Adelaide appeared—he perceived her, fell backwards, trembled violently, and exclaimed, 'Oh my friends!—my friends! save me—I am lost—I saw but one, and now I see two.' We immediately endeavoured to undeceive him. He was seized with strong convulsions, and died, calling on the name of Adelaide. F.

THE LAY PREACHER.

[It is some time, since the first prediction from the Lay Preacher, in the character of a soothsayer, was announced. We have, at length, been able to obtain a part of his vaticinations; and it is probable more will appear in due time.]

"And it came to pass, when all that knew him before time saw that behold he prophesied among the prophets, then the people said one to another, IS SAUL ALSO AMONG THE PROPHETS?"

Shade of BICKERSTAFF, leave awhile thy favourite haunts, and cease thy mockery of the ghost of persecuted Partridge; deign to visit and to inspire 'the last, the meanest of thy sons;' nor wilt thou come alone, but bring with thee Irony, with 'joco serious face,' and Humour ever new, and flashing Wit, and frowning Satire, Judgment with head serene, and Penetration with bright lynx eye.

Thou too I call, well natured ARBUTHNOT, shrewd Scotchman, amiable, witty, and wise; who erst didst dip thy poignant pen in the same standish with thy SWIFT, keenest of writers, who 'twinn'd with thee,' come, nor leave behind Learning with his load of books, and Archness, laughing over her shoulder.

Debonair spirit of STEELE, thou second Bickerstaff, following thy leader with no unequal step, come and tattle in my ear of Agrippa and Lilly, and trine and horoscope. Lastly, ye Highland seers, will ye descend from the lofty Caledonian mount, and come from farthest Thule to aid a countryman and disciple. When the voice of a Sawney is heard, ye must listen, ye must approve. In north British accent on you I call; be present with all your powers, Foresight with boundless vision, Discernment spying all things, and distinguishing between each, and shrewd Conjecture, guessing well, and Sagacity with Socratic face.

But far from my oracular seat be every necromantic agent. Hence, thou wandering Jew, and fly, ye 'wier'd sisters.' Nor philtres, nor spells, nor incantations, are mine. Thrice I wave my wand of snowy hue, emblem of the intention pure, and no lying spirit can I see, and no malignant thought do I entertain. Wide is the circle I draw, but it is to include no

'Root of hemlock, digg'd in the dark.'

I look forward to discover the useful and the true, and, like Prospero, I would 'break my staff,' if it did not point to a moral aim.

Tired, and almost breathless, with my ascent up the steep of rhapsody, I now gladly descend to my usual level, and proceed in my plain way. My business now is not to declaim, but to foretel. The almanac style is simple, and both 'Poor Robin' and 'Poor Richard,' my simple predecessors, prognosticated in a style which had no resemblance to that of Plato, or any of his imitators.

Last night, I looked, for some hours, at the heavenly bodies, and from the information I derive from very excellent glasses, the most inconstant of the planets will govern, at least during the genial days, the whole band of females in America. Lovers and muslin robes will both be discarded very often. Matrimony will at one time be imagined crowned with flaunting roses, and at another laden with sickly rue. The credulous lover, and the experienced Benedick, will sometimes maintain opposite theories, touching the privileges of the sex. The ruddy nosed widow will still swallow noyau, when nobody sees her, and as for Miss Cackle, the elderly young lady, who never made but two slips in her youth, why she will still continue, after the twelfth dish of tea, to talk evil of all the neighbourhood.

Many democrats, confident of the potency of my art, have applied to me to ascertain if they were right in their hopes of a revolution, and the ultimate triumph of jacobin arts and principles. I have ever made it a rule to resolve all such queries by the rules of palmistry. But the hands of these gentlemen are either so dirty with the vileness of their occupations, or so closely clenched to smite every person and every thing in their way, that it is impossible to discern the lines by which I can foretell. I have, however, examined the fiery aspect of Mars, and have pored both upon Luna and Mercury. The first planet assures me they will always bluster and look big, and even dabble in blood, if it should spout from a guillotine. By the second I learn, that, like Falstaff, Bardolph, Peto, Poin, and the rest of that moral gang, in the play, they will persevere in acting the part of 'gentlemen of the shade, minions of the moon, under whose countenance—they steal;' and, in answer to my eager inquiries every night, 'light finger'd Sir Mercury' declares, upon his word and honour, that even the famous medicine, which bears his name, will not preserve from pollution the democratic body much longer, but a long course of hemp must ensue, and for many years this drastic physic must be taken. As some of those, who consulted me, were philosophers, I observed, when making these my funereal responses, that it must be a sweet consolation to them to reflect, that death itself was a great revolution, and even Hell no bad emblem of their favourite form of government.

The character and habits of my dear native country will continue, for some years, nearly the same. Wealth will be almost exclusively pursued; and sometimes through foul paths. Certain dupes will complain of our perfidy, and many foreign merchants will conclude, that punctuality is not the most conspicuous of our national virtues.

The book of fate does not clearly indicate that any man of extraordinary genius will, at present, appear in America. I see, however, certain philosophers, poets, and painters, in embryo. What is very odd, although such a new born, and, comparatively, unlearned country, requires the aid of all the ability of her sons, yet I can discover that Columbia will be almost unconscious of the existence of these her sprightly children; and it is a curious phenomenon, which I modestly leave to the explanation of the Philosophical Society, that the eyes of most of the votaries of learning and of the lovers of the fine arts are steadfastly fixed upon Europe. My second sight, my horary inspection, and all my calculations agree in this, that if another Count Rumford should appear, he would soon find himself in the service of the Elector of Bavaria, or at the head of the Royal Institution of Great Britain. If another West, or Copley, or Trumbull, attracted by the love of fine forms, should dip the faithfullest pencil in the brightest colours, though he will not have an opportunity to sell, in his own country, many yards of canvas, however sweetly tinged, yet he will crayon on British tablets a full length portrait of British generosity. The motto, which one of these American artists has chosen for one of his pictures, is highly curious. It is Scriptural, and, though distant, I can read it very legibly with my Scotch spectacles. On the wall of a palace, I see an historical picture. It represents Maccenas and Horace, banqueting with Augustus. The inscription is from St. Luke, 'Behold they, which are gorgeously appparelled, and live delicately, are in King's courts.'

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

HORTENSIUS, No. II.

In my last number, I endeavoured to lead my fellow-citizens to a contemplation of the difficulties and embarrassments, which opposed and retarded the formation and adoption of the Federal Constitution. The impressions of fear, produced by imminent danger, are too quickly effaced, when it seems to have ceased. This passion was implanted in our breasts to admonish us to shun, not only instant, but to avoid future dangers; and a wise man, not content with having merely escaped, inquires into the causes of his alarm, where they existed, and how they were shunned, that he may derive safety from experience.

If we could return to the years, which elapsed between the acknowledgment of our independence in 1783, and the formation of the federal constitution, and revive the apprehensions, then entertained for our country; if we could review the dark and portentous calm, which then prevailed over our political horizon, and call to our recollection the dreadful anticipations of the wise and the patriotic, we should shudder to perceive how nearly we had approached a state of things, which involved our national existence, and threatened the destruction of every blessing, for which we had so long and so ardently struggled. Let it be remembered that such a state of things existed previously to the year 1789; but that as soon as the 'SUN OF FEDERALISM' arose, the dark clouds of despair were dispelled, and were succeeded by a genial warmth, which gave life and animation to every thing within its influence. If so great and sudden a change instantly followed the adoption of the federal constitution, can we doubt to what cause to attribute it? It is unnecessary to inquire. The cause is felt, is acknowledged by all. The federal constitution gave us respectability abroad, and confidence at home; it enabled us to discharge our debts, and to exchange the downcast looks of insolvency, for the cheerful and manly countenance of conscious probity. It created a government able at once to restrain, and to protect her citizens. Truly might it be said that, from that period, we began to sail upon the 'full tide of successful experiment.' But we are now told that the 'sun of federalism' is set. Yes, it has set; the assertion cannot be contradicted. Every act of the present administration has a direct tendency to destroy the principles of federalism and the constitution, and to make it a mere caput mortuum, a substratum for the lordly Virginian to erect his ancient dominion upon, to the oppression and destruction of every other part of the union. 'The sun of federalism is set,' I receive the confession; it comes from the party accused, and Mr. Jefferson and his friends have acted fully in the spirit of it. The constitution of the United States has ceased to be Federal;

every feature of Federalism in it has been defaced; it has ceased to be an union of states, as was intended; and has become a Virginian government, in which Virginia policy and Virginia interests are considered and regarded to the exclusion of the interests of the eastern and middle states. 'The sun of federalism is, indeed, set,' and, unless it rise again, nothing remains for us but to be subjected to the dominion of Virginia, or to shake off the yoke, by taking the station to which our strength entitles us. God forbid that such an alternative should be forced upon us. It may be prevented. But if it be imposed, I trust that the eastern and middle states will not long hesitate in making their choice. But let us not despond. Justice is on our side, and, if Virginia will consider her true interests, she will perceive that they require all that we ask. She cannot be permitted to triumph over her sister states, to trample the constitution under her feet, and to rule us, as her caprice or her interest may require. The stern and honest character of the eastern people forbids it—they will never submit to it. It is to be hoped, that, under this persuasion, Virginia may yet be induced to be content with that station which has been assigned to her, and to relinquish an advantage, which ought never to have been granted, and which has long since been fraught with the deepest injustice, I mean the representation of three fifths of her slaves. The union of the states is her salvation, let her beware how she shakes it.

The orations against Catiline.

"Thus then, Catiline, pursue your resolution: depart at length, out of Rome: the gates are open. It is too long a time, that the army of Mallius has expected you for their General. Take away with you, all the wretches, who resemble you; purge the city of that contagion, which you have spread in it; deliver it from those Panicks, which your presence excites; let the walls interpose between us and you. You cannot remain here any longer; I will not suffer you: I will not endure you: I will not tolerate you. Do you hesitate to do by my order, what you resolved to do of yourself? I, the Consul, command our enemy to go out of Rome. And who can still detain you? How can you support the residence of a city, in which there is not, a simple inhabitant, except your accomplices, in whose eyes you are not an object of horror and terror? What is the domestic infamy with which your life has not been loaded? What is the outrage with which your hands have not been defiled. Finally what is the life that you lead? For I wish to speak to you one moment, not with the indignation you deserve, but with the pity which you merit so little. You come and appear in this Assembly: very well!—In this great number of senators, among whom you have relations, and friends, and connections, who is the man from whom, you have obtained a salutation, or even a look? If you are the first who has received a similar affront, do you expect that voices will be raised against you, when silence alone, when this decree the most grievous of all, has already condemned you? When at your arrival, the seat remained vacant around you, when the Consular senators, as soon as you were seated, have quitted their places which might be near you? With what front, with what countenance can you support so many humiliations? If my slaves dreaded me, as your fellow-citizens fear you, if they looked at me with the same eye, as all the world regard you, here, I would abandon my own house; and yet, you hesitate to abandon your country, to fly into some desert, to hide, in some distant solitude, this your guilty life, reserved for punishment! I hear you answer me, that you are ready to go into exile, if the senate pronounces the decree:—No. I will not propose that to the senate; but I am about to put you in a situation to know their disposition towards you, in such a manner, that you cannot longer doubt of them. Catiline! Go out of Rome! and since you wait for the word exile, exile yourself from your country!—Well! what!—Catiline, do you remark the silence? And would you have more? If I had said as much to Sælius, to Marcellus, Consul as I am, I should not be in safety in the senate. But it is to you that I address myself, it is you, whom I order into exile, and when the senate allows me to speak thus, the senate approves me; when it is silent, it pronounces; its silence is a decree."

"I say as much of the Roman Knights, of that honorable body, which surround the senate in so great numbers, whose sentiments and voices you might have heard, as you entered this place, and whose hands ready to be laid on you, I have so much difficulty to restrain. I will be answerable, that they will follow you as far as the gates of the city, which for so long a time you have longed to destroy.—Depart then: you have so often said that you waited for an order of exile, which might render me unpopular. Be content: I have given it: complete your design, by obeying it, of exciting against me that enmity, from which you promise yourself, such great advantages. But if you would furnish me with a new subject of glory, go out with that retinue of robbers, who are devoted to you; go with the dregs of the people; go to the camp of Mallius; declare an impious war against your country! go, and throw yourself into that haunt, to which your stupid fury, has long called you. There; how perfectly you will be satisfied! What pleasure worthy of you, will you there enjoy? To what horrible transports of joy, will you resign yourself, who, throwing your eyes around you, not one single honest man is to be seen or heard?—And you, conscript Fathers, hearken with attention, and engrave in your memories, the answer, which I think I ought to make to the complaints, which appear, I must acknowledge to have some foundation in justice.—I seem to hear my country, that country which is dearer to me than my life, say to me: Cicero what are you doing? What! the man whom you acknowledge to be my enemy, the man who is about to carry war into my bosom, who is expected in a camp of Rebels, the father of crimes, the head of a conspiracy, the corruptor of my citizens, do you suffer him to depart from Rome!

Do you send him to take arms against the Republic! Do you not load him with irons! Do you not drag him to death? Do you not consign him to the most terrible punishment? What restrains you? Is it the discipline of our ancestors?—Frequently even individuals, have punished with death, scoundrel citizens. Have the laws limited the chastisement of guilty citizens?—Those who have declared themselves against the Republic have never enjoyed the rights of citizens. Are you afraid of the reproaches of the succeeding generation? But the Roman people, who have conducted so early through all the degrees of elevation, up to the best of their dignities, without any recommendation from your ancestors, without knowing you any other way than by yourself, obtaining from you very little gratitude, if there is any consideration, any apprehension, which can make you forget the safety of your citizen."

"To this sacred voice of the Republic, to the complaints which she may address to me, conscript fathers, this is my answer. If I had believed, that the last course would have been to put Catiline to death, I would not have suffered him to live a moment, in fact, if the greatest men of the republic, have honoured themselves by the death of Flaccus, of Saturninus, of the two Gracchi, I ought not to fear, that posterity will condemn me, for having put to death this robber, an hundred times more guilty, this murderer of his fellow-citizens; or if it was possible, that so just an action, could excite hatred again me, it is one of my principles that we ought to regard as titles of glory, the enemies we make by our virtues. But there are, even in this order, men who see not all our dangers and all our evils, or who will not see them. These are the men, who by shewing themselves too weak, have nourished the hopes of Catiline; it is they, who have fortified the conspiracy, by refusing to believe it. Influenced by their authority, a great number of citizens deluded or wicked, if I had been severe with Catiline, would have accused me of cruelty and tyranny. At this day, if he resorts as he resolved to do, to the camp of Mallius, there will be no man stupid enough to deny that he has conspired against his country. His death would have restrained the plots which threaten us, but would not have entirely stifled them. But if he carries away with him all that execrable rabble of assassins and incendiaries, then, we shall not only have destroyed that plague, which has been nourished and grown up among us, but we shall even have annihilated the very seeds of corruption."

"It is not on this day only, conscript fathers, that we have been surrounded with snares and ambushes; but it seems, as if all this tempest of fury and of crimes, had been gathering a long time, to break out under my consulate. If among so many enemies, we strike at Catiline alone, his death would give us time to breathe, to be sure; but the peril would still subsist, and the poison would be shut up in the bosom of the republic. Thus, then I repeat it, let the wicked separate themselves from the good; let our enemies assemble in one retreat; let them cease, to besiege the consul, in his house, the magistrates on their tribunals, the fathers of Rome in the senate to collect torches to set fire to our habitations; in fine, that we may see written on the front of every citizen, his sentiments for the republic, I will be responsible, conscript fathers, that then will be in your consuls vigilance enough, in this order, sufficient authority, in that of the Roman Knight an abundance of courage, among all the good citizens, concord and union, that, on the departure of Catiline, all that you can fear from him and his accomplices, will be at once discovered suppressed and punished."

"Go then, with this omen of our safety and your ruin, with all the Satellites which your admirable machinations have attracted around you, go! I say Catiline! Give the signal, of a sacrilegious war.—And thou, Jupiter Stator! whose temple was erected by Romulus, under the same auspices with Rome herself! Thou, in all times implored as the protector of the Roman Empire! Thou will preserve, from the rage of this robber, thine altars, these walls, and the lives of all our citizens; and all these enemies of Rome, these plunderers of Italy, these villains leagued together by the same crimes, will be also, dead or alive, united forever in the same punishment."

It was, no doubt, the first punishment of Catiline, to have this thundering philippick, to endure. By coming to the senate he exposed himself to this tempest. There was no possibility of interrupting a consul, speaking in the midst of the Senators: the usage indeed, permitted no man to interrupt any senator in giving his opinion. Nevertheless, neither the voice of Cicero, nor that of conscience, were able to intimidate Catiline, so much as to take from him the courage to reply. He assumed an hypocritical countenance, and arose to answer; but he had scarcely uttered a few vague phrases, which Sallust has preserved for us, relying upon the opinion which his birth ought to secure to him, in opposition to that of Cicero, when the murmurs arising on all sides, convinced him, that the privileges of a senator were no longer acknowledged in him. Immediately a general clamour, hindered him from proceeding; the names of parricide and incendiary, resounded in his ears; it was then necessary to throw off the mask, and being no longer master of himself, he left for his last farewell to the senate, these furious words, cited by several historians, and whose energy is remarkable. "Since I am driven to extremities by the enemies who surround me, I will extinguish under ruins the fires which they light up about me." The event justified the policy of Cicero. The night following Catiline went out of Rome with three hundred men in arms, and proceeded to put himself at the head of the troops of Mallius. We know what was the issue of this war, and in the bloody battle in which he was defeated, his soldiers were almost all killed, and Rome and Italy were delivered from what was most vicious among them, and the most dangerous to their repose. If any one inquires why Catiline, before whom Cicero had explained his intentions and his views, should take precisely the party which the consul desired him to take; it was because there was no other for him to take; it was because, that, every thing being discovered and Rome so well guarded, that it was not possible to attempt anything, he had no other resource, than open force and the army of Mallius.

Soon after his departure, Cicero ascended the tribunal of harangues, and rendered an account to the Roman people, of all that has passed: This is the subject of the second oration against Catiline. The orator proposes, in this, principally to dissipate, the false and insidious alarms, which the secret partizans of Catiline affected to disseminate, by exaggerating his resources and the danger of the republic, Cicero opposes to these insinuations as cowardly as they were insidious, the faithful picture of the forces of the two parties and the contrast between, the Roman power and that of an army of desperate robbers. In fact, it was evident, that nothing would be feared from Catiline, but a coup de main, one of those sudden and unforeseen insurrections, or seditions which might overthrow a city. It was only in Rome that he was truly formidable: reduced to make war in form, he must fall. Accordingly every thing concurred, to make it appear, that the views of Cicero were as just, as his conduct was noble and patriotic.

That of the conspirators was so imprudent, that it precipitated their ruin long before that of their chief. He had left in Rome Lentulus and Cethegus, and some others of his principal confidants, to watch the moment, to disembarass themselves if it were possible of this indefatigable consul, the greatest obstacle to all their designs, to set fire to Rome, and attack the senate in the instant, when Catiline should shew himself at the gates with his army, and finally to increase their party, till that time, by all imaginable means. They attempted to draw into their design the deputies of the Allobroges, and transmitted them a plan of their conspiracy with their signature. All was carried, at once, to Cicero. Armed with decisive proofs he convoked the senate, orders before him Lentulus, Cethegus, Ceparius, Gabinius and Statilius, who not suspecting that they were betrayed, complied with his orders, he seizes on their persons and carries them with him, to the senate, where he first introduces the deputies of the Allobroges. Their depositions are heard; the dispatches are opened; the proofs are clear. The criminals are forced to acknowledge their signatures and their seals. It is, upon this occasion that they report a beautiful saying of Cicero to Lentulus. This conspirator was of the family of the Cornelians, the most illustrious of Rome. He was himself at that time Pretor. His seal represented the head of his great-grand father who had been an excellent citizen. Do you know this seal? Says the consul to him, it is the image of your ancestor who deserved so well of the republic, how is it possible that the mere sight of this venerable head, should not have restrained you, at the moment when you was going to make use of it, for signing a crime?

The senate decreeds rewards to the Allobroges, and thanks and honours, without example to the consul; they ordained the festivals called supplications, which after the triumph, were the reward of the most honourable victories. Cicero harangues the people, and explains to them, all that had been done in the senate, and from what danger Rome had been delivered. This is the third oration against Catiline. Finally, nothing remained but to decide the fate of the criminals. Silanus, designated consul for the following year, gives his opinion, in favour of death. His opinion is followed by all who speak after him, till they came to Caesar, whose opinion is perpetual imprisonment, and confiscation of their estates. He had already great influence and his judgment might draw after it, the more voices, because even those who were the most attached to Cicero, fearing that one day an account might be demanded of him of the blood of citizens, who, in the ordinary forms, could not be condemned to death, but by the people, appeared inclined to indulgence that they might not expose a great man, whom they loved. They seemed to look to his countenance, for the judgment they ought to give. Cicero perceived the new danger, which the republic was in, at this critical moment. He knew that the friends and partisans of the conspirators, wished nothing more than to be put in a condition to force the prison; and if the senate had softened, in so important a deliberation, this would be enough to raise the party of Catiline. The intrepid consul, arose to speak, and it is in this harangue which is the fourth oration against Catiline, that he has manifested, the highest elevation of his sentiment, and that devotion of a soul, truly Roman, which knew his own personal dangers, and set them all at defiance, for the safety of the state.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

DISSERTATIO MEDICA INAUGURALIS,

MENTIS LITERARUM STUDIOSE INCITAMENTIS,
MALIS ET REGIMINE.

AUCTORE ANDREA STEWART.

Ambiunt literarum præmia; sed nullum fortasse genus hominum est, quod in invidiam est proclivius, quam docti, qui præmia ista adjudicant; et cum res ita sese habeat, impetus, quo periciuntur ut inter se detrectarent, tanto ferè gravior est, quam quod inter alios sentitur, quanto mentis ingenique dotes mechanicæ arti et rationi præstant. Et ob eam causam, siqui, in hoc curriculo, ad laudem et honorem evadunt, mentem, quatenus fieri queat, solitudini minimè obviā præ se ferre debent.

At revera, cum ingenio acri et idoneo, sentiendi quædam facultas exquisitior, quam usu multo etiam ut jam dixi, expolitur, ferè semper est consociata; et inde fit, ut quo plus impetui graviore sint obnoxii, eò minus ad istum feliciter sustinendum sint parati. Et hoc modo quidem, spiritus iste invidiæ mordax, veluti siquando veri novo relabertur hyems lethifera, primitias et spem omnem ingenii, haud rarè oppressit, vel penitus delevit.

Sin verò his malis, graviora, ut res domi angustior, derelictio amicorum, vel eorum quos penitus dilexerint, mors in natura forte accesserint, quanta plerumque est animi ægritudo!

Homo, quantislibet dotibus præditus, est quodammodo imbecillus, multisque casibus, quos neque providere neque antevertere possit sapientia sua, obnoxius. Sed, quamvis cujusque profecto malis acerbitas sua semper insit, aliis aliis modis, pro vitæ ingenique ratione, eā patiuntur.

Omne, quodcumque malum homini acciderit, si modò animus, inter negotii consuetudinem, hilaresque amicitias amicitias, ab eo sapius avertatur, vim suam modicam paulatim deperdit. Intra solitudinem, autem, quæ ipsa est patens uberrima malorum, cum tristis et adversi cujusvis memoria diu alicui, suapte insuper indole in tristitiam procliviori, ingruerit; concidunt indies spes læta, alacritas, et vis acrior ingenii. Et, revera, res eo usque nonnunquam perducta fuit, ut tanquam cumulo obrutus, animus et charitate amicorum, vel ex cunctis, quas præbet vita, deliciis, solatium percipere nequiret.

Amicitias naturæ, quæ quondam ei deliciarum plurimo essent, silvæ, rura, et rigui in vallibus amnes, tandem amplius ad delectationem non valuerunt. Solis ipsius lux, quæ omnibus ferè secum lætitiā addert, invisā facta fuit. Atque omnia denique circumspicienti speciem inanimam, tristem, lugubrem, et mentis habitui consentaneam induerunt.

His, quæ jam dixi, addendum restat, quod mala, quibus studiosi sunt obnoxii, nonnunquam, præsertim si diutius animo incubuerint, in hypochondriasm abeunt. Et ista quidem, siquando in systema altius descenderit, est omnium fortasse, in quos homines incidunt, si demas insaniam ipsam morborum dirissimus. Furtim obrepit; et, quoniam corpus ferè prius quam animus adoriatur, per signa compluria dyspepsie, languoris, et virium fractarum paulatim sese ostendit. Flatus et murmura per illa grassantur; segnis et molestus fit cursus sanguinis: nervi, qui animo proximè inseriunt, labe altā correpti, ad munera sua non amplius sufficiunt; debilitas urget; et ubique macies, torpor, et lassitudo invalescunt.

Ad hæc verò tandem accedit morbus animi gravior. Bona valetudo, negotia, et remissiones hilares, plerisque sunt contra mæstiam tutamini satis apto. Siquibus, autem, in secessu degentibus, fractis jam viribus, et sensuum habitu morbo, animus dolore ac falsis imaginibus assidue obsideatur, fieri non potest, quin, etiamsi ipse esset sanus, metu et mæstia diuturna obrueretur. At, revera, in hypochondriasi, animi ipsius habitus est depravatus; et inde sit, ut morbus quodammodo vi duplici ingruat. Tristitiæ eò usque indulget æger, ut cogitationes suæ, quæcumque sint, hac tandem omnino imbuantur. Fictis malis, quæ à veris nequit dignoscere, luditur. Sub nocte tristia somnia, et interdiu periculā dirā, subinde ei minitantiā, animo observantur. Terra, cui incedit, fortasse sub pedibus subsidere, vel tectum, sub quo degit, capiti suo irruere videtur. Morbus quidam, aliis verò minimè obviū, vitam aggreditur; vel animus ipse, è corpore elapsus, fatum suum irrevocabile jamjam subiturus est. Aliqui etiam se vitreos esse putantes, timuerunt, ne forte corpora suā fragiliā, si foras prodissent, occursu repentino, comminuerentur. Locos quosdam et homines, alii metu supersticioso correpti, ut inauspicatos evitarent. Et revera, opiniones et imagines fictæ, quibus aliis temporibus alii fuerint ludibrio, tam varix quam horrenda fuerunt. Inter signa hujusmodi, si tandem altius inveteraverint, morbus plerumque invictus grassatur. Impetus ejus, præsertim inter studiosos, quorum ratio vitæ ei magis favet, viam (ut ita dicam) qua tendit, strage tristissima sternit. — Omnia in periculo versantur, et in pejus indies ruunt. Systema humanum, quod tam mira fabrica et tanta partium varietate instructum, naturæ scienti parere, et quasi symphonia dulci vibrare solet. — laxatur ita, ut tristitia tantum et discordia edat. Mens ipsa, diu sensu depravato obsessa, et vi ficticis imaginationis exagitata, tormentis suis paulatim succumbit; et, quantumvis antehac doctrinā, vel ingenio valido, insignis fuerit, imbecilla et effæta inter stragem corporis labitur. Ægotans miser, ultra medicatrices herbarum, vel amicitias ipsius suaviloquæ potestates, sibi ipsi, ut ita dicam, superfluit; et mors denum superveniens è malis et miseris eum sola eripit.

Hæc ferè sunt incommoda, quæ literarum studiosis obtingant. Varia quidem sunt, et nonnunquam, ut ex supradictis constat, prægravia; et, quoniam omnes ab iis quam maximè præcavere oportet, pauca de mentis regimine quo evitari possint, subjicienda decrevi. Hoc verò quam breviter expediam.

Omnibus igitur, literarum cultui deditis, qui mentem sanam in corpore sano, servarent, curæ imprimis esse debet, ut modò ac rationi naturæ sedulo obtemperarent. Solitudo nimia, vigilie, atque nistis diuturniores ac vehementes sunt effugienda: et, diu operam dent ne corporis habitus, à quo mentis indoles multum profecto pendet, quid detrimenti capiat; — talis est instituenda studiorum ratio, ut, vel lectionis et cogitationum varietas, vel remissio tempestiva, laborem alternans, animum fessum subinde recreent et reficiant.

Segni et mordaci curæ est imprimis omnimodis obsistendum. Et cum hoc consilio — assidue studere oportet, nequid animus negotio et incitamentis idoneis vacuus sit; tunc enim, vix fieri potest, quin aciem suam, ut ita dicam, in seipsum converteret, et dolorem quamplurimum inter fictas miseras subinde cerneret. In ludæ finem etiam, oblectamenta et exercitatio modica sub dio, propterea quod mentem, à nisu et obtutu suo, quasi furtim avertant, multum plerumque proderunt. Ludi quidam, præsertim ubi de pignore leviores certetur, hoc modò exercitationem simul et incitamenta conciliant. Neque amulatio vel equitatio in aère puro et libero, dummodo tempestiva sint, huc minus tendent: — inter ruris amicitias enim, è studiis suis elapsi, docti ita oblectati, præsertim si socius hilarior adsit, curarum fient, quasi invitati, inmemores: mentis tenebræ diffugient; atque vires et alacritas facillè redibunt.

Juvabit insuper aliquando, in cætu, et commercio hominum, vel etiam in negotiis versari: nam inde cultum studiorum repetentes, ad omnia ejus munera aptiores evadent.

Sed præ cæteris, amicitiam dulcem et seculam quam oportet colere. Post altas suas labores, animus æger et defatigatus, hinc inde solatium in amicitia oblectamenta, quasi ad invicem in se, ultro annititur.

In cætu aliorum quidem remissione leviores sumus; sed in gremio, ut ita dicam, et inter benivolentias illorum tantum, quos diligimus, potest ægritudo animi gravior elici.

Sin autem mala è consuetudine studiorum, in tempestiva et schola proveniant, jam prædicta, quoad incubuerint, et morbum obtingent, remedia fuerint; ad remedium adque valetudinem reverti erit necessitas.

Corporis habitui morbo, ratione, et animi, si nea victus, exercitationis, et medicamentorum, et occurrendum: et interea animus, si non levior, et festinatione quodam negotio et solatio, si non potest, mulcendus, et occupandus est. Si vero hæc vitæ alacritas diversitas dondum non inveniatur, fuisset, ad periculum nationem tantam, et vitam, quamquam levi, propterea quod nonnullam, tam aliter desperatis, ad sanitatem vixit, reverti possumus.

Inter perigrinandum multa quidem bona ex aëre puro et exercitatione proveniunt. Sed in eo præcipue prodest, quod memoria pristini doloris, tantò plerumque obscurior fit, quantò longius à locis et hominibus, qui eam revocare soleant, recedimus. Res novæ et inopinatæ etiam, quæ subinde in conspectum veniant, ægrotantem à suis malis paulatim alliciunt. Et quum vis morbi, hoc modò, fuerit labefactata, et spei amœnitates tandem, velut lux cœli jucunda, menti ariserint, omnia indes meliora cedunt. Hæc ferè sunt remedia, quæ in mala animi diuturniora tantùm prosunt. Citra varia oblectamenta, et negotii festinationes, alia potiùs nocent, vel levaminis aliquid saltem vix secum afferunt. Et in hanc sententiam juvat mihi demùm, verbis ornatissimi Poëtæ, propositum meum absolvere:

These chronic Passions, while from real woes
They rise, and yet without the body's fault
Infest the soul, admit one only cure,
Diversions, hurry, and a restless life.
Vain are the consolations of the wise,
In vain your friends would reason down your pain.
O ye whose souls relentless love has tam'd
To soft distress or friends untimely fall n!
Court not the luxury of tender thought,
Nor deem it impious to forget those pains
That hurt the living, nought avail the dead.
Go, soft Enthusiast! quit the cypress groves,
Nor to the rivulet's lonely moanings tune
Your sad complaint: go seek the cheerful haunts
Of men, and mingle with the bustling crowd;
Lay schemes for wealth, or pow'r, or fame, the wish
Of nobler minds, and push them night and day,
Or join the caravan in quest of scenes
New to your eyes, and shifting ev'ry hour,
Beyond the Alps, beyond the Appennines,
Or, more adventurous, rush into the field
Where war grows hot, and raging through the sky
The lofty trumpet swells the mad'ning soul,
And in the hardy camp and toilsome march
Forget all softer and less manly cares.

LONDON EDITION OF DR. LINNÆ'S

'POWERS OF GENIUS.'

From the 'Albion Press,' Mess. T. Williams and T. Hurst, two of the London Booksellers, have reprinted, from the second edition of the Philadelphia copy, 'The Powers of Genius.' It is a fashion of late to print every poetical work in the most ornamental manner, with the smoothest paper, the brightest types, and the finest engravings, which can be procured. This has been aptly called the luxury of literature, and it has been brilliantly displayed in the book before us. A more charming union of the Printer's skill, and the Engraver's art, can scarcely be imagined, and we rejoice to witness such honours paid to the literature of our country. One circumstance, however, demands some animadversion. The author's name is published without any addition, and his original preface, which indicates the place and date of its composition, has been expunged by the British bookseller, who, doubtless, had his reasons for this omission, but, as Deborah says in the Vicar of Wakefield, I should like to know those reasons. The volume, in its English dress, has all the air of an English production, and, as such, will unquestionably be regarded by all its readers. This is an injury to America, and to one of her ingenious children. In the infant state of our literature, it is but seldom that a tolerable book appears. Whenever this is happily the case, let it receive, if not the brilliant meed of Renown, at least the simple acknowledgment of legitimacy. In the history of British republication of our native books, we have more than once remarked a similar deception. The interesting romances, from the pen of a well known and elegant writer in this city, are regularly reprinted at the Minerva Press, without the least hint of their origin, and Mess.

Lane and Newman talk of Mr. C. B. Brown, as if perfectly unconscious that he writes on this side of the Atlantic. The Robinsons published, two or three years since, the 'Life and Adventures of Dr. Underhill,' but the birth and parentage of the book seemed wholly to escape their recollection. Some London Lethe had washed away every American trace, and the doctor figures in the British capital as an unfortunate English physician, who, unhappily, had the double misfortune, for a short time, to keep school in America*, and to be detained six years in captivity at Algiers. We have some right to prove what the lawyers call an alibi; as we actually sat by the American author, while he was writing the above adventures, and know, that, at this present writing, he neither prescribes nor compounds in the city of London, but administers the justice of his country from the supreme courts of Vermont. But to return to the poem, which has given birth to these remarks. It is well known, as the performance of Dr. LINN, an amiable clergyman and ingenious poet of this city, who, we hope, will be incited to continue his literary pursuits, satisfied that they attract the regard of Englishmen, and are read by candid critics, in the belief that the Powers of Genius are not wholly unknown on this side of the Atlantic.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

NEW LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON.

Mr. G. KEARSLEY, one of the London booksellers, has published a very perfect and commodious edition of Dr. JOHNSON'S Dictionary of the English language, in four large and beautiful volumes in royal octavo. This circumstance alone, would render this edition more popular, than that of the original folio, or quarto. But there is another, and cogent reason for every scholar to be solicitous to peruse in this form, the most elaborate performance of Dr. JOHNSON. A new Biography of the great Lexicographer has been written by Dr. J. ASKIN, whose talents, in this delightful walk of Literature, are familiar to the public, and whose graceful simplicity of pure English style, must be equally obvious, and admirable to all, who have formed their taste upon the classical models of ADDISON and GOLDSMITH. One might suppose that the faithful memory, and minute information of Boswell, the tell tale volubility of Mrs. Thrale, the laborious accuracy of Sir John Hawkins, and the elegant narrative of Arthur Murphy had communicated every thing pertinent to the character of JOHNSON. But in a wide field, exuberant with vegetation, and copious of flowers, there is always something for careful Industry to glean, and for grateful Genius to admire. Dr. ASKIN, with his peculiar powers for the task, will either gratify our love of anecdotes, by narrating something new and rare, or at least will please the taste and imagination of the Polite Scholar, by a skilful arrangement of those materials, which by other artists have been rudely or imperfectly employed.

SHAKSPEARE IN THE PRESS.

The first volume of the new American edition of SHAKSPEARE is now in the press of Mr. MANNING, one of the proprietors, and the work is advancing

* Many of the London Literati, we are assured, consider it as a moot point, which was the most ignominious condition of servitude, but as others very impudently suppose that the Algerine republic, in point of strength, dignity, and stability, is greatly superior to the American, they, with their usual prejudices, have not hesitated to prefer the slave to the schoolmaster.

with as much speed as the difficult nature of the task will justify. In reprinting an edition, from the text of STEEVENS and REED, the pages, mottled with many varieties of typographical character, and abounding in quotations from authors, whose style is obsolete, or uncouth, demand a revision at once scrupulous and slow. To drive such a work, with celerity, through the press, would be disgraceful to the Editor, detrimental to the Printer, and a disappointment to the Public. Subscribers may rest satisfied, that the proprietors are not careless of their obligations, and that the anxious care, which imposes a temporary delay, it is hoped, will be crowned with the accomplishment of the task, in such a manner, as not to mock the expectations of the students of SHAKSPEARE.

FESSENDEN'S ORIGINAL POEMS.

Flattered and animated, by the patronage of the English public, extended towards his first and *unacknowledged publication, Mr. FESSENDEN has published in London a volume of 'Miscellaneous Poems.' The London copy has not yet reached us, nor the opinions of any of the Reviewers. But we have authority to say, that the manuscript was perused by Mr. GIFFORD, the poet, who gave it his sanction, and the favourable opinion of such a judge, is certainly entitled to the highest respect, and will naturally influence many, both at home and abroad, to peruse Mr. Fessenden's productions with avidity. We are informed that the author has secured, in this country, the copy-right of his work, and the volume will probably appear in an American dress, in the course of the present autumn. We wish that the Author may be praised, by men of Taste, and rewarded by men of Fortune.

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN IRONICAL ORATION ON DRUNKENNESS.

Delivered in the University of Pennsylvania, June 6, 1804.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

Your benevolent countenances and ardent eyes speak the interest you feel in the occasion of our meeting. Your hearts throb for the young gentlemen, who appear before you candidates for the honours of our University. While they stand panting to start in the career of life, your favour inspires them with the hope of reaching the goal with glory.

Amid the general interest felt on this occasion, I tremble for myself. Lest I should incur, both from you and my colleagues, the imputation of intolerable vanity, when I inform you that I rise to put the finishing hand to their yet incomplete education. I am thoroughly sensible of your acquisitions and merits, my honoured peers; but, I trust, you will believe, without an oracle, that something is yet wanting to the perfection of your philosophy; and, aspiring to the summit of science, will receive a discovery not only with patience, but with applause. A discovery, that the most distinguished accomplishment, the virtue of all virtues, the chief of virtues, is—drunkenness.

* The satire, 'Terrible Tractoration' was a fair experiment on the public opinion. This poem was published without a name, and without a patron. By all the Journalists in succession, it was attributed to the first wits of the age, and it is not yet generally known in England, that the author is an American.

I perceive upon your countenances mingled emotions of surprise and disgust. But, O ye that have believed so many things without a reason, hear me!

That drunkenness is a virtue you will not doubt, if you will only consider that it has been more universally practised, in all ages, than any other virtue; and has achieved some of the most distinguished exploits in the annals of man. Need I remind you that the father of the new world is drawn drunk on the title-page of history: or that his posterity are, at this day, reaping the fruits of his virtue. Need I relate how Babylon, famed for her stupendous towers, delightful gardens, splendor of conquest, and extent of empire, terminated her illustrious drama with drunkenness. Shall I celebrate the hero of Macedon, who finished the conquest of the world by drink. Shall I quote the heroes of Greece and Rome, whose works give immortality to their empires, and have, time immemorial, been esteemed decisive in philosophical disquisition. You know, learned youths, that their finest hymns celebrate this divine virtue. But it is unnecessary to produce the monuments of Grecian or Roman drunkenness; or to celebrate the northern conquerors, who, as drunken as brave, laid the empire of Rome in ruins, that the vineyards of Calabria might enable them to perfect this virtue. The truth is, antiquity is profuse in her praises of this virtue of drunkenness. She attests that amidst changes of laws and manners, revolutions in governments, and the catastrophe of cities and empires, drunkenness has figured illustriously. You might suspect my patriotism, American youths, were I to omit so favourable an occasion of wiping from my country the slanderous stigma of certain European philosophers, who assert that talents and virtue dwindle in our western clime. An illustrious philosopher and politician has vindicated the claims of the Aborigines of our country to talents and eloquence, equal to any thing which Greece, Rome, or Europe, can boast. I have only to add, that in the competition of virtue, their drunkenness will bear comparison with that of any nation in the world: which is a strong corroboration of the modern philosophy, that savage life is most propitious to virtue.

Although our infant republic may not yet have obtained that rank in drunkenness, which she is destined to hold among the nations of the earth, yet there are hopeful symptoms of a laudable ambition. Academies, for the instruction and practice of this virtue, spring up daily; line our high-ways, decorate our streets, crowd our alleys—under the various denominations of hotels, inns, taverns, beer-houses, grog-shops, and boozing gardens, for the peripatetic school. And as these are all supported by the voluntary contributions of the students, their number and decorations are an accurate standard of the measure of this virtue. Already a swallow cannot fly our streets, without infringing against their emblematic signs. There the sun stands still till they have finished their bottle; here the moon and stars, obsequious to virtue, light them in and out, at all hours of the night. Jefferson foregoes the cares of government to preside over these sons of science. Nelson and Buonaparte, on the thundering steeds of war, direct these high spirits to glory. The grand Turk himself abjures his faith for their company. Or, perhaps, an angel on wing hovers over the door to waft to heaven the happy martyrs, who fall sacrifices to virtue!

These, however, are monuments only of private virtues. I must triumph in the glory of my country, who, in her high political character, bows to this queen of virtues. Revolutions, treaties, extension of empire, elections of officers, every distinguished era and prosperous event she consecrates to memory by drink. Honoured be your shrines, ye fathers of your country, who consecrated the fourth of July to drink! ordaining that thirteen toasts, and a bumper to the union, should annually cement our affections to the federal constitution; with a provision to increase the number, according to the growing prosperity of the nation. And thrice blessed be thy bones, immortal Genius, who amendest the constitution by the addition of six volunteers. Time, who wears away the monuments of human grandeur, shall witness this monument of political wisdom, rearing its pyramidal head, and increasing amidst the storms of future centuries. I see, I see, the glorious day approach, (for Louisiana is our's), when our grandsons, outstripping the virtues of their sires, shall quaff twice seventeen bumpers, and twice six volunteers, to the prosperity of our favoured land; millenium of drink! I hail thy approach!

But I check my too adventurous flight, and shall content myself with demonstrating to you the advantages which you, young gentlemen, may reap from drunkenness.

THE DRAMA.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

A new Comedy, from the pen of Mr. T. DIDDIN, was produced at this Theatre, under the title of Guilty or not Guilty? The principal characters are—

Lord Rigid	Mr. Archer.
Edmond Rigid	Mr. Elliston.
Major Corslet	Mr. R. Palmer.
Mr. Balance	Mr. Chapman.
Charles Balance . . .	Mr. Palmer jun.
Sir Harry Pointer . .	Mr. De Camp
Lady Rigid	Mrs. T. Woodfall.
Mrs. Balance	Mrs. Ward.
Suzette	Miss Grimani.
Sophia	Miss Woodfall.
Nancy	Mrs. Gibbs.
Deborah	Mrs. Randall.

The story is taken from FONTAINE'S Novel of The Reprobate; and on the opening of the piece, we are told that the Hero of it, Edmond, has been expelled the university, turned out of the army with disgrace, associated with gamblers abroad, and that, on his return home, he had attempted the life of his father, and the honour of Lord Rigid's second wife: the seduction of an amiable young woman (daughter to a veteran officer) is also attributed to him; and such is the terror inspired by his very name, in the village where he resides, that he is obliged to live in a state of perfect seclusion. His father, with a view to reclaim him, proposes to him a wife, and introduces him to his ward Sophia, and in doing so, becomes involved in a duel with her lover, Sir Harry;—Edmond interferes, and this event tends to a full explanation of his conduct, and he is united to the Major's daughter.

As a light Comedy, this Piece is, we think, superior to any of Mr. DIDDIN'S former productions. It is replete with humour, interest, and morality.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

While America, the parent country of the author, is profoundly silent, Europe is lavish in praise of Sir Benjamin Thomson, that other Howard, combining with the highest talents the most liberal philanthropy. An English author remarks, that he 'hopes the directors of the interior government of his country will have the sense and wisdom to profit from his most valuable and important work, whose truly philosophic and benevolent author must feel a joy and self-satisfaction, far superior to any praise, which man can bestow.' In that masterly poem, 'The Pursuits of Literature,' is found the following honourable mention of an American, in voluntary exile from his native country.

'Yet all shall read, and all that page approve,
When public spirit meets with public love.
Thus late, where Poverty with Rapine dwelt,
Rumford's kind genius the Bavarian felt,
Not by romantic charities beguiled,
But calm in project, and in mercy mild,
Where'er his wisdom guided, none withstood,
Content with peace and practicable good;
Round him the labourers throng, the nobles wait,
Friend of the poor, and guardian of the state.'

It was the good fortune of this American genius to be patronized, in his youth, by Sir John Wentworth, a British Maecenas, and another name for munificence and generosity. He then drank copiously of all the streams of English favour, and, at length, presided in the councils of a Prince. It is said, by I know not what malicious Londoner, that Thomson, in America, was, for many years, a plough boy, next a clerk in a retail store, and lastly, as one of the highest honours to which American ability could aspire, was a village surveyor, and by his Columbian friends was much praised, though by no means paid, for his skill in arithmetic. Our prejudiced author adds, that he has little doubt if the present Count Rumford had remained at home, he would have had a very comfortable cottage, coeval with the oaks that surrounded it; that he would have been assessor of the parish, and gained some paper dollars for his trouble; and to relieve his own hunger, as well as that of the swine which surrounded him, would have devised new modes to prepare Indian corn, and other schemes for the culture of the potato.

The following whimsical humbug, is from a London paper.

A gentleman, whose attention has been greatly directed to the character and temper of BUONAPARTE, and is therefore capable of judging what will be the inevitable consequences of his temerity, can impart some intelligence of vast importance to Gentlemen or Ladies of Fortune. Whoever wishes for further information, must inclose a pecuniary compliment, and propound their question, which will be immediately answered. If an interview is required, and the Advertiser is satisfied with the manner of requiring it, and the motive, he will grant it. Address to Mr. J. L., No. 14. Old Cavendish-street, Oxford-street.

On Friday evening, while some Volunteers were exercising in St. Paul's church-yard, a crowd of people assembled on the out side of the railing, and amongst others, a decent looking man, apparently from the country; he stood by a Gentleman, and, with seeming earnestness, asked what was meant by 'stand at ease?' The other very civilly explained; and, the better to elucidate his observation, stood in the military position, when the ruffian snatched his watch, and ran off, and his flight being favoured by some associates, escaped through Doctor's Commons. [lb.]

Instead of creating only one Constable in France, hundreds ought to have been appointed, in order to take into custody a gang of Ruffians, who have seized the crown, and robbed the People of their Liberty. [lb.]

A very homely man, acting Mithridates on a French theatre, when Monimia says to him, 'My lord, you change countenance,' a young fellow in the pit exclaimed, 'for heaven's sake let him.

PROLOGUE—Written for the play of Richard III. performed by the young gentlemen of the Naval Academy, Gosport, during Easter week.

When high events our deep attention claim,
Excite our wonder, and survive to fame,
The Muse recalls them on her mimic stage,
And points the moral still to every age.
That purpose his, see rising to our view
The glorious scenes immortal Shakspear drew,
There, as we mark another's failings shewn,
We find the justest mirror for our own:
And as each pageant passes in our view,
Look at ourselves: behold that mirror true;
Hence fair instruction see deriv'd to all,
See Justice triumph, and Ambition fall;
When dark Hypocrisy assumes her veil,
How Virtue triumphs when her projects fail.
What dread of guilt alarms not every breast,
When dreams of horror break the murderer's rest?
What fears of certain retribution rise
When tyrants perish, and a Richard dies?
Nor less to Honour's paths our steps incline,
When deeds of glory in her pages shine,
And these brave youths, who laid the despot low,
With kindred ardour bid our bosoms glow.
Then, should that chief, who wakes the world to arms,
Whose hostile frown that prostrate world alarms,
Our fleets evade, escape the ocean's roar,
And plant his banners on the British shore;
Shall we, dismay'd, our well earn'd honours yield,
And shrink with terror from the patriot field?
Ye sacred spirits of our sires forbid!
Forbid it Heaven!—let the deeds they did,
In this dread hour of strife, their sons inspire,
To meet the danger with their native fire:
Let Agincourt, let deathless Blenheim tell,
How erst the vaunting foes of Britain fell;
Let trophied Egypt, let Lincelles proclaim
We still are worthy of the British name.
What! fear those foes we've oft with glory fought?
Perish the wretch, who dare avow that thought!
No! rush to battle, bid the invader know
We've set our lives upon the doubtful throw.
If fate demand our dying country's fall,
Then nobly perish in that country's call!
Or, once again, his sanguine hopes confound,
His fane of glory level to the ground,
While conscience pointing to Domingo's coast,
To Acre's plains, to Jaffa's murder'd host,
Unnerves his arm—may then this boaster fly,
This dark usurper, sink, despair, and die!

PAT'S HINT TO BONAPARTE.

Tune—Darby Galligher's.

Arrah, Monsieur Amie,
Bonaparte ma chree,
Do you think we'll agree,
While you wrangle with brother John;
Now take care of your bacon,
By my soul you're mistaken,
For we are the lads that will help one another on.

If you think you're so clever,
As to whack us together,
Just come over the river,
You, spalpeen, we'll let you know,
Not one inch of Britain
You shall have to sit on,
Augh the wrong thing you've hit on.
As sure as I'm singing now,

O to be at
Your napper, you brat,
Here's John Bull and Pat,
The tight boys that can leather you;
Then be asy at home,
For if hither you come,
Musha, here is your doom,
In sweet London we'll feather you.

Now, in crossing the dub,
Who knows but your tub
May meet with a rub,
That will rub your conceit away;
British tars are the boys,
Who regard not your noise,
Long life to the joys,
How they'll batter your pate away!

Then come, if you dare;
Each soldier, each tar,
Pants high for the war,
Which you threaten you'll to them bring:
Fait, there is not a man,
In each spot of our land,
But has join'd heart and hand,
For his country and noble KING.

O to be at
Your napper, you brat,
Here's John Bull and Pat,
The tight boys that can leather you;
Then be asy at home,
For if hither you come,
Musha, here is your doom,
In sweet London we'll feather you.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The fine satire from 'Climenole,' is just received. His choice of topics, and his mode of treating them, are perfectly to our taste. This favourite correspondent is assured that his essays can never be too frequently communicated, nor too copiously extended.

'A Caledonian' shall be treated with all that liberality, which such a bonny lad deserves.

The affectionate and elegant tribute, from 'Jaques,' to the memory of HAMILTON, is entitled to a much higher place in literary estimation, than those vulgar wailings, which usually deform our gazettes, and 'petrify' one, in a single stanza.

The Medical Thesis, which, with so much Roman elegance and with such Esculapian skill, discusses a topic, interesting to every man of letters, is from the Edinburg school, and was kindly communicated by a friend, recently from that seat of Science.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

REFLECTIONS IN SOLITUDE.

JAQUES ON HAMILTON.

In solitude, though Rumour's aspen tongue
May ring upon the ear her changing notes,
Yet oft, like fleeting forms, which Fancy calls
To build the morning dreams which lovers know,
They pass away, and busy Mem'ry bears
But faint impression of the idle sounds!
Yet oft, when Silence sleeps upon the leaves,
Intrusive Rumour wakes me from my dreams
With tales so mournful, and so oft repeated,
That e'en in solitude I may not choose
But sorrow, and the heart, responsive still,
Murmurs the melancholy tale to air!
Oh! then, to startled Fancy's sickened vision,
The morning music of the robin dies,
The brook's pure waters stagnate in their course,
And the green foliage of the lofty woods
Assumes a sickly cast. Suspicion then
Steals to my ear, and whispers me to shun
The harmless peasant, lurking near my haunts,
Intent on blood. Contagion too takes wing
From crowded streets, and flying on the breeze,
Rears many a sod, and rudely sculptured stone
Within the grave-yard of the village church!—
Rumour! with all thy hundred busy tongues,
Thou canst not tell a tale so sorrowful
To pierce my country's heart, as that which late
The sighs of millions breath'd upon thy ear!
Oft may a parent, while his orphans mourn,
Sleep with his fathers in the mouldering tomb;
Yet kind Oblivion soon will chase the tear
From swelling lids; for Pleasure's gaudy beam
Dries Sorrow's source, as I have often seen
The verdant brook escape from summer suns.
Humanity has ceaseless cause to weep,
For 'man was made to weep.' So sang the bard,
Whom, when the Muses left their sacred groves,
To claim the mortal who had stol'n their lyre,
They found on Scythia's music-gifted hills

Warbling a song of sweetest minstrelsy,
While round his plough the wondering peasants flocked.

Athens her orator,—her CÆSAR, Rome
Have mourned. Her noble CHATHAM, Albion mourns,

And Sparta's honours gather round the grave
Beneath whose turf Leonidas was laid.
These men were great and good, and merited
The fairest honours, and the warmest tears.
Thou too, my country! hast a debt to pay,
Of which Peruvian mines were poor to rid thee!
No! let thy lips dwell ceaseless on the name,
Let thy warm tears bedew the yet green grave,
And let the laurels, which thy love may plant,
Thicken around the fame of HAMILTON.

For he was thine, and only thine, my country!
Thy fields attest his valour in thy cause;
Thy senate hung in rapture on his lips,
Which poured as sweet a stream of eloquence
As Athens knew. Full many a sleepless night
His thorny pillow own'd the sighs and tears
Which heaved and streamed for thee and thee alone!

And in that deed, which laid his bosom bare,
As Honour whisper'd him, he lent his ear,
And, fancying, heard his country claim his life!
Spirit of Genius! Oh! had I that glow
Of intellect, which late illum'd thy soul,
And prov'd Promethean fire no fabled song,
I then should muse, for friendship's partial ears,
Strains not unworthy of thy bright'ning fame!
Yet to thy country still that fame is dear,
And HE, who form'd thee good as thou wert great,

May prompt some pen to sketch each glorious deed

That mark'd thy days. Then shall th' historic page

Record thee as thou wert. Thy val'rous acts
Shall lead the youthful warrior to the field,
Who still shall copy thee, and stay his sword
When Mercy sues. In academic shades,
When youth shall dwell upon that eloquence,
Which Greece alone had rivalled, he shall feel
Ambition lighting all her glowing fires,
His heart shall throb—his feeble pulses swell,
His bright eye kindle, and, with rapid glance,
Dart on the page devoted to thy fame,
And as he gazes on the envied light,
Which thou hadst early reach'd, he yet may deem

It well befitting his advent'rous flight
To seat him there. Some youthful Solon too,
Whom fate may lead to build an empire up,
Shall gather wisdom from thy lum'ous mind,
Which saw its country, even at its birth,
Fast sinking to the tomb where states repose,
And, nobly rescuing it from Faction's grasp,
Pointed the path to Honour and to Fame.
The page of Hist'ry, too, with pride shall tell
That when the treasures of thy country laid
Within thy easy grasp, they could not tempt
Thy honest soul. Oh! it shall proudly say,
'Lo! his grey hairs announ'd the hour of rest,
Yet Poverty still claim'd him as her child!
The simple narrative, which Truth shall tell,
Shall prove thy brightest, fairest eulogy!
Time, as he steals along, and ceaseless yields
Fictitious greatness to Oblivion's tomb,
Shall own thy fame superior to his power,
And feel the splendor that encircles thee!
The foes of Virtue, HAMILTON! were thine,
And thine her dearest friends! She lesson'd thee
When Pleasure's syrens wanton'd in thy path,
To fix thy steady eye on Honour's form,
And deem the hours mispent, which found thee not

Thy country's MENTOR; and she promis'd thee
The sweetest recompense for all thy toils,
Which Virtue gives, and souls, like thine, desire!

For know, when truth shall dissipate the gloom,
Which faction thicken'd to obscure thy fame,
That thou shalt find, wherever Honour lives,
Hearts warm, lips busy, and remembrance prompt
To speak of one, whose bosom knew no guile.

SERENA, IN A MOURNING DRESS.

So have I seen behind some sable cloud,
(Its skirts just tinted with a silver hue)
The queen of planets veil'd in lovely gloom.
Such gloom as o'er the sadd'ning landscape sheds,
The soft and soothing spirit of the sigh.
Such as the poet courts, when fancy's pow'r
Wakes the lov'd shade of some departed hour;
Breathes in regret's dull ear a soothing strain,
And almost bids past joy, be joy again.

EVENING.

Ah! sweeter far! when noon inflames no more,
And day's last sunshine sleeps along the shore;
When o'er the fading scene, with gentler sway,
Ev'n sheds her soft and solitary ray—
For the last gleam, that gilds her parting sky,
Detects responsive lustre in the eye.
So, says Serena, so expire the brave,
So sinks neglected Genius to the grave!
Quick o'er her cheek is spread th' indignant glow,
And hallow'd sighs ascend to fancied woe—
Soft as the breeze that sheds the dews of Ev'n;
Pure as the soul, that wafts their breath to heav'n.

Lines, occasioned by a visit to the Summer residence of a friend, during the Winter.

Deserted pile! severe, indeed, thy fate,
Gone is thy summer transport's fleeting date—
The guardian trees that clos'd thy awful form, Sent their broad shade, or shelter'd from the storm;

In winter's bleak and cheerless aspect clad,
Mourn to the sullen blast a murmur sad:
And as thou brav'st the fierce assailing sky,
And nature's slumb'ring ruin meets thine eye,
Methinks—or 'tis the gale—I hear thee sigh!
Respected mansion! oft has fancy here,
Breath'd the pure sigh, and shed the impassion'd tear—

For, here reposing, virtue rears her shrine,
And the mild aspect of her bliss is thine.
Thine o'er the kindling forms of youth to trace
The sire's mild dignity, the mother's grace,
Commingle sweet...to high refinement wrought,
The glow of feeling, and the grasp of thought.
This, ardent as the vows of saints forgiv'n,
That, strong and tow'ring as the mind of heav'n,
Combin'd in friendship's soft encircling zone,
And breathing o'er thy shades a rapture all their own.

Such was thy bliss, ere nature sadness knew,
And the bright season seem'd to smile for you.
Now through thy hall no cheerful echoes ring,
Nor life-inspiring beauty wakes the string;
No more the lawn, in moon-light softness drest,
Courts the lov'd wand'rer to its dewy breast;
Or 'neath the porch, at twilight's sacred hour,
Wakes the dread tale of death its spectral pow'r;
Of clay cold hands of murder's shrouded blow,
The couch convuls'd, and shriek of midnight
woe.

Affrighted fancy, gazing on the beam
That doubtful moonlight flings across the vale;
Starts—as the watchful owl's prophetic scream,
Shakes the low whispers of the passing gale.
At each still pause that saddens on the ear,
Tho' not a sound invade thy silence drear;
Save the lone cricket from th' untrodden floor,
Save the faint murmurs of the distant shore;
Tho' the short splendors of each parting day
Shed o'er thy solitude a feeble ray,
Yet with the spring that solitude shall smile,
And haste the hour that makes thee blest, sweet pile!

Brings to thy bosom's wish the social train,
And bids thy walls resound to joy again!

Lines, suggested by a perusal of the life of Chatterton.*

.....And yet there are, who, borne on fortune's
tide,

Down the smooth vale of time unconscious glide;
Ne'er dream of wretchedness while they repose,
Nor wake to other cares; to other woes.

And when the north wind rages through the sky,

Withhold from bleeding Poverty a sigh;
Leave those to weep, who, torn from all held
dear,

In want and silence shed the frequent tear;
Who, rear'd 'mid Fortune's noon, ill brook the shade,

And feel, with tenfold sense, its damps invade;
Feel more than chilling frost, Neglect's con-
troul,

And all the horrors of a wintry soul.
For ah! how oft from Penury's cold grave,
Nor worth, nor all the power of mind can save.
Condemn'd through life a ceaseless war to wage,
With all the pride and dullness of the age,
Still vain each wish, o'erwhelm'd each hope elate,

Oft Genius sinks desponding to her fate—
Or moves th' indignant pensioner of pride,
Her triumphs blazon, nor her spoils divide;
And, wrapt in chilling gloom, ne'er feels the
day,
Taught by her hand round happier Wealth to play.

Ah, stern decree! that minds, whom Heav'n inspires
With more than angel thought, than angel fires,
Whose virtues vibrate to the tend'rest tone,
And wake to woe, ere half her woes be known;
From the high boon a sterner fate derive,
And suffer most to suffering most alive!

"HE SAID, IT IS FINISHED! AND HE BOWED HIS HEAD, AND GAVE UP THE GHOST."

St. John, Chap. 19, v. 30.

Hark! from the cross the earth-convulsing sound,
Descending with prophetic swell,
Bursts in ten thousand thunders on astonish'd hell!

Angelic voice! ascending, soft and clear,
It met the bending seraph's ravish'd ear,
Swift thro' the skies th' immortal accents ran,
And Heav'n exulting, hail'd the new-born man.
So erst while stretch'd o'er nature's wide domain,

Unpeopled darkness held her ebon reign;

* These lines, with a few variations, appeared, some time ago, in the Morning Chronicle of New York; it is, therefore, optional with the Editor whether or not to republish them.

When thro' the gloom creative radiance flew,
And call'd to birth distinct each blended hue;
Beam'd on the realms, where Beauty slumb'ring lay,

And woke her various graces into day—
O'er the wide concave swell'd angelic lays,
And perfect nature breath'd harmonious praise—
Nor less the praise that o'er redemption reign'd:
This sang a world created, that a world regain'd.
Fir'd by the sound, see men of humbler clay
Lift their bold vision to immortal day;
Hail in life's sunset, more than life inspires,
And cry 'tis finish'd! as the world retires.
Yes, such thy joy, blest man, when all is o'er
Of pangs and tears that earth's rude climate bore;

When the last stream of day deserts the sky,
And thund'ring millions shout their maker nigh;
'Tis o'er! the God of heav'n and earth proclaims,
And earth and heav'n are wrapt in instant flames.
'Tis o'er! triumphant Hope exulting cries,
And springs indignant to her native skies.

SELECTED POETRY.

[The following elegant stanzas, written on the expected nuptials of the late Lady Harriet Hamilton, are introduced in a very beautiful and pathetic poem, entitled "The Year of Sorrow," by the Hon. W. R.
Spencer.]

Fresh flowers which on the fountain brink
The breath of day-spring rears,
Whose dainty blossoms only drink
The rain-bow's diamond tears.

Such flowers alone my hand shall wreath
For Harriet's genial bow'r;
Such flowers alone their sweets shall breathe
On Harriet's* bridal hour.

Pure as Elysian mornings break,
Fond hopes her fair cheek flush;
Pure as the sinless thoughts, which wake
The cherub's infant blush!

Oh! for a voice, if such there be,
Which sighs have never broke;
Oh! for a harp, whose melody
Of sorrow never spoke!

For thee, Tyrone, their strains should flow,
Since ev'ry bliss divine,
Which saints believe, or seraphs know,
With Harriet's heart are thine.

Yet, thine are joys beyond the scope
Of fiction's brightest theme;
Brighter, than all which youth can hope,
Or love or fancy dream.

Smile on thy green hills, Erin, smile,
Thy woes, thy wars, shall cease,
An angel to thy troubled isle
Bears Concord, Joy, and Peace!

* The departed Lady Harriet Hamilton, eldest daughter to John James Marquis of Abercorn, was shortly to have been married to Henry de la Poer, Marquis of Waterford, Earl of Tyrone.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 101.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

TO the reader, who delights in the creations of Fancy, there are few poetical pieces that will yield more pleasure, than the Castle of Indolence of Thomson; none that will more completely gratify his imagination, by an unbounded and luxuriant indulgence in natural description and imagery.

From the allegorical form, and apparent looseness of expression, resulting from the style of the versification, it does not appear, at first, to have so methodical an arrangement, as a better acquaintance will discover. We must, nevertheless, feel disposed to allow it some perfection, considering it as the offspring of seven years labour of the author of the Seasons.

The two cantos, into which this poem is divided, display a contrast of argument and an opposition of description, of considerable art and ingenuity. The stern dictates of reason are nearly forgotten in the fascinating delusions of the imagination; and though we cannot avoid yielding to the sound and conclusive arguments of the former, yet does the latter hold out lures and deceptions, flattering to our love of ease and natural dependency, that we cannot avoid, without difficulty, the net of the baneful enchanter.

Perhaps no subject admits of more sophistry, or could be more artfully descanted upon, than the vanity and futility of human pursuits. It has been a most copious source of declamation, at all times and in all countries, to the philosopher and satirical poet.

Considering the subject in the abstract, and as bearing relation to a future life, it is the most true and impressive manner in which to treat it. But, considering us as formed for active life, an indifference to its duties and occupations cannot reasonably or consistently be encouraged as praiseworthy, or at all conducive to happiness here.

In Milton's Comus, there is much artful argument used by the voluptuous enchanter, who certainly disguises the most unbounded licentiousness and immorality in the language of a very pleasing and imposing philosophy. Nothing proves the weakness of our intellect more forcibly than these kind of contrasts, where the truth is found so nearly allied to both, that it requires nice discrimination to make the just distinction.

In the present instance we cannot avoid being pleased with the attractions of this retreat, from which Want and Care are far distant, and where Ease and Pleasure abound, and which, though delusive, have their analogy in that future mansion, upon which a warm imagination sometimes delights to dwell.

Some quotations, that will be made in the course of this sketch, will fully prove the appositeness of the above remarks as to the plausibility of the sophisms, which fill the first canto, and the interest we are compelled to take, so far as the premises upon which the arguments are founded. It appears that our author's first intention was the composition of a few stanzas, descriptive of his own attachment to ease and indolence; but he soon discovered that the subject would admit of a greater extent, and might be treated in a manner to convey the most useful and salutary instructions, while it admitted of all the embellishments which a descriptive and moral imagination could afford. Hence we find a long and regular work upon the subject, in two cantos; the first containing an appeal to our passions and imagination, ornamented with very appropriate scenery; the second an address to the reader, wherein is pointed out the fallacy of the former arguments, and the true duties and sources of happiness to mankind as at present constituted.

The following introductory lines convey the moral upon which the superstructure is reared.

O mortal man! who livest here by toil,
Do not complain of this thy hard estate,
That like an emmet thou must ever moil—
Is a sad sentence of an ancient date,
And certes there is for it reason great;
For tho' sometimes it makes thee weep and wail,
And curse thy star, and early drudge and late;
Withouten that would come an heavier bale,
Loose life, unruly passions, and diseases pale.

These lines will remind him, who may have seen Zimmerman's book on the 'Ill effects of Solitude,' of the many examples therein given of the bad consequences resulting from suppressed passions, and seclusion from the active scenes of life.

The poem opens with a fine description of the valley, in which the castle is situated. Every thing that can be considered in unity with the subject, is here placed before our eyes with the vivid colouring and happy arrangement of the author of the Seasons.

Was nought around but images of rest;
Sleep soothing groves, and quiet lawns between,
And flowery buds, that slumberous influence kest
From poppies breath'd, and beds of pleasant green
Where never yet was creeping creature seen;
Meantime unnumbered glittering streamlets play'd,
And hurried everywhere their waters sheen,
That as they bicker'd thro' the sunny glade,
Tho' restless still themselves, a lulling murmur made.

Full in the passage of the vale above
A sabbath, silent, solemn, forest stood.

Where nought but shadowy forms were seen to move,
As Idleness fancied in her dreaming mood,
And up the hills, on either side, a wood
Of black'ning pines, aye waving to and fro,
Sent forth a sleepy horror through the blood;
And where this valley winded out, below
The murmuring main was heard, and scarcely heard to flow.

We have a perfect Elysium presented to our imagination in the succeeding lines, and we feel tempted to turn aside with the passengers, and confine our wanderings to such delightful pleasure grounds. The castle is truly the palace of Luxury and Indulgence; downy couches, the splendid allurements of the table, the charms of beauty, the power of music and poetry, and an abstraction from the disquietudes of the soul, dazzle our senses, and we think of nothing less than the transformations of Circe, or her voluptuous son.

The place being so interestingly described, we listen next to the fascinating oratory of the deceitful possessor, addressed to the numerous passengers, who, in their journey along the paths of life, approach his gates.

The charms which surround them, seconded by so persuasive eloquence, prove irresistible, and they turn in, overjoyed at the termination of their labours.

The contrast so often made of the 'unearn'd pleasures' of the animal creation, and the 'toil worn man,' is handsomely drawn, after which come these animated verses:

Outcast of nature, man! the wretched thrall
Of bitter-dropping sweat of sweltry pain,
Of cares that eat away the heart with gall,
And of the vices an inhuman train,
That all proceed from savage thirst of gain.
For when hard hearted interest first began
To poison earth, Astrea left the plain,
Guile, Violence, and Murder seiz'd on man,
And for soft milky streams, with blood the rivers ran.

Come ye! who still the cumbrous load of life
Push hard up hill, but as the farthest steep
You trust to gain, and put an end to strife,
Down thunders back the stone with mighty sweep,
And hurls your labours to the valley deep,
Forever vain; come, and withouten fee
I in oblivion will your sorrows steep,
Your cares, your toils, will steep you in a sea
Of pure delight; O come, ye weary wights, to me.

What, what is virtue, but repose of mind,
A pure, ethereal calm, that knows no storm,
Above the reach of wild ambition's wind,
Above those passions that this world deform
And torture man, a proud malignant worm,
But here instead, soft gales of passion play,
And gently stir the heart—

O grievous folly! to heap up estate,
Losing the days you see beneath the sun;
When sudden comes blind, unrelenting, fate,
And gives the untasted portion you have won,
With ruthless toil, and many a wretch undone,
To those, who mock you gone to Pluto's reign;
But sure it is of vanities most vain
To toil for what you here untiring may obtain.

POLITE LITERATURE.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.
ADVICE TO A JOURNALIST.

[Translated from the French]

On the subject of Philosophy....History....the Theatre....
Pieces of Poetry....Literary Olios....Anecdotes of Literature....Languages and Style.

The periodical work, to which you intend to devote your labours, may succeed, although there are already too many works of this kind. You ask me, what line of conduct must be pursued to render such a journal grateful to our age, and to posterity. I will answer you, in two words: be impartial. You possess science and taste, if to these you add justice, I predict permanent success. Our nation loves all kinds of literature, from the mathematics to an epigram. None of the journals generally speak of the most brilliant portion of belles lettres, I mean dramatic pieces, nor of the great number of charming poetical works, which support daily the amiable character of our nation. Your journal may be a receptacle for almost every thing, even a song, any thing well written, is not to be disdained. Greece, who boasts of having given birth to Plato, glories in her Anacreon; and Cicero does not make us forget Catullus.

PHILOSOPHY.

You possess a competent knowledge of geometry and physics, to give an exact account of books of this kind; and you have enough of understanding and taste to speak of them with that art, which strips them of their thorns, without loading them, with unbecoming flowers.

I would particularly advise you, when you shall make philosophical extracts, first to present to the reader a kind of historical abridgment of the opinions suggested, or of the truths established.

For example, is the question of the vacuum under discussion? Mention briefly the manner in which Epicurus thought he had proved it; shew how Gassendi rendered it more probable; expose to view the infinite degrees of probability, which Newton has added to this opinion, by his arguments, by his observations, and by his calculations.

Is a work on the nature of air under consideration? It is proper, in the first place, to shew that Aristotle and all the philosophers knew that it had weight, but were ignorant of the degree of that weight. A great number of ignorant persons, who are desirous of knowing at least the history of the sciences, men of the world, young students, will learn, with avidity, with what force of reason, and by what experiments the great Galileo combated the first error of Aristotle on the subject of air; with what art Torricelli weighed it, as we ascertain the weight of any thing in a balance; by what means its elasticity was discovered; and, finally, how the admirable experiments of Hale and Boerhaave have discovered effects of air, which we are almost forced to attribute to properties of matter, unknown until our day.

Does a book, filled with calculations and problems, on the subject of light, make its appearance? How much pleasure will you afford to the public, by exhibiting the feeble ideas entertained by eloquent and ignorant Greece on the subject of refraction; the opinion of the Arab Alhazen, the only geometrician of his time, respecting it; the conjectures of Antonio de Dominis; the system of Descartes, of which he made an ingenious and geometrical, but false application; the discoveries of Grimaldi, whose life was but too short; finally, the truths established by Newton; truths the most bold and luminous, to which the human mind is capable of attaining; truths, which open a new world to our view, but which still leave a cloud behind them!

Shall a work be composed on the gravitation of the celestial bodies, that admirable part of the demonstrations of Newton? Will you not gratify your readers, if you give the history of this gravitation, from Copernicus, who had but a glimpse of it, from Keller, who was bold enough to announce it as if by instinct, to Newton, who has demonstrated to the astonished world, that it presses upon the sun, and the sun upon it?

Attribute to Descartes and to Harrot the art of applying algebra to the mensuration of curb, integral and differential calculation to Newton, and afterwards to Leibnitz. Name occasionally the authors of all new discoveries. Let your journal be a faithful register of the glory of great men. In exposing opinions, in supporting, in combating them, carefully avoid injurious expressions, which irritate an author, and frequently a whole nation, without enlightening any one. Nothing of animosity, nothing of irony. What would you say of an advocate-general, who, in summing up a cause, should outrage, by poignant expressions, the party whom he condemns? The office of a journalist is not so respectable, but his duty is almost the same. You do not believe in pre-established harmony, must you, on that account, decry Leibnitz? Will you insult Locke, because he believes God sufficiently powerful to communicate, if he will, thought to matter? Do you not believe that God, who has created all things, can render this matter and this faculty of thinking eternal? That if he has created our souls, he has also the power to create millions of beings different from matter and from soul? That thus the sentiment of Locke is respectful to the Divinity, without being dangerous to men? If Bayle, who knew much, has doubted much, remember that he has never doubted of the necessity of being an honest man. Be also honest, and imitate not those little minds, who, by vile abuse, outrage an illustrious shade, whom they would not have dared to attack, during his life.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

The orations against Catiline.

"I perceive, Conscript Fathers, that all eyes are turned upon me, and that your minds are employed, not only upon the dangers of the Republic, but upon mine. This personal interest, which intermingles with the sentiment of our common misfortunes, is a testimony, undoubtedly very delightful and very flattering; but I conjure you, in the name of the Gods, to forget it altogether, and laying aside my particular safety, think only on your own and that of your children. If such is my situation, that all the evils, all the afflictions, all the adversity must be accumulated on me alone, I will support them not only with courage, but with joy, provided, that by my labours, I can insure your dignity and the safety of the Roman people. Since they have decreed me the consulate, you all know, the tribunals, the sanctuary of justice and the laws, the field of Mars, consecrated by the Auspices, the assembly of the senate, which is the refuge of nations, the asylum of our household gods, regarded as inviolable, the domestic bed, where every citizen ought to repose in peace, in fine this seat of honour, this curule chair, have been for me, but theatres of dangers, constantly renewing, and of continual alarms: it is upon these conditions that I am Consul—I have suffered; I have dissembled; I have pardoned: I have healed many of your wounds, by concealing my own; and if the Gods have decreed, that it shall be at this expense, that I am to save, from the sword and from fire, from all the horrors of pillage and devastation Rome and Italy, your wives, your children, the priestesses of Vesta the temples and altars of the Gods; whatever may be the destiny that awaits me, I am ready to submit to it. Lentulus has been able to believe that the destruction of the Republic was attached to his destiny, and to the Cornelian name: why should not I glory that the epocha of my consulate, has been fixed by the Destinies to save the Republic? Think then only on yourselves, Conscript Fathers, and cease to think of me. In the first place I ought to hope, that the Gods, protectors of this Empire, will grant me the recompence which I have merited; but if it happens otherwise, I shall die without regret; for never can Death be either disgraceful for a brave man, nor premature for a consular senator, nor to be dreaded by a wise man. It is not that I glory, in being insensible to the tears of my brother who is here present, to the grief which you all express for me; it is not that my thoughts are not often occupied on that extreme affliction in which I left at home, a consort and a daughter equally dear to me, equally struck with my dangers, a son still an infant, that Rome seems to carry in her bosom, as a pledge for my performance of the duties of my consulate; it is not that my eyes do not, involuntarily turn towards a son-in-law, who attends in this assembly, as well as you, with inquietude for the event of this day. I am touched with their situation, and their sensibility, I acknowledge; but this is one reason the more why I should save them, all with you, even at the expense of my own existence than to see them all enveloped with you in the same ruin. In fact, conscript fathers, look at the storm, which threatens you, if you prevent it not. The question is not here of a Tiberius Gracchus, who wished only to obtain a second tribunate; nor of Caius, who excited an uproar in the assembly of the Comitia among the rustic tribunes; nor of Saturninus, who was only culpable of the murder of a single citizen, of Memmius: You have to pass sentence on those, who have remained in Rome, only to set fire to it, here to receive Cataline, and cut all your throats: you have in your hands their letters, their signatures, their acknowledgments. They have attempted to raise insurrections among the Allobroges, to arm the slaves, to introduce Cataline into our walls; in one word, their design was, after having put us all to death, not to leave a single citizen who might weep over the ruins of the state. This is proved; this is avowed—this, conscript fathers, is what you have already decided. What was it, in effect, that you did, when you passed in my favour, a decree of thanks, for having discovered and prevented a conspiracy of villains, armed against the country; when you compelled Lentulus to retire from the pretorship; when you committed him and his accomplices to prison; when you ordained a supplication to the gods, an honor which before me, was never granted, but to conquering generals; when you have honoured with the greatest recompences, the fidelity of the Allobroges? All these acts, so solemn, so multiplied, are they not a condemnation of the conspirators? Nevertheless, since I have thought it my duty to lay this affair in deliberation before you, since the question is to resolve on the punishment due to the guilty, I must declare first of all, what a consul ought not to omit to explain. I well know that there reigned in mens minds, a kind of giddiness and fury, that they sought to excite tumults, that they had pernicious designs; but I had never believed, I confess, that Roman citizens were capable of forming such abominable plots. If you believe that but a few are engaged in them, conscript fathers, you deceive yourselves. The evil is more extensive than you imagine. It has not only gained Italy, it has passed the Alps, it has glided secretly into the provinces; lingering and delay can only encrease it; you cannot too soon suppress it, and whatever part you take, you have not a moment to lose. Your resolution must be taken before night."

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN IRONICAL ORATION ON DRUNKENNESS.

Delivered in the University of Pennsylvania, June 6, 1804.

[concluded].

Happiness, supreme happiness is its gift! Happiness, which extinguishes the desire of all other enjoyments. Once drunkards and parents, wives, children, estate, characters, body, soul,—all, all, are a cheap sacrifice to the enjoyment of the beatific bowl. Then it annihilates misery. The drunkard is insensible of the hour he spends dressing for the tavern, the hour he is going to the tavern, the six hours he sits in the tavern, the two hours he is staggering from the tavern, and the ten hours he sleeps, after having returned from the tavern;—twenty hours out of twenty-four—leaving only four short hours, to the wretchedness of rational existence. What a deduction from misery! A man, who, according to the parish register ought to be three-score years of age;—has, on this system been detained but a few months in this valley of tears.

Your academic life, young Gentlemen, by exposing you to the company of men, that know more than yourselves, must have corrupted your minds, with modesty, and diffidence. Drunkenness is the sovereign antidote against those mean habits. Mark the stripling in a debauch, he speaks with the confidence of a hero, and emphasis of an oracle;—traps his father, laughs at his mother's ignorance, and scoffs at the folly of all mankind;—his fearless mind brooks no controul. Confident of his powers, and influenced with tremendous courage, he dares and achieves incredible exploits, such as breaking glasses, burning chairs, kicking waiters, and knocking down watch-men, with a thousand such feats, which by an apt figure of speech he calls, playing the devil.—But of all the mental advantages, resulting from drunkenness, there is one that I would mention with peculiar emphasis: it is, indeed, worth all the rest put together. There is something within us, whether it be a natural principle, or a corruption of our nature, or a prejudice of education, for it certainly does exist,—which is the cause of our most excruciating torments: it is more imperious in its orders, than all the professors in the University; and more severe in its corrections, than regimental flogging. In the old English language, it is called conscience; but modern philosophy terms it moral sense;—I presume with a charitable motive of detaching some disgusting association of ideas. Well, gentlemen, drunkenness exterminates this hydra. In six month's time it will sponge the conscience as clean from the soul, as if it had never been there.

The advantages of this virtue to health, are too well ascertained to require investigation. Universal experience proves that it warms us in winter like muff, and mitens—and cools, like a fan, the rage of the dog-star. Physicians are sensible of the efficacy of drunkenness, that they mix all their medicines with alcohol, which is the very soul of potable liquors. Or rather, to tell the honest truth, they disguise this precious medicine, with their poisonous drugs—which has been the occasion of many a brave man's death; who, had he lived on pure alcohol, would have had nothing to ail him. For as there is but one disease—debility, and but one medicine, excitement; it follows that he, who lives on excitement can never be sick.—But suppose he should fall sick from an inattention to this salutary regimen;—a recurrence to the practice of this virtue, will be a pharmacopia of medicine, and system of surgery to him. His biliary ducts will be emulged, his nerves invigorated and his breast purged of phlegm by a daily emetic. If plethoric, he phlebotomises, like an hypotamus, on the first stum he meets, and is frequently found under a tavern table, or at the corner of the streets, in a position extremely favourable to the medical operation, invented by the bird Ibis.

I conclude with the simple remark—that drunkenness is essential to your characters, as politicians, and the best support of our Republican institutions. It humanizes society into the most perfect union. King and Cobler, Priest and Fiddler, are all hail-fellows-well-met over the bottle. The haughtiness of wealth, the sternness of virtue, the aristocracy of talents, all vanish before drink. Justice, temperance, fortitude, patience, and all stale prejudices are extinguished by this virtue, as lesser light by the rising sun. A glorious equality of taste and talents, of virtues and pursuits is the consequence. It is such a promoter of humility, that I defy the world to show me a drunkard, that does not of choice prefer lower company, than he was used to while sober. Without drunkenness you cannot shine as politicians. What will you do with the seventeen toasts, and six volunteers on the 4th of July, to say nothing of the new festival of St. Louisiana, and the numerous other festivals consecrated, and to be consecrated to virtue, in the rubric of intoxication.

But what I have said may be sufficient to remove prejudices, to convince you of the value and tendency of this virtue of drunkenness, and particularly to inspire you with disgust at the miserable water-system of some pale moralists and philosophers; who, if they had been blessed with early initiation into our system, would not now be exhibiting the deplorable spectacle of human nature sinking beneath gray hairs, and old age.

I could descant for an age upon this divine virtue, but I am too thirsty to proceed.

Fathers, go in peace to the shade of your grandsires. slow old age shall not oppress your sons: mothers, your hopeful progeny shall rise to distinction: And you, ye bright fair, favour us with your smiles, and your applause: But should you avoid our company, abhor our practises, and bestow your amiable persons on the sons of Sobriety,—Then! O then! we shall be compelled to revert to old Christian rules, and temperance may yet become a Virtue!!

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Original letter from General HAMILTON, on the subject of Arnold's treason, and Andre's fate.

Since my return from Hartford, my dear friend, my mind has been too little at ease to permit me to write to you sooner. It has been wholly occupied by the incidents, and the tragic consequences, of Arnold's treason. My feelings were never put to so severe a trial. You will have heard the principal facts before this reaches you; but there are particulars, to which my situation gave me access, that cannot have come to your knowledge from public report, which I am persuaded you will find interesting.

From several circumstances, the project seems to have originated with Arnold himself, and to have been long premeditated. The first overture is traced back to some time in June last. It was conveyed in a letter to Col. Robinson, the subject of which was, that the ingratitude he had experienced from his country, concurring with other causes, had entirely changed his principles: that he now only sought to restore himself to the favour of his prince by signal proof of his repentance: and that he wished to open a correspondence with Sir Henry Clinton for this purpose. About that period, he made a journey to Connecticut, on his return from which to Philadelphia he solicited the command of West-Point; alledging that the effects of his wound disqualified him for the active duties of the field. The sacrifice of this important post was the atonement he intended to make. General WASHINGTON hesitated the less to gratify an officer, who had frequently rendered eminent services, as he was convinced the post might be safely trusted to one, who had given so many distinguished proofs of his patriotism. The beginning of August, he joined the army, and renewed his application. The enemy, at this juncture, had embarked the greatest part of their force on an expedition to Rhode-Island, and ~~our~~ army was in motion, to compel them to relinquish the enterprise, or to attack New York in its weakened state. The general offered Arnold the left wing of the army, which he declined, on the pretext already mentioned; but not without visible embarrassment. He certainly might have executed the duties of such a temporary command, and it was expected from his enterprising temper that he would gladly have embraced so splendidly inviting an opportunity; but he did not choose to be diverted a moment from his favourite object, probably from an apprehension that some different disposition might take place, which would exclude him. The extreme solicitude he discovered to get possession of the post would have led to a suspicion of treachery, had it been possible from his past conduct to have supposed him capable of it.

The correspondence, thus begun, was carried on between Arnold, and major Andre, adjutant-general to the British army, in behalf of Sir Henry Clinton, under feigned signatures, and a mercantile disguise. In an intercepted letter of Arnold's, which lately fell into our hands, he proposes an interview 'to settle the risks and profits of the co-partnership;' and in the same style of metaphor, intimates an expected augmentation of the garrison, and speaks of it as the means of extending their traffic. It appears by another letter, that Andre was to have met him on the lines, under the sanction of a flag, in character of Mr. John Anderson. But some cause or other, not known, prevented this interview.

General WASHINGTON, crossed the river in his way to Hartford the day these dispatches arrived. Arnold, conceiving he must have heard of the flag, thought it necessary, for the sake of appearances, to submit the letters to him, and ask his opinion of the propriety of complying with his request. The general, without his usual caution, though without the least surmise of the design, dissuaded him from it, and advised him to reply to Robertson, that whatever related to his private affairs must be of a civil nature, and could only properly be addressed to the civil authority. This reference fortunately deranged the whole plan, and was the first link in the chain of events that led to the detection. The interview could no longer take place in the form of a flag, but was obliged to be managed in a secret manner.

Arnold employed one Smith to go on board the Vulture, and bring Andre ashore, with a pass for Mr. John Anderson: Andre came ashore accordingly, and was conducted with a picket of ours, to the house of Mr. Smith, where Arnold and he remained together in close conference all that night and the day following. At day-light in the morning, the commanding officer at King's ferry, without the privity of Arnold, moved a couple of cannon to a point opposite where the Vulture lay, and obliged her to take a more remote station. This event, or some lurking distrust, made the boatmen refuse to convey the two passengers back, and disconcerted Arnold so much, that by one of those strokes of infatuation, which often confound the schemes of men conscious of guilt, he insisted on Andre's changing his uniform for a disguise, and returning in a mode different from that in which he came. Andre, who had been undesignedly brought within our posts in the first instance, remonstrated warmly against this new and dangerous expedient. But Arnold persisting in declaring it impossible for him to return as he came, he at length reluctantly yielded to his persuasion and consented to change his dress, and take the route he recommended. Smith furnished the disguise, and in the evening they arrived at King's ferry together, they proceeded to Crown-Point, where they stopped the remainder of the night, at the instance of a militia officer, to avoid being suspected by him. The next morning they resumed their journey, Smith accompanying Andre a little beyond Pine's-bridge, where he left him. He had reached Tarrytown where he was taken by three militia men, who rushed out of the woods and surrounded him.

At this critical period, his presence of mind forsook him—instead of producing his pass, which would have extricated him from our parties, and could have done him no harm with his own, he asked the militia men if they were of the upper or lower party—distinctive appellations known among the enemy's refugee corps*. The militia men replied, they were of the lower party; upon which he assured them he was a British officer, and pressed them not to detain him, as he was upon urgent business. This confession removed all doubt, and it was in vain he afterwards produced his pass.—He was instantly forced off to a place of greater security, where he was carefully searched, and in his stocking feet were found several papers of importance, delivered to him by Arnold. Among these were a plan of the fortifications of West-Point, a memorial from the engineer on the attack and defence of the place, returns of the garrison, cannon and stores, copy of a council of war, held by General WASHINGTON a few weeks before.

The prisoner was at first inadvertently ordered to Arnold, but upon recollection, while he was still on the way, he was countermanded, and sent to Old Salem. The papers were enclosed in a letter to General WASHINGTON, which having taken a route different from that by which he returned, made a circuit, that afforded leisure for another letter, through an ill-judged delicacy written to Arnold, with an information of Anderson's capture, to get to him an hour before General WASHINGTON arrived at his quarters; time enough to elude the fate that awaited him. He went down the river in his barge to the Vulture, with such precipitate confusion, that he did not take with him a single paper, useful to the enemy. On the first notice of the affair, he was pursued, but much too late to overtake him.

A moment before his setting out he went into Mrs. Arnold's apartments, and informed her, that certain transactions had just come to light, which must forever banish him from his country. She fell into a swoon at this declaration, and he left her in it to consult his own safety, till the servants, alarmed by her cries, came to her relief. She remained frantic all day, accusing every one who approached her, with an intention of murdering her child, (an infant in her arms) and exhibiting every other mark of the most genuine and agonising affection. Exhausted by the fatigue and tumult of her spirits, her phrenzy subsided towards evening, and she sunk into all the sadness of distress. It was impossible not to have been touched with her situation; every thing affecting in female tears, or in the misfortunes of beauty; every thing pathetic in the wounded tenderness of a wife, or in the apprehensive fondness of a mother; and every appearance of suffering innocence, conspired to make her an object of sympathy to all who were present. She experienced the most delicate attentions, and every friendly office, till her departure for Philadelphia.

Andre, without loss of time, was conducted to the head-quarters of the army, where he was immediately brought before a board of general officers, to prevent all possibility of misrepresentation, or cavil on the part of the enemy. The board reported, that he ought to be considered as a spy, and according to the laws and usages of nations, to suffer death: which was executed two days after.

Never, perhaps, did a man suffer death with more justice, or deserve it less. The first step he took after his capture was to write a letter to General WASHINGTON, conceived in terms of dignity without insolence, and apology without meanness. The scope of it was to vindicate himself from the imputation of having assumed a mean character for treacherous or interested purposes, asserting that he had been involuntarily an impostor; that contrary to his intention he was to meet a person for intelligence, on neutral ground, he had been betrayed within our posts, and forced into the vile condition of an enemy in disguise; soliciting only, that to whatever rigour policy might devote him, a decency of treatment might be observed, due to a person, who, though unfortunate, had been guilty of nothing dishonorable. His request was granted in its full extent; for, in the whole progress of the affair, he was treated with most scrupulous delicacy. When brought before the board of officers, he met with every mark of indulgence, and was required to answer no interrogatory which could even embarrass his feelings. On his part, while he carefully concealed every thing that involved others, he frankly confessed all the facts that related to himself; and upon his confession, without the trouble of examining a witness, the board made their report. The members of it were not more impressed with the candor and modest firmness, mixed with a becoming sensibility which he displayed, than he was penetrated with their liberality and politeness. He acknowledged the generosity of the behaviour towards him in every respect, but particularly in this, in the strongest terms of manly gratitude. In a conversation with a gentleman, who visited him after his trial, he said—he flattered himself he had never been illiberal, but if there were any remains of prejudice in his mind, his present experience must obliterate them.

In one of the visits I made to him (and I saw him several times during the confinement) he begged me to be the bearer of a request to the general, for permission to send an open letter to Sir Henry Clinton. 'I foresee my fate, (said he) and though I pretend not to play the hero, or to be indifferent about life; yet I am reconciled to whatever may happen, conscious that misfortune, not guilt, will have brought it upon me. There is only one thing that disturbs my tranquillity. Sir Henry Clinton has been too good to me; he has been lavish of his kindness. I am bound to him by too many obligations, and love him too well, to bear the thought that he should reproach himself, or that others should reproach him, on a supposition that I had conceived myself obliged by his instructions to run the risk I did, I would not for the world leave a sting in his mind that should embitter his future days.' He could scarce finish the sentence, bursting into tears in spite of his efforts to suppress them, and with difficulty collected himself enough afterwards to add. 'I wish to be permitted to assure him I did not act under his impression, but submitted to a necessity imposed upon me, as contrary to my own inclination as to his orders.' His request was readily complied with and he wrote the letter annexed, with which, I dare say, you will be as much pleased, as I am, both for the diction and sentiment.

When his sentence was announced to him, he remarked, that since it was his lot to die, as there was a choice in the mode, which would make a material difference to his feelings, he would be happy, if it were possible, to be indulged with a professional death. He made a second application by letter, in concise but persuasive terms. It was thought this indulgence, being incompatible with the custom of war, could not be granted; and it was therefore determined in both cases to evade an answer, to spare him the sensations, which a certain knowledge of the intended mode would inflict.

When he was led out to the place of execution, as he went along he bowed familiarly to all those with whom he had been acquainted in his confinement. A smile of complacency expressed the serene fortitude of his mind. Arrived at the fatal spot, he asked with some emotion, 'must I then die in this manner?' He was told it had been unavoidable. 'I am reconciled to my fate (said he) but not to the mode.' Soon, however, recollecting himself, he added 'it will be but a momentary pang;' and springing upon the cart performed the last offices to himself, with a composure, that excited the admiration, and melted the hearts of the beholders. Upon being told the final moment was at hand, and asked if he had any thing to say, he answered, 'Nothing, but to request you will witness to the world that I die like a brave man.' Among the extraordinary circumstances that attended him, in the midst of his enemies, he died universally esteemed and universally regretted.

There was something singularly interesting in the character and fortunes of Andre. To an excellent understanding, well improved by education and travel, he united a peculiar elegance of mind and manners, and the advantage of a pleasing person. It is said he possessed a pretty taste for the fine arts, and had himself attained some proficiency in poetry, music and painting. His knowledge appeared without ostentation, and embellished by a diffidence, that rarely accompanied so many talents and accomplishments, which left you to suppose more than appeared. His sentiments were elevated, and inspired esteem, they had a softness that conciliated affection. His elocution was handsome, his address easy, polite and insinuating....By his merit he had acquired the unlimited confidence of his general, and was making a rapid progress in military rank and reputation. But in the height of his career, flushed with new hopes from the execution of a project the most beneficial to his party that could be devised, he is at once precipitated from the summit of prosperity; sees all the expectations of his ambition blasted, and himself ruined.

* A band of marauders, who receive no pay, but subsist by plunder.

The character I have given of him is drawn partly from what I saw of him myself, and partly from information. I am aware that a man of real merit is never seen in so favourable light, as through the medium of adversity. The clouds that surround him are so many shades that set off his good qualities. Misfortune cuts down little vanities, that in prosperous times, serve as so many spots in his virtues, and gives a tone of humanity that makes his worth more amiable. His spectators, who enjoy a happier lot, are less prone to detract from it through envy; and are much disposed by compassion, to give the credit he deserves, and perhaps even to magnify it.

I speak not of Andre's conduct in this affair as a philosopher, but as a man of the world. The authorized maxims and practices of war are the satire of human nature. They countenance almost every species of seduction as well as violence; and the general who can make most traitors in the army of his adversary, is frequently most applauded. On this scale we acquit Andre; while we could not but condemn him if we were to examine his conduct by the sober rules of philosophy and moral rectitude. It is however a blemish in his fame, that he once intended to prostitute a flag; about this a man of nice honor ought to have had a scruple; but the temptation was great: let his misfortunes cast a veil over his error.

Several letters from Sir Henry Clinton and others, were received, that Andre came out under the protection of flag, with a passport from a general officer in actual service, and consequently could not be justly detained. Clinton sent a deputation composed of lieutenant general Robertson, Mr. Elliot, and Mr. William Smith, to represent, as he said, the state of Major Andre's case. General Green met Robinson, and had a conversation with him, in which he reiterated the pretence of a flag, urged Andre's release as a personal favor to Sir Henry Clinton, and offered any friend of ours in their power in exchange. Nothing could have been more frivolous than the plea which was used. The fact was, that, besides the time, manner and object of the interview, change of dress, and other circumstances, there was not a single formality customary with flags; and the passport was not to Major Andre, but to Mr. Anderson. But had there, on the contrary, been all the formalities, it would be an abuse of language to say, the sanction of a flag for corrupting an officer to betray his trust ought to be obligatory. So unjustifiable a purpose would not destroy its validity, but make it an aggravation.

Andre himself has answered the argument, by ridiculing and exploding the idea in his examination before the board of officers. It was a weakness to urge it. There was in truth, no way of saving him: Arnold or he must have been the victim, the former was out of our power.

It was by some suspected Arnold had taken his measures in such a manner, that, if the interview had been discovered, in the act, it might have been in his power to sacrifice Andre to his own security. This surmise of double treason made them imagine Clinton might be induced to give up Arnold for Andre; and a gentleman took occasion to suggest this expedient to the latter, as a thing that might be proposed by him. He declined it: the moment he had been guilty of so much frailty, I should have ceased to esteem him.

The infamy of Arnold's conduct, previous to his desertion, is only equalled by his meanness since. Besides the folly of writing to Sir Henry Clinton, assuring him that Andre had acted under a passport from him, and according to his directions, while commanding officer at a post, and that, therefore, he did not doubt, he would be immediately sent in; he had the effrontery to write to general Washington, to the same purpose, with the addition of a menace of retaliation, if the sentence should be carried into execution. He has since acted the farce of sending in his resignation. This man is in every sense despicable. In addition to the scene of knavery and prostitution, during his command in Philadelphia, which the late seizure of his papers has unfolded; the history of his command at West Point is a history of little, as well as great villainies. He practised every dirty art of speculation, and even stooped to connections with the suttlers of the garrison to defraud the public.

To his conduct, that of the captors of Andre forms a striking contrast: he tempted their integrity with the offer of his watch, his horse, and any sum of money they should name. They rejected his offers with indignation: and the gold that could seduce a man high in the esteem and confidence of his country, who had the remembrance of his past exploits, the motives of present reputation and future glory to prop his integrity, had no charms for three simple peasants, leaning only on their virtue and a sense of duty. While Arnold is handed down with execration to future times, posterity will repeat with reverence, the names of VANWERT, PAULDING, and WILLIAMS.

Copy of a letter from Major ANDRE, Adjutant-General, to Sir HENRY CLINTON, K. B. &c.

Tappan, Sept. 29, 1780.

SIR,

Your excellency is doubtless already apprised of the manner in which I was taken, and probably of the serious light, in which my conduct is considered, and the rigorous determination which is impending.

Under these circumstances, I have obtained General Washington's permission to send you this letter; the object of which is to remove from your breast any suspicion, that I could imagine I was bound by your Excellency's orders to expose myself to what has happened. The events of coming within an enemy's posts, and of changing my dress, which led me to my present situation, were contrary to my intentions, as they were to your orders; and the circuitous rout which I took to return, was imposed (perhaps unavoidably) without alternative, upon me.

I am perfectly tranquil in my mind, and prepared for my fate, to which an honest zeal for my king's service may have devoted me.

In addressing myself to your excellency on this occasion, the force of all my obligations to you, and of the attachment and gratitude I bear you, recurs to me. With all the warmth of my heart, I give you thanks for your excellency's profuse kindness to me; and I send you the most earnest wishes for your welfare, which a faithful, affectionate, and respectful attendant can frame.

I have a mother and three sisters, to whom the value of my commission would be an object. as the loss of Grenada has much affected their income. It is needless to be more explicit on this subject; I am persuaded of your excellency's goodness.

I receive the greatest attention from his excellency General Washington, and from every person, under whose charge I happen to be placed. I have the honor to be,

With the most respectful attachment,

Your excellency's most obedient,
And most humble servant,

JOHN ANDRE, Adj. Gen.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, APRIL 27.

DEAKIN V. RILEY.

This was an action to recover a compensation in damages for breach of promise of marriage, the Defendant having broken such promise by marrying another woman.

Mr. Serjeant COCKEL, in his opening, stated that the Plaintiff, Mrs. Deakin, was a respectable woman, residing in Birmingham, the widow of a man who long bore an excellent character, while employed as a guard to the Shrewsbury mail coach. The Defendant carried on the business of a cabinet-maker and upholsterer in the same place, and frequently visited at Mrs. Deakin's house after the death of her husband. In the course of such visits he pretended to feel an attachment, and proposed marriage. Mrs. Deakin had no children, and there was but little difference between her age and Riley's, who was about twenty-seven. As she possessed some property, he advised to add it to what he had, and with the whole he would carry on the upholstery business to their mutual advantage. Mrs. Deakin, who took some time to consider of his offer, said she had no objection to comply, and if he really was serious, she would make application to her trustee to regulate and dispose of her property, so that they might act together. An agreement being made to that effect, they commenced living together as man and wife; her goods were sold, the money was given to the defendant, and the marriage ceremony was only protracted in consequence of his asserting that a temporary inconvenience prevented him from immediately making the affair known to his family. It was necessary (the learned counsel observed) to pause, as this part of the Plaintiff's character would be censured by the counsel conducting the defence; if, however, she was blameable in too easily submitting to live with the Defendant, her character, before she became connected with him, was as fair as any woman's could be. After the defendant had lived with her some time, she became pregnant, and in that situation he left her, on finding he could marry to more advantage. The promise of marriage would be proved by evidence; also that the unfortunate woman's property had been sold, with other facts, upon which the Jury could not fail to give their verdict for the plaintiff.

Richard Harrison being called, said, he was a hair-dresser at Birmingham; he knew Mrs. Deakin's husband—he was guard to the Shrewsbury mail, and had a house by the Dog Inn, Birmingham, where Mrs. Deakin became a widow on the 10th of May, 1802. About the latter end of August, or the beginning of September, in the same year, the defendant, Joseph Riley, came to witness, and asked to speak with him, before Mrs. Deakin, at three o'clock that afternoon, at her house; he accordingly went, and Riley said to him, in the presence of Mrs. Deakin, 'Do you know I am going to marry Mrs. Deakin?' Witness said, he did not. Riley replied, 'I am going to marry her, and will marry her.' Witness asked, when they would marry? Riley said, 'that on account of a difference between him and his sister, who was averse to the match, he could not marry then, but would in a short time.' A conversation then took place respecting Mrs. Deakin's property. She had a house well furnished; and it was proposed to witness who was trustee of her property, that the furniture, &c. should be immediately sold, and the money given to Riley to put into trade; the goods were accordingly sold by Mr. Smith, an auctioneer, and the money procured in consequence, amounted to 27*l*. The linen and china of Mrs. Deakin were all she had left, and Riley had expressed the greatest hurry to have the things disposed of. Shortly after, witness received Mrs. Deakin into his house. She was then with child, and remained with him during her lying-in.—Riley used to visit her, and the child, by his order was christened at St. Philip's church. The nurse was also paid by him till after Christmas, about which time Riley was married to Miss Jane Evans, whom witness described to be a rich broker's daughter, of Worcester-street, Birmingham. Mrs. Deakin being deprived of her house and goods, went to live as servant with a lady named Wheatly, afterwards to the Dog tavern in Spiceall street, where she lived when the defendant first became acquainted with her, and finally, lodged in the house of a married man named Palmer, in which situations the witness had no opportunity of observing any improper behaviour on her part. On cross examination, witness said the child was born April 1808, and that Mrs. Deakin was situated in a profitable employment at the Dog tavern, when her husband died, in May, 1802.

This was the only evidence adduced.

Mr. Serjeant Bessr, in behalf of the defendant, contended, that the character of the Plaintiff ought to prevent the Jury from giving credit to the case as made out; it was only supported by one witness, brought 150 miles from the country. The cause might have been tried in Warwickshire, if the party bringing the action had not been afraid of being known to the Jury as a person of bad character. The conduct of the Plaintiff, in forming the connection she had done, within a month after the death of her husband, ought to impress upon the Jury, that she was not entitled to bring the present action; and if they should be inclined to give a verdict to the plaintiff, the damages could not be too trivial.

No witnesses were called for the Defendant.

Mr. Justice Roome summed up the evidence, and said he was disposed to express a sentiment which he had early imbibed, respecting causes similar to the present, namely, that the man who intrigues for money is guilty of an aggravated offence. The defendant had taken the plaintiff's, and thereby prevented her from procuring her livelihood in the same decent manner in which she lived when he first knew her. It was a deliberate and unmanly part, to reduce a woman to the situation in which the plaintiff stood. There was nothing in her conduct to her discredit, except the grounds on which the action was brought; and if the Jury believed the witness, who had conducted himself properly, and told a probable story, they must find a verdict for the Plaintiff, and give her such damages as they thought adequate to the injury she had sustained.

The Jury, after a short deliberation, found for the Plaintiff—damages 150*l*.

HILL v. FAWCETT.

This cause, which stood for trial, excited an uncommon degree of expectation and curiosity in the Theatrical world. It was an action for an assault, and the combatants were both Knights of the Sock. The charge was prepared, the Jury sworn, the Judges arranged made a terrible show. The Learned Serjeant retained for the complainant was commencing the Prologue, when the parties agreed to refer the subject to the criticism of a more private tribunal, and accordingly the piece on the record was withdrawn—we are therefore unable to give even a faint outline of the fable. Some of the incidents, which have reached us from report, and consequently may be incorrect, we will venture to state. We understand the plaintiff, Mr. Hill, of vocal celebrity, happened to walk into the Green-room of the Theatre, to which he was attached, upon a certain evening, when the paraphernalia of his nether habiliments were not in the most perfect state of appointment—a button had escaped from a situation in which its locality was peculiarly important. This naturally caught the eye of Mrs. Atkins, who, with great good nature, assisted the sloven in arranging the decomposition of his galligaskins. The matter might have passed over as an ordinary transaction, but the defendant, Fawcett, who observed the kind offices tendered by the Lady, thought proper to indulge his mirth at the expense of the plaintiff; in short, he quizzed him, to such a degree, that the wrath of Mr. Hill vented itself in expressions which admitted but of one alternative—Fawcett had recourse to it, and knocked Hill down.—Such was the ground work of the Drama announced for public exhibition. It was whispered that Mrs. Atkins, disliking the part she was to perform, had not only omitted the rehearsals, but had altogether declined coming forward. The audience retired very much dissatisfied.

AMERICAN TRANSLATION OF POTHIER'S TREATISE ON INSURANCE.

In a country, whose genius is so commercial as our own, and where the spirit of enterprize animates every man of business, questions on the usage and law of insurance are perpetually arising; to be ignorant, or even doubtful of which, were most pernicious to the interest and credit of the merchant adventurer. Of all the books, written to elucidate the various contracts, existing among mankind, those of Monsieur POTHIER, a French lawyer of the highest celebrity, are pre-eminently entitled to notice for their admirable correctness, propriety, perspicuity and good sense. Such is the clearness of his method, the soundness of his law, and the wonderful facility of his style, that the writer of this article, though not an adept in the intricacies of the French idiom, and not professionally stimulated to the study, cannot open the various volumes of this elegant writer, without dwelling with a fond delight, upon pages, so opulent in useful rules of business, and so bright with all the clearness of illustration. The possession of a book from so learned an author, on a topic so interesting as that of Insurance, must be a treasure to every lawyer, and merchant. But, with one exception, this treasure has hitherto been locked up in a foreign casket, and many, who have not time or inclination for the study of the French language, are naturally anxious for the key. We are happy, both for the sake of the legal and mercantile classes, to have it in our power to announce, that an American gentleman possessing an intimate knowledge of the original, has just finished a very accurate translation of Pothier's treatise. This will be immediately put to press, and will appear in a very short time. If the translator should in the public estimation have rendered an useful service to the merchants and lawyers of his country, he will be stimulated to proceed with a version of such other tracts of Pothier, as either for curiosity or use, may be advantageously added to our forensic studies. The writer cannot dismiss this article without citing the irresistible authority of Sir WILLIAM JONES, who has praised Pothier with an elegance and an emphasis of expression, only rivalled in those classical books, of whose spirit he so brilliantly shared.

At the time when Le Brun wrote, the learned M. POTHIER was composing some of his admirable treatises on all the different species of express or implied contracts; and here I seize with pleasure an opportunity of recommending those treatises to the English lawyer, exhorting him to read them again and again; for if his great master, Littleton, has given him, as it must be presumed, a taste for luminous method, apposite examples, and a clear manly style, in which nothing is deficient, nothing redundant, he will surely be delighted with works, in which all these advantages are combined, and the greatest portion of which is law at Westminster as well as at Orleans: for my own part I am so charmed with them, that, if my undissembled fondness for the study of jurisprudence were never to produce any greater benefit to the public than barely the introduction of Pothier to the acquaintance of my countrymen. I should think that I had in some measure discharged the debt, which every man, according to Lord Coke, owes to his profession.

THE MAN IN THE MOON. A NEW PERIODICAL PAPER.

Our readers may remember, that some time since, in the course of our Miscellaneous paragraphs, we mentioned that a new series of essays under the whimsical but expressive title of The Man in the Moon, was announced for publication in the city of London. We have just learned, that a complete octavo volume of these papers, has been published, consisting of animadversions on the politics, morals, and manners of the day. This work has been favourably received, and the Editor of 'The European Magazine' a very elegant and judicious Journal, informs us, that The Man in the Moon, comprizing twenty four papers, is a mélange of good humoured strictures, on the manners, and literature of the times. Many of the characters introduced, are drawn from the life, and the satire, with which the author has lashed prevailing follies, is at once forcible and delicate.—We hope this volume will soon be introduced in America, where a taste for this agreeable species of Literature, seems to be on the increase.

VIRGIL.

Mess. POYNTELL and Co. continuing their praiseworthy zeal for the diffusion of classical knowledge in this country, have published a fine edition of the works of VIRGIL. It is printed by Mr. Maxwell, in a style of neatness, which will not detract from the reputation of his Press; and it has been very accurately revised by several gentlemen of competent skill, who have diligently consulted the best editions, particularly the Princeps; that of Heyne; the magnificent folio of Foulis; and the splendid quarto of Dulau. It were presumptuous for the editor to pronounce a work spotless, to effect which, would demand the hundred hands of one character in ancient fable, and the hundred eyes of another. But it is just and true to aver that the American Copy is more correct, than the London Original. For the honor of our country, for the benefit of studious youth, and for the promotion of correct taste in literature, we hope that the works of Virgil, one of the most splendid specimens of ancient wit, will be perused at every Grammar School, and College in America. From the correct and elegant style, in which Mr. POYNTELL and his partners have now printed four* of the Roman classics, we may reasonably anticipate such a full measure of public approbation, that these Gentlemen may be encouraged to reprint many of the finest specimens of Grecian, Roman, and British genius.

* Cæsar, Virgil, Horace, and Sallust. The two last of which will likewise be noticed in this Journal.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 102.

[Criticism on the 'Castle of Indolence' concluded.]

IN describing some of the amusements of these mortals, who, having drank of the waters of oblivion, are free to pass their time as they will, Thomson indulges in some very satirical reflections upon the various pursuits of society. Folly and Vice are rendered conspicuous in the well-drawn character of the miser, spendthrift, and the author, in the detail of the dissipation and extravagance of the city, the dark intrigues of party, and the ridiculous results of warfare.

The following verses will serve as a specimen of this satire, and the first may possibly bear an application to some of our American cities.

Then would a splendid city rise to view,
With carts and cars and coaches roaring all,
Wide pour'd abroad, behold the giddy crew,
See how they dash along from wall to wall.
At every door hark how they thundering call;
Good Lord! what can this giddy rout excite?
Why, on each other with fell tooth to fall,
A neighbour's fortune, fame, or peace to blight,
And make new tiresome parties for the coming night.

But, what most shew'd the vanity of life,
Was to behold the nations all on fire;
In cruel broils engag'd, and deadly strife,
Most Christian Kings, inflam'd by black desire,
With honourable ruffians in their hire,
Cause war to rage, and blood around to pour;
Of this sad work when each begins to tire,
They sit them down just where they were before,
Till for new scenes of woe peace shall their force restore.

As the first canto closes, the scene changes, and the deception begins to appear—

Their only labour was to kill the time,
And labour dire it is, and weary woe.

The consequences of indolence and luxurious indulgence begin to be discovered, and the allegory is well supported by fine personifications of Disease, Lethargy, Dropsy, Hypochondria, Spleen, Gout, and Apoplexy.

At the commencement of the second canto, we have these lines, which may, probably, prove soothing to the luckless wretch, who has not basked in the smiles of prosperity;

I care not, Fortune, what you me deny,
You cannot rob me of free nature's grace,
You cannot shut the windows of the sky;
Nor bar my constant feet to trace
The woods and lawns by living streams at eve.

The genius displayed in the arrangement as well as matter of the poem, is happily continued throughout.

In the compass of a very few verses Thomson has condensed a highly poetical account of the origin and progress of science and the arts from the east, until they attained perfection in that favoured island, the general character of whose people and institutions he has repeated in all his compositions in the most elevated and flattering style. We see, as it were, in one point of view, his original, warlike, savage countrymen, the building of cities and cultivation of fields, the arrival at perfection in every product of genius and industry, and the threatened decline of all, from the introduction of luxury and licentiousness. When the parts of this description are so well connected, and form so beautiful a whole, it is superfluous to give a detached quotation. The passage is easily recalled by those who have read it with an interest the piece merits.

The following verse seems so applicable to the times, and our peculiar situation, that I must be excused for inserting it as a lively and well-drawn portrait:

A rage of pleasure maddened every breast;
Down to the lowest lees the ferment ran;
To his licentious wish each must be blest,
With joy be fevered, match it as he can;
Thus vice her standard rear'd; her arrier ban
Corruption called, and loud she gave the word,
Mind, mind yourselves, why should the vulgar man,
The lacquey be more virtuous than his lord,
Enjoy this span of life! 'tis all the gods afford.

The progress of this baneful wizard's power and success at length reaches the ears of industry, who, roused by indignation, is induced to abandon his retreat for the purpose of extirpating this ravaging monster before it was too late.

Accompanied by his minstrels, he approaches this Elysian vale; at the sight of which an exclamation escapes, pretty much to the same purport as the previous remarks in this essay upon the proximity of vice to virtue.

Irresolution, and a subserviency of Reason to Passion and Indolence, where they have gained ascendancy in spite of the judgment and wishes of the incapacitated mortal, are accurately described.

The address of the minstrel to the wavering and irresolute multitude, answers the purpose of reclamation, and contains unanswerable arguments in opposition to those formerly advanced, and which are exemplified by many appropriate similes.

Did I not consider quotations as generally tiresome, I would copy some verses that in a very beautiful manner describe the changes that were produced in the visions of these deluded mortals, by clearing the mist from their mental sight,

Precipices, destructive and loathsome objects are now substituted for what was so enchanting; they are astonished at their own blindness, and reformation is the consequence. It was not, however, the lot of all to escape this wretched thralldom. Some are consigned over to beggary and scorn, from whose persecutions they cannot fly or expect relief.

Hitherto nothing has been attempted but an outline of the plan of this poem, very little else can be done in examining a production of this description, which is not shackled by the rules of the various and rigid nature which regulate the more elevated kind of poetry. I will, therefore, close my remarks, in a few words, by giving such a character as more properly belongs to this order of poems.

In considering this production, the reader must be very fastidious, indeed, if he discerns any thing defective in the poet's powers of imagination. It is never languid nor uninteresting, though of considerable length, and wrote in a stanza which is not always favourable to energy or animation. The plan is complete and methodical; the subject well supported, and highly interesting; the imagery striking and poetical; the versification as smooth and flowing as his master Spenser's, or any of his imitators. I think it has the advantage of the Minstrel of Beattie, by being of more general application and utility.

A REVIEW POLITICAL AND LITERARY.

Memorabilia Democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full and true account of that venerable science; interspersed with anecdotes, characters, and speeches, of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats. By SLAVESLAP KIDNAP, Esq. Foolscap, 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651.

Washington—Printed by Samuel H. Smith, for Duane and Cheetham, and Adams and F. Blake, proprietors of the work.

I owe an apology to the public for the abrupt manner in which these essays were interrupted; particularly as it happened at the moment when intelligent men began to take a great interest in their success. The opportunity which this circumstance offers, seems favourable to a large and minute development of myself, my purposes, my engagements, and my connexions, with all other like personal elucidations, forming the most voluminous part of the writings of my countrymen. And having consulted my two worthy and admired friends Doctor— and Doctor Samuel L. Mitchell, they both were of opinion, that the occasion was fair, and ought not to be neglected, 'Ille ego qui quondam,' and 'quorum pars magna fui,' being, as they assured me, the choicest passages in the Æneid. To chaunt which, with variations and additions, was the great object, as it was the sweetest reward, of their literary labours. But having had the misfortune, as they term it, of being bred up in the monkish discipline of our ancestors, and having some scruples of conscience, the result of ancient prejudices, at blowing myself up to a consequential size, after their example, by the force of my own wind, I have determined to leave the public in ignorance concerning myself, and the causes of my omission. I shall be content if I can create in my readers that interest for my subject, which contemporary writers, for the most part, exclusively claim for themselves. Here, however, I cannot refrain from refuting a calumny, which, I find, in certain circles, has received currency, and which implies that I am wholly unequal to the task I have undertaken; and that I have sunk under the greatness of Mr. Kiddnap's work. Than which nothing is more false. I desire to be thankful that I am blessed with an excellent constitution of body, well adapted to that intense application, which is necessary to pursue and analyse the rich vein I have opened; and, I speak after the fashion of brother essayists, I feel no incompetency to the task. So that, if I can escape the ordinary calamities and temptations, which beset newspaper patriots—if paper continue plenty, and geese moult and multiply, as of late, about the capitol; if, notwithstanding truth cannot now, as formerly, be given in evidence, I steer clear of a prison, and be not, like some of the greatest and ablest friends of our present administration, obliged to abscond for forgery, swindling, or murder, I have no doubt that I shall make, under the auspices of Mr. Kiddnap, a collection of whatever is rare or valuable, either in politics or literature, among the democrats of these United States—a collection, which will be sought for, and deposited in the cabinets of the curious, like amber, not on account of its extraordinary worth, but because it has drawn together and preserved, in a strange manner, all the light, hollow, rotten, filthy bodies, which have come in its way; and exhibits, with great accuracy, their many defects and obliquities, through the medium of its natural transparency.

My readers, also, must not imagine, because I have suspended this publication, that I have been wholly negligent of its interests. On the contrary, I have the satisfaction of informing them, that I have, after painful endeavours, succeeded in opening a correspondence with Mr. Kiddnap, who has not only expressed his entire approbation of these essays, but has also promised, from time to time, to aid my future labours with such annotations and additions, as the present state of democracy in the United States, (so entirely different from its condition when his work was first put to the press), seems to demand. The fruits of this correspondence will, I dare promise, be not less pleasant than the other productions of this great man. He has, however, annexed one condition to his offer of assistance and farther elucidation of his subject, which is, that in this review, I should not confine myself to the order in which his work made its appearance, but that I should select such parts as he should previously prescribe. All other controul he disclaims, neither deprecating censure, nor soliciting applause. A proposition so reasonable, and indeed so advantageous, I could not find in my heart to refuse, and now hasten, on my part, to fulfil, by presenting to the public, according to his direction, some extracts from his ninety-seventh chapter, entitled 'An inquiry into the literary merits of Thomas Jefferson, il divino.' Although my readers will readily believe that I cannot subscribe to the unqualified praise, which Mr. Kiddnap bestows, yet I shall postpone all remarks of my own for the present, not only because I find it a thankless task to interrupt an author in the midst of his admiration and interjection of wonder, with the cool calculations of a reviewer, but also out of respect to Mr. Jefferson, who is, I am told, never so ill at ease as when any adverse wind turns aside the gross incense of his admirers. After the ordinary introductory remarks, which critics use to display their learning, and swell their volumes, Mr. Kiddnap thus proceeds.

"I enter upon this examination of the literary merits of our dear Jefferson with a deep sense of the greatness of the design, and my inadequacy to it. How wide is the field! How untrodden! Infinitely more difficult is it to select, than to gather the thousand fruits and perfumes, which are scattered, in such wild confusion, by his creative hand. The abstract, as he is, of all that is glorious in democracy. The very sun of republicanism. The softest politician. The prettiest philosopher. The mightiest and most heroic economist. His mind is the repository of the knowledge of all ages and countries. His heart a perpetual bleeding fountain of philanthropy. Great is he, in all qualities and attributes, in all purposes and projects. Whether like the olympic Jupiter, shaking his ruddy locks, he thunders forth messages from the capitol, or like him with Europa, toys with Matthew Lyon in brutal gambols, or, like the same god with Danae, descends on Duane in a golden shower,

Di captis adspirare meis.

The persevering malignity of the enemies of our president, demands speedy and minute justice for his literary efforts. This task, lofty as it is, be mine. Turn we first to his philosophical works. Here the fire of his genius glows with a mild and unclouded lustre. Here the purity of his pen is a perpetual emblem of the unsullied whiteness of his heart. Here the precision and elegance of his style forever indicates the strong, discriminating mind, competent always to make just adaptation of language to circumstances, persons, and occasions. In the heat of political controversy, inaccuracies may have escaped from his pen. Homer, it is said, at times slumbers. It is not wonderful then, if the keen eye of Jefferson should occasionally be closed. In his philosophical works, however, we may challenge the utmost malice of criticism. Among these he never nods. With time to think and prepare, correctness always distinguishes his style, and taste selects it for her perpetual residence. I commence my examination with that master piece of chaste composition, which may be found in the twelfth page of the advertisement, preceding the fourth volume of the 'Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, held at Philadelphia for the purpose of promoting useful knowledge.' In January 1797, Mr. Jefferson was chosen president of that association, and its secretaries, having given him a written notice of his election, received from him the following elegant and classic reply.

Monticello, January 28, 1797.

Gentlemen,

I have duly received your favour of the 7th inst. informing me that the American Philosophical Society have been pleased to name me their president. The suffrage of a body, which comprehends whatever the American world has of distinction in philosophy and science in general, is the most flattering incident of my life, and that to which I am the most sensible. My satisfaction would be complete, were it not for the consciousness that it is far beyond my titles. I feel no qualification for this distinguished post, but a sincere zeal for all the objects of our institution and an ardent desire to see knowledge so disseminated through the mass of mankind that it may at length reach even the extremes of society, beggars and kings. I pray you, gentlemen, to testify for me to our body my sense of their favour, and my dispositions to supply by zeal what I may be deficient in the other qualifications proper for their service, and to be assured that your testimony cannot go beyond my feelings.

Permit me to avail myself of this opportunity of expressing the sincere grief I feel for the loss of our beloved Rittenhouse. Genius, science, modesty, purity of morals, simplicity of manners, marked him as one of nature's best samples of the perfection she can cover under the human form. Surely no society, till ours, within the same compass of time, ever had to deplore the loss of two such members as Franklin and Rittenhouse: Franklin, our patriarch, the ornament of our age and country, whom philosophy and philanthropy announced the first of men, and whose name will be as a star of the first magnitude in the firmament of heaven, when the memory of his companions of the way will be lost in the abyss of time and space. With the most affectionate attachment to their memory, and with sentiments of the highest respect to the society, and to yourselves personally, I have the honour to be, gentlemen,

Your most obedient,

And most humble servant,

TH. JEFFERSON.

Messrs. Samuel Magaw
Jonathan Williams
William Barton
John Bleakly.

Secretaries of the
A. P. Society.

I shall attempt to point out some of the beauties of this celebrated answer. For no where is the happy genius of this great man more apparent. In the first place I remark that an ordinary writer would have imagined that his chief object, on such an occasion as this, was to inform the secretaries of his acceptance, or refusal of the office, to which he had been elected; and accordingly would have directed all his labours to that end. Not so Mr. Jefferson. It is a favourite maxim of his, never to commit himself. He has, accordingly, managed himself so dexterously as to keep the society in total darkness upon the very point, on which it required information, and to communicate which was the natural purpose of his letter. He tells the secretaries that he has received their letter, is flattered by its contents, and conscious the honour is beyond his deserts; that what he wants in merit he is willing to make up in zeal. He laments Rittenhouse, and celebrates Franklin's apotheosis. But whether he accepts the office of president, we are just as wise, at the end, as at the beginning of his letter. So that in case of any danger resulting from the exercise of the office, he is yet at liberty to deny that he ever accepted it. This Fabian policy is one of those characteristic traits of greatness, in which, it may be doubted, if any man ever excelled Mr. Jefferson. The phraseology of the first sentence, also, is very remarkable, and entirely in his own peculiar manner. He understands, as he carefully expresses himself, not that he has gotten the office of president, which he does not seem much to value, but that he has obtained, what he values highly,—the name. This fills his fancy. On this his imagination dwells with delight. I think there is farther, plainly perceptible, in this expression, that refined shrewdness and sarcastic keenness, which we shall have frequent occasion to notice in Mr. Jefferson. For by his nice selection of the term name in this connexion, he obviously means to be understood, first, that all the honour, the American Philosophical Society can bestow, are merely nominal; and next, that, if it were not for the name of it, the attainment even of the presidency of that society would be worth nothing at all.

Notwithstanding my respect for Mr. Jefferson, I cannot but dissent from his assertion in the next sentence. I cannot agree that the American Philosophical Society "comprehends whatever the American world has of distinction in philosophy and science." I know many men, full as distinguished as any member of that body, who are not elected into it. I confess, that Mr. Jefferson's desire to return the compliment, he had received, with interest, has carried him a little beyond what the truth of the fact will warrant. As he could not but know that there was a great deal of science and knowledge, in the American world, which never did, and probably never would, get into that society. I know that some of his friends, in their constructions upon this sentence, lay great stress upon the qualifying terms 'in general,' and maintain, that he means it to imply that the members of that society were not famous for a PARTICULAR AND ACCURATE KNOWLEDGE OF ANY THING, but were distinguished only by a general acquaintance with philosophy and science. Although this is entirely conformable to that dry humour, which, as I have mentioned above, Mr. Jefferson can exhibit upon occasion, yet it always appeared to me to be a harsh and forced construction; and, what is worse, it does not seem to help my friend, in the least, on the score of correctness, inasmuch as it cannot be denied that there are now, and always have been, in this American world, a great many scientific smatterers, men very loud in their pretensions to philosophy and science in general, who, however deserving, have never reaped the honors of that fraternity.

The use of the word 'TITLES,' in the plural, in the ensuing sentence, is very happy. A common writer would have expressed himself, here, in the singular. Apprehending that all the literary reputation he had acquired, through his whole life, was, in a collective view, the title from which he derived the distinction. But Mr. Jefferson is as precise, as a Virginia attorney, giving his opinion on the validity of the bill of sale of a slave. He seems to say, 'I have examined the case. It is this. I have written an essay on a mould board, another on the great claw, I have baptized it the megalonyx, and demonstrated that it is not the megatherium. I have prepared an account of the Mammoth and given a drawing of its bones. These are my titles; I am conscious the dignity is greater, than such exertions in the case of science, merit.' This whole process is implied by that happy use of the plural.

In the succeeding sentence, Mr. Jefferson seems, again, to have forgotten himself. His animosity to kings is well known, and as he never suffers an occasion to escape, to make them feel his displeasure, it was natural he should seize upon so fair an opportunity as the present, to make them experience the weight of his resentment. But why should he so grossly insult the beggars? Why reduce them to a level with kings, whom Mr. Jefferson, we all know, considers as the lowest of mankind? Why intimate that, notwithstanding the universal diffusion of knowledge, in this country, it had not reached that valuable class of citizens? Surely Mr. Jefferson knew that he was under more obligations to them, having received from them a more active support, than to any other description of men in the United States. I have stated these sentiments to Mr. Jefferson, who is under the deepest affliction at the unintentional wound he has given to suffering humanity, whose interests are always near his heart. And he has assured me, that it is his firm intention, in the next volume of these transactions to make a suitable apology to the beggars. I mention this, lest any sense of this insult, should render the beggars cool, as to his success, at the ensuing election, in which case, I have great doubts, whether he could attain the Presidency. I shall now notice another instance of Mr. Jefferson's precision, in style, as well as his rigid adherence to principle. No man is a credible witness in his own cause. Mr. Jefferson knew, therefore, that let him swear as stoutly as he would to 'his zeal and dispositions,' the society were bound to give no credit to his testimony. But a great man is never at a loss for expedients. From this dilemma, in which he was necessitated, either to say nothing, or to say what the society were not obliged to believe, he extricates himself with singular address. He prays the committee itself, to testify, in these particulars, in his behalf. Assuring them, that let them testify as much as they will, they cannot go beyond his feelings, or, in other words, that they will be in no danger of the act against perjury. This method of testifying by proxy as to the state of one's own feelings is entirely an invention of Mr. Jefferson. It is, also, not less convenient than it is admirable. But the misfortune, in this case, is, that neither Mr. Magaw, nor Mr. Williams, nor Mr. Barton, nor Mr. Bleakly have ever given the depositions required. There are certainly none, in the transactions of the American Philosophical Society, and, I am credibly informed, none on the files of its secretaries. An omission much to be lamented, especially as it bears, constructively, a reflection on Mr. Jefferson's sincerity, inasmuch as it implies that neither of those gentlemen was willing to risk his reputation, by testifying, in the cause. I hope, however, they will all set themselves about correcting this procedure, as soon as possible. And if each will, separately, depose before a magistrate, and accompany his evidence, like Mr. Jefferson, in the affair of Logan, with all the usual captions and legal formalities, they will not only discharge an incumbent duty to their President, but also perform an acceptable service to their fraternity; by furnishing a large and valuable portion of materials for a future volume. It being obvious, from the number and expansive nature of the publication of their Society, that one of the chiefest and most important ends, of its patriotic labour, is the encouragement of paper, and other infant manufactures of our country.

The next object worthy of attention is the epithet, which the affectionate heart of Mr. Jefferson selects for his predecessor. It is not, as one would expect, great, immortal, illustrious, or the like; but it is, our beloved Rittenhouse. Now this is the excellence of the philosophy of the present day. It makes all its professors amorous. And when other objects fail, it is their rule to fall in love, with one another. But this reciprocal passion among philosophers has the following peculiarity, which is very remarkable;—that death, which, in other amour; is very apt to render the surviving bereaved, languid and indifferent, makes disconsolate, widowed philosophers burn with much more intense heat. And I have observed that, he, who is about to take the chair of the deceased, never fails to be seized with very desperate paroxysms, on such occasions.

The ensuing sentence exhibits a specimen of Mr. Jefferson's genius and taste, as wonderful, as is rare. First;—what a spirit does he throw into the peace, by that noble personification of 'genius, science, modesty, purity of morals and simplicity of manners.' The three first of these gentlemen, have been, if I mistake not, embodied before. But the two last are wholly indebted to

M. Jefferson for the corporeal shape, in which they appear. Having noticed the persons, I will next attend to the object, for which they are created. This is very particular. Being no other than 'to mark Dr. Rittenhouse as one of nature's best samples of the perfection she can cover under the human form.' Observe, reader, the grandeur of this idea.—First, nature is here represented as a Birmingham manufacturer. Next, she is sending out to America 'samples of perfection.' Next, a house of great credit. Messrs. Genius and Co. is associated, expressly for the purpose of putting 'the tower mark,' on the Doctor, before exportation. And last of all, Messrs. Genius and Co. who are, naturally, very anxious to keep up the character of the manufacture, are made to apologise for the deficiency of the sample;—that although it is not the best, yet that it contains as much, as could possibly be gotten under 'the cover.' They seem to say, 'considering the size of the package, we have made great stowage.' If Mr. Jefferson had staid his hand, here I think, no work ancient or modern could have compared with this either in style, or execution. Unhappily, however, like other great masters in design, he has injured the effect, by crowding too many characters upon his canvas. For immediately after is seen, Dr. Franklin, as 'a patriarch, and the ornament of our age and country,' 'with philosophy and philanthropy' very solemnly announcing him 'the first of men.' In all this, there is very great want of unity in design. For as Dr. Rittenhouse had just before been declared to have been 'marked,' by five respectable, authorised, inspectors, as the 'best sample of human perfection,' it was to be expected that two such judicious personages, 'Philosophy and Philanthropy,' would have paid some attention to their recommendation, and made so solemn an announcement in favour of Rittenhouse, rather than of Franklin. So that, it must be confessed, Mr. Jefferson by attempting too much, in one piece, has given a very confused and inconsistent effect, to the whole. For he is reduced to this dilemma; either that 'genius, science, modesty, purity of morals and simplicity of manners' laboured under a great mistake, when they put upon Dr. Rittenhouse 'the mark of the best sample of human perfection,' or else, that 'Philosophy and Philanthropy' were guilty of a most unpardonable error, in 'announcing Dr. Franklin the first of men.' This however is not the whole misfortune of our hero. For he goes on to assert that 'the name of Franklin will be as a star of the first magnitude, in the firmament of Heaven, when the memory of his companions of the way will be lost in the abyss of time and space.' Now, as poor Rittenhouse was, undoubtedly, 'one of the companions of Franklin's way' we have great cause of lamentation at the fate to which Mr. Jefferson subjects him. Alas!—that 'the best sample of the perfection nature can cover under the human form' should be doomed to be 'lost in the abyss of time and space.' Weep, friends of Rittenhouse, weep. Clothe yourself in sackcloths, Rather O—rise and avenge his injured fame."

ADVICE TO A JOURNALIST.

[Translated from the French.]

HISTORY.

To journalists, few subjects are more grateful than that of History; it is within the reach of every man's capacity, and the most congenial to his taste. We are, it is true, equally desirous to acquire a knowledge of nature, as to inform ourselves of the actions of Sesostris or Bacchus; but application is requisite to examine. For instance, by what machine, a great quantity of water may be furnished to the city of Paris; which is to us an object of importance; and we have merely to open our eyes, in order to read the ancient fables, which are transmitted to us under the title of Histories, which are repeated to us daily, and are of but little importance to us.

If you give an account of ancient History, proscribe, I conjure you, all vain declamations against certain conquerors. Let Juvenal and Boileau, from the recesses of their cabinet, lavish ridicule on Alexander, whom they would have fatigued, and disgusted with incense, had they lived under him; let them call Alexander, madman; do you, impartial philosopher, consider in Alexander, that captain-general of Greece, nearly resembling a Scanderberg, a Huniade, like them commissioned to avenge his country's wrongs, but more fortunate, more illustrious, more polished, more magnificent. Do not merely represent him subjugating, the entire empire, of the enemy of Greece, and pushing his conquests even to India, whither the domination of Darius extended; but represent him giving laws, amidst the tumult of war, forming colonies, establishing commerce, founding Alexandria and Scanderoon, which are this day the centre of oriental commerce. These are the features in the conduct of kings, which we ought to study; and these we neglect. What good citizens will not be more delighted with an account of the cities, and ports, which Caesar built, of the calendar which he changed &c. than with that of the men murdered by his command.

Let it be your peculiar care, to inspire young persons, with more taste for the History of recent times, which is necessary to us, than for ancient History, which is mere matter of curiosity; let them reflect that the modern has the advantage of being more certain, because it is modern.

I would particularly desire you, to recommend a serious attention to the study of the History of the age, immediately preceding, that of Charles V, Leon X, and Francis I. That is the age, in which a revolution was effected in the human mind, as in our world, that has changed every thing.

The brilliant age of Louis XIV, gives the last touches, to the picture which Leon X, the Medicis, Charles V, and Francis I, had sketched. I have been long engaged in writing the History of this last age, which ought to be an example to future ages; I endeavour to exhibit the progress of the human understanding, and of all the arts, under Louis XIV. May I be permitted, before I die, to leave this monument to the glory of my nation! I have abundant materials to erect this edifice. I possess ample memoirs, of the advantages which the great Colbert has procured, and had contemplated for his own nation, and for the world; of the indefatigable vigilance, and provident care of a minister of war, destined by nature to be the minister of a conqueror; of the revolutions which have happened in Europe; of the private life of Louis XIV, who has been in his family an example to men, as he has sometimes been an example to kings. I possess memoirs of frailties inseparable from human nature, of which I love not to speak, but that they give value to virtues; and I already apply to Louis XIV, this fine expression of Henry IV, who said to the ambassador of Don Pedro: what! has not your master virtue enough to have some faults? But I fear that I have neither time nor ability, to finish this great work.

I pray you to impress it on the public mind, that if our modern Histories written by contemporaries, are more certain in general, than ancient Histories, they are sometimes more doubtful in the details; I explain. Men differ from each other in profession, party, religion. The soldier, the magistrate, the jansenist, the molinist, do not view the same facts, with the same eyes; this vice is common to all ages. A Carthaginian would not have written a history of the Punic wars, in the spirit of a Roman, and he would have reproached Rome with the perfidy, of which Rome accused Carthage. We have but few ancient historians, who have written in opposition to each other, on the same event: they would have cast doubt over those things, which we at this day regard as incontestable. However slight the probability attached to them, we respect them for two reasons; because they are ancient, and because they have not been contradicted.

We contemporary Historians, are in a different situation; our position frequently resembles that of belligerent powers. Bonfires have been made at Vienna, at London, at Versailles, for battles which had been gained by no party; on either side, they cry victory, both parties have reason. How many contradictions with respect to Mary Stuart, the civil wars of England, the troubles of Hungary, the establishment of the protestant religion, the council of Trent! Speak of the revocation of the edict of Nantz, to a Dutch burgomaster, it is an imprudent act of tyranny; inquire of a minister of the French court relatively to the same subject, it is a stroke of sound policy. What do I say! The same nation, at the end of twenty years, no longer entertains the same opinions which it originally entertained of the same event, of the same person; this I have witnessed with respect to Lewis XIV. But what contradictions shall I not have to encounter on the subject of the history of Charles XII! I have composed his singular life from the memoirs of M. de Fabrice, who was, during eight years, his favourite; from the letters of M. de Fierville, who was ambassador at his court; from those of M. de Villelongue, for many years a colonel in his service; from those of M. Poniatowski. I have consulted M. de Croissi, ambassador of France at the court of this prince. I now learn that M. Norberg, chaplain of Charles XII, is at present engaged in writing a history of his reign. I am confident that the chaplain will often have regarded the same actions in a point of view different from that of the favourite and of the ambassador. What shall be my determination in this case? Immediately to correct myself in those particulars, wherein this new historian is evidently right, and to leave the rest to the judgment of disinterested readers. What part do I act on this occasion? that of a painter, who, with a feeble, but faithful pencil, strives to represent men such as they have been. I feel a perfect indifference with respect to Charles XII and Peter the great, except as to the benefits which the latter has conferred on mankind. For me, they are objects neither of flattery nor of slander. I shall treat them and Louis XIV, with the respect due to deceased monarchs, and with that respect which is due to immortal truth.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

The orations against Catiline.

He discusses in this place, the opinion of Silanus, and that of Caesar, always with the greatest regard for the latter. He has even the address to make it perceived, that it ought not to be suspected, that his advice had been dictated by a criminal indulgence. He enters ably into the thought of Caesar, who not wishing to have the appearance of sparing the conspirators, had affected to consider, a perpetual imprisonment, as a punishment much more severe than death, which is but an end of all evils. He dwells upon this idea, and insists upon the pains of death, only because the circumstances, and the interest of the state render it necessary. After this detail he seems to assume new forces, to inspire the senate with all the courage, with which he is himself animated, and this last part of his discourse, inspires that interest, mixt with admiration, which is one of the most beautiful effects of eloquence.

"I ought not to conceal from you, what I hear every day: from all quarters, there come to my ears, the discourses of those, who seem to fear, that you have not sufficient means, or forces, to execute what you shall have resolved. Deceive not yourselves, Conscript Fathers; every thing is prepared, every thing is foreseen, and every thing is safe, both by my care and vigilance, and still more, by the zeal of the Roman people, who are determined to preserve their Empire, their Property and Liberty. You have in your favour, all the orders of the state: citizens of every age, have filled the public places and the temples, and occupy all the avenues, which conduct to the place of this assembly. It is in fact, because this affair is the first since the foundation of Rome, in which all the citizens have had but one sentiment, but one interest, excepting those, who too certain of the fate which the laws reserve for them, had rather fall with the Republic, than perish alone.—I except these very cheerfully, I separate them from us; they are not our fellow-citizens; they are our most mortal enemies. But all the others, great Gods! With what ardour, with what courage, with what a concurrence, they present themselves, to assure the dignity and the safety of all! Shall I speak to you, of the Roman Knights, who, yielding to you the first rank in the state, contend with you only in zeal and love for their country? After the long debates which have divided you, this day of danger, and the common cause have attached them all to you; and I dare to be responsible to you that all the parts of the public administration, ought no longer to fear any injury, if this union, established during my consulate, can be forever maintained. I see here among you, I see replenished with the same zeal, the tribunes of economy, those worthy citizens, who, in this same day, to concur in the general defence, have quitted the Functions which called them another way, and have renounced the profit of their offices, and sacrificed every other interest, to that which calls us together. Who, indeed, is the Roman, to whom the aspect of his country, and the day of Liberty, are not dear and precious blessings? Forget not int his number, the freedmen, who by their labours and their merit, have rendered themselves worthy of sharing in your rights, and to whom Rome has become a mother, while her children, the most illustrious by their birth and their names, have wished to annihilate her. But what do I say of freedmen? There is not a slave, whose master renders his servitude supportable, who has not the conspirators in horror, who does not desire that the Republic should subsist, and is not ready to contribute to it, with all his power. Lay aside then all anxiety, Conscript Fathers, concerning what you have heard, that an agent of Lentulus endeavoured to excite the artisans and the common people. He has attempted it, indeed, but in vain; he has not found one, so destitute of resources or so depraved in character, as not to desire to enjoy in tranquillity the fruit of his labour, his dwelling and his bed. This whole class of men, cannot found its hopes of subsistence, but upon public tranquillity: their gains diminish when their shops are shut: how would it be if they were set on fire! Fear not then that the Roman people will fail you: be afraid only of failing the Roman people. You have a consul, whom the Gods, in snatching him from ambushes and from Death, have not preserved for himself, but for you. Our common country, menaced with swords, and torches by an impious conspiracy, stretches out her suppliant hands; She recommends to you her capitol, the eternal fires of Vesta, pledges of the duration of this Empire; she recommends to you, her walls, her Gods, her inhabitants. Finally, it is upon your own lives, on those of your wives and your children, on your property, on the preservation of your firesides, that you have to pronounce a sentence, this day.—Think, how very little was wanting, that this edifice of Roman grandeur, founded by so much toil, elevated to such an height by the Gods, was not overthrown in one night. It is for you, to provide, that hereafter, no similar enterprise, may be, I do not say committed, but even meditated. If I hold such a language to you, Conscript Fathers, it is not to excite your zeal, which, no doubt is superior to mine; it is, to the end, that my voice, which ought to be first heard, may acquit itself in your presence of the duties of your consul. I am not ignorant, that I am making myself, as many implacable enemies as there are conspirators, and you know how numerous they are; but they are all in my eyes, vile, feeble and abject; and although it should one day happen, that their fury, excited and supported by some enemy more powerful, should prevail against me, over your rights and those of the Republic, I shall never repent of my actions or my words. Death, with which they threaten me, is reserved for all men; but the glory, with which your decrees have covered me has been reserved only for me. Others have been honoured, for having served their country; but your decrees have attributed to me alone, the honour of having saved it. For ever celebrated in your Histories and Festivals, be that Scipio who rescued Italy from the hands of Hannibal, that other Scipio, who conquered Carthage and Numantium, the two most cruel enemies of Rome; that Paulus Æmilius, whose triumphal chariot was followed by a powerful king; that Marius who delivered Italy from the Cimbrians and Teutons; above all, the great Pompey, whose exploits have had no other bounds than those of the world; there will remain a place sufficiently honourable, for him who has preserved to the conquerors of nations, a country in which they may come to triumph. I know that foreign victories, have this advantage over domestic, that in the one case the conquered become submissive subjects or faithful allies, in the other those whom a blind fury has rendered enemies of the state, cannot, when you have hindered them from mischief, be suppressed by arms, nor softened by beneficence. I expect therefore an eternal war with the wicked. I will sustain it, with the assistance of all the good citizens, and I hope that the coalition of the senate and the Roman Knights, will be, in all times, a barrier which no effort can overthrow.

"Now, Conscript Fathers, all that I ask of you, as a reward for all I have sacrificed for you, the government of a province, and the command of an army, which I renounced, to watch over the safety of the state, for all the honours and all the advantages, which I have neglected from this single motive, for all the anxieties I have suffered, for all the burden I have taken on myself; all that I request of you is to preserve a faithful memory of my consulate. This remembrance, as long as it shall be present to your minds, will be the firmest rampart that I can erect against personal hatred and envy. If my hopes should be disappointed, if the wicked prevail, I recommend to you, the infancy of my son, and I shall have nothing to fear on his account; nothing can be wanting to him in due season, either for his safety or his dignity, if you recollect, that he is the son of a man, who, at his own risque, has secured you, from those who threatened you.

"That which remains for you to do, at this moment is, to resolve with promptitude and firmness, on the cause of Rome and the Empire; and whatever you may decide, be assured that the consul will know how to maintain your authority, cause your decrees to be respected and insure the execution of them."

It is, with language like this, that the wicked are intimidated, the weak are encouraged, and the good are confirmed; in one word, that the soul of one man, becomes that of an whole assembly, and of all the people. The sentence of death was pronounced, with a voice almost unanimous, and executed without delay. Cicero, a moment afterwards found the partisans, the friends and the relations of the conspirators, still collected in the public place: they were ignorant of the fate of the guilty, and had not yet lost all hope. "They have lived," said the consul in turning towards them; and this single word, was a clap of thunder, which scattered them all in a moment.—It was night.—Cicero was escorted home, amidst the acclamations of the whole people, and followed by the principal senators. Torches were placed at the doors of the houses to illuminate his progress; the women were at the windows, to see him pass and to shew him to their children. Some time after, Cato before the people, and Catulus in the senate, decreed him the title of Father of his country, an appellation so glorious, that in the course of time, flattery applied it to the Imperial dignity, but Rome while she was free, as Juvenal happily expresses it, never gave it, but to Cicero alone.

Roma patrem patriæ, Ciceronem libera dicit. All these facts are so well known, we are so familiar with them, even from our first studies that I should not have recalled them to memory, if they had not made a necessary part of the object which engages us and the works which we consider; and I have been so much the less able to abstain from it, as it is more delightful in composing the history of Genius, to make at the same time that of Virtue.

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

HORTENSIVS, No. III.

The weight and influence of Virginia, as a state, when opposed to the other states individually, are great. The extent of her territory, the greatness of her population, and influence over her immediate neighbours, populated by emigrants from her own bosom, possessing all the nationality for which Virginians are remarkable, all these circumstances give to Virginia, in the scale of states, great preponderancy. To remedy this inequality, and to prevent the wrongs, which it had occasioned, and was likely to occasion, was a favourite and honourable object of the framers of the federal constitution. Hence that instrument gave jurisdiction to the courts of the United States in 'controversies between states, and citizens of another state.'

The honesty, the utility, and the wisdom of this provision, without any particular reference to Virginia, are obvious. Are not the principles of justice the same, whether insisted on by one man against a million, or by a million against one man? Should not the rights of an individual citizen be secured as well as the rights of a state, the creature of individual citizens, created for the protection of its rights? To maintain a contrary doctrine, is to convert a shield into a sword, and to plunge it into the heart of the possessor. In every free government every free citizen should have equal justice and protection. The great Frederic of Prussia used to say, that 'judges ought to know that the poorest peasant is a man as well as the king himself: all men ought to obtain justice; since in the estimation of justice, all men are equal; whether the prince complain of a peasant, or a peasant complain of a prince.' Such were the sentiments of a king; what ought to be the sentiments of republicans, who boast of the purity, the justice, and the equality of a republican form of government? Considerations like these produced a constitutional provision for the suability of states, a provision, to use the language of an eloquent statesman, who assisted in the formation of that constitution, 'tending to exhibit the sublimest spectacle of which the mind can form an idea, that of a great state kneeling at the altar of justice, and sacrificing its pride to a sense of right.'

But the pride of Virginia was too great for such a sacrifice. She was first to claim the privilege of injuring individuals of other states in their property, their liberty, and lives, 'of enjoying the high privilege of acting thus eminently wrong,' without controul. The sovereignty of Virginia could not brook the sovereignty of equal justice and equal laws. She was the foremost to make war upon this provision of the constitution. Maryland was first called, by an individual citizen, into a federal court, and, to her eternal honour be it remembered, that, deeming it no degradation to do justice even to an individual citizen, she appeared by her attorney general, and did what justice required of her. Virginia took the alarm at so virtuous an example. She feared that it might be followed by other states, and therefore she hastened to destroy the constitutional provision. She was unwilling to have her justice measured by any other than her own tribunals. She feared that the stream might flow too purely for her policy and her views. Her legislature, therefore, hastened to denounce the first attempt to enforce the constitutional provision in the case of Chisholm against the state of Georgia. STATE SOVEREIGNTY WAS, TO HER, so precious in opposition to the sovereignty of the United States, that, to use the contemptuous language of one of her senators,* she felt the same interest for it, 'whether it were the little state of Delaware herself, or the still more insignificant republic of St. Martin's. She raised the hue and cry, that state was attacked, and to be destroyed. The patriotic consolidation of the states was intended, and, by gaining over to her views the weak and the wicked, she obtained an amendment (or rather an alteration) of the constitution, providing that 'the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law and equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States, by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state.'

* See the speech of General Mason, one of the Virginia senators, on the repeal of the judiciary law. This offensive expression was about to be noticed by Mr. White, a respectable senator from Delaware, but he was prevented by an apology as insincere and mean, as the expression was illiberal and improper. Mr. Mason explained by saying that 'he did not mean, by what he said, anything derogatory to the state of Delaware, on the contrary, he entertained a high respect for that state.'!! To such pitiful and inconsistent apologies are men often driven, when thoughts, which they dare not openly avow, get tongue. Mr. White was about to proceed, but upon the vice-president stating that the words attributed to the gentleman from Virginia were improper, and ought not to have been permitted, and he hoped the gentleman from Delaware would take no further notice of them, Mr. White concluded, by saying 'as the gentleman from Virginia is now pleased to deny his intention, in obedience to the chair, I shall spare myself the trouble, and his feelings the pain, of a retort, that very readily presents itself.' This note would not have been subjoined, but that it is too manifest that the sentiment uttered by Mr. Mason towards Delaware, is the sentiment of Virginia towards her sister states. Her system is a system of pride, and encroachment upon their rights and liberties, one which, by her power and her intrigues, and, above all, by the advantage she derives from the representation of her slaves, she has carried on, but too successfully.

Thus was one of the fairest features of our constitution defaced and destroyed—the peace and harmony of the states compromised, and the eternal and immutable laws of justice violated. Nay more, one of the principal barriers to the encroaching spirit of Virginia is thus thrown down. This is but the first step in her march. We will follow her, and we shall find, that, by her address and her influence, increased greatly and unreasonably; by granting to her the invidious privilege of having her negroes represented, she has formed and accomplished designs yet deeper and more destructive against the constitution, to which these United States have assented to be bound; and that unless she be stopped in her course, nothing remains for us but her triumph over the ruins of whatever is dear and valuable to the middle and eastern states.

MISCELLANY.

ON THE UNCOUTH NAMES OFTEN USED BY WRITERS TO EXEMPLIFY CHARACTERS.

SIR,

Somebody, I think, has very properly taken notice of the odd names which Dr. Watts has used to distinguish those characters, which he introduces to illustrate his moral instructions. The characters are commonly grave; but the names are often such as give them something of a ludicrous air. He was a man of learning, judgment, and angelic goodness; but I know not whether his taste in literary matters has not been too highly appreciated. I do not recollect the fictitious name which was selected as an instance of absurdity; but in looking for it, I found those of Polonides, Polyramus, Fluvio, and Credonius; all of which are strangely uncouth. Such are also in the same book, Jocander, Positivo, Scitorio, Scintillo, Thebaldino, Niveo, and Plumbinus.

If writers mean to give their characters the appearance of truth, they should not select ancient names for living persons, much less names formed by their own capricious invention, and such as were never given to men of any age or country. We know, indeed, that the name is a mask; but the mask of a respectable character should resemble neither a monster nor a caricature. Let all fiction, which is intended to please, approach as nearly as possible to reality.*

I own I am not pleased with the generality of our dialogue writers, who give their persons Greek and Roman names, though at the same time they may talk like Englishmen, and allude to modern customs, manners, and places. There is an incongruity in these, which lessens much of the entertainment which the dialogue might otherwise afford.

Why may not modern names be admitted into modern dialogue? You will say, perhaps, Palamon and Philander, Eugenius and Eusebius, have a prettier sound than Smith, Johnson, Walker, Benson, Hudson. The Latin and Greek languages have a prettier sound than the English; and, therefore, you may, for the same reason, write the whole dialogue in those languages. It is another point in favour of Greek and Latin names, that, as the Romans did not use the ceremonious salutations of the moderns, a great deal of trouble is avoided by omitting the unmeaning modes of address, Sir, Madam, Your Grace, and My Lord, which some imagine necessary when they introduce a conversation between such personages as Mr. Smith, Mr. Johnson, Mrs. Melville, Lord Clarendon, and the Duke of Kent.

But, I think, these ceremonious appellations may be omitted with less violation of probability and propriety, than is caused by introducing Greeks and Romans, talking about the doctrines of Christianity, the laws of our country, and other subjects, on which they could not be made to converse, without a violent anachronism.

When the subject relates entirely to antiquity, ancient names are not improper; indeed, as the ancients may be supposed better acquainted with such subjects than the moderns, the mind is pleased with the propriety of introducing them as the interlocutors.

But while the matter is good, it is not right to cavil at trifles which are no more than forms. Perhaps my remarks are hypercritical: that they may not be tedious, I will here conclude them.

I am, SIR,
to borrow one of Dr. Watt's names,
Your humble Servant,
POLYRAMUS.

SIR,

I am a great lover of learning, but not having had the advantage of a liberal education, I am totally unacquainted with the learned languages; and I lament the defect as a real misfortune. I hear much of their excellence, and you may suppose it a great mortification to me, that I am unable to read those books which have been celebrated as the finest productions of the human intellect. I endeavour to compensate my defect by reading English authors; but I often stumble upon Latin mottoes and sentences, which I suppose to contain some jewel, too precious to be exposed to vulgar view, and locked up in a casket of which I have not the key.

But I am not only puzzled and mortified with mottoes and sentences, which I do not understand, but often with strange names of characters in moral writers, and of persons who converse in fictitious dialogues, which, I have no doubt, contain some significant meaning, which I am at a loss to unriddle.

Dr. More, in his Dialogues, introduces the following persons; Philotheus, Bathynous, Sophron, Philopolis, Euister, Hylobares, and Cuphophron. Every one of these is expressive of the character introduced; but I should have been quite in the dark about them, and have wondered at their oddity, if the Doctor had not obligingly explained their meaning in one of the first pages of his volume. I wish the example had been followed by many others, who introduce me into the company of persons, whose characters I do not know, because I do not understand the meaning of their crabbed names.

I humbly conceive, that it would be quite as well, if writers suffered the characters to open themselves to the reader in the course of the conversation; and I see no good reason why christian and surnames of honest Englishmen, may not be given to persons who come forward to talk on subjects, which they must understand far better than the wisest of the ancients; I mean such as Dr. More discusses, the attributes of God, and his Providence in this world; but in truth, I find, on inquiry, that these names are not the names of ancients. They occur not in history, but are compounded of words that seldom met before, to express ideas which can only be understood by those who are acquainted with the learned languages. Such names appear to me to have no more propriety than some of those which, in the times of fanaticism, were used by the Puritans, such as, Praise-God Barebones, Make-peace Heaton, Kill-sin Pimple, and Fly-debate Roberts; the names of some among the jurymen impannelled in Sussex, during the usurpation of Cromwell.

I acknowledge, however, that the ancient and high-sounding names adopted in English dialogues, give a dignity to the discourse; but I, who am a mere Englishman, wish to see Englishmen introduced, without being ashamed of their names, and do not know why the names of Clarendon, Temple, Raleigh, and a thousand others, equally well sounding, might not answer the purpose as well, as names borrowed from Greece and Rome; and, as to the significance of the above mentioned compound appellations, what should I be the wiser for it without an explanatory table? What must I think of Dr. More's Cuphophron? I should not know the sense of the word; and, I am sure, I could not admire the sound. Few Gothic names are of more difficult pronunciation.

But I ought not to judge decisively, as I profess myself no scholar. I only submit to you my complaint, as an English reader. I shall be much obliged to you to desire gentlemen, who my hereafter write dialogues, and introduce uncommon names, as exemplifications of their instruction, either to give modern names, or such as are known in history, or else, always to add an explanatory table.

I am, SIR, Your's, &c.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE. FOR THE PORTFOLIO.

James Humphreys proposes to print in weekly numbers, from the last London edition, (a number to be published every Saturday Evening till the whole are finished) SERMONS by HUGH BLAIR, D. D. F. R. S. Edin. one of the Ministers of the High Church, and Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in the University of Edinburgh. Prefixed with an Account of the Life and Character of the Author, by James Finlayson, D. D.

Each number to contain two Sermons, printed in octavo, on a very handsome paper, and on a perfectly new type.....to be delivered to Subscribers, covered in blue paper at the price of eighteen and an half cents, to be paid on delivery.

The Work shall be paged, &c. in such manner, that the whole number of Sermons, when finished will bind up in four handsome Volumes, for each of which Volumes, a Title Page and Table of Contents will be given with the number that is to commence the volume.

Such Subscribers as are desirous of not receiving the numbers as published, may have them reserved till the whole is complete, on advancing two dollars.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The refinement of the arts seems in many instances to be the secret way in which the Providence of Heaven operates for the diffusion of religion. At one moment, by the magnet, it directs the steps of the missionary through deserts, savage as heathenism itself, to redeem their lost tenants from the slavery of ignorance, and to make the 'wilderness blossom as the rose;' and at another, it sends abroad on numberless wings, the effusions of the pious, the reasoning of the learned, and the great tidings of salvation, to comfort the faithful; to confute the infidel, and to inform all men of the path to heaven. The invention of Printing must be considered by every one, as an incident, which has altered at least half the features of the ancient world; but how can the Christian view it other than as the intervention of Deity to terminate the perversion of his word, to chase away the clouds that obscured and distorted his countenance, and to present us that wisdom, which the Son of Sirach calls 'the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of his brightness.' It has had its evils in disseminating impiety; but it is the hope of good men, and the opinion of wise men, that the evil is small in comparison with the good, and that in the gradual process of time, by the inevitable prevalence of truth, the good will put to flight its cruel adversary.

To apply this invention therefore to a purpose so pre-eminently important, is to give it a dignity far above the splendor of that elegance with which modern art has invested it; and a use transcendently superior to the preservation of the grandest monuments of taste and human learning. By one application of it, the vessel in which we make the voyage of life is merely decked with fantastic flags, and perishable gilding; and by the other, it is furnished with a pilot who defies the blast of rain and tempest, and amid every confusion guides his dependent passengers to the 'haven where they would be.' As the preserver of taste and profane learning, it is comparatively a humble rivulet which dries before the face of one summer's sun, and whose course upon earth is instantly obliterated; but as the distribution of the Word of Life, it may be considered as a branch of those immortal waters which proceed from the throne of God, and as humbly contributing to that universal life which is to be seen 'whither the river cometh.'

In selecting the above work for publication the editor truly hopes that he has the approbation of religious men. Dr. BLAIR is confessedly in the very first rank of elegant critics and philologists; but his reputation in this sphere bears that same humble relation to his renown as a minister of God, which has been above said to exist between Taste and Religion. He is deemed to be a most impressive lecturer to the conscience; a most convincing reasoner with the understanding; and above all, a Preacher who directs his appeals to the heart with an effect almost irresistible. The praise of all serious men is upon him, and the single testimony of many of his admirers, is a sanction to his excellency which will be admitted to be conclusive, equally by the Infidel and the Christian. His sermons are styled by Dr. Samuel Johnson 'sermones aurei ac auro magis aurati;' 'excellently written both as to doctrine and language.' Of one of them he observes, 'to say it is good is to say too little'; and of another, 'his doctrine is the best limited, the best expressed; there is the most warmth without fanaticism, the most rational transport.' Praise from such a man is a judgment not to be reversed; it has been affirmed by the voice of thirty years, and has grown into an universal opinion.

The mode of publication has a particular reference to the ability of people in moderate circumstances. All men are alike interested to receive such instruction as is taught in the school of Dr. BLAIR: but all men are not alike able to spare from the wants of a family, a gross sum which shall make them at once the possessors of his sermons. A few pence deducted from the income of a week, may gradually supply them with the work under the plan submitted, and in the course of a very few months, without an embarrassment of the smallest kind, lay upon their shelves a monitor who is ever pleasing, friendly, and pious. It has a still more particular reference to the avocations of the week. Many of those who ought to be instructed, are engaged through the days of business, with the hourly claim of their respective callings. The evening of Saturday, and the succeeding Sabbath, find them in the possession of their only leisure: and beside that which is given to public worship on Sunday, this leisure is fully adequate to the perusal of a sermon. A volume at such a moment, however at command, might be put aside as an old acquaintance, or as too heavy for the time: but the novelty of a weekly number, whose very return would beget regularity in the exercise of reading, and whose very size would challenge the attention of that moment, could not but be received and read. The plan has been long a favourite one among societies in England for the diffusion of religious knowledge, and it is hoped will have similar uses in our own country.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE FINE ARTS.

UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF HIS MAJESTY.

Engravings, with a descriptive account, in English and French, of Egyptian monuments, in the British Museum, collected by the Institute in Egypt, under the direction of Buonaparte, and surrendered to the British Commander in Chief, Lord HUTCHINSON, by General Menou.

PROSPECTUS.

As the late projects of Buonaparte for colonizing Egypt, have terminated with little other effect than to aggrandize Britain, except as they may contribute to the advancement of learning; it is presumed that the Monuments collected by the French Institute, and now placed in the British Museum, will through the medium of accurate representations, most effectually promote this end.

Under this persuasion, it is conceived that such representations would be generally acceptable, and liberally encouraged; for, independent of the curiosity attached to the Monuments themselves, or when considered as evidences of art in the wisest Nation of Antiquity, the Sculptures they display, from their extent and importance, must render them to the learned an invaluable acquisition.

To our Navy and Army, through whose valour we possess them, they cannot but be deemed most singularly interesting; since the Work proposed to represent them, will constitute to the world a glorious trophy of British prowess, which the vanquished themselves have been compelled to supply.

With this view, it is proposed to publish Engravings of the several Monuments which the Institute, sent from France for the purpose, had collected in Egypt, but which were surrendered under the 16th Article of Capitulation, by Menou, Commander in Chief, to Lord Hutchinson, by whose orders Colonel Turner received them from Fourier, the President, and brought them to England.

In the number of these Monuments is the celebrated Stone with the hieroglyphic Egyptian and Greek Inscriptions, found at Rosetta; also the magnificent Sarcophagus of Alexander the great.

The Drawings have been made by Mr. Alexander with all possible fidelity, and are engraving by Mr. Medland in the best style of the art.

The whole Collection will not exceed Ten Divisions, at a Guinea each; the first to be published in November, and the rest at short intervals, the whole work being in great forwardness.

ODE TO THE MEMORY OF ROBERT BURNS.

BY J. H. L. HUNT.

Adieu, wi' a' thy woodnotes wild,
Thy rural pipe sae sweetly mild,
Thy song that mony a sigh beguil'd
In sorrow's breast;
Adieu, misfortune's tuneful child;
Thou'rt gone to rest!

Though wealth and simple pride refuse
To weep a persecuted muse,
Love, whom ye sang sae sweet, tear-dews
Thy honour'd tomb;
And o'er thee mony a flowret strews
O' gayest bloom.

Fond spring for thee around the plough
Sha' wreath her willows' greenest bough;
And smiling love's warm hallow'd vow
Breathe on thy grave;
Or whisper where yon hill below
The dark trees wave.

Oft when the dying breeze sha' seek
Wi' murmur kiss the ev'ning cheek,
And rustling whispers fitful break
Fra' twilight grove,
Remembrance o'er the wild sha' wake
Thy pipe o' love.

And oft where Tilt's hoarse-dashing wave
Hears round that rock his wild stream rave,
Yon woods, that, as the storm they brave,
Mourn o'er the flood,
Sha' murmur to each sullen cave
In music rude:

While, as thy songs o' freedom sound,
The mighty spirits pour around,
Of Scots wae hae, on patriot ground,
Wi' Wallace bled;
The graves, wi' awful grandeur crown'd,
Bow to the dead!

The flood's majestic genius rears
His furrow'd front sublime in years,
And, as the swelling pomp he hears,
Rolls his dark eye,
And shakes the reeds wreath'd o'er his ears,
Tumbling fra' high.

Night silent comes; the hero band
Sit pond'ring on their native land;
Tilt half enchains wi' rugged hand
His moon-lit wave;
The woods in sullen murmurs grand
Soothe the stern brave!

How solemn thus, when life's aw'd sight
Looks in the grave, the day ance bright
Spread wi' dark clouds, to view its light,
Steal fra' the eye;
And ponder on the gathering night,
Futurity!

But night is gane; the smiling morn
Beams o'er Tilt's rock-broken burn;
Awa' the fairy vision's torn;
And truth ance mair
Points where his lyre lies a' forlorn,
The charm o' Ayr!

Ah, (blush, ye proud, on wealth wha' doat!)
The tune o' life ha' lost its note,
While yet upon his lyre could float
The blithesome strain;
His lips they were a' pleasure swote,
His heart a' pain!

But in the grave no wealthy scorn
Frowns on the muse's blushing morn;
Nor fra' her tear-dew'd brow is torn
The wither'd wreath;
That cherish'd by no dew, forlorn,
Shrunk into death!

Yet shouldst thou scorn a hundred deaths,
On Scotia's wild red blossom'd heaths,
For Burns they weave immortal wreaths;
Fra' ev'ry grove
His lay each ruby lip soft breathes,
That talks o' love!

Adieu, wi' a' thy wood-notes wild,
Thy rural pipe sae sweetly mild,
Thy song that mony a sigh beguil'd
In sorrow's breast;
Adieu, misfortune's tuneful child,
Thou'rt gane to rest!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Esta paz no tiene precio,
Vale mas que plata y oro;
De quanto el mundo hace aprecio,
Sin la paz todo es, vileza;
La carestia y probeza,
Teniendo paz, es tesoro.

Con riqueza á manos llenas
Nadie está libre y seguro
De aflicciones ni de penas,
Y el pobre mas desechado
En paz, está regalado
Con un poco de pan duro.*

Vive afligido el monarca,
Si de la paz el semblante
Se le esconde; y de la parca
Temiendo el golpe, desprecia
Honra y riqueza, y no aprecia
Cetro y corona brillante.

Canta alegre el pobrecillo,
Siempre que la paz le espera
Con dulce rostro y sencillo;
La envidia no le enfiaquece,
Y goza quanto apetece,
Teniendo paz verdadera.

La envidia y discordia fiera,
Que en esta tierra habitaban,
La han dexado, y estan fuera:
A los abismos baxáron
Y á todos horrorizáron
Con los bramidos que daban.

Aquesta de la paz diosa,
Con modo que nos encanta,
Executa toda cosa.
En las nubes ha nacido,
Del cielo y de dios ha sido
Producida fuerza tanta.

TRANSLATION.

All the rich mines of silver and of gold,
And treasures ever bought and sold,
Without the gem of peace are poor;
'Tis she, bland guest! whose smiles dispense
Around the hut of indigence
Fresh comforts from her own exhaustless store.

Proud affluence never was, and ne'er will be
From grief exempt—from danger free,
Nor turn aside affliction's feet;
Peace, guardian angel! makes amends
For want of home, and loss of friends,
And makes the scanty crust, tho' mouldy, sweet.

Whene'er she turns the smiling face away,
The Monarch falls to grief a prey,
In fear of fate's terrific frown;
In dread suspense he waits the blow,
Nor heeds what honours wealth bestow,
Nor prizes now his sceptre nor his crown.

Elate with joy, his humble vassal sings
What time fair peace her offering brings,
With jocund step and smiling mien;
Secure from envy—far from strife,
He floats adown the stream of life,
And finds the shady haunts he loves serene.

* Better is an handful with quietness, than both the hands full with travail and vexation of spirit. Ecc. 4. 6.

Ambition, care, and discord, neighbours rude,
Shall never with their noise intrude
Where peace has fix'd her hallow'd home;
Doom'd to their own abyss profound,
They scowl the dingy concave round,
And shake with horrid yells the dismal dome.

Here Peace, sole mistress of these verdant plains,
Governs her tributary swains,
With sovereign, but with gentle sway;
In higher regions born,—she came
Adorn'd with robes of purest flame
To teach mankind to Happiness the way.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

The following is merely an imitation, and a very imperfect one. I have seen a good translation of this elegant epigram, but not having it now in my possession, I have ventured to send you this as a substitute. My copy of the original is considerably different from the one given in the Port Folio.

Lumen Acon dextro, capta est Leonilla sinistro
Et potis est formâ vincere uterque deos,
Blande puer, Lumen quod habes concede sorori
Sic tu cæcus Amor, sic erit illa Venus.

Bright as th' immortal inmate of the skies,
For one lost eye fair Leonilla sighs,
And Acon, beauteous as Aurora's light,
Laments the want of one fair orb of sight;
To her thine eye resign, so shalt thou prove
Cupid himself, and she the queen of Love.

SELECTED POETRY.

[A fable, narrated with that bewitching simplicity and archness of humour, which characterise the style of Phædrus, La Fontaine, Smart, and Stevenson, is one of the most attractive, as well as useful forms of poetical composition. The following, by Dr. Aikin, one of the purest and sweetest of living English writers, will be read with pleasure, by all who have a taste for good sense, and easy, unaffected expression.]

THE GOLDFINCH AND LINNET.

A gaudy Goldfinch, pert and gay,
Hopping blithe from spray to spray,
Full of frolic, full of spring,
With head well plum'd, and burnish'd wing,
Spied a sober Linnet hen,
Sitting all alone,
And bow'd and chirp'd and bow'd again,
And, with familiar tone,
He thus the dame address'd,
As to her side he closely prest.

I hope, my dear, I don't intrude,
By breaking on your solitude;
But it has always been my passion,
To forward pleasant conversation;
And I should be a stupid bird
To pass the fair without a word;
I, who have been forever noted,
To be the sex's most devoted;
Besides, a damsel unattended,
Left unnotic'd, and unfriended,
Appears, excuse me, so forlorn,
That I can scarce suppose,
By any she that e'er was born,
'Twould be the thing she chose.
How happy then I'm now at leisure
To wait upon a lady's pleasure;
And all this morn have nought to do,
But pay my duty, love, to you.

What, silent! ah those looks demure,
And eyes of languor, make me sure
That, in my random, idle chatter,
I quite mistook the matter:

It is not spleen, nor contemplation,
That draws you to the cover;
But 'tis some tender assignation;
Well!—who's the favour'd lover?
I met hard by in quaker suit,
A youth sedately grave and mute;
And, from the maxim like to like,
Perhaps, the sober youth might strike;
Yes, yes, 'tis he, I'll lay my life,
Who hopes to get you for a wife.

But come, my dear, I know you're wise,
Compare and judge, and use your eyes.
No female yet could e'er behold
The lustre of my red and gold,
My ivory bill and jetty crest,
But all was o'er, and I was blest.
Come, brighten up, and act with spirit,
And take the fortune that you merit.

He ceas'd—Linetta thus replied,
With cool contempt and decent pride,
'Tis pity, sir, a youth so sweet,
In form and manners so complete,
Should do an humble maid the honour
To waste his precious time upon her.
A poor forsaken she, you know,
Can do no credit to a beau;
And worse would be the case,
If, meeting one, whose faith was plighted,
He should incur the sad disgrace
Of being slighted.

Now, sir, the sober suited youth,
Whom you were pleas'd to mention,
To those small merits, sense and truth,
And generous love, has some pretension;
And then, to give him all his due,
He sings, sir, full as well as you,
And sometimes can be silent too.
In short, my taste is so perverse,
And such my wayward fate,
That it would be my greatest curse
To have a coxcomb to my mate.

This said, away she scuds,
And leaves beau Goldfinch in the suds.

STANZAS

From the Portuguese of Camoens.

Yes—labour, love, and toil would please
Were toil and labour born for thee;
And fortune's nursing lap'd on ease,
In wealth of heart be poor to me!

Why should I pine for sordid gain?
Or why ambition's voice believe?
Since, dearest, thou dost not disdain,
The only gift I have to give.

Time would with speed of lightning flee,
And every hour a comfort bring,
And days and years, employ'd for thee,
Shake pleasures from their passing wing.

A REVIEW POLITICAL AND LITERARY.

No. 10.

Memorabilia Democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full and true account of that venerable science; interspersed with anecdotes, characters, and speeches, of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats. By SLAVESLAP KIDDNAP, Esq. Foolscap, 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651.
Washington—Printed by Samuel H. Smith, for Duane and Cheetham, and Adams and F. Blake, proprietors of the work.

Mr. KIDDNAP'S discourse on Mr. Jefferson's philosophical works, has a thread so finely spun, and is a web so exquisitely wrought within, that the public cannot fail to rejoice, that I am enabled to continue, without interruption, my extracts from that chapter, which I commenced in my last number; and which thus proceeds:

'This reply to the secretaries of the American Philosophical Society is a literary diamond of the first water; which is the more valuable as it was drawn, with great labour, out of the depths of Mr. Jefferson's mind, and sparkles on the front of this fraternity, in all the native radiance of his genius. It is a great happiness to any society to possess such a prodigy of parts in its president; particularly when he is not niggardly of his splendors, but, on the contrary, is careful to seize all opportunities to lavish, upon its projects, his exhilarating influence. The transactions of this fraternity bear frequent testimony of Mr. Jefferson's condescension, in this respect. Among others, his letter to Mr. Jonathan Williams, recorded in the 222d page of its fourth volume, is a rare instance, as well of literary taste and talent, as of the importance and value of his communications. Indeed, it is a model which I would seriously urge those, who are ambitious of being correspondents of the American philosophical society, frequently to analyse, and diligently to meditate. According to the information, which Mr. Williams gives, in a preceding page, this letter was written, expressly, for publication. As might be expected therefore, we shall find all that precision and elegance, in thought and style, which ought, naturally, to characterise the greatest man in America, and its greatest philosopher, when arraying himself to appear before the public, in so prominent a situation, as head of a distinguished literary institution. I present it to my reader entire; for such a precious compendium of excellence ought not to be dismembered; particularly as its finely finished parts are put together, in a masterly manner, and its effect, as a whole, is strikingly beautiful.

Monticello, July 3, 1796.

Dear Sir,

I examined, with great satisfaction, your barometrical estimate of the heights of our mountains, and with the more, as they corroborated conjectures on this subject, which I had made before. My estimates had made them a little higher than yours, (I speak of the Blue Ridge). Measuring with a very nice instrument, the angle, subtended vertically, by the highest mountain of the Blue Ridge, opposite to my own house, a distance of about 18 miles south-westward, I made the height about 2000 feet, as well as I can remember, for I can no longer find the notes, I then made. You make the south-side of the mountain, near Rockfish-gap, 1727 feet above Wood's. You make the other side of the mountain 768 feet. Mr. Thomas Lewis, deceased, an accurate man, with a good quadrant, made the north-side of the highest mountain, opposite to my house, something more (I think) than 1000 feet. But the mountain, estimated by him and myself, is probably higher, than that next Rockfish-gap. I do not remember from what principles I estimated the peaks of Otter, at 4000 feet, but some late observations of Judge Tucker's coincided very nearly with my estimate. Your measures confirm another opinion of mine, that the Blue Ridge, on its south side, is the highest in our country, compared with its base. I think your observation on these mountains well worthy of being published, and I hope you will not scruple to let them be communicated to the world.

I am, &c.

(Signed)

TH. JEFFERSON.

In the first sentence of this famous letter, judging by the old rules of grammar, which were established under monarchies, the pronoun relative 'they,' must necessarily be considered, as having reference to 'mountains,' as its antecedent. Of consequence, it would be construed, that Mr. Jefferson had asserted, that the mountains corroborated his former conjectures. Now, as it is very plain, that neither the mountains, nor their heights, had any agency in this effect, and gave themselves no concern about the matter, but that the support of Mr. Jefferson's pre-conceived notions, was solely owing to the labours of Mr. Williams—the relative 'they' can, in this place have reference only to his barometrical estimate. I am very sensible, that the advocates for 'monkish learning' have burst upon Mr. Jefferson, with a most deafening outcry, for this flagrant violation of one of their 'worm-eaten' rules, in thus making a plural pronoun refer to a singular noun; declaring, that for such a blunder as this, a boy of the lowest form, at school, would have merited the cow-skin. How little can these malignant comprehend the wide 'march' of this great man's mind! Let it, therefore, once for all, be understood and remembered, that Mr. Jefferson is no less a friend of nature, than he is of man. The liberty and independence of all things lie near his heart. His tender, philanthropic soul has been wrung with anguish, at that cruel despotism, established by grammar, in its ancient discipline; whereby the pronoun is kept in slavery, and is obliged to follow the fates of the noun; as is the adjective, those of the substantive; the verb, of its nominative case, and the relative, of its antecedent. These relics of the tyranny of the schools, it is his settled intent to destroy, by taking every proper occasion, to set at liberty, as far as depends on his authority and example, these oppressed members of speech. An instance of this occurs, in the next sentence, where he says, expressly, that by 'them,' he means 'the Blue Ridge.'

I had, at first, some doubts, concerning the propriety of terminating this first sentence with a word, apparently, so insignificant, as is the adverb 'before.' It always did appear to me to be a very desirable beauty, in every sentence, to reserve the principal idea for the close. Since, there, the mind naturally rests, and never fails to be gratified, both, at perceiving no falling off, and at meeting, with the main object of each member at its period. This, although it was a rule of those ancients, whom the great men, my friends, of the present day, so cordially detest, yet, as it seems to be founded in the nature of the mind, and consonant to sound reason, I could not but approve. On this account, as I have intimated, it was impossible for me to refrain from finding fault with Mr. Jefferson, in the instance, above mentioned. But, here, I have to bewail the inadequacy of my own mind to make a right judgment, touching the elegance and reach of his masterly pen. Being certain, that this great and scrupulous philosopher would not have bestowed such an important place on a term so insignificant, (politics and party-spirit having nothing to do in the case), unless some hidden, but important, truth was intended to be intimated. I made it the pursuit of many anxious days and tedious nights, to fathom the depths of his intent, in this particular. And, recollecting how that great man's style, like some lenses, was distinguished for the quality of showing some things double, and many things multiform, I was enabled, by this clue, to pierce the intricacies of this labyrinth. For since it is very obvious from all Mr. Jefferson's writings, both philosophical and political, that his genius has a fundamental bias, and takes its most exquisite delight, in the bottom, particularly of human nature, so it was also very natural for him to fear, lest, by some untoward mistake, the beginning of his labours should be confounded with their end. To prevent which, he has, doubtless, studied, in this sentence, to make the mind rest, as upon an object of prime import, on the word 'before.' For this being an adverb of place, as well as of time, it is very obvious, that he would be understood to imply, that the final cause of his literary labours did not exist, as much of their nature indicates, behind; but that, notwithstanding such appearances, they were really, as he expresses it, 'made before.' It is true, he seems to admit, and with great reason, that the former place is the ultimate destination of all his works, yet he here directly asserts, that their origin was quite 'on the other side of the mountain.'

It is a great art, in any writer, and also very difficult to be acquired, to create surprise, in a reader. This is never more effectually done, than at the beginning of a sentence, setting him out, as he thinks, for one place, and at the end of it, contrary to all his expectation, landing him at another. We have, in the next sentence of this letter, under consideration, a most happy exemplification of this exquisite talent. For what reader, who had not the gift of prophecy, could have imagined, when he found himself, at the outset, measuring with 'a nice instrument' the highest mountain in the Blue Ridge, that before he came to a period, by the magic of his author's genius, he should be hunting with Mr. Jefferson, in his writing desk, 'for the notes I then made.' Great life and beauty is thrown, also, into the last part of this sentence, by the recurrence of, 'I' four times, in less than two quarto lines 'I made the height about 2000 feet, as well as I remember, for I can no longer find, the notes I then made.'—But the scales of justice hang even, in Mr. Jefferson's hands. For with what equity, as well as taste, does he make 'you' take precedence in both the following sentences.

The character, which he next draws of Mr. Thomas Lewis is an instance of genius, as wonderful, as it is rare. By a happy arrangement of language, he gives, in a single stroke, his family, fate, accomplishments and possessions. 'MR. THOMAS LEWIS DECEASED, AN ACCURATE MAN, WITH A GOOD QUADRANT.'

The termination of the next sentence is very beautiful. For by the artful position of his syllables and by what is called, changing the place of the Caesura, the sound is made so perfectly to indicate the sense, that one cannot read it aloud, without imagining some heavy body, a stone, or a philosopher, tumbling from an eminence,

'higher than that,—next Rock-fish gap.'

I next notice Judge Tucker, whom I regret to see jaded with a double genitive. As there is no governing noun, the Judge might have been relieved of one of them, without, any injury to the effect of the peice. Concerning this, I am happy that Mr. Jefferson entirely concurs, in my opinion. Indeed the loss of the time, the paper and the ink, expended about the letter, and the comma, which distinguish the genitive case, is such a singular, as well as alarming, violation of those economical rules and habits, about which, both in public and private life, his talents are chiefly occupied, that the circumstance has been a source of serious concern to this great man. Insomuch, that, he has, imitating, in a like instance, some other great hero of antiquity, whose name I have forgotten, enjoined upon his valet de chambre to repeat to him daily, while he is shaving himself, the following memento. 'NEVER USE TWO GENITIVES, WHEN ONE IS ENOUGH FOR YOUR PURPOSE.'

There is great felicity in the use of the word 'measures,' in the next sentence, for like Judge Tucker, it carries double. For it may mean either that the admeasurements of Mr. Williams had confirmed his opinions, or that other general means, he adopted, had produced this effect. To which, however, this happy result is attributable does not appear. We have, here another beautiful instance of Mr. Jefferson's talent, in, what painters call, claire-obscur. This, by placing his object in shade, involves the reader in doubt; a state of mind, which, as it is the great source of science for qui nil dubitet, nil discet, so it is the great end, and most successful attempt, of this unequalled philosopher, in all his labours, to produce.

One cannot review this letter, without paying the homage of our highest respect, both to the American Philosophical Society, and to its illustrious President. What a flood of new light is poured upon the world, by this laborious and lucky effort! How mightily is the cause of sound literature advanced, by that very precise and accurate information, abounding not less in certainty, than in science, which constitutes the whole of this important epistle! The sum and substance of which is comprised in the following beautiful expressions. 'I made the height, about 2000 feet, as well as I can remember, for I can no longer find the notes I then made.'—Again. Mr. Lewis 'made the North side of the highest mountain, opposite my house, something more, (I think) than 1000 feet.'—Again. There is another mountain 'probably higher, than that next Rock-fish gap.'—And again. 'I do not remember, from what principles, I estimated the Peaks of Otter.'—Last of all, Judge Tucker's observations 'coincided very nearly with mine.' Mr. Jefferson has, in this letter, inter-woven with infinite address, some of the finest and most masterly touches of the art of that cautious Philosophy, so justly admired and prevalent, in our day. A man, who means to live forever, and who would climb to immortality, as the vulgar say, with little wear of sides, or shoe leather, has nothing, in the world, to do, but to get by heart, with great assiduity those noble phrases, 'as well as I can remember,' 'I do not remember,' 'something more, I think,' 'probably' and 'very nearly,' and he has the prettiest and most approved apparatus, in the world, to set up for a philosopher. He may hang out his sign at once, with the assurance that the American Philosophical Society will be a greedy consumer of all his wares and manufactures. I cannot refrain from exulting, here, at the rapid step, with which, under the auspices of this association, we are advancing to that perfection of Philosophy, which is destined to be the glory of our day. How much more beautiful and illustrative is the language, here, adopted by the elegant Jefferson, than is that cursed old fashioned philosophy, the great project of which was to reduce every thing to a just perception; and which taught that a man before he undertook to illuminate others should, at least, in the first place, obtain clear notions himself; especially upon subjects, so simple, and easy of attainment, as the mensuration of terrestrial objects. Mr. Jefferson has, it is true, great merit in executing such a chaste, I might add, perfect, model of modern philosophical disquisition. But, the American Philosophical Society are certainly entitled to share in these honours, for the very flattering manner, in which they have presented that rare work, to the world, by consecrating an entire quarto page of their invaluable volumes to this mighty aggregation of scientific matter. It is to be hoped, that the great men, who now constitute that fraternity will take especial care to have the height, breadth and thickness of their volumes, as they successively issue from the press, accurately ascertained, 'with a good quadrant,' and carefully registered. For works of this kind must necessarily swell so easily, and to such a gigantic size, under the creative hands of the labourers, they encourage, that I have no doubt, I shall live to see the day, when the height of a complete pile of their transactions shall be as great a desideratum, as is now the height of the Blue Ridge and when it shall altogether deprive this Ridge of that very enviable distinction, mentioned by Mr. Jefferson, of being 'the highest pile, in our country, compared with its base.'

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

NIAGARA FALLS.

A Letter from an American officer at Niagara, to his friend at Pittsburgh.

Fort Niagara, October 3, 1802.

DEAR SIR,

In performance of a promise, I made you, to visit, and give you some idea of the Falls of Niagara, so very justly ranked amongst the greatest natural curiosities in the known world, I shall endeavour to give you an account of an excursion thither, in company with Dr. W* and Mr. M*. Let me, however, first inform you, that I conceive it utterly impossible for the greatest exertion of the human mind to convey to another the impression, which is made upon it while contemplating the vast sublimity of the scenery, which is exhibited to the view. The senses become at once bewildered! The beholder for a while stands fixed as a statue! His eyes appear rivetted on one object, as if fearful the smallest deviation would plunge him into the dreadful abyss beneath. Such was my situation; and I must own that I was at times seized with a strange mixture of fear and pleasure.

As the distance between this post and the falls does not exceed fifteen miles, we did not set out, until ten o'clock in the morning of the 1st instant; and, after dining at Queenstown, a small village in Canada, we arrived at an inn, within a quarter of a mile of the falls, where we intended leaving our horses, and descending to the lowest bank of the river below the falls, in order to have a more perfect view. We were, however, informed that the day was too far advanced to think of descending to the lower bank, and again mounted our horses, intending merely to view the falls, from the road leading to Chippeway, where we proposed spending the night. The astonishment, with which we beheld that tremendous cataract from the road, excited in us a determination to leave our horses, and take a nearer view. We accordingly walked towards a deep hollow place, surrounded with large trees, into which, with much difficulty, we descended about eighty yards, and, after walking about one hundred and fifty yards farther over a marshy piece of ground, covered with bushes, arrived at the 'Table Rock,' which is a large flat rock, projecting some distance over the bank below, and is one hundred and seventy-two feet from the margin of the river, at the foot of the great fall. Here we had a view of the rapids, above the falls, extending more than a mile; of the great or Horse-shoe fall immediately on our right, of the fort Schlossee, or Lesser Fall, in front of us, on the New-York side, and, when we could summon fortitude to approach the edge of the rock, of the dreadful abyss below us; from which issued prodigious clouds of mist, in which was visible one of the most perfect and beautiful rainbows we had ever beheld.

Having spent a considerable time on the Table Rock, we, with some difficulty, found our horses, and proceeded to Chippeway, where we remained all night at a very excellent inn, kept by a Mr. Malklin. Although our accommodations were in every respect excellent, we were unable to close our eyes during the night, as we were unaccustomed to the dreadful thundering noise of the Niagara falls, which, though distant three miles, were distinctly heard.

In the morning, accompanied by a Mr. Cummins, who very obligingly offered to be our guide, we returned to the falls, determined to have a more perfect view, from the edge of the river, an undertaking of some danger and much fatigue. As we approached the falls, the rapidity of the river increased, bounding to a great height, where it met with resistance from the rocks; at length, reaching the brink of a precipice, it is hurried over it, meeting with no resistance, until after a fall of one hundred and forty-five feet!

The falls take a direction, rather obliquely, from the Canada side downwards, and on the same side it is hollowed out (if I may express myself so) into the shape of a horseshoe, and, owing to the resemblance, it is called the 'Horseshoe Fall.'

In about an hour after leaving Chippeway, we arrived at part of the bank or cliff, where we could, with the least danger, descend to the edge of the river. You must know, that the banks of the river, on each side, for several miles below the falls, are almost one continued rock, and so nearly perpendicular, as to make it impossible to descend with any safety to the bottom, excepting at two places—where we descended, and at a place called the 'Indian Ladder,' much nearer to the falls, but which our guide informed us was much more dangerous, owing to the decayed state of the ladders.

Having descended a few yards over broken rocks, we came to a ladder, having one end placed on the top of a large rock, the other leaning against the rock on which we stood. This was by far the most dangerous part of the descent, as the ladder was much decayed, and many of the steps were broken out. Although the distance down the ladder was not more than ten or twelve feet, yet the small space upon which we were obliged to stand, at the foot of the ladder, not more than two feet square, together with the dreadful gulf beneath us on one side, (into which we should have been inevitably precipitated, had any part of the ladder given way), increased our fears greatly. We, however, arrived safe at the foot of the ladder, round which we were obliged to creep, then slide down the rock on its side towards the bank, six or eight feet further. Excepting now and then a slight fall among the rocks, over which we passed, we found no further difficulty in reaching the bottom.

We descended the bank somewhat more than a mile below the falls, yet were completely wet to the skin, owing to the falling of the mist or spray, which issued from the bottom of the falls; the wind, however, was immediately down the river, which rendered our situation very unpleasant.

Having, at length, reached the margin of the river, we had a perfect view of the whole cataract, of the prodigious and frightful piles of rocks, immediately over our heads, appearing as if they would every moment fall upon and crush us to atoms, and down which our guide could scarcely make us sensible we had but a few moments before passed. We now indulged ourselves in contemplating for a while, and at a distance, one of the most terrific scenes perhaps imaginable. What a dreadful chaos of rocks were here presented to our view! what a dreary, desolate, but sublime, appearance! The imagination is instantly hurried into a belief, that the great globe itself is returning precipitately and at once into its original chaos!

After refreshing ourselves with a little wine of an excellent quality, which our good landlord at Chippeway had provided for us, we proceeded towards the edge of the Great, or Horse-shoe, Fall; an undertaking extremely difficult and fatiguing, owing to the huge pieces of rocks, that have fallen down from the bank above, and which were rendered very slippery by the constant falling of the mist. Over those rocks we were frequently obliged to climb, and as often we were under the necessity of crawling, on our hands and knees, through dark and dismal passages between large rocks, scarcely wide enough to admit our bodies; indeed, without a guide, a stranger would find it a very difficult matter to reach the opposite side of the prodigious heaps of rocks scattered along the edge of the river; and to be lost and alone, in so dreary and uncomfortable a place, would, I assure you, be no desirable thing. But a few days ago, as we were informed by our guide, a stranger, whose curiosity and perseverance had led him to the foot of the Great Fall, although he found his way thither, was unable to effect his return; after wandering about till night came on, the poor man was obliged to lie down among the rocks. Late the next day he was discovered by a little boy from the top of the Table rock, who, guessing his situation, extricated him from this labyrinth.

After having walked and tumbled over such places, as I have just described to you, and in doing which we were nearly two hours, although the distance was but little more than a mile, we arrived at the Great or 'Horse-shoe Fall.' Here I should stop! I have already told you that it was not in the power of words to convey to another even the smallest idea of the awful magnificence of the scene before us. About ten yards from the spot on which we stood, and one hundred and forty-five feet above us, a little to our right, poured down a prodigious sheet of water from the edge of a projecting rock, then dashing against the sides of the dreadful caverns, hollowed out of the rock over which it falls, produces that thundering sound, often heard thirty and forty miles distant, and causes a quick tremulous motion of the earth for several yards around. Here too the spray or mist, rising like thick volumes of black smoke many hundred feet above the falls, forms large clouds, which are seen fifty and sixty miles off. We were induced to advance so near the edge of the sheet of water, as to be able to look into the caverns in the rock behind it; but could remain there but a very few moments, owing to the sudden blasts of air, which oftentimes rushed from between the water and the rock, with such violence as to deprive us for some moments of the power of breathing. It was, in our opinion, utterly impossible for any human being to stand between the sheet of water and the rock over which it falls, yet we are told of those, who have ventured thus far. We were within five or six yards of the sheet of water, and even at that distance found it impossible to remain longer, than a very few moments, without retreating to get breath. We had, from this place, a distinct view of the whole of the Horse-shoe Falls, which was grand beyond description; the extent of which is said to be between five and six hundred yards, and its height, or perpendicular fall, one hundred and forty-five feet. This fall is separated from the next by a small island, covered with trees, which presents itself to the spectator below, is a solid perpendicular rock, and supposed to be three hundred and forty yards wide. The next fall is very small, not more than six or eight yards wide: this is separated from the Fort Schlosser fall by an island twenty yards wide.

Fort Schlosser Fall so called from its being on that side of the river, on which a Fort of that name formerly stood, extends three hundred and fifty yards, and its perpendicular fall is one hundred and sixty three feet. It is by no means equal in grandeur to the Horse-shoe Fall, yet it had a very beautiful appearance falling over an even ledge of rocks. For the height and extent of the different falls, and the intervening islands. I am indebted to Mr. Cummins, our obliging guide, and I have no reason to suppose they have been exaggerated. For a considerable distance below each Fall, you see a milk-white foam, which has a very pleasing effect. For nine miles below, where it reaches Queenstown, at which place the Falls must have commenced, the water rushes with prodigious impetuosity, over beds of solid stone, and among huge piles of rocks, ten and fifteen feet above the surface of the water. After having viewed this stupendous scene, for more than six hours, and of which I have given so feeble a description, we returned to this place, not a little fatigued, though much pleased

I am, yours, &c.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF THOMAS WARTON.

As a Critic, his observations on Spenser, an edition of Theocritus, and notes on Milton, entitle him to rank with Mr. Tyrwhitt, Mr. Spence, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Hurd, and Dr. Warton, the most elegant and classical critics of our nation.

His Observations on the Faery Queene, have deservedly obtained the approbation of the learned world. He has been indefatigable in illustrating the obscurities, and bringing out the beauties of the great father of allegorical poetry; but his work has not obtained any very extensive popularity, and has failed to recal the attention of the public to the writings of this neglected English classic.

On the merits of his Inquiry into the authenticity of the Poems attributed to Rowley, it is unnecessary to enlarge, as they have been already considered and acknowledged in the 'Life of Chatterton.'

His elegant and accurate edition of Theocritus, the great father of pastoral poetry, does honour to the literature of our country. In his Dissertation on Bucolic poetry, if too much is advanced upon conjecture, it must be allowed that there is considerably learning and ingenuity. Though the Scholia on Theocritus are not so numerous as those on some other Greek authors, they are not less valuable. They boast some of the most distinguished names among the school critics and restorers. The principal observations of these scholars, Warton has with great labour, collected and digested, and has at the same time enriched the common treasury with contributions of his own. The reputation of his coadjutor Mr. Toup, as a Greek scholar, is too well established to receive any addition from the highest praise which the present writer can bestow.

For a commentator on Milton he was peculiarly qualified, being not only conversant with the elegant remains of Grecian and Roman learning, but intimately acquainted with those treasures of Gothic and Old English literature, with which Milton, in his younger days, appears to have been singularly delighted, and to which frequent allusions are made even in the 'Paradise Lost.' In spite of objections which may occasionally be made, his Notes and Illustrations must be allowed to contain a rich body of anecdote and criticism. They are manifestly the result of diligent reading and patient research: serving to unfold the treasures whence Milton drew most of his beautiful imagery; to explain his Gothic and classical allusions; to point out the source of many of his conceptions; and, at the same time, to demonstrate and display the strength and sublimity of his genius. These notes which may be called historical, and those at the end of the larger poems, containing a kind of general critique on them, abound with valuable information, and are drawn up with much judgment and taste. Though in some instances his labour appears superfluous, we cannot but admire the extent of his reading, and the pains he has taken to collate passages, in order to show whence Milton stole every balmy sweet. It by no means indubitably follows, that Milton was indebted to preceding writers to the extent which his collations intimate. Critics, when employed in detecting imitations, are very apt to pursue the matter too far. Later poets are generally represented by them as imitating their predecessors, in instances where it is more reasonable to conclude them alike copied from nature. We coincide in opinion with Walsh, when he says, in one of his letters to Pope, 'In all common subjects of poetry, the thoughts are so obvious (at least if they are natural), that whoever writes last, must write things like what have been said before.' His observations on Milton's religious principles, are such as the text by no means justifies, and seem rather suggested by prejudices than dispassionate reason. But he does ample justice to his genius, and even directly affirms, 'that what was enthusiasm in most of the puritanical writers, was poetry in Milton.'

As a poet, his genius was directed by classic taste and judgment; and his fancy, however seductive, led him not to an affectation of over-laboured ornament. Simplicity and perspicuity, supported by elegance, are the distinguishing marks of his poetry. His compositions are highly finished and original, as far as perpetual classic imitations and allusions will allow; his versification is nervous and correct, his reading extensive, and his knowledge of real nature acquired from an actual survey of her works. It seems as if the most considerable of his poems had been cast in the mould of some gifted predecessor; but, according to those critics, who ascribe the invention of every species of poetry to the Greeks, even Horace himself had his archetypes. It will easily be perceived by readers of taste, that he is of the school of Spenser and Milton, rather than that of Pope. He has manifestly confessedly imitated other poets, Gray, J. Phillips, and, in his New-market, Pope; but in his descriptive poetry, Milton was not only his model, in respect of language and versification, but of ideas. It must, however, be allowed, that he has extended Milton's kind of imagery to more objects, and painted on a larger canvas. His imitations, of Milton, like the pictures of Raphael painted by Giulio Romano, are perfectly copied; but still they are copies.

The Pleasures of Melancholy, one of his earliest productions, is a beautiful Miltonic poem, abounding with bold metaphors and highly-coloured pictures. The indulgence of melancholy, by attending the cathedral service during winter evenings, and the luxury of tragic tears at the theatre, are feelingly and poetically described. The Triumph of Isis, in fertility of invention, and felicity of expression, may challenge a comparison with Mr. Mason's admirable 'Elegy,' which occasioned it. The Inscription in a Hermitage at Ansley Hall, is beautifully simple and characteristic. The Monody written at Stratford upon Avon, is well appropriated and picturesque. The graphical painting of the river, and the fine enthusiasm that follows, are of the happiest execution. The poem on the death of George II. is one of the best of his performances. It is elegant and harmonious, in the highest degree. The verses on the Marriage of the King have equal merit. The whole is finely imagined, and animated with a noble love of his country, its glory and its constitution. His New-market, a satire, has lost none of its stings by time, as the vices at which they are darted are still in full force. The names are admirably turned, and their severity is by no means overcharged. The Pastoral in the Manner of Spenser, is an ingenious imitation, and the Ode on the Approach of Summer is replete with true poetry; but the imagery is Miltonic and perpetually reminds us of the source whence it was drawn. The use of old words in a poem not called an imitation of some old bard, seems a studied imperfection; such are the words aye, eld, murky, watchet. The frequent mixture of regular trochaics of seven syllables, and iambs of eight, seems a defect. If authority will justify this metrical irregularity, he has Milton in his 'Allegro' and 'Penseroso' on his side, and Gray in his 'Descent of Odin,' 'Triumphs of Owen,' and 'Death of Hoel;' but convenience or inadvertence seem to have occasioned these deviations from regularity, rather than choice or system. The Hamlet is a delightful picture of rural life, or rather of the life of the husbandman. Felix si sua bona norint. But to enjoy what the poet describes, he must possess the poet's enthusiasm. The Ode sent to a Friend on his leaving a favourite Village in Hampshire, is another very agreeable specimen of his talent for descriptive poetry. The Suicide is characterized by bold personification, picturesque description, and pathetic sentiment. The Ode written at Vale-Royal Abbey, is much in the style and manner of Gray's 'Church-Yard Elegy,' and appears to be modelled upon it; yet it wants the simplicity of the latter; but that possibly the magnificence of the subject would not easily allow. He seems also to have had Gray in view in his Crusade and the Grave of King Arthur; for they are much in the wild strains of his Cambrian lyre. They are not inferior to Gray's 'Triumph of Owen,' and 'Death of Hoel;' at the same time, they have more perspicuity. In the Ode for Music, are spirit, force, and fancy, which will give pleasure to an Englishman, as long as the present language remains intelligible.

Among the pieces of pleasantry and humour, The Progress of Discontent is one of the most agreeable. The Castle Barber's Soliloquy, and the Oxford Newsmen's Verses, are Hudibrastic compositions; of which much of the merit consists in the rhymes. The Prologue on the old Winchester Play House, over the Butcher's Shambles, is full of wit and humour. The Phaeton and the One Horse Chair, is a manifest imitation of Smart's fable of 'The Bag-Wig and Tobacco-Pipe.' The Grizzle, and the Epistle to Thomas Hearn, are locally humorous. The Panegyric on Oxford Ale, is so close an imitation of J. Philip's 'Splendid Shilling,' that many of the ideas and epithets are the same. Much humour and pleasantry, however, are displayed in this burlesque poem.

In the construction of Sonnets in the Italian measures, he seems more ingenious and happy than most of those who have attempted that difficult species of composition; but we perceive a stiffness and constraint even in those of Warton, which show them to be aliens, and heterogeneous to our language. The Sonnet, written at Winsland, and to the River Lodon, are eminently beautiful.

It has been observed, that he is particularly happy in descriptive poetry; and he has in his New-Year and Birth-Day Odes, rendered it necessary to extend this praise to his felicity in Gothic painting, for which he probably qualified himself, by his study of Chaucer, Spenser, and other old authors, who have described the seats of 'knights and barons bold;' who

In sage and solemn tunes have sung
Of turneys, and of trophies hung.

The Odes for 1787 and 1788, while he had no splendid foreign or domestic events to celebrate, nor any calamities to deplore, abound with Gothic pictures and embellishments, which give that kind of mellowness to these poems, that time confers on medals and productions of the pencil. Birth-day Odes have so long been treated with obloquy and contempt, that however well they may be written, they are not only read with unwillingness, but with determined severity; and yet we find in those of Warton a Pindaric boldness and fire, which scholars of taste and candour must perceive, however they may withhold their praise. Others, who are not qualified to relish the sublime beauties, and animated graces of the higher poetry, will find ample scope for ridicule in the Gothic pomp and garniture of his verse;

His Norman minstrelsy, and ivied towers,
Knight-errant tales, and Spenser's fancy bowers.

Among the modern Latin poets, there are few who do not yield to Warton. His Latin Poems are valuable, as much for their fancy and genius, as for their style and expression. They discover true classical feeling, and abound with ideas and expressions which have been conceived in the same language in which they are written. The poem on the rebuilding of the Chapel of Trinity College, 1748, is not only the most considerable in length, but seems to contain a greater proportion of beautiful lines than any of his other pieces; all of which have, however, their several merits, and are such as would not disgrace a Roman in the days of Augustus.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. CRITICISM

[From the Edinburgh Review.]

[Life of Geoffrey Chaucer, the early English Poet; including Memoirs of his near Friend and Kinsman John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster; with Sketches of the Manners, Opinions, Arts, and Literature of England in the 14th century. By William Godwin. 2 vols. 4to. London, 1803.]

The perusal of this title excited no small surprise in our critical fraternity. The authenticated passages of Chaucer's life may be comprised in half a dozen pages; and behold two voluminous quartos! The more sanguine of our number anticipated the recovery of the 'Boke of the Lioun,' and the other long lost labours of Adam Scrivenere, the bard's amanuensis; the more cautious predicted a new edition of the Chest of Rowley, and the Shakespeare cabinet of Ireland. Our expectations were yet farther heightened, by the lofty tone in which Mr. Godwin contrasts his own labours and discoveries with those of the former biographers of Chaucer. Tyrwhitt, the learned and indefatigable editor of the Canterbury Tales, had professed himself unable to produce more than a short abstract of the historical passages of the poet's life; and Ellis the elegant historian of our early poetry, has (to use his own words) 'followed Tyrwhitt, in reciting a few genuine anecdotes, instead of attempting to work them into a connected narrative, in which much must have been supplied by mere conjecture, or by a forced interpretation of the allusions scattered through the works of the poet.' But Mr. Godwin censures this resolution, as having been adopted to save the fatigue of minute research after the documents from which a full and formal life of Chaucer might have been compiled.

The fact is, however, that this editor (Mr. Tyrwhitt) made no exertions as to the history of the poet, but contented himself with examining what other biographers had related, and adding a few memorandums, taken from Rymer's Manuscript Collections, now in the British Museum. He has not, in a single instance, resorted to the national repositories in which our records are preserved. In this sort of labour I have been indefatigable, and I have many obligations to acknowledge to the politeness and liberality of the persons to whose custody these monuments are committed. I encountered indeed, no obstacle, whenever I had occasion to direct my inquiries among the different offices of government. After all my diligence, however, I am by no means confident that I may not have left some particulars to be gleaned by the compilers who shall come after me.' Preface, p. xii.

After this heavy imputation upon a former editor, to whose industry and labours Chaucer is chiefly indebted for the revival of his fame; after the grave self-congratulation of the biographer; his thanks to those who aided, or did not impede his researches; and his modest apprehensions, that, notwithstanding all his diligence, some gleanings may remain for future compilers;—the reader will learn, with admiration, that Mr. William Godwin's two quarto volumes contain hardly the vestige of an authenticated fact concerning Chaucer, which is not to be found in the eight pages of Messrs. Thomas Tyrwhitt and George Ellis. The researches into the records have only produced one or two writs, addressed to Chaucer, while clerk of the works; the several grants and passports granted to him by Edward III, and Richard II, which had been referred to by former biographers; together with the poet's evidence in a court of chivalry, a contract about a house, and a solitary receipt for half a year's salary. These, with a few documents referring to John of Gaunt, make the Appendix to the book, and are the only original materials brought to light by the labours of the author. Our readers must be curious to know how, out of such slender materials, Mr. Godwin has contrived to rear such an immense fabric? For this purpose he has had recourse to two fruitful expedients. In the first place, when the name of a town, of a person, or of a science, happens to occur in his narrative, he stops short, to give the history of the city ab urbe condita! the life of the man, from his cradle upwards, with a brief account of his ancestors; or a full essay upon the laws and principles of the science, with a sketch of the lives of its most eminent professors. We will not do Mr. Godwin the injustice to suppose, that this mode of biography is copied from some respectable old gentleman prosing by his fire-side, who halts in the story about Tom, till he has given the yawning audience the exploits and genealogy of honest Dick. We believe he profited by instructions derived from no less a person than Miguel Cervantes. 'If you have occasion,' says that author, 'to mention a giant in your piece, be sure to bring in Goliath, and on this very Goliath (who will not cost you one farthing) you may spin out a swinging annotation. You may say, the giant Goliath, or Goliath, was a Philistine, whom David the shepherd slew with the thundering stroke of a pebble, in the valley of Terebinthus. Vide Kings, such a chapter and such a verse, where you may find it written. If, not satisfied with this, you would appear a great humanist, and would show your knowledge in geography, take some occasion to draw the river Tagus into your discourse, out of which you may fish a most notable remark: The river Tagus, say you, was so called, from a certain king of Spain. It takes its rise from such a place, and buries its waters in the ocean, kissing first the walls of the famous city of Lisbon; and some are of opinion that the sands are gold, &c. &c. So well has Mr. Godwin profited by these instructions, that the incidents of Chaucer's life, serving as a sort of thread upon which to string his multifarious digressions, bear the same proportion to the book that the alphabet does to the Encyclopædia, or the texts of a volume of sermons to the sermons themselves. A short glance at the work will fully justify this assertion.

Chaucer was born in London.—This is the subject of the first chapter. The commentary is a sketch of the history of London from the year of Christ 50, down to the reign of Edward III, with notices respecting the principal citizens and Lords Mayor, Henry Picard, John Philpot, Sir William Walworth; not forgetting Whittington and his cat. The proportion of the commentary to the text is as twelve pages to as many lines.—Chaucer must have gone to school.—This is text the second, and forms a sufficient apology for a long essay on the learning of the age; while the probability that, during the vacation, Chaucer must have read romances,* introduces a long dissertation on these compositions, awkwardly abridged from Warton and Ellis. But Chaucer must have gone sometimes to church,—and therefore Mr. Godwin feels himself obliged to give an account of the peculiar tenets of the church of Rome; some of which, particularly those of purgatory and auricular confession, seem greatly to the taste of our philosophical biographer. The author proceeds, with the most unfeeling prolixity, to give a minute detail of the civil and common law, of the feudal institutions, of the architecture of churches and castles, of sculpture and painting, of minstrels, of players, of parish clerks, &c. &c; while poor Chaucer, like Tristram Shandy, can hardly be said to be fairly born, although his life has attained the size of half a volume. How these various dissertations are executed, is another consideration; but we at present confine ourselves to the propriety of introducing them as part of the life of Chaucer. We are aware that Mr. Godwin has informed us, that, 'to delineate the state of England, such as Chaucer saw it, in every point of view in which it can be delineated, is the subject of this book;' and that 'the person of Chaucer may in this view be considered as the central piece in a miscellaneous painting, giving unity and individual application to the otherwise disjointed particulars with which the canvas is diversified.' Now, had the biographer either possessed, from the labours of others, or recovered, by his own industry, facts sufficient to make a regular and connected history of Chaucer, bearing some proportion to the disjointed particulars so miscellaneously piled together, we could have objected less to the digressive matter, although even then we might have required it to be abridged and condensed. But where the central figure, from which the whole piece takes its name and character, is dimly discoverable in the background, obscured and overshadowed by the motley group of abbeys, castles, colleges and halls, fantastically portrayed around it, we cannot perceive either unity or individuality in so whimsical a performance. The work may be a view of the manners of the thirteenth century, containing right good information, not much the worse for the wear; but has no more title to be called a life of Chaucer, than a life of Petrarch.

We have said that Mr. Godwin had two modes of wire-drawing and prolonging his narrative. The first is, as we have seen, by hooking in the description and history of every thing that existed upon the earth at the same time with Chaucer. In this kind of composition, we usually lose sight entirely of the proposed subject of Mr. Godwin's luteubrations, travelling to Rome or Palestine with as little remorse as if poor Chaucer had never been mentioned in the title-page. The second mode is considerably more ingenious, and consists in making old Geoffrey accompany the author upon these frisking excursions. For example, Mr. Godwin has a fancy to describe a judicial trial. Nothing can be more easily introduced; for Chaucer certainly studied at the Temple, and is supposed to have been bred to the bar.

* Mr. Godwin himself may have read Valentine and Orson, while at school; but in the 13th century, romances were the amusement of gentlemen.

'It may be amusing to the fancy of a reader of Chaucer's works, to represent to himself the young poet accoutred in the robes of a lawyer, examining a witness, fixing upon him the keenness of his eye, addressing himself with anxiety and expectation to a jury, or exercising the subtlety of his wit and judgment, in the development of one of those quirks, by which a client was to be rescued from the rigour of strict and unfavouring justice. Perhaps Chaucer, in the course of his legal life, saved a thief from the gallows, and gave him a new chance of becoming a decent and useful member of society: perhaps, by his penetration, he discerned and demonstrated that innocence which, to a less able pleader, would never have been evident, and which a less able pleader would never have succeeded in restoring triumphant to its place in the community, and its fair fame. Perhaps Chaucer pleaded before Tresilian and Brember, and lived to know that those men whose fiat had silenced his argument, or to whose inferiority of understanding, it may be, he was obliged to vail his honoured head, were led to the basest species of execution, amidst the shouts of a brutish and ignorant multitude.' Vol. i. p. 369.

This curious tirade is not to be placed among those occasional flourishes to which authors who affect the striking and the sentimental are so peculiarly addicted. It is not given us a day-dream, in which the writer gives reins to the vivacity of his imagination; but the supposed cases which Mr. Godwin puts, without the least authority from the record, are gravely intended as illustrations of the life of Chaucer. For example, the next sentence informs us—'We have a right however to conclude, from his early quitting the profession, that he did not love it.' And this averment is followed with a list of the unhappy effects which the study of the law produces on the human understanding and temper. We do not think the profession congenial to the feelings of a youthful poet; but it is probable, that he who could stoop to the drudgery of comptroller of the customs, had other reasons for leaving the bar than mere disgust at the profession. For 'cockets and dockets,' and 'sugar casks, and beer-butts, and Common-council men,' (p. 502.) may be supposed to have as benumbing an effect upon the heart and imagination, as cases and precedents, and the ambidexter ingenuity of the bar. Another instance of the laudable manner in which the narrative is bolstered out by imaginary circumstances, occurs where Mr. Godwin treats of Chaucer's confinement in the tower. The biographer is not satisfied with putting the bard into a dungeon; farther severities are conjured up against him; his apartment is supposed to have been changed for a worse. 'It is probable that he was considered as a person of inferior consequence, and obliged to yield his apartment to some statesman of loftier title, who was a few days after conducted to the scaffold.' Nay, further, it is Mr. Godwin's opinion, that his friends were denied access to him, and a mouton or jail-spy quartered in his chamber; both of which suppositions afford a good sentence or two of philosophical condolence.

'It is likely, that he was forbidden the visits of his friends; but by the magic power of fancy he called about him celestial visitants. It is likely, that a jailer or a turnkey was planted in his apartment, under pretence of checking unlicensed attempts at correspondence or escape; but in reality, serving only to exclude him from one of the best inheritances of man, the power of being alone in the silence of elemental nature, and with his own thoughts. Chaucer, however, assisted by the workings of his mind, instead of seeing continually the base groom who attended him, saw only the gods who protected and cheered him in his cell.' Vol. ii. p. 477.

It is needless to examine what foundation exists for such vague suppositions, when we know that Chaucer was so much master of his time and thoughts during his confinement, as to compose his Testament of Love. His biographer might with equal plausibility have grafted upon his story a supposed attempt to escape, and given us a Newgate kalendar chapter from the horrors of Caleb Williams, or the languors of St. Leon.

These assertions rest entirely upon the gratia dictum of Mr. Godwin, and with a thousand others are only introduced with an 'it is possible; or 'it is probable,' or indeed the bare conjunction if, which having been long renowned for a peace-maker, will doubtless in future be allowed equal virtue in compilation. But we are deeply interested for our own sake, as well as that of the public, in entering our protest against this mode of book-making. If a biographer be at liberty to introduce into his story a full account of every contemporary subject of disquisition, however little connected with his hero, and can assume the further right of connecting his hero, by virtue of a gratuitous supposition, with whatever scenes he may take a fancy to describe, it is obvious, that unless the author's mercy temper his strength, the rights of the courteous reader are in no small peril. To what length Mr. Godwin might have extended his history, not so much of what Chaucer did actually do, as of what he and all his contemporaries might, could, would, or should have done, cannot now be exactly ascertained. He informs us in his Preface, that after writing about a thousand quarto pages, it was altogether uncertain when he might have drawn to a close. But there exists a superior power, to which even authors must 'vail the honoured head,' and, fortunately for the Reviewers, Ecce Deus ex Machina!

'If I, enamoured of my subject, might have thought no number of pages, or of volumes, too much for its development, it was by no means impossible that purchasers and readers would think otherwise. My bookseller, who is professionally conversant with matters of this sort, assured me, that two volumes in quarto were as much the public would allow the title of my book to authorise. It would be in vain to produce a work, whatever information it might comprise, which no one will purchase or read: I have therefore submitted to his decision.'

Upon perusing this sentence, the cold drops stood upon our brow at contemplating the peril which we had escaped; and while we lauded the gods for Mr. Phillips' tardy interference in our behalf, we marvelled not a little at the good man's easy faith, which had so long deferred it.

From these remarks upon the general structure of the work, we may now descend to view the execution of the plan, such as it is, beginning with what relates to Chaucer, who (pars minima fui) occupies the least share in his own memoirs. It appears to us, that among the very few facts concerning our bard which Mr. Godwin has given us, some are assumed without due evidence. For example, we are informed, that, 'having passed through a certain course of education, Chaucer was removed to the University of Cambridge.' The only proof which is brought of this assertion, is, Chaucer's having termed himself in the Court of Love, 'Philogenet of Cambridge, clerk.' But we cannot see how the acknowledged falsehood of one part of this designation can possibly prove the truth of the rest; or why Chaucer may not have invented a fictitious character to be attached to a false name. It seems to us much such an argument, as might be adduced to prove that the late Mr. Mason resided at Knightsbridge, inasmuch as that was the pretended abode of the facetious Malcolm M-Gregor. In like manner, we are very willing to suppose, that the old bard was a man of a jovial and festive habit; but we would rather infer this from his writings, than from supposing that he daily consumed the whole pitcher of wine which was allowed him by the king. Indeed, from the address of the host to Chaucer, we imagine a personage of a grave and downcast appearance, very different from the idea we might form, a priori, of the jolly author of the Canterbury Tales: but it would be as ridiculous to argue from hence, that he was an enemy to mirth, as to hold that, with or without assistance, he daily discussed four bottles of wine, because he received such an allowance from the royal cellar.

MISCELLANY.

ON ERASMUS'S PRAISE OF MARRIAGE.

Among the marks of modern profligacy may be enumerated the reluctance with which young men enter the marriage state. The affections of many are in vain solicited by any charms besides those of lucre. The times seem to be past, when, in the prime of life virtuous love led young men to select a companion, for the amiable qualities of her mind and person, independently of all pecuniary considerations. The loveliest of women may now pine in hopeless celibacy; for, if they cannot purchase a husband, as they would purchase a gown, with the contents of their purse, they may live and die without one. In vain has nature given them the vermeil cheek, and the eye of sensibility, if fortune has refused her more brilliant gifts. Young men gaze at them indeed, like children at the peacock, and turn away without any tenderness of sentiment, or at least, without any wish to possess the beauty which they admire, on honourable conditions.

It is indeed observable, that young men of the present age too often consider marriage as an evil in itself, only to be incurred when the pecuniary advantages attending it afford a compensation. For the sake of the good, it seems, they sometimes condescend to accept the evil. A most insulting opinion, and no less unreasonable and untrue than contumacious; for marriage, prudent and affectionate marriage, is favourable to every virtue that can contribute to the comfort and happiness of the individual, while it most essentially serves the interests of society.

I was thinking on this subject, when I accidentally opened a little book of Erasmus on the Art of Letter Writing. He gives models of letters on various subjects, and, under the appearance of affording hints, in a didactic way, for the use of students, contrives to recommend several most useful things, with great force of argument, and in a very entertaining manner. I happened to open the book in the place where he is writing a persuasive to marriage, and I was so well pleased with several of his topics, that I determined to select a few of them for the consideration of my readers. I mean not literally to translate, or to give the whole of his persuasive. There are parts in it, which one cannot entirely approve; but there are others, which every heart, that is not spoiled by fashion and false philosophy, must admire.

Is there any friendship, says he, among mortals, comparable to that between man and wife? For the love of you, he proceeds, your wife has ceased to value the tenderness of parents, brothers, sisters; to you alone she looks for happiness, on you she depends, with you she wishes to live and to die.

Are you rich? you have one who will endeavour to preserve and to increase your property. Are you in narrow circumstances? you have one who will assist you faithfully in the pursuit of gain. If you enjoy prosperity, she will double your happiness; if you are in adversity, she will console you, she will sit by your side, she will wait upon you with all the assiduity of love, and only wish that she could appropriate the misfortune which gives you pain. Is there any pleasure to be compared with an union of hearts like this?

I must add the next passage in his own words.

Si domi agis, adest quæ solitudinis tedium depellat; si foris, est quæ discedentem osculo prosequatur, absentem desideret, redeuntem læta excipiat.

She is the sweet companion of your youth, and the pleasant solace of your old age.

What can be more odious than that man, who, as if he were born for himself, lives for himself, heaps up riches for himself, spares for himself, spends for himself, loves no human creature but himself, and is beloved by none?

How will you value your happiness,

—Ubi quis tibi parvulus aula,
Luserit Aeneas,

*qui tuos tuæque conjugis vultus referat, qui te blande

I know, says he, that you will object that all this happiness depends upon the disposition of the wife, more than on the marriage state. A marriage may be thus happy if the wife be good; but suppose her ill-natured, suppose her unchaste, and suppose the children undutiful. Believe me, the bad husband usually makes the bad wife. You certainly have it in your power to chuse a good one; but what if she should afterwards be spoiled? Erasmus confidently replies: A good wife may indeed be spoiled by a bad husband, but a bad wife is usually reformed by a good one. Falso uxores accusamus. No body, he assures us (I am afraid too confidently), ever had a bad wife but by his own fault. And with respect to children, good children, says he, are usually born of good parents; but however they may have been born, they commonly become just such as they are made by education.

But why, continues he, do you so anxiously enumerate the inconveniencies of marriage, just as if celibacy were totally free from them, or as if any mode of human life were not subject to evil and misfortune. If you would have no inconvenient circumstances in your state, you must leave this life. Sen intra humanam conditionem animum continens, nihil est conjugali vita, neque tutius, neque tranquillius, neque jucundius, neque amabilius, neque felicius. But if one can restrain one's desires within the boundaries of happiness which belong to human nature, there is no state safer, more tranquil, pleasanter, lovelier, nor happier, than the conjugal.

Though Erasmus is seeking hints to supply the young letter-writer with matter for his compositions, yet I cannot but think that he spoke his honest sentiments, because he spoke with warmth, and, I believe, meant obliquely to censure those unnatural institutions of the Romish church, which tend to discourage marriage. He is very copious on the subject, and advances many arguments, which I have not room to transcribe, and which indeed will appear to much greater advantage in the original. I must not conceal that, to shew his ingenuity, he has written a dissuasive from marriage; but it really contains no argument which is valid, or which is worthy of repetition.

I am of opinion, that the reluctance of many young men of fortune to enter into the state, arises not from any settled conviction of the unreasonableness of the institution, but from profligacy, thoughtlessness, false ideas of pleasure, and a want of rational ideas of human life and the nature of human happiness. But, whatever is the cause, the effect is certainly unhappy both to men and women. Men, indeed, in consequence of their libertinism, gratify their desires in the haunts of vice; and so much the worse for they thus add sin to misery. Women are often kept in a state of celibacy, for which nature never designed them, and to which, I may say, without attributing to them indecency or immodesty, they are in general not much inclined. It is happy, however, that reserve and virtue so far prevail among them, as, for the most part, to prevent them from forming improper connexions.

is consequence of being thus injuriously prevented from making a matrimonial alliance. It is to be hoped, they will still preserve their dignity by preserving their innocence; but their case is hard, and nothing, which a wise legislature can do to alleviate it, should be omitted.

A reformation of manners, among the young men who lead the fashion, would contribute most to the encouragement of marriage; for where libertinism greatly prevails, celibacy, which is favourable to it, will be predominant. Perhaps, if women were instructed in useful as well as ornamental arts, and were less expensive in dress and diversions, the rest might be left to the natural operation of their beauty and agreeable accomplishments. As the small-pox is in great measure defeated, they certainly never appeared more beautiful, than in the present time; and with respect to ornamental accomplishments, they were never pursued with more ardour, or advanced to higher perfection.

OBITUARY.

[We copy the following, from a paper published at Elizabeth-Town, because, from our knowledge of her, who is the subject of its eulogy, we can add our full sanction, to the testimony, which it contains of her virtues, and her amiable qualities.—The employment is a mournful one, but there is yet a melancholy satisfaction to friendship, in recording the virtues which it once had fondly cherished, and whose departure, while it saddens the bosom of a friend, has robbed the domestic circle, of its sweetest charm.]

Departed this life, on Saturday last, at the seat of her father in Elizabeth-Town, Miss Henrietta Williamson, second daughter of Matthias Williamson, junior, Esqr.—A private worth so pre-eminent in its kind, as that which distinguished the deceased, although its loss be not very interesting to the public, shall not fail of receiving the encomiums of a friend.—All those who were acquainted with this young lady, and to whom her amiable qualities, had endeared her, will deeply deplore her early fate.—Yes, excellent young woman! no splendid monument will, indeed, be erected to perpetuate thy memory? But in the deep regrets of those, who have long been in habits of a delightful intercourse with thee, and whom thy sweet manners, cultivated and improved understanding, always interested and charmed—in the concern which is excited by thy death in the bosoms of those who have frequently held sweet communion with thee at the altar of God—in the tears which the poor and the afflicted, who have been relieved by thy sympathy and benevolence, will mingle with those of thy bereaved family—thou enjoyest an honour more enviable than all that could be bestowed upon thy ashes by brass or marble.—If all those then, who are acquainted with the distinguished virtues and graces that adorned this young woman, can never cease to lament her loss—If tears of gratitude will be shed by the poor and afflicted, on the recollection of the tenderness and assiduity with which she administered to their necessities—Ah! what must be the emotions of that man, who merited and obtained from her one of the purest hearts, that ever beat with the pulse of love, and from whom she was cruelly snatched by death, at the very moment in which he was to receive her, as the companion of his life—the friend of his bosom? Almighty God, who in a mysterious wisdom orderest all things in heaven and in earth, into the hands of thee, with whom, we trust, she had made her peace before her departure from the world, we commend her spirit!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The following tribute to GENIUS is from an American Gentleman, and is to be prefixed to the splendid edition of MOORE'S ANACREON, now in the press of Mr. Maxwell.

TO THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

ON HIS TRANSLATION OF ANACREON.

In many a time, though many a minstrel sung,
In many a version quaint, and many a tongue,
The odes which erst the Teian bard divine,
Rapt in the madd'ning power of love and wine,
Trill'd to the melting lyre, what time around
Admiring Athens heard the extatic sound;
Moore! at whose birth the tuneful sisters smil'd,
Whose pen the loves direct, and graces mild,
Thou, only thou, hast found the art to show
The simple grandeur, and the chasten'd glow,
Which fires the soul, but dies no modest cheek:
Hence sprung the laurels of the ancient Greek!
Nay, if we read the Samian sage* aright, [flight,
That souls through various bodies wend their
No more we wonder, when we all agree,
Anacreon's spirit is transfus'd in thee.

MERCUTIO.

THE RING.

A TALE.—BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

Annulus ille viri. OVID. Amor. Lib. ii. Eleg. 15.

The happy day at length arriv'd,
When Rupert was to wed
The fairest maid in Saxony,
And take her to his bed.

As soon as morn was in the sky,
The feasts and sports began;
The men admir'd the happy maid,
The maids the happy man.

In many a sweet device of mirth,
The day was pass'd along;
And some the fealty dance amus'd,
And some the dulcet song.

The younger maids with Isabel
Disport'd through the bowers,
And deck'd her robe and crown'd her head
With motley bridal flowers.

The matrons all in rich attire,
Within the castle walls,
Sat listening to the choral strains
That echo'd through the halls.

Young Rupert and his friends repair'd
Unto a spacious court,
To strike the bounding tennis-ball
In feat and manly sport.

The bride-groom on his finger had
The wedding-ring so bright,
Which was to grace the lily hand
Of Isabel that night.

And fearing he might break the gem,
Or lose it in the play,
He look'd around the court to see
Where he the ring might lay.

Now in the court a statue stood,
Which there full long had been;
It was a Heathen goddess, or Perhaps a Heathen queen.

Upon its marble finger then
He tried the ring to fit;—

*Pythagoras.

And thinking it was safest there,
Thereon he fasten'd it.

And now the tennis sports went on,
Till they were wearied all,
And messengers announc'd to them
Their dinner in the hall.

Young Rupert for his wedding-ring
Unto the statue went,
But oh! how was he shock'd to find
The marble finger bent!

The hand was clos'd upon the ring
With firm and mighty clasp;
In vain he tried, and tried, and tried,
He could not loose the grasp!

Now sore surpris'd was Rupert's mind,
As well his mind might be;
'I'll come,' quoth he, 'at night again,
'When none are here to see.'

He went unto the feast, and much
He thought upon his ring;
And much he wonder'd what could mean
So very strange a thing!

The feast was o'er, and to the court
He went without delay,
Resolv'd to break the marble hand,
And force the ring away!

But mark a stranger wonder still,
The ring was there no more;
Yet was the marble hand ungrasp'd
And open as before!

He search'd the base, and all the court,
And nothing could he find,
But to the castle did return
With sore bewilder'd mind.

Within he found them all in mirth,
The night in dancing flew;
The youth another ring procur'd,
And none the adventure knew.

And now the priest had join'd their hands,
The hours of love advance!
Rupert almost forgets to think
Upon the morn's mischance.

Within the bed fair Isabel,
In blushing sweetness lay,
Like flowers, half-open'd by the dawn,
And waiting for the day.

And Rupert by her lovely side,
In youthful beauty glows
Like Phæbus, when he bends to cast
His beams upon a rose!

And here my song should leave them both,
Nor let the rest be told,
But for the horrid, horrid tale
It yet has to unfold!

Soon Rupert 'twixt his bride and him,
A death-cold carcass found;
He saw it not, but thought he felt
Its arms embrace him round.

He started up, and then return'd,
But found the phantom still?
In vain he shunk, it clipp'd him round,
With damp and deadly chill!

And when he bent, the earthy lips
A kiss of horror gave;
'Twas like the smell from charnel-vaults,
Or from the mouldering grave!

Ill fated Rupert, wild and loud,
Thou criest to thy wife,
'O! save me from this horrid fiend,
'My Isabel! my life!'

But Isabel had nothing seen,
She look'd around in vain;
And much she mourn'd the mad conceit
That rack'd her Rupert's brain.

At length, from this invisible
These words to Rupert came;
(O God! while he did hear the words!
What terrors shook his frame!)

'Husband! husband! I've the ring
'Thou gav'st to day to me;
'And thou'rt to me for ever wed,
'As I am wed to thee!'

And all the night the demon lay,
Cold chilling by his side,
And strain'd him with such deadly grasp,
He thought he should have died!

But when the dawn of day was near,
The horrid phantom fled,
And left the affrighted youth to weep
By Isabel in bed.

All, all that day a gloomy cloud
Was seen on Rupert's brows;
Fair Isabel was likewise sad,
But strove to cheer her spouse.

And, as the day advanc'd, he thought
Of coming night with fear;
Ah! that he must with terror view
The bed, that should be dear!

At length the second night arriv'd,
Again their couch they prest;
Poor Rupert hop'd that all was o'er,
And look'd for love and rest.

But oh! when midnight came, again
The fiend was at his side,
And as it strain'd him in its grasp,
With howl exulting cried,

'Husband! husband! I've the ring,
'The ring thou gav'st to me;
'And thou'rt to me forever wed,
'As I am wed to thee!'

In agony of wild despair,
He started from the bed;
And thus to his bewilder'd wife
The trembling Rupert said:

'Oh Isabel! dost thou not see
'A shape of horrors here,
'That strains me to the deadly kiss,
'And keeps me from my dear?'

'No, no, my love! my Rupert, I
'No shape of horrors see;
'And much I mourn the phantasy,
'That keeps my dear from me!'

This night, just like the night before
In terrors pass'd away,
Nor did the demon vanish thence
Before the dawn of day.

Says Rupert then, 'My Isabel,
'Dear partner of my woe,
'To Father Austin's holy cave,
'This instant will I go.'

Now Austin was a reverend man,
Who acted wonders maint,

Whom all the country round believ'd
A devil, or a saint!

To Father Austin's holy cave
Then Rupert went full straight,
And told him all, and ask'd him how
To remedy his fate.

The Father heard the youth, and then
Retir'd awhile to pray;
And, having pray'd for half an hour,
Return'd, and thus did say:

'There is a place, where four roads meet,
'Which I will tell to thee;
'Be there this eve, at fall of night,
'And list what thou shalt see.

'Thou'lt see a group of figures pass
'In strange disorder'd crowd,
'Travelling by torch-light through the roads,
'With noises strange and loud.

'And one that's high above the rest
'Terrific towering o'er,
'Will make thee know him at a glance,
'So I need say no more.

'To him from me these tablets give,
'They'll soon be understood;
'Thou need'st not fear, but give them straight,
'I've scrawl'd them with my blood!'

The night-fall came, and Rupert, all
In pale amazement, went
To where the cross-roads met, and he Was by the Father sent.

And lo! a group of figures came,
In strange disorder'd crowd,
Travelling by torch-light through the roads,
With noises strange and loud.

And, as the gloomy train advanc'd,
Rupert beheld from far
A female form of wanton mien,
Seated upon a car.

And Rupert, as he gaz'd upon
The loosely-vested dame,
Thought of the marble statue's look,
For hers was just the same.

Behind her walk'd a hideous form,
With eyeballs flashing death;
Whene'er he breath'd, a sulphur'd smoke
Came burning in his breath!

He seem'd the first of all the crowd,
Terrific towering o'er:
'Yes, yes,' said Rupert, 'this is he,
'And I need ask no more.'

Then slow he went, and to this fiend
The tablets trembling gave,
Who look'd and read them, with a yell,
That would disturb the grave.

And when he saw the blood-scrawl'd name,
His eyes with fury shine;
'I thought,' cries he, 'his time was out,
'But he must soon be mine!'

Then, darting at the youth a look,
Which rent his soul with fear,
He went unto the female fiend,
And whisper'd in her ear.

The female fiend no sooner hear'd,
Than, with reluctant look,
The very ring that Rupert lost,
She from her finger took,

And, giving it unto the youth,
With eyes, that breath'd of hell,
She said, in that tremendous voice,
Which he remember'd well:

'In Austin's name, take back the ring,
'The ring thou gav'st to me;
'And thou'rt to me no longer wed,
'Nor longer I to thee.'

He took the ring, the rabble pass'd,
He home return'd again;
His wife was then the happiest fair,
The happiest he of men!

LA PIPE DE TABAC.

TRANSLATED.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

In your Port Folio of the 30th of June I observe, that you request a translation of 'La Pipe de Tabac.' Being in a part of the country, where I have not been able to get a sight of any of your later numbers, I do not know, whether any of your other correspondents has fulfilled this task, and therefore offer the following to your consideration.—As an apology for its imperfections, give me leave to observe, that it was not written 'where tobacco loves to grow,' but in a wilderness, where I could not get a single whiff to inspire me.—Permit me also to notice the orthography of 'Segar,' which you have adopted in your paper. Although the French and Spaniards, from whom we have derived the word, spell the first syllable, in the same manner that you do, yet the other way is, in my opinion, more congenial to the powers of the English alphabet, and is sanctioned by a longer usage. Should we even consider it as a foreign word, the first letter is improper; for the cedilla (ç) is never necessary before a vowel. But I shall not enlarge upon this subject, lest you should cry, 'Smoke the critic!' and shall conclude, by declaring, that I shall be, to my last breath, the sincere admirer of tobacco, and Mr. Oldschool.

ORLANDO FUMOSO.

While one half the world are fretting,
At debts and taxes, peace or war,
I can laugh, while I am sitting
At my ease with my segar.
Yet of me, sure, none will think ill,
(We such changeeful mortals are,)
If a bright eye's roguish twinkle
Makes me forget e'en my segar.

The weary soldier quits his station,
Down from the yard-arm comes the tar;
Quick they banish all vexation,
Puffing away at a segar.
But soon they wake to other blisses,
If they spy a charming fair,
With lips so red and ripe for kisses;
Then adieu to the segar.

Much do I admire the notion
Of the famous Smokomar,
Who, press'd with such sincere devotion,
His mistress' lips and his segar.
This great man took in his pocket
Always, when he went to the wars,
His charmer's picture in a locket,
Wrapp'd in a pouch full of segars.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. 103.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

Though a strong attachment to Independence, has not permitted me to become a member, of the ancient, and honourable Fraternity, of genuine Loungers, yet as I have never been in love with Labor, nor pursued it further than necessity compelled me, I do not consider myself very remote from them, in practice, and still less in theory. Presuming, therefore on your good will to one, who is related though distantly to your family, I beg you, to publish this letter, in order to answer at once a number of importunate friends, who pester me with remonstrances, and reproofs, similar to those, which I am about to mention.

Not long since, an old College-acquaintance, paid me a visit at my farm; our conversation (after briefly remembering old times, and juvenile pranks) turned upon Politics, a topic, on which my friend, who has been deeply engaged in them, expressed himself with great vehemence, and indeed with passion. Finding, that I heard him with little emotion, that I could very calmly light a new segar, and draw a fresh cork, in the midst of his warmest invectives, he discovered much surprize, and more indignation; pretty severely reproved me, for my apathy and indolence, asserted that it was my duty, as a good man, to stand forth in defence of sound principles, both in morals, and politics, which he said, were in imminent danger, of being banished the country, and concluded by telling me, that if Patriotism failed to excite me, yet ambition, the parent of virtue, ought to teach me, how shameful it would be, to live unknown, and die unlamented.—As this was not the first time, I had been thus taken to task, I answered him at some length—that I was neither Rinaldo, slumbering in the gardens of Armida, nor Hercules in the chamber of Omphale—that if indeed, I could alone discomfit the Fiends and Demons, who inchant, and pollute our land, or possessed strength to brain the monsters who infest it; I would burst the shackles of sloth, however, strongly rivetted. That I had not the extravagant vanity, to suppose myself competent to an enterprize, in which men, infinitely my superiors, had failed—that I was only a plain honest farmer, with no other advantage than a tolerable education, and desirous to steal through the 'cool sequestered vale of life' with as much ease, and as little noise as possible; that it would be as rational, to preach tenderness to the hyaena, or gentleness to the wildcat, as humanity, truth, and reason to a Jacobin. That I had seen a maxim in a Law-book, which I thought a good one, 'ad vana aut impossibilia non cogit lex' and that I deemed myself discharged from the duty, by the impossibility of performing it. With respect, said I, to the gratification of self-interest, in the pursuits of ambition, I have reasoned myself into a belief, on that subject, very congenial with my disposition; that all is vanity under the sun. I find myself at present, very comfortably situated, and why should I wish to change? My farm, supplies me with all the necessaries, and many of the comforts of life. I can afford to open a bottle of wine, on those rare occasions, like the present, when a friend honours me with a call, and we talk over the tale of other times, and renew the memory of joys, that are past. I find leisure on Sunday, to sit, or slumber sub antiqua ilice, and there I peruse the Port Folio, and indulge in a luxury which Horace never knew, and which I fear the gallant Mr. Saunter will not approve, a pipe of good tobacco. Shall I then abandon these comforts, to follow the will O wisp ambition? For what purpose? To gain either power or fame. As to the first, to a man of my sentiments, and in a government like ours, it is unattainable. I who may truly say, odi profanum vulgus, and who entertain a sovereign contempt for the civium ardor prava jubentium shall I have the folly, to hope for the applauses, or the votes of the rabble—it would be as wise to attempt climbing a thorn locust. But suppose all difficulties vanquished, and that the mob who are every thing by turns, and nothing long, should in one of their vagaries raise me to office. Have we not seen the best men, in the most elevated posts, resemble criminals on a high pillory, whom every blackguard, pick-pocket, democrat and negro, was permitted, nay, invited and even hired, to revile, and insult, and pelt with rotten eggs.

And if power be to an honest man, and in the present times neither attainable, nor worth the having, still less is fame. In what consists this meteor? It is the opinion of the world, and so often governed by caprice, prejudice and passion, that no man by deserving can be sure of receiving it, nay, he must expect to meet with obloquy, and clamorous reproach, till envy shall be appeased by his death. Of all men, you my friend, will be the last to believe the people infallible.—The observation of every day, as well as every volume of History, gives the lie to this maxim, at once impious and absurd. Vox populi vox dei. The people are as liable to error, in the choice of their favourites, as in any thing else. If by a rare concurrence of fortunate circumstances, a few great men, have during their lives, obtained the merited meed of fame, how many have on the contrary, been loaded with the reproaches, and the hatred of their countrymen. During the most glorious period of the Grecian Annals, it is scarcely possible to find three great men, who escaped the censures of their fellow-citizens, while a hundred were punished for their virtues, by exile, imprisonment, or death. But you will tell me, that posterity has reversed the decisions of their ungrateful contemporaries, and done ample justice to their desert. You will urge me, to extend my views to distant ages, to erect for myself a monument in the temple of futurity, and to make 'the times to come my own.' But are you sure that even posthumous fame is always just. The opinion of posterity, may be less warped by prejudice, but it must necessarily be founded on testimony, and often on the testimony of interested witnesses. Have we not great reason to believe that the Carthaginian Heroes, have been cruelly misrepresented by the Roman Historians, and do we not know of many similar instances, in more modern times? When violent factions long prevail, errors, prejudices, and falsehoods are likewise of long duration; they outlive the means of detection; their stains penetrate and discolour every page of History, and become at length indelible. At any rate, glory like those who confer it, is mortal, and must have an end, and whether my name be forgotten in fifty or five thousand years, is a matter of but little importance. Even admitting that posthumous fame will always follow virtuous action, is it of any real service to him, who has acquired it? Can he, whose whole sublunary existence, is nothing but lifeless bones and ashes, receive pleasure or profit from sublunary praise?

Can Honour's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flattery sooth the dull cold ear of death?

Is it worth my while, to sustain toil and trouble, and vexation, and a life of disquietude, and care, in order that those, who come after me, may repeat eulogies, which I shall never hear, and raise monuments which I shall never see? Will posthumous renown, be a thing of which I shall have any knowledge, or from which I can derive any advantage? If it be not, can there be wisdom in making it a motive of action? There is however, one species of fame of which I think, a wise man ought to be desirous, and which is liable to none of the objections, I have enumerated. To most men, I would be unwilling to mention it, because in the present enlightened Age of Reason, I should expect to be answered with ridicule, but to you my friend, whose opinions on this subject, at least, are not dissimilar from mine, I will not be ashamed to say, that the future glory, promised by the Christian system, is alone worthy a rational ambition. It consists not of the approbation of weak and often wicked men, but in that of the wisest, and purest of Beings; it is neither erroneous, nor uncertain, nor of limited extent, and duration, nor is it incapable of being enjoyed. But it will be conferred by the Omnipotent himself, in the presence of an assembled, and applauding Universe; it will be bounded only by space; it will endure, when time shall be no more; and will confer the possession of exquisite happiness, through all the countless ages of Eternity.

Such Mr. Saunter, were the arguments I opposed, to the reproaches of my friend. Though they did not convince, yet they silenced him, and delivered me from his importunities. Encouraged by this success, I have flattered myself, that they may produce a similar effect, on my other monitors, and therefore as I have stated above, I request you to publish them.

I am, &c.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

Of the other Harangues of Cicero.

At a time when the dangers of the republic took up all the time and engaged all the thoughts of Cicero; when, after having forced Cataline to fly from Rome, he observed all the steps of the conspirators, and sought to possess himself with the proofs of their crimes, he undertook in the tribunals a most important affair, the success of which interested at once his friendship, his eloquence, and his policy. One would find it difficult to conceive how, with him, the cares of the administration left room for the contentions of the bar: how among so great fatigues, which scarcely allowed him a few hours for sleep, the consul had still leisure to be an advocate, and to compose a pleading, as well laboured as that of which I am about to speak; if we did not know what prodigious facility, in study and in business, he possessed from nature and from habit, and what a man may do who is accustomed to make a continual use of his time and of his genius. Moreover, the first of all interests in the estimation of Cicero, that of the state, summoned him to the defence of Licinius Murena, designated consul for the following year, but then accused of intrigue, and who by a juridical condemnation, might lose the dignity he had obtained. He was a citizen full of honour and courage, who had served with the greatest distinction, under Lucullus, and was greatly attached to Cicero and his country. Amidst the troubles and disorders of the public affairs, it was of the last importance that the good cause should not lose such a support, that Murena should enter on his office at the day prefixed, and that they should not be exposed to the dangers of a new election. The circumstances rendered the defence difficult and delicate. Cicero himself, at the request of all the honest men, disgusted at the corruption which reigned in elections, had carried a law against bribery, more severe than any before it. Murena had for his accuser one of his competitors for the consulate, Sulpicius, a renowned lawyer, and also esteemed among the friends of Cicero. But that which gave to the accusation the most weight, it was supported by a man whose character was generally respected, Cato, who at the same time was near obtaining the tribunate. Zealous to make an example, he had publicly said, that the year should not pass away before he had accused one of consular rank. We may believe that the excess of his zeal had infused a portion of precipitation and of ill humour in his pursuits; for, by the relation of historians, Murena, without being absolutely irreproachable, was not within the meaning of the law, and had not permitted himself to proceed farther than that kind of solicitation which had been customary, and which the fairest character blushed not to employ. They could not impute to him any formal transgression, and this was not the example which ought to have been chosen; accordingly he was absolved by all the suffrages. We have heard the Roman orator thunder against Verres and Cataline, with all the vehemence, all the pathos, all the energy of eloquence, animated by virtue and patriotism. We shall soon see his talents and his style, accommodating themselves to a very different tone. We pass, here, from the sublime to the simple, and we shall see how ably he seizes all the characters, suitable to this kind of oratorical composition, the art of discussion, the choice of examples, the turns of pleasantry, finesse, delicacy, and even gaiety, such at least as the nature of his cause would admit.

Cicero, after having established in his exordium, equally noble and interesting, the relations and connexions which attached him to Murena, after having refuted the imputations of Sulpicius, proceeds thus:

"It is time to proceed to the great support of our adversaries, to him whom we may consider as the wall of defence around our accusers, to Cato; and whatever gravity, whatever interest is engaged by him in this cause, I dread much more, I confess, his influence than his reasons. I shall request, in the first place, that the personal dignity of Cato, his approaching hopes of the tribunate, and the glory of his life may not be converted into arms against us, and that the advantages which he has received to be useful to all, may not serve for the ruin of an individual. Scipio, the African, had been twice consul, had overthrown Carthage and Numantium, the two terrors of this empire, when he accused Lucius Cotta: He had in his favour great eloquence, a great reputation for probity and integrity, an authority such as a man ought to have, to whom the Roman people owed their own. I have often heard it said by our old men, that nothing had served Cotta so much with his judges, as this pre-eminence of Scipio. Those men were so wise that they would not suffer a citizen to be overborne in the tribunals in such a manner as to leave a suspicion that he had been oppressed by the excessive preponderance of his accuser. Do we not also know, Cato, that the judgment of the Roman people saved Sergius Galba from the pursuits of one of your ancestors, a citizen of great courage and high consideration, but who seemed to be too zealously determined on the ruin of his adversary. Always, in this city, the people in a bouy, and particularly those enlightened judges who look into futurity, have resisted the too great power of those who have accused. I wish not to see an accuser discover in the tribunals a superiority too decided, too much power, too much credit: employ all these advantages for the safety of the innocent, for the support of the feeble, for the defence of the unfortunate; but never for the danger and ruin of the citizens. Let no man then come here to say, that Cato, in presenting himself against Murena, has judged his cause. It would be to establish an unjust principle, and to place the accused in a condition too hard and too unfortunate, if the opinion of their accuser were regarded as their sentence. For myself, Cato, the singular esteem which I have of your virtue, does not permit me to blame your conduct and proceedings on this occasion; but perhaps I may find something in them which deserves to be reformed. You commit no faults, and we cannot say of you, that you ought to be corrected; but only that there is something in you which might be softened and moderated. Nature herself has formed you for honesty, gravity, temperance, justice, firmness of soul. She has made you great in all the virtues: but you have added to them certain principles of philosophy, in which our wishes for more moderation, more softness, which are in fine, to say what I think of them, more severe and rigorous, than nature and truth will warrant: and since I speak not here before an ignorant multitude, you will permit me, judges, a few reflections upon that kind of philosophical studies, which in itself is no stranger to your taste or my own.

"Know, then, that all which we see in Cato, which is excellent, which is divine, is of himself, belongs properly to him; on the contrary, that which leaves something to be desired is not of himself, but of the master whom he has chosen, of the sect he has embraced. There was among the Greeks a man of great understanding, Zeno, whose followers called themselves Stoics. I will present you with a few of his principles: That the wise man has no regard to any title of favour whatever; that he never pardons any fault; that compassion and indulgence are nothing but levity and folly; that it is not compatible with the dignity of human nature, for a man to suffer himself to be touched, moved or softened; that the wise man, even if he is an hypocrite and a counterfeiter, is the most beautiful of men, and the most rich, even while he is begging for charity; that he is a king even in slavery, and that all of us, who are not wise men, are but slaves and fools; that all faults are equal; that every offence is a crime; that he who kills a chicken, when he has not a right, is as guilty as he who strangles his father; that the wise man never repents, is never deceived, and never changes his opinions.

"Such are the maxims, which Cato, whose understanding and information you know very well, has drawn from very learned authors, and which he has appropriated to himself, not indeed like many others, to make them subjects of controversy, but to make them the rules of his life. The farmers of the republic petitioned for a little delay: have a care, said Cato: grant no favours. Unfortunate persons request some relief. It is a crime to listen to compassion. A man acknowledges that he has committed a fault, and asks forgiveness.—It is to render ourselves guilty of the offence to pardon it.—But the fault is but light—All faults are equal.—Have you said any thing without reflection—it is not permitted you to retract it. But I was drawn away by the general opinion. The wise man knows nothing but certainty, and has no regard to opinion. Have you been involuntarily deceived concerning a fact—It is not an error, it is a lie and a calumny. From all this proceeds a conduct perfectly conformable to this doctrine. Why is Cato here as an accuser? It is because he said in senate that he would accuse one of consular dignity. But you said it in anger. The wise man is never angry. But it was a word, escaped of a sudden, which engages you to nothing. The wise man cannot, without shame, change a resolution—he cannot, without a crime, allow himself to be softened: all compassion is weakness: all indulgence a sin."

"And I also, in my early youth, distrusting my own information, have searched, like Cato, for that of the philosophers; but the masters whom I have followed, Plato and Aristotle, have principles. Their disciples, men regular in their opinions, think that even the wise man may allow something to circumstances and particular considerations; that the good man may give way to pity; that there are gradations of crimes and of punishments; that virtue and firmness may grant favours; and that the wise man himself may sometimes be drawn away by opinion, transported with anger, touched by compassion; that he may without shame, retract what he has said, and change his opinion if he finds a better; that, finally, all the virtues have limits, and ought to avoid excess.

"If, with the character you have, Cato, chance had directed you to the same authors with me, you would not have been more of a good man, more courageous, more temperate, more just; this could not be; but you would have been a little more inclined to tenderness; you would not have gratuitously rendered yourself the aggressor, and the enemy of a man full of modesty in his manners, full of honour and greatness in his sentiments. You would have considered, that fortune having brought you both forward at the same time, for the care of the republic, him as consul and you as tribune, there ought to be between you, a sort of patriotic connexion. You would have suppressed, you would have forgotten, what you had said in the senate, with too much violence, or you would have drawn from your words a consequence less rigorous. Believe me, you are at present in all the fire of your age, in all the ardor of your character, in all the enthusiasm of the doctrines you have adopted; but time, practice, experience, must undoubtedly calm, moderate, and soften you. In fact, those legislators of virtue, those preceptors whom you have followed, have carried, in my opinion, the duties of men beyond the bounds of nature. We may, in speculation, proceed as far as we please; elevate ourselves to the stars; but in practice, in reality, there are limits at which we must stop. Pardon nothing, they say. But I answer pardon, by all means, when there is room for indulgence. Give no attention to any personal considerations. And I say we ought to have no regard to them, farther than duty and equity allow. Suffer not yourselves to be touched with compassion—Never, indeed, to such a degree as to enfeeble the authority of the laws, but always, as far as humanity, the first law of all, prescribes. Be inflexible in your sentiments. Aye, if none better are proposed or occur to you. Thus spoke the great Scipio, who had like you, Cato, the reputation of a man of great information, of a man almost divine in his domestic discipline; but whom, the philosophy of which he made profession, drawn from the same sources with yours, had not rendered more severe than a man ought to be, and who, on the contrary, has always past for the mildest of all men. Lælius had taken the same lessons, and who ever had more softness of manners, or rendered wisdom more amiable? I might say as much of Gallus, of Philip; but I choose rather to take examples from your own house. Who of us have not heard of Cato the Censor, one of your most illustrious ancestors? And who ever was more measured in his conduct and in his principles: more tractable, more easy in the commerce of life? When you praised him in your pleading with equal justice and dignity, you quoted him as a domestic model, whom you proposed to imitate. The ties of blood, the relations of character, give you a better right, it is true, than any of us; but nevertheless, I regard him as an example for me, as well as for yourself; and if you could also, to your natural severity, unite a little of his facility and softness, all the qualities you possess would not indeed be the better, but would become more amiable.

"Thus, to return to what I said at first, the name of Cato ought to be separated from this cause: his authority ought to be of no weight in a legal investigation, or at least to have no influence but in doing good: Attack us by facts. What would you have, Cato? What do you demand? Upon what is your accusation supported? You rise up against intrigue. I defend it not. You reproach me with justifying in the tribunals, what I have proscribed by my laws; I have proscribed intrigue, and I defend innocence. Accuse nothing but crimes and I join you. Prove that Murena has committed them, and I will acknowledge that my own laws condemn him."

ADVICE TO A JOURNALIST.

COMEDY.

Let us proceed to the subject of belles-lettres, which will form one of the principal articles of your journal. It is your purpose to devote much attention to dramatic productions. This project is the more reasonable, as our theatre is more chaste, and is become a school of morality. You will undoubtedly avoid the example of some periodical writers, who endeavour to depreciate all their contemporaries, and to depress the arts, of which a good journalist ought to be the champion. To Molière the preference is justly due, over all comic writers, of every age, and of every country; but let not this preference be exclusive. Imitate the wise Italians, who place Raphaël in the first rank, but refuse not their admiration to Paul Veronèse, Carracci, Corregio, Dominicain, &c. Molière is first; but it would be unjust and ridiculous, to deny to le Joueur rank with his best productions. It is worthy only of a man devoid of justice and of taste, to refuse his esteem to les Menechme, and not to be highly delighted with le Legataire universel. He, who is not pleased with Regnard, is not worthy to be an admirer of Molière.

Have the courage to avow, that many of our minor pieces, such as, le Grondeur, le galant Jardinier, la Pucille, &c. are superior to the greater portion of the minor pieces of Molière; I say superior, in delicate delineation of character, in wit, which abounds in most of them, and even in refined and chastened pleasantry.

It is not my intention to give a detailed account of the infinite variety of modern pieces, nor, by applauding a few authors, to whom, perhaps, even that applause would be unsatisfactory, to offend a great number of persons; but, when such works, as le Préjugé à la mode, replete with correct delineations of character and manners, and possessing high interest, shall be given to the world; when Frenchmen shall be so fortunate, as to receive presents of such intrinsic worth as le Glorieux, let me intreat you, not to diminish their success, under the pretence, that they are not comedies in the style of Molière. Avoid that despicable perverseness, which flows from envy; seek not to proscribe the tender, melting scenes, which are found in these works: for, when a comedy, besides its appropriate merit, possesses that also, of exciting interest; we must be in a very surly mood, to be angry, because an additional pleasure is afforded to the public.

I dare to assert, that, if the excellent pieces of Molière possessed a little more interest, their representation would command more general attention; le Misanthrope would not only secure our esteem, but attract crowded audiences. Comedy should not degenerate into insipid, whining tragedy: the art of extending its limits, without confounding them with those of tragedy, is a great art, which merits encouragement, and which it is disgraceful to destroy. To give a finished sketch of a dramatic production, is also a great art. I have always estimated the genius of young men, according to the detail which they gave of a new piece, whose representation they had just witnessed; and I have remarked, that all those, who best acquitted themselves, were those, who have since acquired the highest reputation in their professions. So true is it, generally, that the spirit of business, and the genuine spirit of the belles-lettres, are the same.

To expose in terms perspicuous, and elegant, a subject, which is sometimes confused; and, without attending to the distribution of the acts, to illustrate the intrigue and the dénouement, to narrate them as an interesting history, to draw the characters at a single stroke, to mention those circumstances, in which more or less of probability, or of dexterity, was apparent; to retain the most happy verses, instantly to perceive the general merit, or to detect the general defects of style; all this I have sometimes seen achieved, but it is a rare achievement, even among men of letters, who devote their attention particularly to it: for, to certain minds it is more facile, to pursue the train of their own ideas, than to give an account of the ideas of others.

TRAGEDY.

My observations on tragedy, will vary but little from those which I have made on comedy. You know what glory this illustrious art has shed upon France: an art more difficult than comedy, and superior to it, because, to compose a fine tragedy, the author must possess the genuine spirit of poetry; but comedy requires only some talents of versification.

You, who so well understand Sophocles, and Euripides, will not seek a vain recompense for the labour which it has cost you, to acquire a knowledge of them, in the contemptible pleasure of preferring them, in violation of your sentiments, to our great French authors. Recollect, Sir, that, when I challenged you, to shew me, in the tragic authors of antiquity, fragments comparable to certain traits even in the inferior pieces of P. Corneille, you acknowledged, that it was impossible. These traits of which I speak, were, for instance, the following verses of the tragedy of Nicomède. 'I will,' says Prusias."

Ecouter à la fois l'amour & la nature,
Etre père & mari dans cette conjoncture.

Nicomède.

Seigneur, voulez-vous bien vous en fier à moi!
Ne soyez l'un ni l'autre.

Prusias.

Eh! que dois-je être!

Nicomède.

Roi.

Reprenez hantement ce noble caractère.
Un véritable Roi n'est ni mari, ni père:
Il regarde son trône, & rien de plus. Regnez:
Rome vous craindra plus que vous ne la craignez. †

You will not infer, that the last pieces of this father of the theatre are perfect, because they emit such brilliant coruscations: join with the public, in acknowledging their extreme imbecility.

Agésilas and Surena cannot diminish the honour which Cinna and Polyeucte confer upon France. M. de Fontenelle, nephew of the great Corneille, says, in the life of his uncle, that, if the proverb, 'as beautiful as the Cid,' was too soon forgotten, it is attributable to authors, who were interested in its suppression. No, it was as impossible for authors, to effect the suppression of the proverb, as to effect that of the Cid. Corneille himself abolished it; it is attributable to Cinna. Say not with the Abbe de Saint-Pierre, that fifty years hence the pieces of Racine will no longer be represented on the theatre. I pity our children, if they relish not these master-pieces of elegance. How must their hearts be formed; if Racine cease to interest them?

It is probable, that the works of the celebrated authors of the age of Louis XIV. will exist as long as the French language. But discourage not their successors, by assuring them, that the career is replete, and that there is no room. Corneille is defective in interest; Racine is often not sufficiently tragical. The authors of Venceslas, of Radamiste, and of Electre, with their great defects, possess

* 'I will,' says Prusias,
Listen at once to nature and to love,
In this conjuncture be, father and husband.

Nicomède.

May I, my Lord, presume counsel to give?
Neither a husband, nor a father be.

Prusias.

Ah! what then should I be?

Nicomède.

A King. Resume,

Nobly resume that splendid character.
A genuine monarch neither father is,
Nor husband. In his throne, his soul is centred.
Reign; and strike terror into haughty Rome.

† Nicomède, Tragedie, Acte IV. Scène III.

peculiar beauties, in which these two great men are deficient; and it is presumable, that these three pieces will always remain on the French theatre, since they have maintained their pre-eminence, although performed by different actors, for this is the proper test of a tragedy. What shall I say of Manlius, a piece worthy of Corneille, and of the fine character of Ariane, and of the high interest which predominates in Amasis? I will not speak of the tragedies written during the last twenty years: as I have composed some of them, it belongs not to me to appreciate the merit of contemporaries superior to myself; and, in regard of my dramatic works, I can only say, and request you to inform your readers, that I correct them daily.

But, when a new piece shall appear, say not with the odious author of the Observations, and of so many other pamphlets: the piece is excellent, or, it is miserable; or, such an act is impertinent, such a part is despicable. Support your opinion by substantial proofs, and let the public pronounce. Be assured, the decree will be against you, whenever you shall decide without proof, even should that decision be correct; for it is not your judgment that is required, but the report of a case, on which the public is to decide.

What will give peculiar value to your journal, is the care which you shall take, to draw comparisons between novel pieces and those of foreign countries, which may be founded on the same subject. In the last century, this point was neglected in the disquisition on the Cid: only a few verses of the Spanish original were cited; the situations ought to have been compared. Suppose, that the Manlius of la Fosse, were now presented to us, for the first time; it would be a high gratification to your readers to have the English tragedy, of which it is an imitation, exhibited to their view. Does an instructive work appear relative to the pieces of the illustrious Racine? Combat the erroneous opinion, which is generally entertained, that the English have not permitted the subject of Phœdra to be introduced on their theatre. Inform your readers, that the Phœdra of Smith is one of the finest pieces of which London can boast. Inform them, that the author has closely imitated Racine, even in the amour of Hippolytus; that he has blended the intrigue of Phœdra with that of Bajazet, and that still he boasts of having drawn every thing from Euripides. I think that your readers would be charmed with a comparison of some scenes of the Grecian, the Latin, the French, and the English Phœdra. Thus, in my opinion, would temperate and sound criticism perfectionate the taste of the French, and perhaps Europe. But what piece of sound criticism has been produced since that of the French academy on the Cid? and even that is almost as incomplete, as the Cid itself.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CRITICISM

[From the Edinburgh Review.]

The public are indebted to Mr. Godwin for the recovery of Chaucer's evidence in a question about bearing arms, occurring betwixt Scrope and Grosvenor;* but the manner in which it is narrated, is a good illustration of the strained inferences concerning Chaucer's temper and disposition, deduced by his biographer from the most common and trivial occurrences.

* Chaucer was a man of a frank and easy temper, undeformed by haughtiness and reserve, and readily entering into a certain degree of social intercourse on trivial occasions. This particular is strongly confirmed to us by the curious record of his testimony, in the cause of arms between Scrope and Grosvenor. He describes himself as walking in Friday Street, in the city of London, and observing there the arms he had seen always borne by the family of Scrope hung out as a sign. 'This inconsiderable circumstance immediately excites an interest in the patriarch of the English language, and English poetry. The Scropes were his friends. He accosts a stranger, whom he perceives accidentally standing by, and asks, 'What inn is that which I observe has hung out the arms of Scrope for its sign?'—'Nay,' replied the other, 'it is no inn, nor are these the arms of Scrope; they are the shield of a Cheshire family of the name of Grosvenor.' In Chaucer, the thus addressing himself to a person unknown, is no evidence of a vulgar, indelicate, and indiscriminating mind. It shews that he was a character, not fastidious enough to refuse to interest itself in trifles, and frank, even and affable in his intercourse with mankind.' Vol. ii. p. 569.

And all this is to be inferred from a question asked of a passenger, the fruit probably of momentary curiosity. This mode of drawing characters ought to supersede that of the ingenious Frenchman, who describes them accurately from seeing the party's hand-writing.

While Mr. Godwin was thus poring upon a millstone, and proclaiming his discoveries to the world, we are surprised that he has omitted the famous tradition, that Chaucer, while in the Temple, was fined two shillings 'for beating a Franciscan friar in Fleet Street.' (See Fuller and Speght.) This circumstance, with a proper allowance of possibilities, would have gone some length in eking out a third quarto. For, in the first place, it is naturally connected with the history of Fleet Street, and Fleet Ditch, and the Fleet Prison, and of Fleet the law-book, and of the Fleet or Royal Navy, with some account of which (so naturally bearing upon the life of Chaucer) the reader must no doubt have been highly gratified. Secondly, the circumstance of the fine would have happily introduced a history of the silver coinage, with an abridge of the Temple records, from the earliest period to the present day; and the political justice of fine and imprisonment might have been discussed in a separate chapter. Thirdly, the mention of the Franciscan, would have paved the way with great propriety for a history of the mendicant orders, and have saved Mr. Godwin the trouble and disgrace of foisting it in elsewhere, upon a much more flimsy pretext. (vol. ii. p. 20.) But, above all, the cause of the scuffle, and the drubbing itself, would have led to many a learned dissertation. It is probable that one or both parties were in liquor. If so, when, how, or with what liquor did they become intoxicated? Was it with wine of Ape, or of Chepe; with Malverie, or with Hippocras? Was it together or separately? And can any light be thrown upon the combat, from the similar affray betwixt justice Shallow when an Inn's of court man, and Samson Stockfish the fruiterer? Again, it is probable that the quarrel originated in some theological dispute,—and the vast and thorny field of controversy might have been accurately surveyed, to enable the reader to fix upon the precise spot occupied by the disputants. Perhaps Chaucer offended the friar by the freedom of his conversation,—and why not insert all the jocose and satirical passages of the Canterbury Tales? To illustrate the nature of the beating, Mr. Godwin might have described—

—'Your rouse, your wherit and your dowet,
Tugs on the hair, your bob o'the lips, your thump,
—your kick, the fury of a foot,
Whose indignation commonly is stamped
Upon the hinder quarters of a man,—
With all your blows and blow-men whatsoever,
Set in their lively colours, givers and takers.'

All which knowledge is unfortunately lost to the world, perhaps through the ill-considered interference of Mr. Phillips the publisher.

Some particular passages of the life, are less fancifully and more correctly delineated. Mr.

Godwin combats, and in our opinion successfully, the opinion of those who deny the honourable claim of Thomas Chaucer, to call the poet father; and he has vindicated the relation, which the Dream of Chaucer unquestionably bears to the History of John of Gaunt.

The critical dissertations upon Troilus and Creseide, and Chaucer's other poems, have considerable merit. They are the production of a man who has read poetry with taste and feeling; and we wish sincerely, that instead of the strange farrago which he calls the life of Chaucer, he had given us a correct edition of the miscellaneous poetry of the author, upon the same plan with Mr. Tyrwhitt's admirable Canterbury Tales. It is true, that we could not have expected from Mr. Godwin, either the extensive learning or the accuracy of illustration which Mr. Tyrwhitt has displayed. But, as already noticed, his critical disquisitions have occasional merit; and he might have pleaded the ancient prerogative of commentators, for writing in a more rambling and diffusive style than is consistent with the dignity of history or biography. Mr. Godwin is sometimes rather hasty in his critical conclusions. He exclaims against Chaucer, for 'polluting the portrait of (Creseide's) virgin character in the beginning of the poem, with so low and pitiful a joke as this—

'But whether that she children had or none,
I rede it not, therefore I let it gone.' vol. i. p. 305.

If Mr. Godwin had perused the poem attentively, he would have seen that no joke was intended, and that Creseide was no maiden, but in fact a young widow.

'And as a widowe was she and alone.'

And again, when invited by Pandarus to do honour to May,

'Eighe! God forbid, quod she, what! be ye mad?
Is that a widowe's life, so God you save?
Pardy you makin me right fore adrad;
Ye bene so wilde, it semith as ye rave.
If sare me wele better, aie in a cave
To bide, and rede on hily saintis lives:
Let maidins gon to dance and young wifes.'

We were much surprised to find, that the Canterbury Tales, the most important, as well as the most exquisite of Chaucer's productions, have attracted so little of Mr. Godwin's attention. He might have displayed, in commenting upon poems as varied in subject as in beauty, his whole knowledge of the manners of the middle ages, were it ten times more extensive. But Mr. Godwin, beginning probably to write before he had considered either the nature of his subject, or the probable length of his work, had exhausted both his limits and materials ere he came to the topic upon which he ought principally to have dwelt. The characters, therefore, of the several pilgrims, so exquisitely described, that each individual passes before the eyes of the reader, and so admirably contrasted with each other; their conversation and manners, the gallantry of the Knight and Squire, the affected sentimentality of the Abbess, the humour of mine Host, and the Wife of Bath; the pride of the Monk, the humility of the Parson, the learning and poverty of the Scholar, with the rude but comic portraits of the inferior characters, are, in the history of the life and age of Chaucer, of which they form a living picture, passed over in profound silence, or with very slight notice. The truth is, Mr. Godwin's speed and strength were expended before he came within sight of the goal, and he saw himself compelled with a faint apology to abandon that part of his subject which must have been universally interesting. The few remarks which he has made upon the Canterbury Tales, induce us to believe that he has seen and regretted his error; but it is a poor excuse, after writing a huge book, to tell the reader that it is but 'superficial work,' because the author 'came a novice to such an undertaking.' (See Preface.) It is the duty of an editor, to collect and arrange his materials before he begins to print his work; nor will the public be satisfied with an apology, which ought either to have deterred him from the undertaking entirely, or at least to have retarded the execution of it, till study and labour had supplied the defects of superficial information. As Mr. Godwin is unquestionably a man of strong parts, we by no means discourage him from applying himself to illustrate the history of his country, but we would advise him in future, to read before he writes, and not merely while he is writing.

The history of 'Old John of Gaunt, time-honoured Lancaster,' occupies a considerable portion of these volumes. He is styled in the title page, Chaucer's near 'friend and kinsman;' an abuse of words, if, as we conceive, kinsman can only be correctly used to express a blood relation. John of Gaunt was undoubtedly Chaucer's patron, and ultimately stood in a certain degree of affinity to him, by marrying his concubine, a sister of the poet's wife; but this connection could not give to the bard a portion of the blood of the Plantagenets, or render him in any sense the kinsman of the duke of Lancaster. In the historical part of his work, Mr. Godwin has proposed to himself a splendid plan. Antiquities had, in his opinion, hitherto been the province of —'men of cold tempers, and sterile imaginations,' whose works are compiled 'with such narrow views, so total an absence of discrimination, and such an unsuspecting ignorance of the materials of which man is made, that the perusal of them tends for the most part to stupidity, the sense, and to imbue the soul with moping and lifeless dejection.' It was my wish, had my power held equal pace with my strong inclination, to carry the workings of fancy and the spirit of philosophy into the investigation of ages past. I was anxious to rescue, for a moment, the illustrious dead from the jaws of the grave, to make them pass in review before me, to question their spirits, and record their answers. I wished to make myself their master of ceremonies, to introduce my reader to their familiar speech, and to enable him to feel, for the instant, as if he had lived with Chaucer.' Preface, x.

This is well proposed, and expressed with that dignified contempt of his predecessors' labours, which especially becomes an author at the moment when he is about to avail himself of the information they afford him. But it is one thing to call spirits from the vasty deep, and another to compel their obedience to the invocation. When we expected to see the heroes of Cressy and Poitiers stalk past in the rude and antiquated splendor of chivalry, as perchance they might have appeared upon the summons of Warton, Ellis, or some such cold-tempered, sterile-minded antiquary, the philosophical phantasmagoria of Mr. Godwin presented us with a very different set of beings. It seems to have been his rule, that if it be difficult to think like our ancestors, it is very easy to make them think like ourselves; and therefore, whatever motives Mr. Godwin himself esteems praiseworthy and laudable, he imputes to his hero John of Gaunt, with all the liberality and contempt for congruity of the worthy squire who equipped his Vandyke portraits with modern periwigs. In this respect, the work reminds us of a particular class of novels, said to be 'founded on real history,' in which the dramatis personæ are assumed from the ages of chivalry, but appressed in the sickly trim of sentiment peculiar to the Grevilles and Julias of Mr. Lane's half-bound duodecimos. Mr. Godwin's dukes and knights hold, in like manner, the language, we had almost said the cant, of his sci-disant philosophy; and argue as learnedly of the nature of the human mind, of cause and effect, and all that, as if they had occasionally presided at Coachmakers Hall. The duke of Lancaster was unquestionably the wisest prince of his time; yet his honored shade must forgive us, if we deem him incapable of framing the profound and polite oration which he is here supposed to address to Chaucer, upon his being appointed an ambassador. We can only afford room to insert the following grand finale: 'Man is a complex being, and is affected with mixed considerations; and your contemporaries will listen with far different feelings to your beautiful and elevated productions, if they flow from an ambassador and a minister of state, than if you remained obscurely sheltered under your natal roof, in the city in which you were born, or sequestered among the groves and streams which adorn your neighbourhood at Woodstock.' And this tawdler stuff is supposed to be spoken by John of Gaunt, and to Geoffrey Chaucer! And this is carrying 'the workings of fancy,' and 'the spirit of philosophy,' into the investigation of ages past, and 'rescuing the illustrious dead from the jaws of the grave!' Imbued 'with moping and lifeless dejection, and stupified' as we are, after the perusal of two huge quarto volumes of incoherent narrative of trite sentiment, we cannot help feeling, at such absurdity, a momentary impulse of surprise and indignation!

Of the miscellaneous information contained in these volumes, we cannot be expected to treat at length, especially as the greater part of it has nothing to do with the proper subject of the book. It seems to us, that Mr. Godwin, a novice, as he himself informs us, in the study of ancient history, had applied himself to his task with the ardour of a proselyte. Every fact, every peculiar view of manners which occurred in the course of his reading, had to him the charms of novelty; and he was benevolently eager to communicate to others the information which he had just acquired. But, unfortunately, a mind which has newly received a fresh train of ideas, is almost invariably found incapable to abridge or digest them, as no man can draw a map of a country which he traverses for the first time. Upon subjects not familiar to our thoughts, we must be contented to express ourselves with the crude prolixity of the works from which we have derived our information; and our attempts to be copious and distinct, will commonly produce but a string of tedious and ill-combined extracts, instead of a concise and luminous system. Hence the long, dull, and unnecessary details with which Mr. Godwin has favoured us upon every subject which crossed his path. He could but write in proportion as he read, and empty his common-place as fast only as he filled it. A comprehensive view of his subject we cannot possibly find in his writings; for it was at no time wholly before his own eyes. He knew not when or where to stop; and, in fact, was speeded, from mere want of room, to abandon his work, half-finished, at the moment it became most interesting.

Some of the dissertations, considered abstractedly, possess considerable merit; and we cannot refuse praise to the industry of Mr. Godwin, who has acquired a great fund of knowledge, however ill arranged, upon subjects to which he was so lately an utter stranger. We have already said, that we would be pleased to see some parts of his book arranged as notes upon Chaucer's poems. We find it impossible 'to pick them in a pile of noisome and musty chaff;' but when they are brought forward in a work arranged upon a better plan, our approbation shall be conferred much more willingly than our present censure. A natural consequence of the hurry with which Mr.

Godwin has compiled his work, is the inaccuracy which has occasionally crept in, although less frequently than we could have thought possible. Vere, for example, the favourite of Richard II, is likened to 'Carr, the minion of James I, with these advantages in favour of the former, that he was of an ancient family, and Carr an upstart,' p. 366. This is a mistake. Carr, or Ker, earl of Somerset, was the third son of Sir Thomas Ker of Fairnyhirst, the chief of a very ancient and powerful family, now represented by the marquis of Lothian. As he had unfortunately little personal merit, it is hard to deprive him of the advantage of birth, which he really possessed. The universal predominance of the French language in the reign of Edward III, is expressed with rather too much latitude, vol. i. p. 18. Previous to the birth of Chaucer, a remarkable change had begun to take place in this particular. Histories, and long poems of devotion and chivalry, were already translated out of the Romance or French language into English, and these in such numbers, as sufficiently to demonstrate that they were not required for the use of the lower and middle classes alone. We should have been pleased to have seen the authority upon which the romances of Robert sans peur and Robert le diable are ascribed to Waer, having esteemed these tales of later date than the Roman de Rou. The story of Anlaf the Dane, who is said to have penetrated into king Athelstane's tent, disguised as a minstrel, is rather apocryphal, especially with the miraculous decoration of William of Malmesbury. Mr. Godwin seems to entertain some doubt of John of Gaunt's flight into Scotland, and residence at Holyroodhouse. But no fact can be better attested. Andrew of Winton, a contemporary historian, has dedicated a chapter to show

'Qhwen of Longcastele the Duke,
Refute intil Scotland tuk.' Book IX. c. 4.

He mentions particularly his progress, in which he was attended by Earl William of Douglas, from Berwick to Haddington, and thence to Edinburgh—

'And intil Haly-rwde-hows that Abbay
Thai made him for to take herbyr.'

This circumstance, and the more recent asylum afforded to Henry VI. are probably alluded to by Molinet, when he terms that country

'De tous siecles, le mendre
Et le plus tollerant.'

The style of Mr. Godwin's life of Chaucer is, in our apprehension, uncommonly depraved, exhibiting the opposite defects of meanness and of bombast. This is especially evident in those sentimental flourishes with which he has garnished his narrative, and which appear to us to be executed in a most extraordinary taste. In the following simile, for example, we hardly know whether most to admire the elegance and power of conception, or the happy ease and dignity of expression.

'Its slender pillars (the author is treating of the later Gothic architecture) may possess various excellencies, but they are certainly not magnificent; and the shafts by which the pillars are frequently surrounded have an insignificant air, suggesting to us an idea of fragility, and almost reminding us of the bumble vehicle through which an English or German rustic inhales the fumes of the Indian weed.' Vol. 1. p. 145.

In p. 181, we hear of 'a tune, in which the luxuriance and multiplicity of musical sounds obscure and transmute with disdain upon the majestic simplicity of words.' In other places we find the 'technicalities of justice,'—the religious nerve of the soul of man—'young knights who looked upon the field of Roncesvalles with augmented circulation—unforeshortened figures—an 'ancient baron neighbourhood to a throne,' and sundry other new and whimsical expressions. But even these conceited barbarisms offend us less than the execrable taste displayed in the following account of Chaucer's early studies.

'He gave himself up to the impressions of nature, and to the sensations he experienced. He studied the writings of his contemporaries, and of certain of the ancients. He was learned according to the learning of his age. He wrote, because he felt himself impelled to write. He analyzed the models which were before him. He sought to please his friends and fellow scholars in the two Universities. He aspired to an extensive and lasting reputation.' Vol. i. p. 436.

We have no doubt that Mr. Godwin considers these short sentences, as the true model of a nervous and concise style. For our part, we find the sense so poor and trite, when compared with the pithy and sententious mode of delivery, that we feel in our closet the same shame we have sometimes experienced in the theatre, when a fourth-rate actor has exposed himself by mousing, slapping his pockets, and, according to stage phrase, making the most of a trifling part. We will not pursue this subject any further, although we could produce from these ponderous tomes some notable instances of the mock heroic, and of the tone of false and affected sentiment. Such passages have tempted us to exclaim with Pandarus (dropping only one letter of his ejaculation),

'Alas! alas! so noble a creature
As is a man should *reden such ordure!'

Upon the whole, Mr. Godwin's friends have, in one respect, great reason to be satisfied with the progress of his convalescence. We hope and trust, that the favourable symptoms of his case may continue. He is indeed now and then very low; or, in other words, uncommonly dull; but there is no apparent return of that fever of the spirits, which alarmed us so much in his original publications. The insurrection of Jack Straw (a very dangerous topic) produces only a faint and moderate aspiration breathed towards the 'sacred doctrines of equality,' which it is admitted are too apt to be 'rashly, superficially, and irreverently acted upon, involving their disciples in the most fearful calamity.' The disgrace of Alice Pierce, or Perrers, the chère amie of Edward III, or, as Mr. Godwin delicately terms her, 'the chosen companion of his hours of retirement and leisure,' calls down his resentment against the turbulence and rudeness of the Good Parliament. But less could hardly have been expected from the author of the Memoirs of a late memorable female.

We cannot help remarking that the principles of a modern philosopher continue to alarm the public, after the good man himself has abandoned them, just as the very truest tale will sometimes be distrusted from the habitual falsehood of the narrator. We fear this may have incommoded Mr. Godwin in his antiquarian researches, more than he seems to be aware of. When he complains that private collectors declined 'to part with their treasures for a short time out of their own hands,' did it never occur to Mr. Godwin that the maxims concerning property, contained in his Political Justice, were not altogether calculated to conciliate confidence in the author?

But, upon the whole, the Life of Chaucer, if an uninteresting, is an innocent performance; and were its prolixities and superfluities unsparingly pruned (which would reduce the work to about one-fourth of its present size), we would consider it as an accession of some value to English literature.

MISCELLANY.

ON NEGLECTING THE PRACTICE OF DRINKING HEALTH AT TABLE.

Tardē Cyathos mihi das; cedō sanē: benē mihi; benē vobis. PLAUTUS.

SIR,

I lately addressed to you a few observations on the omission of grace at table; and I now beg leave to add some remarks on another omission, which fashion seems to recommend, but which is countenanced neither by the examples of the ancients, nor by reason, nor by a sense of propriety. I observed, on my visit to my old friend in London, that the friendly practice of drinking health at dinner was, in most of the fashionable families, very much on the decline, and in many, totally omitted. Indeed the omission arises from a principle which seems very much to prevail in the present age, and which aims at the abolition of all forms and ceremonies, as meaning nothing, and at the same time giving trouble and excluding ease. Forms and ceremonies undoubtedly have their utility, or they would not have been universally retained in every age and nation, which history has recorded. But allowing some forms to be without meaning, I cannot suppose, unless I throw a severer reflection on the friendship and hospitality of modern times than I chuse, that the drinking of health is, without exception, a senseless and empty ceremony. A man of a warm and a friendly heart usually feels a sentiment of cordial kindness, when he holds the cup of refreshment in his hand, and wishes health and happiness to his friends, who are partaking with him, of the same innocent and necessary pleasure.

The custom prevailed among the Greeks, who carried the elegance which they displayed in the polite arts to the table and social circle, assembled to enjoy the pleasures of the palate and of discourse. Homer, indeed, has given the model in the first book of the Iliad, who says of the gods at their feast,

Χρυσίος δ' ἀπείσσει
Διδοίχαι ἄλλήλους.

The manner of drinking to each other resembled what is called among us pledging. The person who drank to his friend was said προπίνειν, or to drink first. He drank a part of the cup, and then handed the rest to the friend whom he had named. The words which passed on the occasion were προτίμω σοι χαλκός, to which the person saluted, λαμβάνω ἀπὸ σου πῆρας, which may be thus freely translated: I have the honor to drink to you—I pledge you with pleasure.

It was also the custom, after due respect paid to the gods, to drink to absent friends; and, as an emblem of sincerity, it was established as a law never to dilute the wine drunk on this occasion.

I shall not trouble you with various proofs that the custom of drinking health is justified by the example of the politest people of antiquity. It would be easy to collect them from the writers on antiquities; but the instance alledged is sufficient for my purpose, and will serve to confute those, who hint that the custom is unpolite.

There is surely something peculiarly brutal in sitting down to meals without ever thinking of God or man; in neglecting the grace, and omitting the form of wishing health and happiness to those who sit at the same table. We have seen that it is contrary to the practice of antiquity, and of almost all people in the world, who, though they varied in the forms of the table, agreed in the essential points, in giving glory to God on high, and testifying good-will towards men.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CONRAD'S EDITION OF GOLDSMITH'S CITIZEN OF THE WORLD.

Having, in a late paper, mentioned, with approbation, the new and improved edition of Goldsmith's essays, published by Mess. Conrads, we are happy to have so early an opportunity, to notice The Citizen of the World, now, for the first time, republished from a correct copy. Perhaps no portion of Goldsmith's works has been more deformed by the errors of typography, and the blunders of ignorance, than The Citizen of the World, as it is found in Parsons's edition. Whole sentences are omitted, paragraphs transposed, and the author's meaning confounded and polluted by every species of depravation. The text, originally printed in haste, in the Public Ledger, was never scrupulously regulated, until the complete edition of Goldsmith's works was undertaken in the year 1803.

These delightful volumes, replete with entertainment, and presenting excellent models of a style, familiar, but not mean, and easy, without negligence, are now published in a neat and commodious style. The Editor recommends these amusing essays to the juvenile American. By studying them with assiduity, he will gradually purify himself from Indian barbarisms, and democratic jargon.

THE EDINBURG REVIEW.

This elaborate and sprightly Journal, which more than once, we have had reason to commend in no vulgar strain of hackneyed flattery, is, agreeably to information, derived from the Editors themselves, conducted upon a principle of Selection: it takes no notice of insignificant works, but enters very fully into the discussion of those, that seem entitled to attention. Combining in some manner the representative functions of a Review, with the independence of original discussion; comprehending every foreign publication, which an extensive continental correspondence can procure; and distinguished by an impartiality, which no party-zeal has yet pretended to call in question; it lays claim to the support of those, who are not satisfied with the indolent and indiscriminating profusion of other Journals.

The Editors were silent upon these pretensions, till they saw how the public was likely to receive them. Their success has been much beyond their expectation, and, they believe, beyond any former example. In spite of the size of their volume, the remoteness of their situation, and all the disadvantages of inexperience, they were enabled, even in their second number, to equal the circulation of several of the established Journals of the metropolis; and they have been convinced, by the constant increase of the demand, that, to secure the patronage of the public, it is only necessary to deserve it, by a diligent and conscientious discharge of their duty.

In this and the preceding Port Folio, we have copied from this new Journal, a most acute, witty, and well-deserved censure of that enormous excrescence of literature, Godwin's Life of Chaucer.

THOMAS CAMPBELL, author of the Pleasures of Hope, is writing at London an Allegorical Poem, illustrative of a series of designs, by one of the Princesses. The subject is Cupid turned Volunteer.

SOUTHEY is engaged on a History of Portugal.

WALTER SCOTT, editor of the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, and writer of several spirited Poems, is about to publish a Poetical Romance, called the Lady of the Minstrel.

* For dreden.

The Life and Pontificate of LEO the TENTH, is soon to be expected from Mr. ROSCOE, the elegant and learned historian of Lorenzo the Magnificent.

The Rev. Mr. BOWLES is very forward with a new edition of the Works of POPE. Notwithstanding all the various editions of this author, his works yet stand in need of much contemporary illustration.

The Works of Dr. JORTIN are in the press: he was a pious and respectable member of the Church, whose writings are a valuable addition to British Literature.

Mr. MITFORD is about to present to the public an interesting work on the Harmony of Language.

There is also in great forwardness for the press, a new and enlarged edition of that useful work, the General Biographical Dictionary.

We are happy to learn that Mr. Gifford is employed in writing a Life of Buonaparte.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In the character of Gen. HAMILTON integrity of heart and intellectual ability were combined in a degree singularly remarkable. DRYDEN has portrayed such a statesman, and has boldly contrasted the spirit and frankness of a man of real talents and courage, with those loathsome and paltry devices, practiced by such mountebank politicians, as affairs are cursed with in every democratic country.

While emp'ric politicians use deceit,
Hide what they give, and cure but by a cheat,
He BOLDLY SHEW'D THAT SKILL which they pretend,
And work'd by means AS NOBLE AS THE END.

THE SHRINE—By T. Moore, Esq. To —

My fates had destin'd me to rove
A long, long pilgrimage of love,
And many an altar on my way
Had lur'd my pious steps to stay:
For, if the saint was young and fair,
I turn'd and sang my vespers there.
This, from a youthful pilgrim's fire,
Is what your pretty saints require;
To pass, nor tell a single bead
With them would be profane indeed!
But, trust me, all this young devotion
Was but to keep my zeal in motion;
And, every bumbler altar past,
I now have reach'd the SHRINE as last.

The celebrated lady Harrington was more remarkable for her love of play than her love of virtue. George Colman wrote the following epigram upon this eccentric lady:

What though I hold of trumps a flush,
And boast a friend in Pam?
Yet I can own without a blush,
That I the loser am.

Alas! this happens every day,
And is each night renew'd:
For who with Harrington can play
And fail of being Loo'd.

The character of a noted political trimmer and changeable demagogue, of this city, is happily and exactly hit off in the following lines:

O thou, whom all the zephyrs court,
Who lov'st with every breeze to play,
Changing,
Raging,
Whirling,
Twirling,

Veering a thousand times a day.

A very general apprehension begins at length to prevail throughout the kingdom on the subject of the invasion; namely, the apprehension that it will not take place. Lon. pap.

The Lord's Supper; a Sketch, by B. WEST, R. A. This is the original design of the great picture in the Collegiate Church, Windsor, and is in itself a most admirable production. We have often had occasion to observe of Mr. West's sketches, that they are in general superior to his finished pictures, and perhaps in no one instance was the observation more true than in that before us. As a composition it is a perfect study, which, any attempt to finish, would have robbed of its chief excellence, namely its masterly freedom of outline. [Lon. pap.]

LINES WRITTEN ON A HERMITAGE, IN NITHSDALE.

[From vol. ii. of Burns' Works.]

Thou whom chance may hither lead,
Be thou clad in russet weed,
Be thou deck'd in silken stole
Grave these maxims on thy soul.
Life is but a day at most,
Sprung from night, in darkness lost:
Hope not sunshine every hour:
Fear not clouds will ever lour
Happiness is but a name;
Make content and ease thy aim.
Ambition is a meteor gleam;
Fame an idle, restless dream,
Peace, the tenderest flower of spring;
Pleasures, insects on the wing.
Those that sip the dew alone,
Make the butterflies thy own;
Those that would the bloom devour,
Crush the locusts, save the flower
For the future be prepar'd,
Guard, wherever thou canst guard;
But, thy utmost duly done,
Welcome what thou canst not shun.
Follies past give thou to air
Make their consequence thy care;
Keep the name of man in mind,
And dishonor not thy kind,
Reverence with lowly heart,
Him, whose wondrous work thou art.
Keep his goodness still in view,
Thy trust and thy example too
Stranger, go! heaven be thy guide
Quoth the Beadsman of Nith-side.

The English ladies are informed, by a perfumer, that the much esteemed composition, first compounded for the use of the unfortunate Antoniette, and only used by her during her reign, now stands totally unrivalled in its power of removing superfluous hairs, without the least disagreeable sensation, and leaves the skin clear and white, and free from those blemishes on nature's work. It seems that, by the art of perfumers, painters, &c. a woman can now make and unmake herself at pleasure, and

'Seated on a three legg'd chair,
Take off her artificial hair,
Or, picking out a chrystal eye,
May wipe it clean, and lay it by.'

.....In the present age we should scarcely dream that a serious advertisement like the following, should appear in the Morning Chronicle. 'Mrs. Williams, who formerly studied astrology, is returned to town, and vends her Batavian tincture for nervous disorders, &c.' This lady, like the Sidrophel of Butler, if thus skilled in the science of the stars, can easily

'Cure warts and corns by application
Of medicines to the imagination,
Know whatsoever's to be known,
But much more than she knows, can own,
What medicine 'twas that Paracelsus
Could make a man with, as he tells us,
When men may eat and drink their fill
And then be temperate if they will,
When use, and when abstain from vice,
Figs, grapes, phlebotomy and spice.'

Most men are governed by custom or authority, not one in ten thousand thinks for himself; and those few who have courage enough to reject the force of either, dare not act up to their freedom, for fear of incurring the censure of singularity.

ORIGINAL POETRY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Lines written after the departure of T. MOORE, Esq. from Philadelphia.

How oft have I seen, at the first blush of morning,
The wretch, to whose eye-lids repose were a treasure,
Turn, sad, on his pillow, and snatch a short slumber,
As fancy, the while, wove her visions of pleasure.

And then in his light-dreams, all fleeting as showers,
That kiss the new grass, in the morning of spring,
His fair one would smile, as he sigh'd all his passion
And, blushing, receive from his fingers the ring.

At a moment like this, the bright vision would vanish!
In vain would he woo the soft god back again,
The dream of his fancy had gone, and he sigh'd
That pleasure should fly from the footsteps of pain.

Thus to me, youthful stranger! (whom fate has permitted,
To charm us, from friends and from country to roam,) Thyself wert the vision, that fitted before me,
That stole to my bosom, and made it a home.

But the rainbow of evening can linger not long,
Its mellow tints fade, and we watch it in vain,
And the rose bud, that blooms in the morning of May,
Soon loses its sweets—but its thorns still remain.

And yet, if kind mem'ry be doom'd to revive
In me the impressions, affection has wore,
I shall woo her to visit me oft, for I know
She will shew in, my day-dreams, the image of MOORE. JAQUES.

[While our right witty, and dearly beloved, the TRANSLATOR of ANACREON, was delighting a festive group with sentiment and song, the following complimentary verses, written for the occasion, were sung by one of our sweetest minstrels. The company was indebted for the composition to our entertainer, a gentleman of this city, whose wit is as bright as his wine, and whose powers of entertainment are not confined to the banquet he spreads.]

SONG.

As Jove in good humour was taking his glass,
And lounging at ease, in his vast wicker chair;
His cronies delighted the red goblet pass,
And music and merriment ring through the air.

While jesting and laughter and song were in turn,
And all strove to heighten the general mirth;
Jove bellow'd aloud—'What is that I discern?'
And instantly added—'Why there goes the earth.'

All ran to the window to see us glide by;
Then seated again, the chat fell upon men—
Morus talk'd of the days, when Joy liv'd in the eye,
And said we should never see such days again.

'And why may they not?' jolly Bacchus replied,
'Let Jupiter send them ANACREON down;
His name is remember'd with honor and pride,
His presence will give to the world new renown.'

The Gods all agree—'tis an excellent thought,
And second the motion, by Bacchus thus made;
But Jupiter set their opinions at naught
And thus the great King of the Gods gravely said.

'I love well these mortals, though sometimes they err,
And blessings abundant upon them will pour;
The promise thus made, not an instant defer,
You ask for ANACREON, but I will give MOORE.

REUBEN AND ROSE,

A Tale of Romance,

BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

The darkness, which hung upon Willumberg's walls,
Has long been remember'd with awe and dismay;
For years, not a sunbeam has play'd in its halls,
And it seem'd, as shut out from the regions of
day!

Though the vallies were brighten'd by many a beam,
Yet none could the woods of the castle illumine;
And the lightning which flash'd on the neighbouring stream,
Flew back, as if fearing to enter the gloom!

'Oh! when shall this horrible darkness disperse?'
Said Willumberg's lord to the seer of the cave;
'It ne'er can dispel,' said the wizard of verse,
'Till the bright star of chivalry's sunk in the wave!'

And who was the bright star of chivalry then?
Who could be but Reuben, the flower of the age!
For Reuben was first in the combat of men, Though youth had scarce written his name on her page.

For Willumberg's daughter his bosom had beat,
For Rose, who was bright as the spirit of dawn,
When with wand dropping diamonds, and silvery feet,
It walks o'er the flowers of the mountain and lawn.

Must Rose, then, from Reuben so fatally sever?
Sad, sad were the words of the man in the cave,
That darkness should cover the castle forever,
Or Reuben be sunk in the merciless wave!

She flew to the wizard—'And tell me, oh! tell,
Shall my Reuben no more be restor'd to my eyes?'
'Yes, yes,—when a spirit shall toll the great bell
Of the mouldering abbey, your Reuben shall rise!'

Twice, thrice he repeated 'Your Reuben shall rise,'
And Rose felt a moment's relief from her pain;
She wip'd, while she listen'd, the tear from her
eyes,
And hop'd she might yet see her hero again!

Her hero could smile at the terrors of death,
When he felt that he died for the sire of his Rose;
To the Oder he flew, and there plunging beneath,
In the lapse of the billows soon found his repose.

How strangely the order of destiny falls!
Not long in the waters the warrior lay,

When a sunbeam was seen to glance over the
walls,
And the castle of Willumberg bask'd in the day.

All, all but the soul of the maid was in light,
There sorrow and terror lay gloomy and blank:
Two days did she wander and all the long night,
In quest of her love, on the wide river's bank.

Oft, oft did she pause for the toll of the bell,
And she heard but the breathings of night in the air;
Long, long did she gaze on the watery swell,
And she saw but the foam of the white billow
there.

And often as midnight its veil would undraw,
As she look'd at the light of the moon in the stream,
She thought 'twas his helmet of silver she saw,
As the curl of the surge glitter'd high in the beam.

And now the third night was begemming the
sky,
Poor Rose on the cold dewy margent reclin'd,
There wept till the tear almost froze in her eye,
When hark! 'twas the bell that came deep in the wind!

She startled, and saw, through the glimmering
shade,
A form o'er the waters in majesty glide;
She knew 'twas her love, though his cheek was decay'd,
And his helmet of silver was wash'd by the tide.

Was this what the seer of the cave had foretold?
Dim, dim through the phantom the moon shot
a gleam;
'Twas Reuben, but ah! he was deathly and cold,
And fled away like the spell of a dream!

Twice, thrice did he rise, and as often she thought
From the bank to embrace him, but never, ah!
never!
Then springing beneath, at a billow she caught,
And sunk to repose on its bosom for ever!

MR. EDITOR!

Happening some time ago to take up a French book of the Old School, entitled, Le Comte de Valmont, ou les Egaremens de la Raison, I came to the en-

ble to a certain great Philosopher of this country, that I could not resist the temptation of enclosing a copy of them to you for your inspection. If you can obtain a liberal translation of them, or think them worthy of Philosophe! il s'en donne le nom,

Comme tous ces Messieurs, qui fiers de leur raison,
Se croyant appelés à reformer la terre,
A tous les préjugés ont déclaré la guerre.
Petits pedans obscurs qui pensent à la fois
Eclairer l'univers et régenter les rois;
Fanatiques d'orgueil, dont la folle manie
Est de se croire un droit exclusif au génie;
Flatteurs en affichant le mépris des grandeurs;
De tout ce qu'on revêt audacieux frondeurs;
Pleins de crédulité pour des faits ridicules,*
Et sur tout autre objet sottement incrédules;
Pensant que rien n'échappe à leurs yeux péné-

Prechant la tolérance, et très intolérans;
Qui sur un tribunal érigé par eux mêmes,
Jugent tous les talens, en arbitres suprêmes;
De quiconque les flatte orgueilleux protecteurs;
De quiconque les brave ardens persecuteurs:

Hast thou not seen, as fell the vernal shower,
The glistening drops down some fair lily pour!
Or the clear dews just trickling down the thorn.
What time cool breezes blew, the breath of

When Ligurina weeps so bright, so clear,
Steals from her pensive eye the pearly tear,
And as adown her lovely cheek it flows
With Cupid's fiercest flame my bosom glows!

SELECTED POETRY.

ELEGANT EXTRACT FROM THE LATIN OF CARDINAL BEMBO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

As you devote a portion of the Port Folio to 'Selected
Poetry,' permit me to recommend the following Verses to your attention. POLITIAN has left an unfinished Monody on the death of his friend and patron, Lorenzo de Medeci. It was the belief of the day that Politian died in the actual composition of this monody. The celebrated Cardinal Bembo taking advantage of this circumstance, in the following eleegiac lines represents Politian as 'attempting, by the power of music, to revoke the fatal decree which had deprived him of his friend.' The whole elegy presents to the mind, with uncommon accuracy, a complete and entire picture, which the pencil might easily delineate. The original is in Latin. the translation by Roscoe.

Whilst, borne in sable state, LORENZO's bier,
The tyrant death, his proudest triumph brings
He mark'd a bard in agony severe,
Smote with delirious hand the sounding strings.

He stopp'd—he gaz'd—the storm of passion rag'd
And prayers with tears were mingled, tears with grief;
For lost LORENZO, war with fate he wag'd,
And every God was call'd to bring relief.

The tyrant smil'd—and, mindful of the hour
When from the shades his consort Orpheus led,
'Rebellious too wouldst thou usurp my power,
And burst the chain, that binds the captive dead.'

He spoke! and speaking, launch'd the shaft of fate,
And clos'd the lips that glow'd with sacred fire;
His timeless doom 'twas thus POLITIAN met,
POLITIAN, master of th' Ausonian lyre.

EPIGRAM.

[The following Epigram from the 'Reporter,' is in the pointed style of the classic Anthologia.]

Once, at a masquerade, a painted fair
Was wand'ring o'er the rooms in piteous case:
'I've lost my mask,' she cry'd with mournful air:
'No!' said a friend—'you have it on your face.'

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM THE GREAT EARL OF CHATHAM.

[The topic of EDUCATION, hackneyed as it has become, is still so momentous and so interesting, whenever brilliant light is shed upon it, by the lamp of wisdom and experience, that the Editor of the Port Folio would be careless of one of the essential objects of his Miscellany, if he did not always, with eagerness communicate to the public whatever is calculated to invigorate the mental powers. Among the various volumes on this subject from Milton's Tractate to Locke's Treatise and Dr. Knox's admirable system, none is more replete with wisdom, goodness, and every just, generous, and magnanimous sentiment, than a collection of letters, just published under the superintendence of Lord GRENVILLE, and with the concurrence of the right honorable William Pitt, the present Premier of Great-Britain, from the celebrated CHATHAM to his Nephew. These excellent epistles were addressed to Thomas Pitt, while at the university of Cambridge; and they exhibit the most lucid proofs of the warmth of their eloquent author's heart, and the soundness of his head. They have for their noble object the formation of a CLASSICAL SCHOLAR, a Beauclerc, with the spirit of a cavalier, the learning of Sir William Jones, the integrity of a Sully, the generosity of a Henry IV, and the piety of a primitive christian. The Editor most fervently hopes that they may become imprinted on the memory of every studious youth in America. They will not, it is true, teach the Way to Wealth by the rules of an exciseman's arithmetic, or a pedlar's economy. They will not prepare the youthful mind for Atheism or Fanaticism. On schemes of swindling, they lay no stress, nor do they explode the classical discipline, as the deformity of a monkish age. But all readers, who have not forgotten their ANCESTORS, all who can taste and relish the sweetness of the ancient page, all to whom honour is a habit, and who estimate wisdom and nobleness of mind of higher worth, than wild land, or stock in the Bank of the United States, will peruse and follow the advice of a CHATHAM. May its influence pervade my country, that our sons may be as plants, grown up in their youth, and their manners polished after the similitude of a PALACE.]

LETTERS FROM THE EARL OF CHATHAM TO HIS NEPHEW.

THE EDITOR'S PREFACE.

The following letters were addressed by the late Lord Chatham to his nephew Mr. Pitt (afterwards Lord Camelford) then at Cambridge. They are few in number, written for the private use of an individual during a short period of time, and containing only such detached observations on the extensive subjects to which they relate, as occasion might happen to suggest, in the course of familiar correspondence. Yet even these imperfect remains will undoubtedly be received by the public with no common interest, as well from their own intrinsic value, as from the picture, which they display of the character of their author. The editor's wish to do honour to the memory both of the person by whom they were written, and of him to whom they were addressed, would alone have rendered him desirous of making these papers public. But he feels a much higher motive, in the hope of promoting, by such a publication, the inseparable interests of learning, virtue, and religion. By the writers of that school, whose philosophy consists in the degradation of virtue, it has often been triumphantly declared, that no excellence of character can stand the test of close observation; that no man is a hero to his domestic servants, or to his familiar friends. How much more just, as well as more amiable and dignified, is the opposite sentiment, delivered to us in the words of Plutarch, and illustrated throughout all his writings! 'Real virtue,' says that inimitable moralist, 'is most loved, where it is most nearly seen: and no respect which it commands from strangers, can equal the never-ceasing admiration it excites in the daily intercourse of domestic life.' Τῆς ἀληθινῆς ἀρετῆς καλλίστη φάνηται τὰ μέγιστα φαινόμενα καὶ τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἀνδρῶν ἐνδὴ οὐκ ἀνυμνεῖται τοῖς ἱσθίοις, ὡς ἡ καὶ ἡμεῖς βίος τοῖς συνόντι.

PLUT. VIT. PERICLIS.

The following correspondence, imperfect as it is, (and who will not lament that many more such letters are not preserved?) exhibits a great orator, statesman and patriot, in one of the most interesting relations of private society. Not, as in the cabinet or senate, enforcing by a vigorous and commanding eloquence, those councils to which his country owed her pre-eminence and glory; but implanting with parental kindness into the mind of an ingenuous youth, seeds of wisdom and virtue, which ripened into full maturity in the character of a most accomplished man: directing him to the acquisition of knowledge,* as the best instrument of action; teaching him by the cultivation of his reason, to strengthen and establish in his heart those principles of moral rectitude which were congenial to it; and, above all, exhorting him to regulate the whole conduct of his life by the predominant influence of gratitude, and obedience to God, as the only sure groundwork of every human duty!

What parent, anxious for the character and success of a son, born to any liberal station in this great and free country, would not, in all that related to his education, gladly have resorted to the advice of such a man? What youthful spirit, animated by any desire of future excellence, and looking for the gratification of that desire, in the pursuits of honorable ambition, or in the conscientiousness of an upright, active, and useful life, would not embrace with transport any opportunity of listening on such a subject to the lessons of Lord Chatham? They are here before him. Not delivered with the authority of a preceptor, or a parent, but tempered by the affection of a friend towards a disposition and character well entitled to such regard.

On that disposition and character the editor forbears to enlarge. Their best panegyric will be found in the following pages. Lord Camelford is there described such as Lord Chatham judged him in the first dawn of his youth, and such as he continued to his latest hour. The same snavity of manners, and steadiness of principle, the same correctness of judgment, and integrity of heart, distinguished him through life; and the same affectionate attachment from those who knew him best has followed him beyond the grave.

* Ingenium illustre altioribus studiis juvenis admodum dedit; non ut nomine magnifico segne otium velaret, sed quo firmiter adversus fortuita Mem publicam capesseret.

Quæ Gratia vivo—

—Eadem sequitur tellure repōstum!

Of the course of study which these letters recommend, little can be necessary to be said by their editor. He is however anxious that a publication, calculated to produce extensive benefit, should not in any single point mislead even the most superficial reader: nor would he, with all the deference which he owes to the authority of Lord Chatham, willingly appear to concur in the recommendation or censure of any works, on which his own judgment is materially different from that, which he is now the instrument of delivering to the world.

It will be obvious to every reader on the slightest perusal of the following letters, that they were never intended to comprize a perfect system of education, even for the short portion of time to which they relate. Many points in which they will be found deficient, were undoubtedly supplied by frequent opportunities of personal intercourse, and much was left to the general rules of study established at an English university. Still less therefore should the temporary advice addressed to an individual, whose previous education had laboured under some disadvantage, be understood as a general dissuasive from the cultivation of Grecian literature. The sentiments of Lord Chatham were in direct opposition to any such opinion. The manner in which, even in these letters, he speaks of the first of poets, and the greatest of orators; and the stress which he lays on the benefits to be derived from their immortal works, could leave no doubt of his judgment on this important point. That judgment was afterwards most unequivocally manifested, when he was called upon to consider the question with a still higher interest, not only as a friend and guardian, but also as a father.

A diligent study of the poetry, the history, the eloquence, and the philosophy of Greece, an intimate acquaintance with those writings which have been the admiration of every age, and the models of all succeeding excellence, would undoubtedly have been considered by him as an essential part of any general plan for the education of an English gentleman, born to share in the councils of his country. Such a plan must also have comprized a much higher progress, than is here traced out, in mathematics, in the science of reason, in natural,* and in moral philosophy;

* A passage has been quoted above from the Life of Pericles. The editor cannot refrain from once more referring his reader to the same beautiful work, for the description of the benefits which that great statesman derived from the study of natural philosophy.

The lessons of Anaxagoras, says our author, gave elevation to his soul, and sublimity to his eloquence; they diffused over the whole tenor of his life a temperate and majestic grandeur; taught him to raise his thoughts from the works of nature to the contemplation of that Perfect and Pure Intelligence from which they originate; and, (as Plutarch expresses it, in words that might best describe a Christian philosopher) insilled into his mind, instead of the dark and fearful superstition of his times, that piety which is confirmed by Reason and animated by Hope: ἀντὶ τῆς φεβερῆς καὶ φαινεύουσας διανοουμένης τῆς ἀσφαλῆς καὶ ἐλπίδος ἀγαθῶν ἐνδείκναι ἐντολή.

including in the latter the proofs and doctrines of that revelation, by which it has been perfected. Nor would the work have been considered by him as finished, until on these foundations there had been built an accurate knowledge of the origin, nature, and safeguards of government and civil liberty; of the principles of public and municipal law; and of the theory of political, commercial, financial, and military administration; as resulting from the investigation of philosophy, and as exemplified in the lessons both of ancient and of modern history.

I call that, says Milton, 'a complete and generous education, which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously, all the offices, both public and private, of peace and war.'

This is the purpose to which all knowledge is subordinate; the test of all intellectual and all moral excellence. It is the end to which the lessons of Lord Chatham are uniformly directed. May they contribute to promote and encourage its pursuit! Recommended, as they must be, to the heart of every reader, by their warmth of sentiment and eloquence of language; deriving additional weight from the affectionate interest, by which they were dictated; and most of all enforced by the influence of his own great example, and by the authority of his venerable name.

Dropmore, Dec. 3, 1803.

LETTER I.

MY DEAR CHILD,

I am extremely pleased with your translation now it is writ over fair. It is very close to the sense of the original, and done, in many places, with much spirit, as well as the numbers not lame, or rough. However, an attention to Mr. Pope's numbers will make you avoid some ill sounds, and hobbling of the verse, by only transposing a word or two, in many instances. I have, upon reading the Eclogue over again, altered the third, fourth, and fifth lines, in order to bring them nearer to the Latin, as well as to render some beauty which is contained in the repetition of words in tender passages; for example, Nos Patriæ fines, et dulcia linquimus arva, Nos Patriam fugimus. Tu Thyre lentus in umbrâ Formosam resonare doces Amarvillida Sylvas. We leave our native land, these fields so sweet, Our country leave: At ease, in cool retreat, You Thyrsis bid the woods fair Daphne's name repeat. I will desire you to write over another copy with this alteration, and also to write smooaks in the plural number, in the last line but one. You give me great pleasure, my dear child, in the progress you have made. I will recommend to Mr. Leach to carry you quite through Virgil's Æneid from beginning to ending. Pray shew him this letter, with my service to him, and thanks for his care of you. For English poetry, I recommend Pope's translation of Homer, and Dryden's Fables in particular. I am not sure, if they are not called Tales instead of Fables. Your cousin, whom I am sure you can overtake, if you will, has read Virgil's Æneid quite through, and much of Horace's Epistles. Terence's plays I would also desire Mr. Leach to make you perfect master of. Your cousin has read them all. Go on my dear, and you will at least equal him. You are so good that I have nothing to wish but that you may be directed to proper books; and I trust to your spirit, and desire to be praised for things that deserve praise, for the figure you will hereafter make. God bless you, my dear child.

Your most affectionate uncle.

LETTER II.

Bath, October 12, 1751.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

As I have been moving about from place to place, your letter reached me here, at Bath; but very lately, after making a considerable circuit to find me. I should have otherwise, my dear child, returned you thanks for the very great pleasure you have given me, long before now. The very good account you give me of your studies, and that delivered in very good Latin, for your time, has filled me with the highest expectation of your future improvements: I see the foundations so well laid, that I do not make the least doubt you will become a perfect good scholar; and have the pleasure and applause that will attend the several advantages hereafter, in the future course of your life, that you can only acquire now by your emulation and noble labours in the pursuit of learning, and of every acquirement that is to make you superior to other gentlemen. I rejoice to hear that you have begun Homer's Iliad; and have made so great a progress in Virgil. I hope you taste and love those authors particularly. You cannot read them too much: they are not only the two greatest poets, but they contain the finest lessons for your age to imbibe: lessons of honour, courage, disinterestedness, love of truth, command of temper, gentleness of behaviour, humanity, and in one word, virtue in its true signification. Go on, my dear nephew, and drink as deep as you can of these divine springs: the pleasure of the draught is equal at least to the prodigious advantages of it to the heart and morals. I hope you will drink them as somebody does in Virgil, of another sort of cup: Ille Impiger hausit spumantem Pateram.

I shall be highly pleased to hear from you, and to know what authors give you most pleasure. I desire my service to Mr. Leech: pray tell him I will write to him soon about your studies.

I am, with the greatest affection,

My dear child,

Your loving uncle.

LETTER III.

Bath, January 12, 1754.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

Your letter from Cambridge affords me many very sensible pleasures: first, that you are at last in a proper place for study and improvement, instead of losing any more of that most precious thing, time, in London. In the next place that you seem pleased with the particular society you are placed in, and with the gentleman to whose care and instructions you are committed: and above all I applaud the sound, right sense, and love of virtue, which appears through your whole letter. You are already possessed of the true clue to guide you through this dangerous and perplexing part of your life's journey, the years of education; and upon which, the complexion of all the rest of your days will infallibly depend: I say you have the true clue to guide you, in the maxim you lay down in your letter to me, namely, that the use of learning is, to render a man more wise and virtuous; not merely to make him more learned. Macte tuâ Virtute: Go on, my dear boy, by this golden rule, and you cannot fail to become every thing your generous heart prompts you to wish to be, and that mine most affectionately wishes for you. There is but one danger in your way; and that is, perhaps, natural enough to your age, love of pleasure, or the fear of close application and laborious diligence. With the last there is nothing you may not conquer: and the first is sure to conquer and enslave whoever does not strenuously and generously resist the first allurements of it, lest by small indulgencies, he fall under the yoke of irresistible Vitanda est Improbâ Siren, Desidia, I dare say may be affixt to the curtains of your bed, and to the walls of your chambers. If you do not rise early, you never can make any progress worth talking of; and another rule is, if you do not set apart your hours of reading, and never suffer yourself or any one else to break in upon them, your days will slip through your hands, unprofitably and frivolously; unpraised by all you wish to please, and really unenjoyable to yourself. Be assured, whatever you take from pleasure, amusements, or indolence, for these first few years of your life, will repay you a hundred fold, in the pleasures, honours, and advantages of all the remainder of your days. My heart is so full of the most earnest desire that you should do well, that I find my letter has run into some length, which you will, I know, be so good to excuse. There remains now nothing to trouble you with but a little plan for the beginning of your studies, which I desire, in a particular manner, may be exactly followed in every tittle. You are to qualify yourself for the part in society, to which your birth and estate call you. You are to be a gentleman of such learning and qualifications as may distinguish you in the service of your country hereafter; not a pedant, who reads only to be called learned, instead of considering learning as an instrument only for action. Give me leave, therefore, my dear nephew, who have gone before you, to point out to you the dangers in your road; to guard you against such things, as I experience my own defects to arise from; and at the same time, if I have had any little successes in the world, to guide you to what I have drawn many helps from. I have not the pleasure of knowing the gentleman who is your tutor, but I dare say he is every way equal to such a charge, which I think no small one. You will communicate this letter to him, and I hope he will be so good to concur with me, as to the course of study I desire you may begin with; and that such books, and such only, as I have pointed out, may be read. They are as follows: Euclid; a course of Logic; a course of experimental Philosophy; Locke's Conduct of the Understanding; his Treatise on Government, and Letters on Toleration. I desire, for the present, no books of poetry, but Horace and Virgil: of Horace the Odes, but above all, the Epistles and Ars Poetica. These parts, Nocturnâ versate manu, versate diurnâ. Tully de Officiis, de Amicitia, de Senectute. His Catilinarian Orations and Philippics. Sallust. At leisure hours, an abridgment of the History of England to be run through in order to settle in the mind a general chronological order and series of principal events, and succession of kings; proper books of English history, on the true principles of our happy constitution, shall be pointed out afterwards. Burnet's History of the Reformation, abridged by himself, to be read with great care. Father Paul on beneficiary Matters, in English. A French master, and only Moliere's Plays to be read with him, or by yourself, till you have gone through them all. Spectators, especially Mr. Addison's papers, to be read very frequently at broken times in your room. I make it my request that you will forbear drawing, totally, while you are at Cambridge: and not meddle with Greek, otherwise than to know a little the etymology of words in Latin, or English, or French: nor to meddle with Italian. I hope this little course will soon be run through: I intend it as a general foundation for many things, of infinite utility, to come as soon as this is finished.

Believe me,

With the truest affection,

My dear nephew,

Ever yours.

Keep this letter and read it again.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

Of the other Harangues of Cicero.

This single extract, among so many others, would be sufficient to make us feel all the flexibility of the talents of Cicero. It was necessary to throw out of the balance of justice, the weight, which such a name as that of Cato might have in it. He dares to employ ridicule against it; but, if he had not known, how to blunt the point of it, they would not have tolerated him, in making use of it against a man so revered. The cause of Cato would have become that of all honest men, and even of those, who were not such: for, when virtue is generally acknowledged, even those, who love it not, would have it respected: this is a homage, which costs but little, and engages to nothing. With what ability, with what address, he separates the person of Cato, from his doctrines! how he sports gently with one, without weakening in any thing the veneration, which was due to the other! his strokes, in falling on the stoicism of Cato, never reach him; it is, in overwhelming him with panegyrics, that he takes away from him, without being perceived, all the authority of his opinion. For, from the moment that he succeeded in rousing a smile, without offending him, gravity lost all its power; there was no longer any room for it. Accordingly, Cato himself could not preserve his own; he could not himself refrain from smiling, at the portrait which Cicero drew of the stoical rigour; and, half laughing and half scolding, he said, on going out of the audience: In truth, we have a very merry consul.

They were such morsels as these, by which the orator moderated, as far as he could, the austerity of judiciary discussions; they were this sort of episodes, always happily placed, which relaxed the judges, from the fatigues of the quarrels at the bar, the bitterness of juridical controversies, and the bawlings of the advocates. It was this that rendered the eloquence of Cicero so agreeable to the Romans, and caused to be collected with so much avidity, all his harangues, as soon as he had pronounced them. No man ever possessed, in the same degree, the art of diffusing charms over matters of the driest nature; and the true criterion of superiority, is, to be able thus to render himself master of every subject, and to know, in treating of all the varieties, how to seize the tone and the measure of all.

He practiced the same skill again, in pleading the cause of Archias, a celebrated Greek poet, whose title, as a Roman citizen, was very improperly contested. He was born at Antioch; but he had received the rights of a citizen at Heraclea, an allied city, which enjoyed the privileges of Roman citizenship. The archives of this city had been burnt in the time of the social war; and eight and twenty years afterwards, one Gracius, an enemy of Archias, would turn against him this accident, which deprived him of the proof of his title. Fortunately he had in his favour the testimony of Lucullus, whose protection had procured him this favour from the inhabitants of Heraclea. He was defended by Cicero; and the orator informs us, in his exordium, of the rights, which the poet had to his friendship, and even to his gratitude. It is a general observation, that Cicero, in every cause he argues, commences, by establishing the personal motives, which determined him to espouse it; and the pains he takes, in laying the foundation well, prove, that independently of the cause itself, there were other individual proprieties to be observed, that he might undertake, with general approbation, the part of an accuser, or a defender. It was, for men of consideration, a public function, frequently connected with the interest of the state, very different from that croud of little private law-suits, which the orators of reputation, and the men in office, abandoned to subaltern advocates, to those, who are designated in Latin by a word, which signifies, pleaders of causes, causidici. The prosecution of Archias, seemed to be of this last description. It presented only the discussion of a simple fact, which depended, chiefly, on the evidence of testimony, and required only a few minutes of discussion. The discourse of Cicero is not more, than the reading of half an hour, and the fact itself, occupies less than four pages. The rest is an eulogium on poetry and letters, the advantages and pleasures to be derived from them, and the honours, which are due to them. It seems, that Cicero, who, every where, makes profession of an extreme love of poetry, and of those who cultivate it, must have been very happy, to have such an opportunity of presenting them his homage. It was very flattering to Archias, to undertake his defence. We shall soon see, that this conduct does no less honour to the character of Cicero, than to the merit of his client.

The distance, between a Roman consul and a Greek poet, was very great, and the causes demanded not the efforts of an orator. Accordingly, the harangue has scarcely any thing in common with those of the judiciary kind. It resembles much more the demonstrative; and, after having seen Cicero in the sublime and the simple, I have chosen this morsel, as an example of that tempered style, which is characterised by grace, by sweetness, and embellishment.

"If I have any talents, Judges, (and I feel how few they are); any habits of speaking, (and, I acknowledge, they are no more than common); any knowledge in the art of oratory, drawn from the study of letters, which have never been strangers to me, in any part of my life, I am indebted to Licinius Archias, for all these advantages, whatever they may be, and he has a right, to require the fruit and reward of them. As far as my memory can return upon past times, and my earliest years, I perceive him directing my first studies, and introducing me into the course I have pursued, and, if my voice, confirmed and encouraged by his instructions, has been sometimes useful to my fellow citizens, I ought, indubitably, as far as in me lies, to assist him, who has put me in a condition to serve others. What I now say, may surprise those, who attend only to the difference, which they perceive between the nature of my labours, and those of Archias; but eloquence has not been my only study, and all the arts, which relate to the cultivation of the understanding, have with each other a near relation, and belong to the same family.

"Perhaps, also, they may be surprised, that, in a question of law, in a prosecution, which is argued in public, before a Prætor so distinguished, and Judges of such gravity, in presence of so numerous an assembly, I employ a language wholly different from that of the bar; but it is a liberty, which I expect from the indulgence of my Judges, and, I hope, it will not displease them. The character of the accused, a man of letters, an excellent poet, whose leisure and whose labours have always been at an equal distance from the altercations and the noise of the tribunals; the concourse of men of letters, who are drawn together by his cause; your taste for the fine arts, which he cultivates, and that of the magistrate, who presides over this trial; all authorise me, to believe, that you will allow me to depart a little from the ordinary method; and, if I obtain from you this favour, I flatter myself, I shall demonstrate, that, not only Archias ought not to be cut off from the number of our fellow citizens, but even if he were not one, he would deserve now to be admitted.

"Born of a noble family of Antioch, a city anciently celebrated and opulent, full of learned men, and flourishing in arts and letters, Archias had scarcely completed the studies of infancy, when his writing placed him in the first rank. Very soon he became so celebrated in Asia and in Greece, that his arrival in every city, became a festival; the expectation and curiosity he excited, exceeded his renown; and when they had heard him, this expectation was even exceeded by their admiration.

"Grecian literature was thus diffused throughout Italy, cultivated in all the Latin cities, more than they are at this day, and favoured in Rome itself, by the tranquility which the Republic enjoyed. The people of Tarentum, of Rhegium, and of Naples, were zealous to honour Archias with the rights of citizenship, and with rewards of every kind; and all those, who were qualified to judge of talents, regarded him as a man, whose adoption did them honour.

"Marius and Catulus were consuls when he came to Rome, where his reputation had arrived before him. He there found two great men, one of whom might furnish him great actions to celebrate; the other, uniting with the glory of military exploits, a good taste, and great knowledge, was worthy to hear him, who could sing them. Archias, already clothed with the pretextal robe, was received in the house of Lucullus; and he owes, not only to his genius and writings, but also to his character and manners, this honourable advantage, that the house, in which his youth was entertained, is still, at this day, the asylum of his old age. He was welcome to Metellus, the Numidian, and his son; Emilius heard him with pleasure; he lived with the two Catuli, father and son; Lucius Crassus cultivated his acquaintance; he was closely connected with the whole family of Lucullus, Hortensius, Octavius, Drusus, and Cato; and it is, moreover, an honour for him, that, among those, who sought his friendship, some were influenced by taste, and, because they knew how to value and enjoy his talents, and others wished to make a merit of it."

[FROM A FOREIGN JOURNAL.]

CRITICISM

On Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres. By Hugh Blair, D. D.

Dr. Blair has analysed some of the compositions of Atterbury, Swift, and Addison; and his observations on their inelegant and ungrammatical expressions will be useful to every one, who wishes to write the English language with purity and precision. We hope therefore he will excuse us, if we take the liberty to point out some of the inaccuracies, which we have observed in these Lectures.

We shall not always attempt to correct his expressions, as it may frequently be necessary to alter the structure of the sentence; and in some cases, the best emendation is not to substitute one word for another, but to omit the whole period, or at least the most exceptionable part of it.

'Terms and phrases, which border too much on vulgar and colloquial language, to be proper for being employed in a polished composition.' p. 427, 4to. edit.

Bating these two slight inaccuracies, 458. Bating this expression, there is nothing that can be subject to the least reprehension. 480. ii. 294. 437.—Excepting is preferable to bating in these passages.

Neither are the abilities of any human writer sufficient to supply a continued run of unmixed sublime conceptions. 76.—a continued series.

In this, and other instances, a more attentive review may probably suggest better emendations than those, which we shall occasionally subjoin.

This general idea must direct the run of our composition. 265.—the tenor of our composition; or, the modulation of our periods.

Such attentions as these are requisite in the common run of style. 285.—requisite in composition.

A sentiment, which is expressed in a period clearly, neatly, and happily arranged, makes always a stronger impression on the mind, than one that is any how feeble or embarrassed. 245.—in any respect feeble.

If these be any how connected. 333.

The French language surpasses ours, by far, in expressing the nicer shades of character. 174.—by far may be omitted.

More instances of the true language of nature can [may] be quoted from Shakespeare, than from all other tragic poets put together. ii. 511.—all other tragic poets united.

We are every now and then interrupted by unnatural thoughts. ii. 523.

Some circumstance poops out, which ought to have been omitted. 253.—appears.

When, to our surprise, a new MEMBER poops out upon us. 490.—presents itself, or appears.

Agamemnon pitches upon Briseis. ii. 429.—demande Briseis.

All pitch upon some one beauty. 28. I pitched upon it for the subject of this exercise. 495. He pitched upon the war of Troy. ii. 408. Some great enterprize, which he pitches upon. ii. 409. Pitch upon some moving and interesting story. ii. 480.—Choose, or, select.

Eloquence rejoices in the bursts of loud applause. ii. 35.—rejoices in loud applause.

Poetry included then the whole burst of the human mind. ii. 322.—the whole effusion of the human mind, or all the productions, &c.

The response is made by the burst of the whole chorus. ii. 390.—by the whole chorus.

It is the burst of inspiration. ii. 399.—the language of inspiration.

More instructive to the bulk of hearers. ii. 170. The bulk of readers. ii. 287. 347. 356.—The generality.

Milton has chalked out for himself a new road in poetry. ii. 471.

No subject bias fairer for being favourable to poetry. ii. 337.—seems to be more favourable. To bid fair is a vulgarism.

What is called the anapest. 173. To rest either on a long, or on a penult long syllable. 260, &c.—The word penult is an abbreviation, as barbarous as phyz and plenijo.

AUWKWARD PHRASES.

This much may suffice to have said concerning witticism. 40. This much is sufficient to have said upon the subject of beauty. 91. Before concluding this lecture. 79. A sick or drunk person. 74.

The most useful art, of which men are possessed. 125.—It would be much better, in general, to use this verb in the active form: 'which men possess.'

In order to extend some farther the first method. 128. The first rude inventors of language would be long of arriving at such general terms. 151. The excuse can rarely, if ever, be sustained. 185. With respect to this distribution, somewhat singular hath obtained in the structure of language. 145. Which is left lagging behind, like a tail adjoined to the sentence; somewhat that, as Mr. Pope describes the Alexandrine line,

'Like a wounded snake, draws its slow length along.' 223.—

I just express my thoughts in the simplest manner possible. 273. A concise writer compresses his thoughts into the fewest possible words. 371. Only before proceeding to this. 276. It is the sentiment or passion, which lies under the figured expression, that gives it any merit. 277.

Make the application of it be understood. 210. To make his subject be better understood. 344.—To illustrate his subject.

He was fonder of nothing than of wit and railery. 397. In his reasonings, for most part, he is flimsy and false. 400. 451. For in place of meaning to say, that the Latin spoken in Britain was not so debased as what was spoken in Gaul and Spain, he means just the contrary. 485. In order to make it be distinctly apprehended. 488. Before entering on any of these heads. ii. 1. Dionysius of Halicarnassus has given us upon the orations of Isocrates, as also upon those of some other Greek orators, a full and regular treatise. ii. 17. The disguise can almost never be so perfect, but it is discovered. ii. 55. 330. But for the truths of religion, with the greater simplicity and the less mixture of art they are set forth, they are likely to prove the more successful. ii. 104. Some things, which he may only shortly touch. ii. 110. The extreme of overdoing in accuracy. ii. 118. I would advise it to be always treated with brevity. ii. 131.

The French writers of sermons study neatness and elegance in laying down their heads. ii. 171.—The author means, in the division of their subjects.

The middle pitch is that which he employs in common conversation, and which he should use for ordinary in public discourse. ii. 206.—For ordinary is a Scotticism.

He who should tell another that he was very angry, or very grieved. ii. 217. Nature must always have done somewhat. ii. 228. That profession to which he addicts himself. ii. 234. Provided always that so much unity be preserved. ii. 109. He must always take care, that any such allusions be natural and easy. ii. 116. But for you, whenever I hear you, I go away displeased with myself. ii. 126. It must needs give pleasure, if we shall find the beauty and dignity of the composition adequate to the weight and importance of the matter. ii. 385. The more that this unity is rendered sensible to the imagination, the effect will be the better. ii. 413. The nearer that a poet can bring the representation to an imitation of nature, the impression will be the more perfect. ii. 510.

Passages, in which things are supposed to be in own class, and, at the same time, represented as belonging to another.

The relations, which, of all others, we have the most frequent occasion to mention. 150. The relations which, of all others, is by far the most fruitful of tropes. 293. Our past misfortunes afford a circumstance, the most favourable of all others, to our future hopes. ii. 63. Sure of acquiring that fame, and even veneration, which is, of all other rewards, the greatest incentive to genius. ii. 255.

THE SUPERLATIVE degree instead of the COMPARATIVE.

Which of these two methods is of the greatest utility and beauty. 152. Of the two it is the easiest extreme. 217. When our sentence consists of two members, the longest should, generally, be the concluding one. 238. It remains, to this day, in doubt, whether his beauties or his faults be greatest. ii. 523.

DOUBLE COMPARATIVES.

Lesser differences. 27. Attend to all the lesser and more refined graces. 43. ii. 22. The lesser forms of poetry. ii. 335.—Lesser is a corruption of less; but the author has innumerable authorities for the use of it.

Adjectives having a SUPERLATIVE signification, improperly used in a COMPARATIVE sense, or compared by more and most.

The characters of taste, when brought to its most perfect state, are reducible to two, delicacy and correctness. 23.—Most perfect, though a common, is not an eligible expression; because perfect, being an absolute term, cannot with strict propriety be used comparatively. In this passage it would be better to say, its perfect, or, its most improved state.

Nothing that belongs to human nature is more universal than the relish of beauty. 17. The foundation, upon which they rest, is what has been found from experience to please mankind most universally. 31. We can conceive no motive, which would more universally operate upon men. 102. The vehement manner of speaking by tones and gestures became not so universal. 116. Music is known to have been a more extensive art among them, than it is with us; more universally studied. 252. The practice of reading sermons has prevailed so universally in England. ii. 43. Nothing has so great and universal a command over the minds of men as virtue. ii. 230. The reputation of great ancient classics being so early, so lasting, so universal, among all the most polished nations. ii. 252. Thuanus has, by attempting to make the history of his own times too universal, fallen into the same error. ii. 266.—We may say, more general, more extensive, &c. but we cannot, with any propriety, say more universal.

ADJECTIVES instead of ADVERBS.

We can much easier form the conception of a fierce combat between two men, than between a bull and a tiger. 351.—We can more easily. It might be requisite for them to be exceeding full. ii. 110.

[To be continued.]

MISCELLANY.

ON THE UTILITY OF AMUSEMENTS TO OLD AGE.

It is a natural conclusion from the shortness of life, that none of it should be thrown away; and it is therefore thought wonderful, that there should be many contrivances, to abbreviate the duration of what is confessed already to be too much circumscribed. Now pastimes, of all kinds, are considered as contrivances, to wear away time without reflection, and are therefore censured by severe philosophy, as arguing absurdity in man, who is forever lamenting the brevity of his existence. But, as man is constituted, it must be denied, that the time spent in amusement, is always thrown away; and, perhaps, time thus spent, will be found to lengthen, rather than to abbreviate our duration.

It contributes, when under the restraint of moderation, to confirm health and exhilarate the spirits; both which effects of it not only become causes of long life, but also enable a man to act with vigour and efficacy in the employments of a profession, and in the common duties of society. Thus it not only renders life more comfortable, but more useful.

It is, however, true, that, in the vigorous seasons of youth and health, some serious and important employment should be engaged in, which may serve society, advance the interests of a family, or elevate the meritorious individual in the ranks of civil life.

But in old age, when these ends shall have been accomplished, and infirmities begin to increase,* the active mind will still require an object, and the object ought to be of such a kind, as agitates moderately, not like the storm, but like the gentle breeze of a fine summer evening.

Hobby-horses are very desirable at all ages; but necessary in old age, when the sources of amusement begin to fail. It was this, which induced the sensible and experienced Geron to keep an aviary. He had relinquished a busy life, and retired from London to a little country town, where, though there was an agreeable neighbourhood, there were few diversions but those of cards; which, notwithstanding he liked them very well, could not occupy all his time and attention. They are chiefly a winter, and an evening amusement, and he wanted some pastime, besides reading, for the summer and for his mornings. He therefore built a little room in his garden, and fitted it up, with admirable contrivance, as an aviary. The building of it, the conveniences, and the improvements, which he was continually adding, caused him much pleasure: and it soon became an object of high ambition, to breed the most beautiful Canary birds. He succeeded in his attempts, and, more than once, carried the prize, given by a society of bird-fanciers, for producing a bird of the finest plumage. He taught bulfinches to pipe a tune, and made them presents to his friends, as instances of singular favour. He reared nightingales from the nest, and attended them with all a parent's solicitude. The delicate, the elegant woodlark was one of his first favourites, and he listened with fresh delight, when his birds warbled their morning-melody, which he fancifully considered as songs of gratitude and love to himself, in return for food and protection.

But, that he might secure variety, which is necessary to add a zest to amusement, he has added several other hobby-horses to this his first favourite. He has acquired a taste for tulips, and prides himself, on making a more beautiful display of this gaudy flower in the month of May, than any florist in his vicinity. I called it a gaudy flower; but I speak like an inelegant spectator, when I use a contemptuous epithet in mentioning it; for, though to a common eye, a bed of tulips presents only a glare of vivid colours, to a connoisseur it exhibits peculiar elegance, as well as finery. Geron views his tulips with the affection and complacency of a lover.

The garden affords him many sources of amusement. He attends not indeed to the olitory, and his strength will not permit him to take an active part in the labours of horti-culture. But he has a small green-house, to every part of which he gives a daily attention; and its various beauty amply repays him, as indeed nothing is more grateful, in return for care and labour, than the tribe of vegetables.

To add to his amusements, he has stocked a fish-pond in a meadow adjoining to his little garden; and, instead of taking out all the fish at once, by emptying the pond, or drawing it, which is the usual practice of country gentlemen, he makes a rule, that no fish shall be caught out of it, but by angling, which he thinks the only fair method of fishing, among those who fish for diversion. His strength will not permit him to follow the piscatory sport in the river, as he can neither stand long, nor walk a great way; and he has the sense, wherever he cannot accommodate the nature of the diversion to himself, to submit himself to the nature of the diversion.

He has many little amusements in the house, as well as in the aviary, the garden, and canal. As he is properly disposed in religious matters, the reading of the Scriptures, with a comment, and of pious books of the best characters, fills up agreeably as well as usefully, an hour or two every day; but more especially, when the weather is rainy, or in any respect, inclement and unpleasant.

Visits, and cards, in moderation, contribute to enliven his time in an agreeable vicissitude; and, the consequence of his wise distribution of his leisure hours, he enjoys a cheerfulness, which contributes, perhaps, more than any thing else, to health and longevity.

His neighbour Bibo ridicules his amusements as trifling and puerile. Bibo is nearly as old as Geron; but he is not yet free from youthful vanity. He is an old beau, sportsman, gamester, and bottle companion; but his infirmities often prevent him from acting in these characters; and when, on a good day, (as he calls it, whenever he is tolerably well) he attempts them, he never acquits himself to his own satisfaction. Old age, and the depredations of time, are his great complaint. He has no resource in himself, and cultivates no taste for domestic and harmless diversions. He mopes over the fire, in the morning, and the bottle, in the afternoon. Melancholy and bodily disease, increased by indolence and excess, accelerate the evils, and aggravate the pains, of age.

How happy would Bibo have been, if he had condescended to give up the gravity of the gamester, and the affectation of the beau, and adopted a taste for some innocent hobby-horse, which he now despises as too childish and unimportant to deserve his notice.

PORTRAITS OF BONAPARTE.

BY VARIOUS PAINTERS.

Bonaparte is rather below the middle size, somewhat inclined to stoop and thin in person; but, though of a slight make, he appears to be muscular, and capable of fatigue; his forehead is broad and shaded by dark brown hair, which is cut short behind; his eyes, of the same colour, are full, quick and prominent; his nose is aquiline, his chin protuberant and pointed; his complexion of a yellow hue; and his cheeks hollow. His countenance, which is of a melancholy cast, expresses much sagacity and reflection; his manner is grave and deliberate, but at the same time open. On the whole, his aspect announces him to be of a temperate and phlegmatic disposition, but warm and tenacious in the pursuit of his object, and impatient of contradiction.

Paris as it was, and as it is.

The first consul is a well made little man with fine teeth and hands, black eyes, and a nose somewhat approaching to the Roman; complexion very sallow, and cheeks sunk in; features sharp. He wears his dark brown hair combed down in front, and cropped very short behind and round the ears. He keeps a firm and graceful seat on horseback, and his person is then seen to most advantage. He has an intelligent spirit in his countenance, and an eye that bespeaks an uncommon mind. At the grand parade he generally wears a plain cocked hat and blue coat with a scarlet collar, white waistcoat and nankeen or white kerseymere pantaloons with half boots. His white charger was the trained favourite of Louis the sixteenth.

Morrice's View of Modern France.

As he passed several times before the window where I sat, I had ample opportunity to examine his countenance, his figure, his dress and his manner. His complexion is uncommonly sallow, his countenance expressive but stern, his figure little but well made, and his whole person, like the mind which it contains, singular and remarkable. If I were compelled to compare him to any one, I should name Kemble the actor. Though Bonaparte is much less in size and less handsome than that respectable performer, yet in the construction of the features and in the general expression there is a strong resemblance. There is, however, such originality about the appearance of the first consul, that, without having seen him, it is difficult to form an idea of his person. The bust of him in Sevre china, which is very common at Paris, and which has probably become equally so in London, is the best likeness of him I have ever seen.

A Rough Sketch of Modern Paris.

At the review, my eye, aided by a good opera-glass, was fixed upon the first consul. I beheld before me a man, whose renown is sounded through the remotest regions of the earth, and whose exploits have been united, by the worshippers of favoured heroism, to the conqueror of Darius. His features are small and meagre: his countenance is melancholy, cold, and desperate: his nose is aquiline: his eyes are dark, fiery, and full of genius: his hair, which he wears cropped, and without powder, is black: his figure is small, but very muscular. He wore a blue coat, with broad white facings, and golden epaulets, the uniform of his regiment, a small cocked hat, in which was a little national cockade. His boots were made in the fashion of English riding-boots. These are destitute of military appearance. The reason, why they are preferred by the French officers, is, on account of the top leather not soiling the knees of the pantaloons, when in the act of putting one leg over the other. Buonaparte rode through the lines. His beautiful charger seemed conscious of the glory of his rider, and bore him through the ranks with a commanding and majestic pace. The colours of one of the regiments was stationed close under the window, where I had the good fortune of being placed. Here the hero stopped, and saluted them. At this time, I was close to him, and had the pleasure of completely

* Solus senescentem reaturs sanus equum, et Hoc est, senescentem ridens et illa datat. Hor.

gratifying that curiosity, of bel olding the persons of distinguished men, which is so natural to all of us.

Carri's Stranger in France.

I procured a place at a balcony, opposite the north-end of the Pont neuf, and about noon, saw him and his whole train arrive. The guards, that preceded and followed him, were the finest, the best dressed, and the best mounted troops in France; and their number, as the attendants upon a citizen, were almost incredible!

The procession might be called fine, but it was not grand, even according to vulgar notions of grandeur; though it certainly was afflicting. Amid this military parade, he had the contemptible accompaniment of two running footmen, and four lacqueys, in rich liveries, that stood crowded behind his carriage; which was a common coach of Parisian manufacture, but drawn by eight horses. Even the French tradesmen, among whom I stood, who thought much of show, and who cared nothing for that, which most should have excited attention, after observing the horse-troops, that had passed, and were following and seeing this carriage, and the four footmen behind it, exclaimed, 'Ah! que c'est mesquin!'

I have several times been close to his person. His stature is diminutive, his complexion sallow, and his physiognomy bears those marks, that denote the labours of his mind. It is careworn; but it is also susceptible of great variety. From his atrabilious complexion, choler might certainly be predicted; but, from the sedateness of his eye, not of that sudden and impetuous kind, to which he is so very subject.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESS. COLON AND SPONDER.

It is incident to me, when fatigued with many a prolix page through the day, to cheer the jaded mind at night with the sweets of poetry. I have lately formed a nosegay of foreign flowers which I hope will please others, as much as they have delighted me.

TO THE SHADE OF BURNS.

Mute is thy wild harp, now, O bard sublime!
Who, amid Scotia's mountain solitude,
Great nature taught to 'build the lofty rhyme,'
And even beneath the daily pressure, rude,
Of labouring poverty, thy generous blood
Fir'd with the love of freedom—not subdu'd
Wert thou by thy low fortune: But a time
Like this we live in, when the abject chime
Of echoing Parasite is best approv'd,
Was not for thee—indignantly is fled
Thy noble spirit; and no longer mov'd
By all the ills on which thine heart has bled,
Associate worthy of the illustrious dead,
Enjoys with them 'the liberty it lov'd.'

TO AN OLD OAK.

Where thy broad branches brave the bitter north,
Like rugged, indigent, unheeded Worth,
Lo! Vegetation's guardian hands emboss
Each giant limb with fords of studded moss,
Clothing the bark with many a fringed fold
Begemm'd with scarlet shields and cups of gold,
Which to the wildest winds the r webs oppose,
And mock the arrowy sleet or weltering snows.

But to the warmer west the woodbine fair,
With tassels that perfum'd the summer air
The mantling clematis, whose feathery bowers
Wav'd in festoons with nightshades purple flowers,
The silver weed whose corded fillers wave
Round thy pale rind, even as deceitful love
Of mercenary Beauty would engage
The dotard fondness of decrepit age;
All these that during summer's halcyon days
With their green canopies conceal'd thy sprays,

* Ah! how paltry!

Are gone for ever; or, disfigur'd, trail
Their sallow relics in the autumnal gale;
Or o'er thy roots in faded fragments tost,
But tell of happier hours and sweetness lost!

Thus in fate's trying hour when furious storms
Strip social life of pleasure's fragile forms,
And awful justice, as his rightful prey
Tears luxury's silk, and jewel'd robe away:
While reads adversity her lesson stern,
And fortune's mimous tremble as they learn:
The crowds around her gilded car that hung
Bent the like knee, and trold the honey'd tongue
Responding face, or fly in pale despair
And scorn alone remembers that they were.

NOT SO INTEGRITY: unchang'd he lives
In the rude air our conscious honour gives
And dares with hardy front the troubled sky
IN HONESTY'S UNINJURED PANOPLY.
Ne'er on prosperity's enfeebling bed
On rosy pillows he repos'd his head,
But given to useful arts, his ardent mind
Has sought the general welfare of mankind:
To mitigate their ills his greatest bliss,
While studying them has taught him what he is:
He, where the human tempest rages worst,
And the earth shudders as the thunders burst;
Firm as thy northern branch, is rooted fast,
And if he can't avert, endures the blast.

SONNET

Written at Bristol Hot Wells.

Here from the restless bed of lingering pain,
The languid sufferer seeks the tepid wave
And feels returning health and hope again,
Disperse the gathering shadows of the grave:
And here romantic rocks that boldly swell,
Fring'd with green woods, or stain'd with veins of ore
Call'd native genius forth, whose Heaven taught skill
Charm'd the deep echoes of the rifted shore.
But tepid waves, wild scenes, or summer air,
Restore the palsied fancy, woe depreat,
Check they the torpid influence of despair,
Or bid warm health reanimate the breast;
Where hope's soft visions have no longer part,
And whose sad inmate is a broken heart.

SONNET.

The fairest flowers are gone! for tempests fell
And with wild wing swept some unblown away
While on the upland lawn or rocky dell
More faded in the day stars ardent ray;
And scarce the copse, or hedge row shade beneath,
Or by the runnels grassy course, appear
Some lingering blossoms of the earlier year:
Mingling bright florets, in the yellow wreath
That Autumn with his poppies and his corn
Binds on his tawny temples—so the schemes
Rais'd by fond hope, in youths unclouded morn,
While sanguine youth enjoys delusive dreams
Experience withers: till scarce one remains
Fluttering the languid heart, where only reason reigns!

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A work of pre-eminent excellence, and peculiarly interesting to Parents and Pupils, has just appeared at New-York. While Thomas Pitt, afterwards Lord Camelford, was pursuing his studies at the University of Cambridge, the late illustrious Earl CHATHAM, his uncle, addressed to him a series of Letters on the momentous topics of Religion, Virtue, and Learning. These letters are conceived with all that spirit which we should expect from the British Demosthenes, and they are expressed, with all the energy and wisdom of a Mentor. The public are indebted for an early republication of this valuable book to Ezra Sargeant and Co. of New-York, who have procured from the press of S. Gould and Co. a very neat impression, scarcely inferior to the British original. The Editor, Lord Grenville, has dedicated these letters to Mr. PITT, the present prime minister of England. The dedication is expressed in such language, as one great man should use to another, not in the nauseous cant of republican hypocrisy, but in the bold and harmonious tone of dignity and truth.

When you expressed to me your entire concurrence in my wish to print the following letters, you were not apprised that this address would accompany them. By you it will, I trust, be received as a testimony of affectionate friendship. To others the propriety will be obvious of inscribing with your name a publication, in which Lord Chatham teaches how great talents may most successfully be cultivated, and to what objects they may most honourably be directed.

GRENVILLE.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Harrington's Oceana was well adapted to that age, when the plans of imaginary republics were the daily subjects of debate and conversation, and even in our time it is justly admired as a work of genius and invention. The idea, however, of a perfect and immortal commonwealth, will always be found as chimerical, as that of a perfect and immortal man.

Pope seems literally and strictly to have fulfilled the precept of Horace, in each of its circumstances;

Multa tulit, fecitque Puer;

he was laborious and indefatigable in his pursuits of learning;

Sudavit et alsit,

and, above all, what is of the greatest consequence in preserving each faculty of the mind in due vigour

Abstinit venere et vino.

These are the two temptations to which a youthful bard is principally subject, and into whose snares he generally falls. If the imagination be lively, the passions will be strong. True genius seldom resides in a cold and phlegmatic constitution. The same temperament and the same sensibility that make a poet or a painter will be apt to make a man a lover and a debauchee.

GREAVE'S 'INVALID.'

The veteran author of the 'Spiritual Quixotte,' and many other useful and amusing publications, has recently beguiled the tedium of old age, by writing a little book with the above title, and endeavouring to shew from his own example, that Exercise and Temperance will most effectually contribute to the prolongation of life. From a number of pleasant passages, we cannot refuse our readers the pleasure of perusing the following.

[Imitated from Integer Vita.]

The man, who leads a sober life,
Obsequious to his careful wife,
Abstains from all high-season'd food,
And drinks no more, than does him good.

He needs no case of costly drams,
Nor hamper stuff'd with tongues and hams,
Much less the pills, which quacks may puff,
Nor *poisonous draughts of doctor's stuff.

Whether through half-starv'd France he goes,
Or traversing th' unmelting snows,
That crown the Alps and Appennines,
On frogs and stinking rabbits dines,
Or tempts the Volga's barbarous Hood,
Where Tartars feed on horses' blood.

For, late on my return to college,
The seat of temperance and knowledge,
A spotted friend, with fevers arm'd,
And poisonous breath, the town alarm'd,
No lynx, or leopard, fiercer ranges
Among the Hindoos, on the Ganges,
Or haunts the much-fan'd banks of Nile,
Where lurks the treacherous crocodile.

* Nec venenatis gravis sagittis, &c.
† The small-pox.

Yet, taking temperance to my aid,
Undaunted through close lanes I stray'd,
And brav'd the monster, void of fear,
He found no food for fevers here.

Place me amid the eternal frost,
That reigns on Lapland's desert coast,
Where not a flower, or cheerful green,
Or scarce a cabbage-stem is seen;
But clouds and fogs, and darkness drear,
Obscure and sadden half the year.
Place me beneath the torrid zone,
Where scarce a crazy hut is known,
To temperance, while my vows I pay,
And sing her praise, and offspring gay;
Fair health my cares shall still beguile,
And sweetly prattle, sweetly smile.

A quack, who, not much fam'd for skill,
Did seldom cure, nay sometimes kill;
Contriv'd at length, by many a puff,
And many a bottle, fill'd with stuff,
To raise his fortune and his pride,
And in a coach, forsooth! must ride.
His family coat, long since worn out,
What arms to take, was all the doubt.
A friend, consulted on the case,
Thus answer'd, with a sly grimace:
'Take some device in your own way;
'Neither too solemn, nor too gay:
'Three ducks, suppose, white, gray, or black,
'And be your motto—Quack, quack, quack!'

[The following anecdote will expose the folly and falsehood of those calumniating levellers, who have asserted that Louis the sixteenth was a weak man, and ———— "Born Only to eat up the corn."]

While this unfortunate prince was confined in the Temple, he was accustomed to rise at six o'clock in the morning; and, having employed himself for a short time in devotion, he read till nine. He then attended his fellow prisoners, while they took their first meal; but he did not himself take any refreshment, before dinner. After his return to his own apartment, he gave his son lessons in geography and latin. After dinner he read till supper. During five months of imprisonment he read two hundred and fifty-seven volumes, many of which were the Roman Classics. He read these with facility, and was both a scientific and classical scholar. Could a man have been very simple, who could read and relish the sublime authors of antiquity, or who, in the season of impending death, was capable of replying with calm courage to the insolence of Tanterre, and the threats of ferocious soldiers?

TO THE GENIUS OF SHAKSPEARE.

Wrapt from the glance of mortal eye,
Say, bursts thy Genius to the world of light?
Seeks it yon star-bespangled sky?
Or skims its fields with rapid flight?
Or mid yon plains where fancy strays,
Courts it the balmy breathing gale?
Or where the violet pale
Droops o'er the green embroidered stream?
Or where young Zephyr stirs the rustling sprays,
Lies all dissolved in fairy dream.
O'er yon bleak desert's unfrequented round
Seest thou where nature treads the deepening gloom,
Sits on yon hoary tower with ivy crowned,
Or wildly wails o'er thy lamented tomb;
Hearst thou the solemn music wind along?
Or thrills the warbling note in thy melodious song?

Two men, named Turner and Icory, have been committed by the police magistrates. The former is supposed to have worked on the latter to suit his nefarious designs. Lon. pap.

A person ignorant of geography would conjecture that Bom-bay was somewhere in the back settlements. Ibid.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A Gentleman of this city, who had in his possession a blank-book, which once belonged to the poet SHENSTONE, gave it to Mr. MOORE, with the ensuing address.

TO THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

Some gentle god inspires thy clay,
And smiles in every look;
He breathes in every melting lay,
Nor grieves for heav'n forsook.

When the soft, tender sighs of love
Are bursting from thy soul;
'Tis Cupid blooming from above,
We feel the god's controul.

And, when with gay, fantastic mirth,
You scatter sweet delight;
'Tis Bacchus revelling on earth,
Chaste, beautiful, and bright.

Impassion'd child of love and joy,
May both forever smile;
And mix thy cup without alloy,
Thy pleasures without guile.

This sacred page, for Shenstone's muse design'd
Shall drink the sweeter transports of thy mind.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Philadelphia, Sept. 26, 1804.

MR. EDITOR,

The following pieces written by an American prisoner in Tripoli, have been lately forwarded to me, from thence, by a friend of mine, an officer of the late frigate Philadelphia. I herewith subjoin an extract from the letter accompanying them, which contains the only account of their author I have yet received; and if you deem them worthy a place in your Miscellany, you will be pleased to insert them.

Yours, &c.

Tripoli, Bashaw's Castle, March 28, 1804.

I cannot omit mentioning a marine, whose extraordinary merit has attracted the attention and notice of all the officers; his name is Ray; has once been in very good circumstances, but misfortunes have brought him low, and obliged him to enter on board of a man of war, in the capacity of a private in the marine corps. His story he keeps secret; he is much of a poet; since he has been a prisoner, he has written several pieces of considerable merit, amongst others, there is one on 'HILLIARD,' a seaman who died in a prison a few days ago, another called 'The American captive in Tripoli,' both of which I send you, and, in my opinion, they are well worth reading.

Yours, &c.

ELEGY

ON THE DEATH OF HILLIARD.

Hilliard of painful life bereft,
Is now a slave no more;
But, here no relative has left,
His exit to deplore.

No parent, no fond brother stands
Around his clay-cold bed;
No wife, with tender trembling hands,
Supports his dying head.

No sister follows, or attends,
His melancholy bier;
Nor, from a lover's eye descends,
The soft distilling tear:

But foes, and of a barb'rous kind,
Surround him as he dies;
A horror to his fainting mind,
And to his closing eyes.

What though no monumental stone
Bespeaks a guilty name;
By splendid trophies basely won
Damn'd to eternal fame:

Yet, if an honest heart he wore
If virtue's paths he trod;
He was, so poets sung of yore,
The noblest work of God.

His fellow pris'ners strove to cheer,
His sad departing soul,
And bade the sympathetic tear,
In free profusion roll.

Mourn not, 'twas heaven's all-wise behest,
And merciful decree,
That gave his wearying sorrows rest,
And sate the captive free.

THE AMERICAN CAPTIVE

IN TRIPOLI.

Ye lurid domes! whose tott'ring columns stand
Marks of the despot's desolating hand;
Whose weed-grown roofs, and mould'ring arches show,

The curse of tyranny, a nation's woe;
In every ruin, every pile, I find
A warning lesson to a thoughtful mind,
Your dreary cells expressive silence break,
Echo to groans, and eloquently speak:—
'The christian's blood cements the stones he rears

This clay was moisten'd with the christian's tears,

Pale as these walls, a prisoner oft has lain,
Felt the keen scourge, and worn the ruthless chain;

While scoffing foes encreasing tortures pour;
'Till the poor victim feels, alas! no more,
E'en here thy sons, America, are found,
Lock'd in foul prisons, and in fetters bound.'

Heavens! what are times! must free Columbians bow,

Before yon tinsell'd tyrant's murky brow!
Cringe to a power, which death and rapine crown?

Smile at a smile, and tremble at a frown!
Kneel at a throne, its clemency implore,
Enrich'd by spoils, and stain'd with human gore?

To pirate fends obsequious homage pay;
Their presence honour, and their will obey?
Endure the lash, the ponderous load sustain!
Suppress their anger, and their threats restrain?
Leave a rich clime? explore the treacherous waves,

The sport of miscreants, and the slave of slaves?

Heavens! at the sight, each patriot captive glows

With virtuous hatred, on his country's foes;
At every blow, indignant passions rise,
And vengeance flashes from resentful eyes.

But heaven is just; tho' man's bewilder'd mind,
To the dark ways of Providence is blind;
Else, why are some ordain'd above the rest!
Or villains treated better than the best?
Why martyred virtue! hang thy injur'd head?
Why liv'd an Arnold, while a Warren bled?
Earth's murderers triumph, proud oppressors reign,

While patriots bleed, and captives sigh in vain.
Yet slumb'ring justice soon shall wake, and show
Her sword unsheath'd, and bend the hostile bow;
Columbia's genius hover round each son,
And thy blest shade, immortal Washington;
Unit'd to guard us from nefarious foes,
And heaven defend, and angels interpose;
Devoted tyrants cause our wrath to feel,
And Beys and Bashaws in submission kneel,
Man's equal right, sweet liberty, restore,
And despotism fall, to rise no more.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

STANZAS.*

By Thomas Moore, Esq.

Addressed to Mrs. H. at Norfolk, Virginia.

[Mrs. H., the lady of the British consul, is remarkable for the beauty and redundancy of her flowing tresses. Our gallant poet complained that such hair should ever be restrained by the bandeau of Fashion, and requested that he might be gratified by seeing those auburn locks 'unbound and free.' The lady graciously granting this boon, the delighted and sensitive bard immediately wrote the ensuing impromptu.]

I prithee, bind that hair again,
Oh! do not think that many men
Are blest with Joseph's coldness:
Run not the risk our souls to damn,
By sighs, which (pious as I am)
Would tempt e'en me to boldness.

I've often seen those locks of gold,
In brightest, dearest tresses roll'd,
Yet sat quite cool beside you;
Each ringlet, by the graces drest,
The dev'l and you did all your best,
Yet still I have defied you.

But oh! 'twould ruin saints to see
Those tresses thus, unbound and free,
Adown your shoulders sweeping;
They put such thoughts into one's head,
Of dishabille, and night, and bed,
And anything but sleeping!

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

By Thomas Green Fessenden, Esq.

A Poetical Epistle to a friend, uncommonly susceptible of the charms of the Fair, and who frequently fell desperately in love, at the first sight of a fine woman.

With mute attention lend your ear,
To hear, 'and reverence what you hear,'
While truths more precious I unfold,
Than splendid gems, incas'd in gold.
I wish no friend of mine to own
The nerve of steel, the heart of stone,
But Beauty's willing votary bow
Nor blush allegiance to avow.
When angry clouds life's sun o'ercast,
Preluding rude Misfortune's blast;
When doubts perplex and cares annoy,
And bar each avenue of joy;
When the pale victim of disease,
Which baffled art cannot appease,
Torn by Affliction's sharpest thong,
Till Hope has ceas'd her syren song,
Beholds pale Horror's spectred form
Rise moaning in the midnight storm.
The fairer sex possess the power
To tranquilize the torturing hour,
And bid mild Sympathy impart
A cordial to the bursting heart.

To cheer with smiles the vale of woe
Is not the only power they know;
But oft it is their sweet employ
To light with love the lamp of joy.
'Tis theirs in pleasure's brightest noon,
The fibres of the heart to tune
To tones of rapture, which might even Prelude the harmony of heaven.
Then should you find a fair one true
To love, to nature and to you;
What time, a thousand tender arts
Denotes a unison of hearts;
When half-express'd, half-stifled sighs
And timid glance from down-cast eyes
Appear, expressively unique,
With crimson flush of beauty's cheek;
And all in tender love proclaim
That hopes and wishes are the same:

* Published from the author's manuscript.

Unite assenting hearts and hands
In gentle Hymeneal bands:
Then shall fresh rapture crown each day,
Till life and love at once decay.

But ne'er commence in Love's career,
With silly plainings for your dear;
Nor sit on moss-grown bank and snivel,
Because Miss Sylva is uncivil;
Nor tell to every brawling brook
She petrified you with a look;
Nor think it right to hang or drown,
In consequence of Laura's frown;
Nor make your fair in prose or metre,
A 'monstrous pretty' sort of creature;
Ransack the store house of dame Nature,
To find some simile to mate her;
Nor conjure up, with deal of pains,
From vasty deep of poets' brains,
A heathenish kind of wizard battery,
To take her heart by dint of flattery.
That Venus, Dian and the rest,
Compar'd with her, are second best.
For if she's sense, a single grain,
That sort of stuff will all be vain.
She'll say your compliments so smart,
Are from the head, but not the heart;
And with your wear and tear of brains,
You've got 'your labour for your pains.'

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ON THE DEATH OF A LADY.

By Thomas Moore, Esq.

Sweet spirit! if thy airy sleep
Nor sees my tears nor hears my sighs,
Oh! I will weep, in luxury weep,
Till the last hearts' drop fill mine eyes.

But if thy sainted soul can feel,
And mingles in our misery;
Then, then my breaking heart I'll seal,
Thou shalt not hear one sigh from me.

The beam of morn was on the stream,
But sullen clouds the day deform:
Thou wert, indeed, that morning beam,
And death, alas! that sullen storm.

Thou wert not form'd for living here,
For thou wert kindred with the sky;
Yet, yet we held thee all so dear,
We thought thou wert not form'd to die!

ELEGYAC STANZAS.

How sweetly could I lay my head
Within the cold grave's silent breast,
Where sorrow's tears no more are shed,
No more the ills of life molest.

For, ah! my heart, how very soon
The glittering dreams of youth are past,
And, long before it reach its noon,
The sun of life is overcast.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Lines on visiting a spot, which recalled to mind happier days.

O dear recollection of those happy hours
When here I was wont with my Fanny to stray!
When my path-way of life seem'd strew'd over with flow'rs,
And bright was the sun that illumin'd my day.

But, sad recollection! past, past are forever
Those hours of delight, of contentment and love;
Again shall they bless my sad destiny never,
Or the pang of regret from my bosom remove.

Thou; mem'ry, beguilst the poor heart while it
gladdens,
And gildst for a moment the face of despair;
But reflect once again, and it cruelly saddens,
And turns fairy prospects to visions of care.

FRAGMENT OF A COLLEGE EXERCISE.

By Thomas Moore, Esq.

Justum bellum quibus necessarium, et pia arma, quibus nulla, nisi in armis relinquitur spes. LIVY.

Is there no call, no consecrating cause,
Approv'd by Heaven, ordain'd by Nature's laws,
Where Justice flies the herald of our way,
And Truth's pure beams upon the banners play?

Yes there's a call, sweet as an angel's breath,
To slumbering babes, or innocence in death,
And urgent, as the tongue of Heaven within,
When the miad's balance trembles upon sin.

Oh! 'tis our country's voice, whose claim should meet
An echo in the soul's most deep retreat;
Along the heart's responding string should run,
Nor let a tone there vibrate—but the one!

SELECTED POETRY.

THE SOLDIER'S SONG OF DEATH.

Farewel, thou fair day, thou green earth, and ye skies;
Now gay with the broad setting sun;
Farewel, loves and friendships, the dear, tender ties;
Our race of existence is run!

Thou grim king of terrors, thou life's gloomy foe,
Go, frighten the coward and slave;
Go, teach them to tremble, fell tyrants! but know,
No terrors hast thou to the brave!

Thou strik'st the poor peasant—he sinks in the dark,
Nor saves e'en the wreck of a name;
Thou strik'st the young hero—a glorious mark!
He falls in the blaze of his fame!

In fields of proud honour—our swords in our hands,
Our king and our country to save—
While victory shines on life's last ebbing sands—
O! who would not die with the brave!

EPITAPH.

FROM THE GREEK.

Take to thy bosom, gentle earth, a swain,
With much hard labour in thy service worn:
He set the vines, that clothe yon ample plain,
And he these olives, that the vale adorn.

He fill'd with grain the glebe, the rills he led Through this green herbage and those fruitful
bowers;
Thou, therefore, Earth! lie lightly on his head,
His hoary head, and deck his grave with flowers.

A REVIEW POLITICAL AND LITERARY.

No. 11.

Memorabilia Democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full and true account of that venerable science; interspersed with anecdotes, characters, and speeches, of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats. By SLAVESLAP KIDNAP, Esq. Foolscap, 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651.

Washington—Printed by Samuel H. Smith, for Duane and Cheetham, and Adams and F. Blake, proprietors of the work.

Having given Mr. Kidnap an ample and undisturbed range, in my two last numbers, I shall now resume the privilege, which custom allows a reviewer; and, without indulging myself in any asperities against that gentleman, on account of the diversity, which sometimes exists, in our taste, as well as our politics, I shall utter, I trust with becoming modesty, some opinions, which are suggested by his work, and which have relation to subjects, connected with the politics and literature of my country. I cannot, however, refrain from noticing in this place, an objection, which some raise against Mr. Kidnap. In their judgment, his praise is too extravagant and indiscriminate to be sincere. From the topics, on which he dwells, and from the manner in which he handles them, these deep critics pretend to discover, notwithstanding the multitude of his professions, a delicate and severe strain of irony. It is exceedingly to be lamented that men, in other respects sufficiently sagacious, should thus permit their prejudices to get the mastery of their judgments, or that, for the sake, perhaps, of acquiring a reputation for acuteness, they should be beguiled to commit, towards a most honest man, an act of such flagrant injustice. No suggestions could be more groundless, or cruel, than those, which they thus either make, or countenance. Mr. Kidnap's esteem for Mr. Jefferson is not less sincere and ardent, than his professions are open. Long the friend and admirer of our President, he is eager to seize on every occasion to elucidate merits and acquirements, in his opinion, unrivalled. I will not deny that his praise is often too unqualified. Doubtless, it must, both as it respects, objects and degree, seem to many, as it certainly, sometimes, does to me extravagant; not to say ludicrous. But, on this account, to question his sincerity is to show little knowledge of human nature, and less attention to events, which are daily passing before us.

Are not passion and party prejudice apt mightily to thicken mental vision? And when to these are added the medium, through which huicque, in hunc, never fails to look up to present power have we any cause for surprise, if even palpable defects become the subjects of fatuous applause, and elevated insignificance, in the chair for the day, an object of interested admiration? The vetch of the first Cicero, we are told, was a most beautiful appendage to his face in the eyes of his clients. The gait of lame Agesilaus was the fashionable step of his courtiers. Even the wry neck of Alexander was a modish method of carrying the head, both in Macedon and Persia. Will any man on this account, then, find fault with Mr. Kidnap? Let him look into the writings and listen to the conversation of Mr. Jefferson's friends, and he will find their expressions of wonder and admiration in no material respect different from those, which he condemns. Not only Duane and Cheetham, and Adams and Tom Paine, and Tony Williams, scribblers, bribed by their avarice, or some worse passion, to magnify the ephemeral hero of their party, but men of that sect, who have some pretensions to literary skill, and who, certainly have notions on subjects of taste, infinitely superior to those of the dull rabble, for whose applause Mr. Jefferson is chiefly solicitous, have condescended to celebrate him, not merely as a bone collector, or a mould board maker, but as a rare philosopher, and an exquisite writer. The expressions of Mr. Kidnap are in nothing more extravagant, or ludicrous, than are those, which thousands, in this great city, daily use, touching this flimsy Cossamer, buoyant for the hour, on the breath of the multitude. On account of such expressions, therefore, he is not to be suspected of hollowness in his pretensions of friendship. As to those who pretend to discern, in his writings, a concealed vein of irony, I can only assure them, they have entirely mistaken his character. No writer is farther removed from it. He is, on the contrary, of a singularly grave, contemplative cast of mind. Simplex munditiis is his standard of style. In one of his late letters to me, he thus expresses himself. 'I have, through that whole work, been chiefly solicitous to give a plain dress to substantial truths; and have kept constantly in my eye, that excellent resolution of my favourite poet,—Quid verum, atque dicens, cur et rogo, et omnis in hoc sum.'"

The present, seems to me a very proper occasion to give my sentiments touching Mr. Jefferson, as a writer. My respect for Mr. Kidnap and a natural anxiety on my part, not to be found at variance from one, whose judgment I have such frequent reason to applaud, have induced great examination and caution in settling my opinion, as to his merits, in this particular. I have accordingly read, very carefully, all the letters and works Mr. Jefferson has ever published; the most complete and perfect collection of which, now extant, is contained in the book under review. I cannot however hesitate to declare, that it will never be my fate to admire compositions, like his, destitute of order, of perspicuity, of justness, in both thought and expression, without definite outline, for the whole, and without correct finishing in the parts, because the author is lucky enough, at times, to emit some prettinesses of fancy, which, contrasted with the dark opaque enveloping them, ignorance and fatuity have mistaken for lights or truth, or flashes of genius. With respect to Mr. Jefferson's style, I cannot better express my opinion than by saying, that it is just such a style as Betty, my cookmaid, uses, in writing to her lovers. Some specimens of which, I have received through the medium of my footman, a sly fellow, who sports with her weaknesses. And, upon a little reflection, I find, that there are many and natural reasons, why Betty and Mr. Jefferson should agree so entirely, in their respective manners of expression. For Betty is a long-sided, raw-boned, red-haired slut, and, like Mr. Jefferson always hankering to have a mob of dirty fellows about her. The great object of Betty, in all her writings, is to inspire, or keep up a flame, in which, also, she entirely coincides with Mr. Jefferson. Betty's lovers, too, like his, are, for the most part, a set of fickle, noisy, ignorant bullies; and withal great hunters of taverns and cockpits. Should either Betty, or Mr. Jefferson, fail in maintaining their present conquests, the chance of each is equally at an end, and their fates, in future, must be precisely similar. Both must content themselves with 'claws, bones, and mould boards' the rest of their days. The likeness, is, also, very striking between Mr. Jefferson, in his political, and Betty, in her housewife and culinary, career. For both make a great noise in clearing out their offices, and always leave them in a worse condition, than they found them. The proceedings of both are extremely offensive in the post office; where both keep their tools of the vilest use, and often apply letters to ends, very different from those, to which their writers originally destined them. They have, also, respectively, caused great scandal among their friends, and equal diversion among their enemies, by the shameful modes they have adopted for the placing and wearing a bishop. To conclude this parallel, they are, both of them, naturally, of a very warm constitution, and blunder and burn their fingers, without ceasing; the blood of each being kept in a continual ferment by that perpetual roasting, to which they are equally obliged to submit.

I have thought it my duty to be thus explicit, concerning the state of my mind in relation to Mr. Jefferson's writings, to relieve some of my friends of that unjust apprehension, which I am informed they entertain, lest out of complaisance to Mr. Kidnap, I should yield my own opinions on this subject, or at least conceal them from the world.

I shall now turn my attention to that illustrious body, to which our author has invited our notice, and which is known, in this city, and I believe, (although I do not recollect any direct evidence of this fact,) abroad, by the name of the American Philosophical Society. The gentlemen, composing this institution, have, I am informed, adopted a fixed determination not to suffer their years to pass away in that ominous silence, which once characterized its history; and, after proper precautions to shift off from themselves all risk of loss, by publication, have resolved to print away for their lives; leaving nothing unattempted, and no stone unturned, which may serve to raise a large monument, all on a par with their honor. I think, with great propriety, of this noble design; for, being of a philosophical habit myself, it is a great pleasure to find others, particularly such a famous fraternity, in the same humour. Therefore, from what I am about to intimate, I shall not, I trust, be suspected of holding any heretical opinion, contrary to that canon of this society, which teaches that in literature, bulk is as necessary to respectability, as it is, in nature, to the sublime. To which tenet I do here most heartily subscribe. It is not because I deny the value of the end, but because I hesitate about the propriety of the means, that I take the liberty here to represent a grievance to that illustrious body, which I, in common with all those suffer, who, being few in number and so the more to be pitied, interest themselves in its important labours. I feel the more confidence, in making this representation, as I know that the members of that fraternity, being engaged about sublimer matters, have entirely overlooked the fact I am about to mention; which nevertheless, presses very heavily such an one as I am, not overburdened with cash, and always anxious, when I pay my money, especially if it be for a bauble, to think I have 'my full penny-worth.' That, to which I allude, is a vile, and if I allowed myself in hard words, I might add, villainous trick of their printer, for certainly I would not intimate that it had, in the remotest degree, the sanction of that famous and philanthropic, and, of course, moral association. It is, doubtless, a trick of trade, and consists in spreading out the works of that society, and the communications of its friends, over white paper, in a manner the most unprecedented and unconscionable. I will not dwell upon the immorality of publicly vending white paper under the name of Philosophical Transactions; because the fragrance of the imposition is such that every one, not interested in the deception, must have an intuitive perception of its guilt. But I would particularly press on that society the necessity of an immediate attention to correct this procedure, from the consideration that it gives a superficial appearance to the labours of their great men; whose literary essays are doubtless as deep, as they are commonly dark, but which, by the wire-drawing art of their printer, are made to look to the eye, like, and so, generally, to be accounted very slight and flimsy textures.

To the end that this honourable fraternity may know the extent, to which their printer has carried this scandalous practice, I have taken the pains to make admeasurements and calculations, geometric and arithmetic, of their fourth volume, in which I have also had the assistance of a learned friend, an eminent mathematician. The result of which investigation was, that the said volume is a heavy, rectangular quarto, containing forty-four pages of advertisement, five hundred and thirty-one of Transactions (so called) and forty-four of errata, corrigenda and index-making in the whole six hundred and nineteen pages; that the said pages average eleven inches and an half in height, and nine inches in breadth; margin and letter press included; but that the said letter press is only four inches in breadth, and less than six inches and an half in height. Whereby it is manifest that more than three-fourths of every page is white paper, as is aforesaid. But this is not the whole of the mischief. For the said printer, by means of terminating an essay as often as possible at the top, or in the middle of a page, and leaving all blank beneath, does, in a manner still more cruel, deprive science of the retreat, which that learned society intended, doubtless, to provide for her, within its volumes. So that it is verily my belief, of which I am willing to make oath, if there be occasion, that the said six hundred and eighteen pages might, if judiciously and honestly printed, have been inserted without diminution of type, or loss of beauty, in less than two hundred of the same quarto pages.

There are other and flagrant abuses committed by their said printer; all tending to swell the size of their volumes and to give them an important appearance, without any additional expense of mind, or scientific matter. Such, for instance is that display, which on all occasions he is anxious to make of the fierceness of the affection, with which the correspondents of this society glow for each other. The evidences of these attachments are generally found about the end of their letters, and being spread out with great address, occupy a space, which might, I suggest it however, with great diffidence, have been more profitably employed. Thus, one of their lamented correspondents, a great admirer of Dr. Barton, finishes his letter, in the 127th page of this volume, with the following rare tokens of affection; and the society has preserved them, with as much precision, as though they were a description of the title of a real estate, which it was dangerous either to destroy, or mutilate:

'I am, with great respect,

Dear Sir,

Your most obedient and humble servant

JOHN HECKELWELDER.'

So also the same Dr. Barton, who seems to burn towards Dr. Priestley with a species of philosophic love 'fiagrans amor et libido,' in the 215th page, closes a letter to that great man in this very energetic and close manner.

'I am, with the greatest respect,

Reverend and dear Sir,

Your humble and obedient servant
And affectionate friend

BENJAMIN SMITH BARTON.'

Now, although all this is, doubtless between Mr. Heckelwelder and Dr. Barton, and between Dr. Barton and Dr. Priestley very important information, yet I humbly conceive it is of no sort of value to the world; which is no more interested, than science is benefited, by a paraphrastic detail of the affection and respect and humility, which these gentlemen entertain for one another. I know I may be in an error in this particular; being a philosopher of a different sect, from that, which has its residence in the porch of this academy. I observed, in a former number, that the great duty, which the new school inculcates on its disciples is to make as frequently as possible, devout professions of affection for all mankind in general; and for each other, in particular. Love being, now a-days, not only 'the fulfilling of the law,' but the perfection of philosophy. Of the great moral, practical effect of this passion, among modern professors, some memorable examples have been given in France, during the late revolution. The fate of Lavoisier, in a particular manner, is, if I mistake not, an eminent instance of its happy tendency. And it is not to be doubted, that if this philosophy shall ever attain like power in the United States, it will stimulate its disciples to similar instances of active benevolence towards one another. Admitting then my utter incapacity to judge of this 'new light,' by reason of my want of philosophic regeneration, and that the publication of these authentic testimonials of mutual flame is not less important to science, than it is to the bulk of the volumes of this society, yet I cannot but hope that the printer will hereafter be directed to print them, in close order, and be prohibited from thus sacrificing with such profuse ostentation, a considerable proportion of that narrow space, destined to letter press in these publications. I am the more anxious, on this account, because I have heard some carping critics, wicked sneerers at that venerable society, assert that these volumes are issued to the world, by its express authority, after a careful and laborious examination of a publishing committee, appointed expressly for this purpose. Whereby they would malignantly insinuate that all these schemes, (as well as others not here mentioned,) to enlarge the size of its publications are altogether the work of that most just and pious fraternity; and not, as I have declared, a trick of their printer. An insinuation too gross and malevolent to be believed. But now the members of the institution are apprised of the fact, it is certainly worthy of their wisdom to correct, as fast as possible, the practices, which have given colour to so odious a calumny.

Here, I cannot refrain from informing the American Philosophical Society, that I have, in my possession, a treatise on an art, much valued by the ancients, but which has been lost for almost seventeen centuries. Properly translated, (for I will not be guilty of the pedantry of quoting Latin or Greek, in a communication intended for the benefit of the members of that society,) the name of this art is 'WINNOWING.' It consists in a careful separation and rejection of all the worthless, irrelevant, smutty, frivolous, chaff-like, matter from philosophical publications; thereby reserving for the eye of the reader, nothing but what is sound, wholesome, and perfect, in its kind. This treatise I intend to convey by an early opportunity to one of the corresponding secretaries of the society. And I will venture to recommend it to the diligent perusal of its members; particularly of the publishing committee. The labour of applying its rules, I acknowledge will be considerable. But the effect will be the most happy. I can assure the members of that institution that having sifted the matter of their four first volumes, according to the principles of that ancient art, I was astonished at the compact form their, at present, massy labours assumed, and the narrow room, they were compelled to occupy. I have no doubt, that if a willing and laborious committee would apply, according to the directions, prescribed in that treatise, rigidly to the task of winnowing those volumes as therein-mentioned, that society would soon realize the delightful vision of those four Iliads of theirs, in the circumference of a nutshell. Unless, indeed, upon farther process, they should, as seems to me very probable, find them to be four nutshells, in which there was no Iliad.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM THE EARL OF CHATHAM

TO HIS NEPHEW.

LETTER IV.

Bath, January 14, 1754.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

You will hardly have read over one very long letter from me before you are troubled with a second. I intended to have writ soon, but I do it the sooner on account of your letter to your aunt, which she transmitted to me here. If any thing, my dear boy, could have happened to raise you higher in my esteem, and to endear you more to me, it is the amiable abhorrence you feel for the scene of vice and folly, (and of real misery, and perdition, under the false notion of pleasure and spirit) which has opened to you at your college, and at the same time, the manly, brave, generous, and wise resolution and true spirit, with which you resisted and repulsed the first attempts upon a mind and heart, I thank God, infinitely too firm and noble, as well as too elegant and enlightened, to be in any danger of yielding to such contemptible and wretched corruptions. You charm me with the description of Mr. Wheeler,* and while you say you could adore him, I could adore you for the natural, genuine love of virtue, which speaks in all you feel, say, or do. As to your companions let this be your rule. Cultivate the acquaintance with Mr. Wheeler which you have so fortunately begun: and in general, be sure to associate with men much older than yourself: scholars whenever you can: but always with men of decent and honourable lives. As their age and learning, superior both to your own, must necessarily, in good sense, and in the view of acquiring knowledge from them, entitle them to all deference, and submission of your own lights to theirs, you will particularly practise that first and greatest rule for pleasing in conversation, as well as for drawing instruction and improvement from the company of one's superiors in age and knowledge, namely, to be a patient, attentive, and well-bred hearer, and to answer with modesty: to deliver your own opinions sparingly and with proper diffidence; and if you are forced to desire farther information or explanation upon a point, to do it with proper apologies for the trouble you give: or if obliged to differ, to do it with all possible candour, and an unprejudiced desire to find and ascertain truth, with an entire indifference to the side on which that truth is to be found. There is likewise a particular attention required to contradict with good manners; such as begging pardon, begging leave to doubt, and such like phrases. Pythagoras enjoined his scholars an absolute silence for a long novitiate. I am far from approving such a taciturnity: but I highly recommend the end and intent of Pythagoras's injunction; which is to dedicate the first parts of life more to hear and learn, in order to collect materials, out of which to form opinions founded on proper lights, and well-examined sound principles, than to be presuming, prompt, and flippant in hazarding one's own slight crude notions of things; and thereby exposing the nakedness and emptiness of the mind, like a house opened to company before it is fitted either with necessities, or any ornaments for their reception and entertainment. And not only will this disgrace follow from such temerity and presumption, but a more serious danger is sure to ensue, that is, the embracing errors for truths, prejudices for principles; and when that is once done, (no matter how vainly and weakly) the adhering perhaps to false and dangerous notions, only because one has declared for them, and submitting, for life, the understanding and conscience to a yoke of base and servile prejudices, vainly taken up and obstinately retained. This will never be your danger; but I thought it not amiss to offer these reflections to your thoughts. As to your manner of behaving towards these unhappy young gentlemen you describe, let it be manly and easy; decline their parties with civility; rejoin their raillery with raillery, always tempered with good breeding: if they banter your regularity, order, decency and love of study banter in return their neglect of them: and venture to own frankly, that you came to Cambridge to learn what you can, not to follow, what they are pleased to call pleasure. In short, let your external behaviour to them be as full of politeness and ease, as your inward estimation of them is full of pity, mixed with contempt. I come now to the part of the advice I have to offer to you, which most nearly concerns your welfare, and upon which every good and honourable purpose of your life will assuredly turn; I mean the keeping up in your heart the true sentiments of religion. If you are not right towards God, you can never be so towards man: the noblest sentiment of the human breast is here brought to the test. Is gratitude in the number of a man's virtues? if it be, the highest benefactor demands the warmest returns of gratitude, love, and praise: Ingratum qui dixerit, omnia dixit. If a man wants this virtue where there are infinite obligations to excite and quicken it, he will be likely to want all others towards his fellow-creatures, whose utmost gifts are poor compared to those he daily receives at the hands of his never-failing Almighty Friend. Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth, is big with the deepest wisdom: The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; and, an upright heart, that is understanding. This is eternally true, whether the wits and rakes of Cambridge allow it or not: nay, I must add of this religious wisdom, Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace, whatever your young gentlemen of pleasure think of a whore and a bottle, a tainted health and a battered constitution. Hold fast therefore by this sheet-anchor of happiness, Religion; you will often want it in the times of most danger; the storms and tempests of life. Cherish true religion, as precious as you will fly with abhorrence and contempt, superstition and enthusiasm. The first is the perfection and glory of the human nature; the two last the depravation and disgrace of it. Remember the essence of religion is, a heart void of offence towards God and man; not subtle speculative opinions, but an active vital principle of faith. The words of a heathen were so fine that I must give them to you: Compositum Jus, Fasque, Animi Sanctisque Recessus Mentis, et incoctum generoso Pectus Honesto.

Go on, my dear child, in the admirable dispositions you have towards all that is right and good, and make yourself the love and admiration of the world! I have neither paper nor words to tell you how tenderly

I am yours.

LETTER V.

Bath, January 24, 1754.

I will lose not a moment before I return my most tender and warm thanks to the most amiable, valuable, and noble minded of youths, for the infinite pleasure his letter gives me. My dear nephew, what a beautiful thing is genuine goodness, and how lovely does the human mind appear, in its native purity. (in a nature as happy as yours) before the taints of a corrupted world have touched it! To guard you from the fatal effects of all the dangers that surround and beset youth, (and many they are, nam varie illudunt Pestes) I thank God, is become my pleasing and very important charge; your own choice, and our nearness in blood, and still more, a dearer and nearer relation of hearts, which I feel between us, all concur to make it so. I shall seek then every occasion, my dear young friend, of being useful to you, by offering you those lights, which one must have lived some years in the world to see the full force and extent of, and which the best mind and clearest understanding will suggest imperfectly, in any case, and in the most difficult, delicate, and essential points perhaps not at all, till experience, that dear-bought instructor, comes to our assistance. What I shall therefore make my task, (a happy delightful task, if I prove a safeguard to so much opening virtue,) is to be for some years, what you cannot be by yourself, your experience; experience and wisdom, and readily digested for your use. Thus we will endeavour, my dear child, to join the two best seasons of life, to establish your mind and your happiness upon solid foundations: Misceas Autumni et Veris Honores. So much in general. I will now, my dear nephew, say a few things to you upon a matter where you have surprisingly little to learn, considering you have seen nothing but Boconnock; I mean behaviour. Behaviour is of infinite advantage or prejudice to a man, as he happens to have formed it to a graceful, noble, engaging, and proper manner, or to a vulgar, coarse, ill-bred, or awkward and ungenteel one. Behaviour, though an external thing which seems rather to belong to the body than to the mind, is certainly founded in considerable virtues: though I have known instances of good men, with something very revolting and offensive in their manner of behaviour, especially when they have the misfortune to be naturally very awkward and ungenteel; and which their mistaken friends have helped to confirm them in, by telling them, they were above such trifles, as being genteel, dancing, fencing, riding, and doing all manly exercises, with grace and vigour. As if the body, because inferior, were not a part of the composition of man: and the proper, easy, ready, and graceful use of himself, both in mind and limb, did not go to make up the character of an accomplished man. You are in no danger of falling into this preposterous error: and I had a great pleasure in finding you, when I first saw you in London, so well disposed by nature, and so properly attentive to make yourself genteel in person, and well-bred in behaviour. I am very glad you have taken a fencing-master: that exercise will give you some manly, firm, and graceful attitudes: open your chest, place your head upright, and plant you well upon your legs. As to the use of the sword, it is well to know it: but remember, my dearest nephew, it is a science of defence: and that a sword can never be employed by the hand of man of virtue, in any other cause. As to the carriage of your person, be particularly careful, as you are tall and thin, not to get a habit of stooping; nothing has so poor a look: above all things avoid contracting any peculiar gesticulations of the body, or movements of the muscles of the face. It is rare to see any one a graceful laughter; it is generally better to smile than laugh out, especially to contract a habit of laughing at small or no jokes. Sometimes it would be affectation, or worse, mere moroseness, not to laugh heartily, when the truly ridiculous circumstances of an incident, or the true pleasantry and wit of a thing, call for and justify it; but the trick of laughing frivolously is by all means to be avoided: Risu incepto, Res inceptor nulla est. Now as to politeness; many have attempted definitions of it: I believe it is best to be known by description? definition not being able to comprise it. I would however venture to call it, benevolence in trifles, or the preference of others to ourselves in little daily, hourly, occurrences in the commerce of life. A better place, a more commodious seat, priority in being helped at table, &c. what is it, but sacrificing ourselves in such trifles to the convenience and pleasure of others; And this constitutes true politeness. It is a perpetual attention, (by habit it grows easy and natural to us,) to the little wants of those we are with, by which we either prevent, or remove them. Bowing, ceremonious, formal compliments, stiff civilities, will never be politeness; that must be easy, natural, untaught, manly, noble. And what will give this, but a mind benevolent and perpetually attentive to exert that amiable disposition in trifles towards all you converse and live with? Benevolence in greater matters takes a higher name than that of the queen of virtues. Nothing is so agreeable with politeness as any trick of address to the mind. I would trouble you with a word or two more upon some branches of behaviour, which have a more serious moral obligation in them, than those of mere politeness; which are equally important in the eye of the world. I mean a proper behaviour, adapted to the respective relations we stand in, towards the different ranks of superiors, equals, and inferiors. Let your behaviour towards superiors, in dignity, age, learning, or any distinguished excellence, be full of respect, deference, and modesty. Towards equals, nothing becomes a man so well as well-bread ease, polite freedom, generous frankness, manly spirit, always tempered with gentleness and sweetness of manner, noble sincerity, candour, and openness of heart, qualified and restrained within the bounds of discretion and prudence, and ever limited by a sacred regard to secrecy, in all things entrusted to it, and an inviolable attachment to your word. To inferiors, gentleness, condescension, and affability, is the only dignity. Towards servants, never accustom yourself to rough and passionate language. When they are good we should consider them as humiles Amici, as fellow Christians, ut Conservi; and when they are bad, pity, admonish, and part with them, if incorrigible. On all occasions beware, my dear child, of Anger, that demon, that destroyer of our peace. Ira furor brevis est, animum rege qui nisi pareat Imperat, hunc frenis hunc tu compesce catenis.

Write soon and tell me of your studies.

Your ever affectionate.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

Of the other Harangues of Cicero.

Then follows a very short and very clear discussion of the foundation of the cause, and Cicero might have rested there, if he had meant only to gain it: it was evident; but he had promised in his exordium, to produce something more than a plea for his client; and he kept his word. Addressing himself to the accuser, he continues thus:

"You may demand of me, why I appear so attached to Licinius Archias? Because it is to him that I owe, every day, the sweetest relaxation from the labours of the forum, and the tumult of affairs. Do you believe, that I could find reasons in my own mind, adequate to so many different objects, if I did not incessantly draw, fresh supplies of riches, from the study of letters; or that I could sustain such severe labour, if the charms of this same study, did not serve to recreate and support me. I acknowledge, that I devote myself to them as much as possible. Let those dissemble, who know not how to draw any thing from them, which interests the common utility, or which can be brought into public view; but why should not I avow it, who, for so many years, have lived in such a manner, that neither my leisure, nor my interest, nor my pleasures, nor even my sleep, have ever refused a single moment to the wants of my fellow citizens? Who can reproach me, for devoting to this kind of occupation, that time, which others give to the theatres, to their pleasures, to gambling, to feasting, and to idleness? I ought so much the more to be indulged in these pursuits, as even this art, of which I make profession, and which has been the refuge of my friends in all their perils, this talent of public speaking, makes a part of those studies, which I have always loved, and even if this should be thought of small consequence, there are other advantages, much greater, for which I am under obligation to them. In effect, if every thing which I have read, every thing which I have learned, had not fully persuaded me, from my youth, that nothing is more desirable in this life, than glory and virtue; that we ought to sacrifice every thing to them, and account as nothing, torments, exile and death, should I have exposed myself, for the public safety, to so many contests, and to the continual attacks of the wicked? But all the books, all the monuments of antiquity, all the sayings of wise men, repeat this great lesson; and all these instructions would have remained concealed in darkness, if genius had not applied to them her lights. How many excellent models are presented to us, in these portraits of great men, which have been drawn by the writers of Greece and Italy. They are these, I have always had before my eyes, in the administration of public affairs; it was, by thinking on them, that my soul elevated itself, and formed itself after their resemblance.

"Will any one say to me: Those men, whose glory and virtues have been preserved to us by letters, were they themselves learned men? I cannot affirm it of all: I think that there have been several of a nature so happy, as to raise themselves to every thing honourable and glorious, without having occasion for lessons; and I will add further, that nature, without instruction, has commonly more power than education without genius. But when to all that is furnished by the one, is added, all that can be added, by the other; the result is the most beautiful, the most sublime, the most admirable character in humanity.

"Of this number was Scipio the African, whom our fathers saw, Lelius, Furius, those men, whose wisdom had mastered all their passions, that Cato the elder, the citizen, the most courageous, and the most enlightened of his age; and if all these illustrious personages had believed the culture of literature useless, to the knowledge and practice of virtue, would they have made them one of their occupations?

"But if we consider this occupation, without regard to its utility and importance; if we see in it nothing but amusement and pleasure, it will be still, of all things, the most convenient to a man well educated. The others, indeed, are neither of all times, nor of all places, nor suitable for every age: but literature is at once, the instruction of youth, and the charm of advanced age, the ornament of prosperity, and a consolation under misfortunes; they amuse us in retirement, and are not misplaced in society; they awake with us, they bear us company in our journeys, they follow us into the country; finally, those even, who have no taste for them, cannot refuse them their esteem and admiration.

"As to poetry, in particular, we have heard it said by the best judges, that other talents are acquired by precepts, but that poetry is a gift of nature, a faculty of the imagination, a sort of divine inspiration. Accordingly, our old Ennius calls the poets, holy men, because they are distinguished in our eyes by the presence of the divinity. Let then the name of Poet, which even barbarians have never violated, be sacred among you, and among all men as well informed as you are. The rocks and the deserts seem to echo to the voice of the poet; the brutes themselves appear sensible to harmony, and shall we be insensible? The people of Colophon, of Chio, of Salamine, of Smyrna, and of other cities, still contend for the honor of the birth of Homer, and erect altars to his memory. A long time after his death, they wish to have him for a fellow-citizen, because he was a great poet; and shall we reject him, who is really ours, both by his own inclination and by our laws. Shall we spurn the man, who has employed his genius in singing the glory of the Roman people? Yes! in his early youth, he composed a poem upon the war of the Cimbrians, and this was flattering even to Marius, who was, as you very well know, a stranger to the commerce of the muses. It was, because there is no man so obdurate and so stern, as not to be moved, when he perceives his own name transported, by poetry, to future generations. It was once asked of that celebrated Athenian Themistocles, what voice he should hear with the greatest pleasure: that, said he, of him, who shall sing in the best strains the actions of my life. This same Archias has celebrated, in another work, the virtues of Lucullus, over Mithridates, and that war, so fertile in revolutions, which opened to the Roman armies countries, which nature seemed to have excluded from them, those memorable battles, in which Lucullus, with an handful of soldiers, defeated innumerable armies, that siege of Cyzicum, by which he saved a city, our ally, from the fury of Mithridates, that inevitable action of Tenedos, by which the naval forces of that powerful king were annihilated, with the officers who commanded them. The glory of Lucullus is our glory; what has been done for him, was done for us; and in the poems of Archias, consecrated to Lucullus, will be perpetuated, the trophies, the monuments, and the triumphs of Rome.

"And who of us is ignorant, how dear was Ennius to our famous Scipio the African? The statue of this poet is erected in marble, on the tomb of the Scipios. His poem on the Punic war, is regarded as an homage rendered to the Roman name: it is there, that the Fabii, the Marcelli, the Fulvii, the Catos, are loaded with honourable praises, which we partake with them; covered with glory, which reflects upon us: Accordingly, our ancestors gave to this poet, born in Calabria, the title of a Roman citizen, and shall we refuse it to Archias, to whom our laws have granted it? We ought not to imagine, that his labours are the less interesting to us, because he wrote in Greek verse: this would be to deceive ourselves grossly. The Greek language is diffused through the whole world; ours is confined within the limits of our empire; and, if our power is limited to the countries, which we have conquered, ought we not to wish, that our glory may penetrate regions, which our armies have not been able to reach? If this kind of illustration is agreeable and precious, even to the people, whose exploits the poet celebrates, of what value must they not be, and what encouragement ought we not to give to the chiefs, the generals, the magistrates, who look for nothing but glory in their labours and perils? Alexander had in his train a great number of writers, charged with the composition of his history; but when he saw the tomb of Achilles, he cried out: Happy Achilles, who found an Homer to praise you! And, in fact, without that immortal Iliad, the same tomb, which covered the remains of the conqueror of Troy, would have buried his memory. What shall I say of our great Pompey, whose extraordinary fortune has equalled his valour, and who, in presence of his army, proclaimed Theophanes of Mitylene, the historian of his exploits, a citizen of Rome? And our soldiers, those men without letters, for the most part rustic and clownish, sensible, however, to the honours of their general, and, believing that they share in them, answered with their acclamations to the eulogium, which he made of Theophanes.

"We will be candid, Romans; we will dare to avow in public, what every one of us thinks in secret: we are all in love with praise, and those, whom it touches the most keenly, are also those, who know best how to merit it. The philosophers, who write upon the contempt of glory, inscribe their names upon their writings, and are still studious of it, even when they appear to despise it. Decimus Brutus, as great a captain as he was a good citizen, engraved on the monuments he raised, the verses of Accius, his friend. Fulvius, whom our Ennius attended, when he triumphed over the Etolians, consecrated to the muses the spoils he had taken. Is it then the Roman robe, which shall declare itself their enemy, when the generals of armies revere them, and refuse to poets that protection, and those rewards, which are granted them by warriors?

"I will go farther, and if I am permitted to speak of my own interest; if I hazard to shew before you, that love of glory, too ardent perhaps, but which never ceases to be a noble and laudable sentiment, I will acknowledge, that Archias has regarded as a subject worthy of his verse, the events of my consulate, and all that I have done with you, for the safety of our country. The work is begun; I have heard it read. I have been affected with it, and I have exhorted him, to finish it. For virtue desires no other recompense for its labours and dangers, than this glorious testimony, which is to pass to posterity; and if we would take this away, what will remain in this life, so rapid and so short, which can indemnify for so many sacrifices! Certainly, if our souls had not a presentiment of futurity; if it were necessary, that our thoughts should be confined within the limits of our duration here, who of us could wear himself out, with so many fatigues, torment himself with so many anxieties and vigils, and make so light of his life. But there is in all elevated minds an interior power, which makes them feel day and night, the spurs of glory, a sentiment, which admonishes us, that our memory ought not to perish with us, and that it ought to be extended and perpetuated through endless ages. Ah! shall all of us, victims, devoted to the defence of the republic, debase ourselves, to such a degree, as to believe, that, after having lived in such a manner, as not to have one moment of repose or tranquillity, we must, after all, perish entirely? If the greatest men are anxious, to leave their resemblance, in portraits, and perishable statues, ought we not to attach a much greater price to those monuments of genius, which transmit to remotest posterity, the faithful impressions of our souls, of our sentiments, of our thoughts! For myself, Romans, in performing what I have done, I believed that the memory of it would be spread, through the whole earth and the extent of ages. And, whether the tomb shall take from me, the sentiment of this immortality, or whether, as all the wisest men have believed, some part of us must continue, still capable of enjoying it, at this day, at least, this thought cannot be taken from me, which is at once my pleasure, and my reward.

"Preserve then, Romans, a citizen of merit, equally apparent, by the quality and antiquity of relations the most respectable; a man of such genius, that our fellow citizens, the most illustrious, have desired to attach it to them, and to reap the fruits of it; a man, under accusation, whose clear right is attested by the benefit of the law, by the authority of a municipal city, by the testimony of a Lucullus, and the records of a Metellus. Determine, that he, who has laboured to add, as far as in him lay, to your glory to that of your generals, and that of the Roman people, who promises still, to consecrate to memory those recent and domestic storms, from which you have escaped; who is of the number of those men, whose persons are held inviolable, among all nations; shall not be called before you, to receive a cruel affront, but that he shall obtain a pledge of your justice, and of your goodness."

On reading this discourse, we are delighted to see the author paint himself at full length, to recognize in him that frank sensibility, that enthusiasm for glory, which are treated with contempt, as vanity and weakness, by men, who, in reality, never will be capable of so sublime a sentiment. I know, it may be said, that there is much more dignity in doing great things, without thinking of praise or glory; but it is easier to prescribe this precept, than to find an example of it; and this species of virtue will be always so rare, and so difficult to prove, that it is much better, for the common interest, not to decry this motive, at least the most noble of all, which has produced, and always will produce so much good. It would be very unskilful, to discourage those, who, while they are doing every thing for us, ask only our applause. If this is vanity, may it become general! This, it appears to me, is the wish, the most useful and the most wise, that we can form, for the good of mankind.

CRITICISM

On Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres. By Hugh Blair, D. D.

Any instead of Either.

The verse marches with a more slow and measured pace, than in any of the two former cases. ii. 330.

Either instead of Each.

Truth, duty, and interest. But the arguments directed towards either of them are generally distinct. ii. 184.—Either refers to two things only.

The distributive pronoun Neither, improperly followed by the possessive pronoun in the Plural number.

Sight and feeling are, in this respect, perfectly on a level; neither of them can extend beyond their own objects. 413.—Its own objects. Neither relates to two persons or things, taken separately.

Each improperly followed by a verb in the Plural number.

Here are several distinct objects, and each of them are addressed or spoken to. 335.—is addressed.

Each other instead of one another.

By what bond could any multitude of men be kept together, until once, by the intervention of speech, they could communicate their wants and intentions to each other. 100. Objects could not be distinguished from each other. 156. A great number of governments, rivals of each other. ii. 11.

One another instead of each other.

Two men, ignorant of one another's language. 102. The close relation of any two words to one another in meaning. 122. Where two things are compared or contrasted to one another. 243. Which two opinions are entirely consistent with one another. 490. The characters of Corneille and Racine are happily contrasted with one another. ii. 520.—Each other, like the word both, ought only to be used when we are speaking of two things; one another, when we are speaking of more than two.

One followed by a pronominal adjective in the plural number.

It has been advised by writers on this subject [action] to practice before a mirror, where one may see, and judge of their own gestures. ii. 222.

Them both.

The representing them both as subject, at one moment, to the command of God, produces a noble effect. 62. The single word 'ascertain' conveys the import of them both. 418. Ezekiel, in poetical grace and elegance, is much inferior to them both. ii. 403.—Them both is an awkward pleonasm.

The Relative not agreeing with its Antecedent.

That ingenious nation, who have done so much honour to modern literature. ii. 284.—The writers of that ingenious nation.

Verbs in the plural number instead of the singular.

A great mass of rocks, thrown together by the hand of nature, with wildness and confusion, strike the mind with more grandeur, than if they had been adjusted to each other with the most accurate symmetry. 52.—The author might have said, vast rocks thrown together. Mass is not a noun of multitude.

My heart begins to be touched; my gratitude or my compassion begin to flow. ii. 192.—begins to flow.

The smart, or the sneering manner of telling a story, are inconsistent with the historical character. ii. 273. Neither the one, nor the other, find a proper place in history. ii. 280. What the heart or the imagination dictate. ii. 299. There was much genius in the world before there were learning or arts to refine it. 343.—before there were arts or learning.

You was instead of you were.

You was in distress circumstances; you was pushed to the utmost. ii. 186. When you was most in earnest. ii. 219.—You in English, vous in French, and voi in Italian, are uniformly and indisputably pronouns of the plural number. The use of them, in speaking to one person, is a modern refinement, intimating, that we regard the person we are speaking to, as much as we do a multitude of other people.

The subjunctive mode instead of the indicative.

I must observe, that, although this part of style merit attention, and be a very proper object of science and rule; although much of the beauty of composition depends on figurative language; yet we must beware of imagining, that it depends solely, or even chiefly, upon such language. 277.—That figurative language merits attention, and is a very proper object of science and rule, are positions which do not admit of the least doubt, and therefore should not have been expressed in the subjunctive mode; more especially as the verb depends, in the same sentence, and in the same circumstances, is used in the indicative.

We shall be disgusted if he give us too much of the servile employments, and low ideas of actual peasants; and if he makes his shepherds discourse as if they were courtiers, &c. ii. 338.

It were to be wished, that some such work were undertaken. 201. It were to be wished, for the honour of his memory. ii. 301.—'It were to be wished' is an absurd phrase. There is no pretence for the use of the subjunctive mode in this case. 'It is to be wished' is the proper expression.

Sermons are always the more striking, and commonly the more useful, the more precise and particular the subject of them be. ii. 109.—Here is likewise no pretence for the use of the subjunctive mode; and be, in the indicative, is obsolete.

Verbs which ought to be in the active, or the passive voice, employed as neuters.

The mist dissipates, which seemed formerly to hang over the object. 21.—The mist is dissipated, evaporates, or, disappears.

This manner of writing obtained among the Assyrians. 134. 145, 146. 151. 187. &c.—Obtained is frequently used as a neuter verb; but prevailed is preferable.

This readily connects with the flourishing period of a plant. 282. The reader soon waries of this play of fancy. 313. To keep up the reader's attention, and to prevent him from tiring of the author. 382.—By tiring of the author, the professor means, being tired of him. But in this sentence, the expression can only signify the reader's tiring or fatiguing the author.

Such author's as those one never tires of reading. 395. Lest the reader should tire of what he may consider as petty remarks. 467. Every audience is very ready to tire. ii. 60. They begin to tire. ib. He will tire of it, and forget it. ii. 175.—The verb tire, like the word fatigue, is generally used in the passive form: as, he is tired with reading, or, he begins to be tired.

The use of the word applies.

The word 'nature' would have equally applied to idea and to soul. 448.—have been equally applicable.

The epithet 'stately' applies, with more propriety, to 'palaces.' 466. My other observation, which applies equally to dean Swift and Mr. Addison. 495. The saying applies to the subject now before us. ii. 303.—This expression is a Scotticism, which has been lately introduced into the English language, by some careless writers.

Had instead of would, attended with some other improper phrases, or a faulty arrangement.

Metaphors, which need this apology of an 'as it were,' had generally be better omitted. 305. In this case, figures had much better be wanted. 365. This sentence had better been wanting altogether. 425. He had better have omitted the omitted the word. 334. It had better have been expressed by, &c. 436. This member of the sentence had much better have been omitted. 449. 450. ii. 159. Had better have been dropped. 450. The parenthesis had better, far better, have been avoided. 457.—By omitting the adverbs, the reader will perceive the gross absurdity of these phrases, had be wanted, had have been dropped, had have been avoided, &c. The author should have said, this sentence would have been better omitted, &c.

Will instead of shall.

Without having attended to this, we will be at a loss in understanding several passages of the classics. 109. What we conceive clearly, we will naturally express with clearness. 402. As this sentence contains several inaccuracies, I will be obliged to enter into a minute discussion of its structure and parts. 447. We will always be able to give most body to that pitch of voice, to which in conversation we are accustomed. ii. 206, &c.

Will instead of may.

There are few great occasions of public speaking, in which one will not derive assistance from cultivated taste, and extensive knowledge. ii. 234.

Shall instead of should.

If it shall now be required, What are the proper sources of the sublime? 75.

Would instead of should.

The Amatics a no time relished any thing but what was full of ornament, and splendid in degree, that we would denominate gaudy. 20. There are no two words we would more readily take to be synonymous than 'amare' and 'amare.' 196. 'Tutus' and 'securus' are words which we would readily conjoin. 196. Without a careful attention to the sense, we would be unduly led, by the rules of syntax, to refer to the rising and setting of the sun. 213. We would be greatly at a loss, if we could not borrow assistance from figures. 285. If I should mingle in one discourse arguments for the love of God, and for the love of our neighbour, I would offend unpardonably against unity. ii. 109.—If I were to mingle, I should.

From whom [Horace] we would be led to form a very high idea of the taste and genius of the Augustan age. ii. 258. The heroes glorying, as we would now think very indecently, over their fallen enemies. ii. 429.

BRIEF MEMOIRS OF LIVING AUTHORS.

JOHN AIKIN, ESQ. M.D.

Son of the late Dr. Aikin of Warrington, brother to the celebrated Mrs. Barbauld, and an author of great ability and reputation. He published in 1771, a volume on the Ligature of Arteries. His other medical works are, a thin octavo volume on the Use of Preparations of Lead: another, of Essays in Surgery, and a third of Thoughts on Hospitals: a quarto pamphlet, entitled, 'A Specimen of the Medical History of Great Britain': an octavo volume of Biographical Memoirs of Medicine: another, entitled, 'Elements of Surgery,' and two octavo volumes, entitled, 'Elements of Physic and Surgery': an edition of Lewis's History of the Materia Medica, in quarto: and a Manual of Materia Medica in duodecimo. His publications are not however by any means all of a professional kind. In 1773, he published an octavo volume of Miscellanies in conjunction with his sister: his poem entitled, 'Duncan's Warning,' has been greatly admired: He has likewise published a Translation of Tacitus's Manners of the Germans and Life of Agricola: on which performance it is no contemptible eulogium, and it may certainly be pronounced with truth, that notwithstanding the able hands into which the great historian has since fallen, Dr. Aikin's Translation of these Tracts is the best we have. It seems a little surprising that the ingenious author should allow a book which has been in so great request, to remain scarce for want of new impressions. Dr. Aikin has also published An Essay on the Application of Natural History to Poetry: an edition of Thomson's Seasons with Notes: The Kalendar of Nature: a small volume of Poems: England Delineated: A View of the Character and Public Services of Mr. John Howard: an edition of Armstrong's Art of Health, with a critical Essay: an edition of Somerville's Chace, with a critical Essay: A Description of the Country from thirty to forty miles round Manchester, in quarto, the materials of which were arranged, and the work composed by the Doctor: Letters to his Son: an edition of the Spleen, and other Poems, by Matthew Green, and an edition of Pope's Essay on Man, with a critical Essay prefixed: Beside these performances, Dr. Aikin has condescended to, some smaller ones for the instruction of children. It redounds not a little to the credit of the late Dr. Aikin of Warrington that both his son and daughter possess so respectable an eminence in the republic of letters: they are children worthy of such a father: the undoubted heirs of his talents and his virtues. From perusing the list of his works, the reader will observe by how many monuments of literature the talents of the former have been ascertained; and it is needless for us to add our testimony to his fine genius and noble sentiments, or to repeat a suffrage which the general consent of the learned has so frequently conferred: there has never failed to adorn and dignify the subjects that he has taken in hand. Dr. Aikin is said at present to have a leading share in the conduct of the Monthly Magazine, a publication whose merits certainly bespeak an able pilot.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

SPANISH ETIQUETTE.

The etiquette of the Spanish court was the most severe in Europe. One of their kings fell a victim to it. Philip III. being newly recovered from a dangerous malady, was sitting near a chimney, in which was so large a fire of wood, that he was almost stifled. Etiquette did not permit him to rise, nor a common domestic to enter. At length the Marquis de Pobar, chamberlain, came in, but Etiquette forbade his interference, and the Duke of Usseda, master of the household, was sent for. He was gone out; and the flame increased, while the king bore it patiently, rather than violate his dignity. But his blood was so heated, that next morning an erysipelas of the head appeared, and a relapse of the fever soon carried him off.

FROM THE ANTI-JACOBIN REVIEW

FOR JULY, 1803.

Supposed to be written on the water, on board the barge that carried the Police Magistrates to Blackwall last year.

Thames! sire of Albion's streams! imperial tide,
Of fam'd Augusta's wealth the source and pride;
From Julius' town, the din of war no more
Shakes with triumphant peal thy crowded shore.
Hail this auspicious bark; for lo! on board
Mild Themis' waves her olive braided sword,
By mercy sheath'd, or only drawn to awe
The guilty victims of insulted law.

Around the scene her eyes the goddess threw,
And, as the world of wonders struck her view,
Long quays by swarming industry supplied,
Forest of masts the sea-broad wave that hide;
Exulting while she gaz'd, she thus express'd
The warm emotions of her glowing breast.

'These are my triumphs!—war in vain might sweep
The hostile corsair from the enfranchis'd deep;
In vain escap'd from Ocean's fatal rage,
Where winds and waves eternal battle wage;
The fleet with all creation's treasures fraught,
Safe to these shores successful commerce brought:
If midnight plunder with insidious wiles
The merchant of his toil-earn'd wealth beguiles.
But lo! my favourite son, with patriot mind,
Preventive plans of general wealth design'd;
Scann'd with discerning eye corruption's source,
And all the varied powers of fraud and force,
Then found a code to check the bold career,
And teach the river pirate first to fear.
This to three chiefs a power efficient gave,
The gallant admirals of the peaceful wave.
And as when brave St. Vincent's sails appear'd,
Where Duncan, Nelson, Howe, their ensigns rear'd,
France struck her haughty flag! and vanquish'd Spain,
And aw'd Batavia yielded up the main.

So at Kinnaird's, and Bragg's, and Heriot's names,
Who grasp the potent trident of the Thames,
Dejected rapine hung the drooping head,
And all the wretched race of rillian's fled:
Light horsemen throw their black-strap bags away,
No Jemmy's skreen the plunderer of the day.
About the bow no dirty mullarks stand
To catch the pillage from the lumper's hand;
Their wil' arts the ratcatchers give o'er,
And the game lightermen are seen no more.'

Nor were the plaudits of the goddess shewn
To naval deeds and naval chiefs alone;
The heroes of the land her plaudits share,
From oozy Shadwell to remote Queen's square;
Out Bow-street: most with knightly honours crown'd,
From Sir John Fielding, to Sir Richard Ford;
Applauds the toil assiduous that relieves
Augusta's streets from prostitutes and thieves;
The bold foot pad-checks in his midnight course,
And drags the highway robber from his horse.

So long the extended series to pursue,
And see Blackwall just rises to the view;
The river vaing and the muse requires,
Water has dapp'd, and wine must raise her fire.

DIDOT'S STEREOTYPE EDITIONS

Are printed upon 287 clichés, or fixed pages of metal, with prominent characters, hot stamped, by the fall of a strong hollow plate.

The matrix plate, in use for a century, was at first nothing but a mass of argillaceous earth, and latterly of lead, excavated by the simultaneous impression of a moveable text of printing characters. Thus, each of these characters being only the produce of a cast, in its particular matrix struck with a puncheon, it is evident that the form of the primitive relief, engraved on steel, with extreme accuracy, passed through three intermediate impressions, before it was stamped on the cliché or page.

Our process in matrices of single characters admits of but one preparatory impression, which never injures the purity of the original puncheon. This stéréotypage, as simple as the common typography, differs from it, in no other respect, than the inverted order of its characters, the sole use of which is to stamp the relief of the fixed page, by which the ink is to be applied to the paper. Imagine moveable types of copper, separately excavated by the stroke of the archetypal steel; collect and arrange these, and you form one of our paginal matrices.

STEREOTYPE OFFICE,

Duke Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, 4th February, 1804.

Mr. WILSON respectfully informs the Public, that he is now prepared to undertake the printing of Works by Stereotype Plates, subject to the following Standing Rules of the Stereotype Office.

1. Nothing is to be printed against Religion.
2. Every thing is to be avoided, upon the subject of Politics, which is offensive to any Party.
3. The Characters of Individuals are not to be attacked.
4. Every Work, which is Stereotyped, at this Office, is to be composed with beautiful Types.
5. All the Stereotype Plates are to be made according to the improved process, discovered by Earl STANHOPE.
6. School Books, and all Works for the Instruction of Youth, will be Stereotyped here, at a lower price than any other.

Farther Particulars may be known, upon application at the Stereotype Office; and it is requested that all Letters may be post-paid.

The public are indebted to the ingenuity and perseverance of Earl Stanhope, for the perfection of this art. So doubtful were the printers of its success, that it was with some difficulty, in the onset, that his lordship found a man, either willing or adequate, to second his views, and assist his experiments by typographical knowledge. Mr. Wilson, fortunately for himself, was awake to the advantages, which could not fail to result from the completion of his project. He saw, that the noble earl's design was simply to benefit the literary world, by lowering the price of books, and opening a more easy path to the attainment of useful information. His success has been as brilliant, as are the prospects which the stereotype art opens to the mental eye of the philanthropist; and already has he thrust his sickle into the golden harvest. The syndics of the Cambridge university press have purchased the art, at a great expense; and their printer, Mr. Watts, has erected a foundry, upon a more extensive scale, than that of Mr. Wilson, in London, in order to reprint all books, under the university patent, in a style of accuracy and elegance, hitherto unknown. The old presses are entirely laid aside, to make way for others, upon his lordship's plan; which unite all the advantages of convenience, with an incredible saving of labour and time.

It is with pleasure we remark, that, while typography has received such a valuable aid, in Great Britain, the American printers have not been inactive. Mr. HUGH MAXWELL has invented a press, upon a very different plan, from that of Lord Stanhope, but which possesses the same advantages, and bears honourable testimony of the inventor's ingenuity. It is our intention, in another number, to dwell longer on this subject, and give an account of some other inventions, which are considered to be of the highest importance to the arts.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE HOUSE OF SLOTH.

By DR. DWIGHT.

Beside yon lonely tree, whose branches bare,
Rise white, and murmur to the passing air;
There, where the twining briars the yard inclose,
The house of Sloth stands hush'd in long repose.

In a late round of solitary care,
My feet instinct to rove, they knew not where,
I thither came. With yellow blossoms gay,
The tall rank weed begirt the tangled way:
Curious to view, I forc'd a path between,
And climb'd the broken stile, and gaz'd the scene.

O'er an old well, the curb half fallen spread,
Whose boards, end-loose, a mournful creaking made;
Pois'd on a leaning post, and ill sustain'd,
In ruin sad, a mouldering swepe remain'd;
Useless, the crooked pole still dangling hung,
And, tied with thrums, a broken bucket swung.

A half-made wall around the garden lay,
Mended, in gaps, with brushwood in decay.
No culture through the woven briars was seen,
Save a few sickly plants of faded green:
The starv'd potato hung its blasted seeds,
And fennel struggled to o'ertop the weeds.
There gaz'd a ragged sheep, with wild surprise,
And two lean geese upturn'd their slanting eyes.

The cottage gap'd with many a dismal yawn,
Where, rent to burn, the covering boards were gone;
Or, by one nail, where others endwise hung,
The sky look'd through, and winds portentous rung.
In waves the yielding roof appear'd to run,
And half the chimney-top was fallen down.

The ancient cellar-door, of structure rude,
With tatter'd garments calk'd, half open stood.
There, as I peep'd, I saw the ruin'd bin;
The sills were broke; the wall had crumbled in;
A few long emptied casks lay mould'ring round,
And wasted ashes sprinkled o'er the ground;
While, a sad sharer in the household ill,
A half-starv'd rat crawl'd out, and bade farewell.

One window dim, a loop-hole to the sight,
Shed round the room a pale, penurious light;
Here rags gay-colour'd creak'd the broken glass;
There panes of wood supplied the vacant space.

As, pondering deep, I gaz'd, with gritty roar
The hinges creak'd, and open stood the door.
Two little boys, half-naked from the waist,
With staring wonder ey'd me as I pass'd.
The smile of Pity blended with her tear—
Ah me! how rarely comfort visits here!

On a lean hammock, once with feathers fill'd,
His limbs by dirty tatters ill conceal'd,
Though now the sun had rounded half the day,
Stretch'd at full length the lounge snoring lay:

While his sad wife beside her dresser stood,
And wash'd her hungry household's meagre food.
His aged sire, whose beard and flowing hair
Wav'd silver o'er his antiquated chair,
Rose from his seat; and, as he watch'd my eye,
Deep from his bosom heav'd a mournful sigh—
'Stranger (he cried) once better days I knew;
And, trembling, shed the venerable dew.
I wish'd a kind reply; but wish'd in vain;
No words came timely to relieve my pain.
To the poor parent, and her infants dear,
Two mites I gave, besprinkled with a tear;
And, fix'd again to see the wretched shed,
Withdrew in silence, clos'd the door and fled.

Yet this so lazy man I've often seen
Hurrying and bustling round the busy green;
The loudest prater in a blacksmith's shop;
The wisest statesman o'er a drunken cup;
(His sharp bon'd horse, the street that nightly fed Tied, many an hour, in yonder tavern shed,)
In every gambling, racing match, abroad,
But a rare hearer in the house of God.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

On finding — employed at her needle, previous to her confinement.

The fairest nymph of winning charms possess'd,
Ne'er kindled livelier raptures in her swain,
Than when Alzora to my heart I press'd
And saw her smiles return my love again.

Her features softening o'er the muslin task,
Which fondness prompted to her infant care,
A fear betray'd she sweetly strove to mask,
But mark'd the little drapery with a tear.

My throbbing heart the sad emotion caught;
Yet e'er it heav'd the deeply anxious sigh,
My struggling grief she view'd, and kindly sought
To drive the flowing sorrow from my eye.

The dutious efforts of her heaving breast,
Which check'd the aching impulse as it rose,
Each apprehension for herself repress,
And hush'd at once my feelings to repose.

Again her hands the soft attire prepar'd,
Her wish'd-for innocent she hop'd might wear;
I thought—Oh! may that innocent be spar'd,
And prove as happy, as the mother's dear.

To Chloe—at parting.

Why Chloe thus avert thine eye
To hide from me its tear?
Why check thy bosom's rising sigh,
When I that sigh would share?

Weep not, dear maid, because we part;
We soon shall meet again;
Dispel those fears, which rend my heart,
And cause thee so much pain.

Should distance mock our warm embrace,
Though worlds between us lie,
Thy fancied form the hours shall chase,
And make me think thee by.

If beauty with her dimpled smile
Invite me to her arms,
I'll shun the sorceress, scorn the wile,
To dream of Chloe's charms.

Cease then to weep, those fears subdue,
From trembling love that rise,
Nor think I'll ever prove untrue
To her I've sworn to prize.

SONG.

I never 'till now would believe
A bosom with apathy fraught,
Could tender impressions receive,
Or ever by Cupid be caught.

And yet when I chanc'd to survey,
On Chloe's pure lips a sweet smile,
To Love I at once fell a prey,
And own'd myself charm'd with his wile.

Her bosom unveil'd to my eye,
Arose with each thought she express'd,
It tenderly sanction'd my sigh,
And told me I soon should be bless'd.

The promise I long'd to ensure,
And gaz'd with delight on the shrine,
Whose heart I perceiv'd was as pure
As the flame it had kindled in mine.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.
ODE TO MORNING.

By Thomas Moore, Esq.

Turn to me, Love! the morning rays
Are glowing on thy languid charms;
Take one luxurious parting gaze,
While yet I linger in thine arms.

'Twas long before the noon of night,
I stole into thy bosom, dear!
And now the glance of dawning light
Has found me still in dalliance here.

Turn to me, Love! the trembling gleams
Of morn along thy white neck stray,
Away, away, you envious beams,
I'll chase you with my lips away!

Oh! is it not divine to think,
While all around were lull'd in night,
While even the planets seem'd to wink,
We kept our vigils of delight.

The heart, that little world of ours,
Unlike the drowsy world of care,
Then, then awak'd its sweetest powers,
And all was animation there.

Kiss me once more, and then I fly,
Our parting would to noon-day last;
Then close that languid, trembling eye,
And sweetly dream of all the past!

As soon as night shall fix her seal
Upon the eyes and lips of men,
Oh, dearest! I will panting steal,
To nestle in thine arms again.

Our joys shall take their stolen flight,
Secret as those celestial spheres,
Which make sweet music all the night,
Unheard by drowsy mortal ears!

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

Among the French Poets of the last age, whose writings display taste and sentiment, I have been particularly pleased with Bernard, commonly called, Le gentil Bernard; and was gratified by observing, that the accomplished and learned Levizac speaks justly of him, and extracts liberally from his works, in his 'Bibliothèque Portative,' (last edition.) Many will concur with him, in thinking, that Bernard's Art of Love, is superior to that of Ovid; and that his Anacreontic Odes stand unrivalled by any of his contemporaries. If in the former there appears too much of the prurient, and there is less, than in that of his prototype; and in his Amatory Poems, there is a delicacy and chastity, both of thought and of expression. I have amused my leisure by an imitation of a few of his small pieces, which, if you like, you may publish in the Port Folio.

Yours, &c.
QUIDAM.

TO THE ROSE.

IMITATED FROM 'BERNARD.'

Soft offspring of dew of Aurora,
Which kisses of Zephyrs perfume;
Young queen of the empire of Flora,
How gladly we hail thy fresh bloom.

Maria is like a young flower,
Fresh, blooming, and charming to see,
Thou rose, may'st like her smile an hour,
She is not so fugacious as thee.

If thou from thy stalk wilt descend,
With thy tints deck her bosom so gay;
All flowers thou in bliss shalt transcend,
As in beauty thou'rt fairer than they.

Thou may'st live, or even die on that spot,
Let it be both thy throne and thy tomb;
I, envious of thy happy lot,
To reign there, would glad meet such doom.

And shouldst thou apparently languish,
Without sympathy left, to complain.
If she heaves but one soft sigh like anguish,
It will surely revive thee again.

Sly Cupid will doubtless instruct thee,
What grace may to modesty yield;
What of charms to expose, will direct thee;
And what beauties to leave quite conceal'd.

And if any rash hand would annoy thee,
And the spot for thy rest thou hast chose,
As my minister let me employ thee,
To wound with thy thorns all our foes.

TO THE MUSES.

IMITATED FROM 'BERNARD.'

Ye maids of Parnassus, who rove
With the smiles of delight in your faces;
Ye know, that the soul without love,
Is like beauty, devoid of the graces.

No captive the soul but to love:
Though surprize be effected by art;
This a transient dominion will prove;
None but love retains power o'er the heart.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

In looking over an old number of the London 'Monthly Mirror,' I met with the following Jeu d'Esprit, which I have endeavoured to translate. Should you think it worthy the attention of any of your readers, it will serve to fill up some vacant corner of your very useful Port Folio, and oblige

SELECTED POETRY.

FROM THE POEMS OF MRS. HUNTER.

In several of these poems we recognize that beautiful simplicity of feeling and expression, which appear in this Lady's ballad, called, 'Queen Mary's Lamentations,' and the Death Song of an Indian.'

TO MY DAUGHTER, ON BEING SEPARATED FROM HER, ON HER MARRIAGE.

Dear to my heart, as life's warm stream,
Which animates this mortal clay,
For thee I court the waking dream,
And deck with smiles the future day;
And thus beguile the present pain
With hopes, that we shall meet again.

Yet, will it be, as when the past
Twin'd every joy, and care, and thought,
And o'er our minds one mantle cast,
Of kind affections, finely wrought?
Ah no! the groundless hope were vain,
For so we ne'er can meet again!

May he, who claims thy tender heart,
Deserve its love, as I have done!
For kind and gentle as thou art.
If so belov'd, thou'rt fairly won;
Bright may the fav'rd torch remain,
And cheer thee till we meet again.

HYMN,

BY DR. HAWKESWORTH,

Composed about a month before his death, and dictated to Mrs. H. before he rose in the morning.

In sleep's serene oblivion laid,
I safely passed the silent night:
At once I see the breaking shade,
And drink again the morning light.

New born, I bless the waking hour,
Once more, with awe, rejoic'd, to see
My conscious soul resumes her power,
And springs, my gracious God, to thee.

O! guide me through the various maze,
My doubtful feet are doom'd to tread;
And spread thy shield's protecting blaze,
When dangers pass around my head.

A deeper shade will soon impend,
A deeper sleep my eyes oppress;
Yet still thy strength shall me defend,
Thy goodness still shall deign to bless.

That deeper shade shall fade away,
That deeper sleep shall leave my eyes;
Thy light shall give eternal day,
Thy love the rapture of the skies.

EPIGRAM.

TO COUNT GRAVINA,

On his translating the author's song, on a rose,
into Italian verse.

My rose, Gravina, blooms anew,
And steep'd not now in rain,
But in Castalian streams by you,
Will never fade again.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM THE EARL OF CHATHAM

TO HIS NEPHEW.

LETTER VI.

Bath, February 3, 1754.

Nothing can, or ought to give me a higher satisfaction, than the obliging manner in which my dear nephew receives my most sincere and affectionate endeavours, to be of use to him. You much overrate the obligation, whatever it be, which youth has to those, who have trod the paths of the world before them, for their friendly advice, how to avoid the inconveniences, dangers, and evils, which they themselves may have run upon, for want of such timely warnings, and to seize, cultivate and carry forward towards perfection, those advantages, graces, virtues, and felicities, which they may have totally missed, or stopped short in the generous pursuit. To lend this helping hand to those, who are beginning to tread the slippery way, seems, at best, but an office of common humanity to all; but to withhold it, from one we truly love, and whose heart and mind bear every genuine mark of the very soil, proper for all the amiable, manly, and generous virtues to take root, and bear their heavenly fruit; inward, conscious peace, fame amongst men, public love, temporal, and eternal happiness; to withhold it, I say, in such an instance, would deserve the worst of names. I am greatly pleased, my dear young friend, that you do me the justice to believe, I do not mean to impose any yoke of authority upon your understanding and conviction. I wish to warn, admonish, instruct, enlighten, and convince your reason; and so determine your judgment to right things, when you shall be made to see that they are right; not to overbear, and impel you to adopt any thing, before you perceive it to be right or wrong, by the force of authority. I hear, with great pleasure, that Locke lay before you, when you writ last to me; and I like the observation that you make from him, that we must use our own reason, not that of another, if we would deal fairly by ourselves, and hope to enjoy a peaceful and contented conscience. This precept is truly worthy of the dignity of rational natures. But here, my dear child, let me offer one distinction to you, and it is of much moment; it is this: Mr. Locke's precept is applicable only to such opinions, as regard moral or religious obligations, and which as such, our own consciences alone can judge and determine for ourselves: matters of mere expediency, that affect neither honour, morality, nor religion, were not in that great and wise man's view: such are the usages, forms, manners, modes, proprieties, decorums, and all those numberless ornamental little acquirements, and genteel well-bred attentions, which constitute a proper, graceful, amiable, and noble behaviour. In matters of this kind, I am sure, your own reason, to which I shall always refer you, will at once tell you, that you must, at first, make use of the experience of others; in effect, see with their eyes, or not be able to see at all; for the ways of the world, as to its usages and exterior manners, as well as to all things of expediency and prudential considerations, a moment's reflection, will convince a mind as right as yours, must necessarily be to experienced youth, with ever so fine natural parts, a terra incognita. As you would not therefore attempt to form notions of China or Persia, but from those, who have travelled those countries, and the fidelity and sagacity of whose relations you can trust; so will you, as little, I trust, prematurely form notions of your own, concerning that usage of the world (as it is called) into which you have not yet travelled, and which must be long studied and practised, before it can be tolerably well known. I can repeat nothing to you of so infinite consequence to your future welfare, as to conjure you not to be hasty in taking up notions and opinions; guard your honest and ingenuous mind against this main danger of youth: with regard to all things, that appear not to your reason, after due examination, evident duties of honour, morality, or religion, (and in all such as do, let your conscience and reason determine your notions and conduct) in all other matters, I say, be slow to form opinions, keep your mind in a candid state of suspense, and open to full conviction, when you shall procure it, using in the mean time the experience of a friend, you can trust, the sincerity of whose advice you will try and prove by your own experience hereafter, when more years shall have given it to you. I have been longer upon this head, than I hope there was any occasion for: but the great importance of the matter, and my warm wishes for your welfare, figure, and happiness, have drawn it from me. I wish to know if you have a good French master: I must recommend the study of the French language, to speak and write it correctly, as to grammar and orthography, as a matter of the utmost and indispensable use to you, if you would make any figure in the great world. I need say no more to enforce this recommendation: when I get to London, I will send you the best French dictionary. Have you been taught geography and the use of the globes by Mr. Leech? if not, pray take a geography master and learn the use of the globes; it is soon known. I recommend to you to acquire a clear and thorough notion of what is called the solar system; together with the doctrine of comets. I wanted as much or more, to hear of your private reading at home, as of public lectures, which I hope, however, you will frequent for example's sake. Pardon this long letter, and keep it by you, if you do not hate it. Believe me,

My dear Nephew,
Ever affectionately,
Yours,

LETTER VII.

Bath, March 30, 1754.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

I am much obliged to you for your kind remembrance and wishes for my health. It is much recovered by the regular fit of gout, of which I am still lame in both feet, and I may hope for better health hereafter in consequence. I have thought it long since we conversed: I waited to be able to give you a better account of my health, and, in part, to leave you time to make advances in your plan of study, of which I am very desirous to hear an account. I desire, you will be so good to let me know particularly, if you have gone through the abridgment of Burnet's History of the Reformation, and the Treatise of Father Paul on Benefices; also, how much of Locke you have read. I beg of you, not to mix any other English reading with what I recommended to you. I propose to save you much time and trouble, by pointing out to you such books, in succession, as will carry you the shortest way to the things you must know, to fit yourself for the business of the world, and give you the clearer knowledge of them, by keeping them unmixed with superfluous, vain, empty trash. Let me hear, my dear child, of your French also; as well as of those studies, which are more properly university studies. I cannot tell you better, how truly and tenderly I love you, than by telling you, I am most solicitously bent on your doing every thing that is right, and laying the foundations of your future happiness and figure in the world, in such a course of improvement, as will not fail to make you a better man, while it makes you a more knowing one. Do you rise early? I hope, you have already made to yourself the habit of doing it: if not, let me conjure you, to acquire it. Remember your friend Horace. Et ni posces ante Diem librum cum lumine, si non Intendes animum studiis, et rebus honestis, Invidiâ vel Amore miser torquebere.

Adieu.

Your ever affectionate uncle.

LETTER VIII.

Bath, May 4, 1754.

DEAR NEPHEW,

I use a pen with some difficulty, being still lame in my hand with the gout: I cannot, however, delay writing this line to you, on the course of English history I propose for you. If you have finished the Abridgment of English History, and of Burnet's History of the Reformation, I recommend to you next (before any other reading of history) Oldcastle's Remarks on the History of England, by Lord Bolingbroke. Let me apprise you of one thing, before you read them, and that is, that the author has bent some passages, to make them invidious parallels to the times he wrote in; therefore be aware of that, and depend, in general, on finding the truest constitutional doctrines: and that the facts of history (though warped) are no where falsified. I also recommend Nathaniel Bacon's Historical and Political Observations,* it is, without exception, the best and most instructive book we have on matters of that kind. They are both to be read with much attention, and twice over; Oldcastle's Remarks to be studied and almost got by heart, for the inimitable beauty of the style, as well as the matter. Bacon, for the matter chiefly; the style being uncouth, but the expression forcible and striking. I can write no more, and you will hardly read what is writ.

Adieu, my dear child.

Your ever affectionate uncle.

LETTER IX.

Astrop Wells, Sept. 5, 1754.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

I have been a long time, without conversing with you, and thanking you for the pleasure of your last letter. You may possibly be about to return to the seat of learning, on the banks of the Cam; but I will not defer discoursing to you on literary matters, till you leave Cornwall, not doubting but you are mindful of the muses, amidst the very savage rocks and moors, and yet more savage natives, of that ancient and respectable dutchy. First, with regard to the opinion you desire, concerning a common place book; in general, I must disapprove the use of it: it is chiefly intended for persons, who mean to be authors, and tends to impair the memory, and to deprive you of a ready, extempore, use of your reading, by accustoming the mind to discharge itself of its reading on paper, instead of relying on its natural power of retention, aided and fortified by frequent revisions of its ideas and materials. Some things must be common-placed, in order to be of any use; dates, chronological order, and the like; for instance, Nathaniel Bacon ought to be extracted in the best method you can: but, in general, my advice to you is, not to common-place upon paper, but, as an equivalent to it, to endeavour to range and methodize in your head, what you read, and by so doing frequently and habitually, to fix matter in the memory. I desired you, some time since, to read Lord Clarendon's History of the civil wars. I have lately read a much honester and more instructive book, of the same period of history; it is the History of the Parliament, by Thomas May,† Esq. &c. I will send it to you, as soon

* This book, though at present little known, formerly enjoyed a very high reputation. It is written with a very evident bias to the principles of the parliamentary party, to which Bacon adhered; but contains a great deal of very useful and valuable matter. It was published in two parts, the first in 1647, the second in 1651, and was secretly reprinted in 1672, and again in 1682; for which edition the publisher was indicted and outlawed. After the revolution, a fourth edition was printed, with an advertisement, asserting, on the authority of Lord Chief Justice Vaughan, one of Selden's executors, that the groundwork of this book was laid by that great and learned man. And it is, probably, on the ground of this assertion, that, in the folio edition of Bacon's book, printed in 1739, it is said, in the title-page, to have been 'collected from some manuscript notes of John Selden, Esq.' But it does not appear, that this notion rests on any sufficient evidence. It is however manifest, from some expressions in the very unjust and disparaging account given of this work, in Nicholson's Historical Library, (part i. p. 150,) that Nathaniel Bacon was generally considered as an imitator and follower of Selden.

† May, the translator of Lucan, had been much commended by Charles the First, but quitted the court on some personal disgust, and afterwards became Secretary to the Parliament. His history was published in 1647, under their authority and licence, and cannot, by any means, be considered as an impartial work. It is, however, well worthy of being attentively read; and the contemptuous character given of it by Clarendon, (Life, vol. I. p. 35,) is as much below its real merit, as Clarendon's own history is superior to it.

as you return to Cambridge. If you have not read Burnet's History of his own Times, I beg you will. I hope your father is well. My love to the girls.

Your ever affectionate.

LETTER X.

Pay-Office, April 9, 1755.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

I rejoice extremely, to hear, that your father and the girls are not unentertained in their travels: in the meantime, your travels through the paths of literature, arts, and sciences, (a road, sometimes set with flowers, and sometimes difficult, laborious, and arduous,) are not only infinitely more profitable in future, but at present, upon the whole, infinitely more delightful. My own travels, at present, are none of the pleasantest: I am going through a fit of the gout; with much proper pain, and what proper patience I may. Avis au lecteur, my sweet boy: remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth. Let no excesses lay the foundations of gout, and the rest of Pandora's box; nor any immoralities, or vicious courses, sow the seeds of a too late and painful repentance. Here ends my sermon, which, I trust, you are not fine gentleman enough, or, in plain English, silly fellow enough, to laugh at. Lady Hester is much yours. Let me hear some account of your intercourse with the muses,

And believe me ever,

Your truly most affectionate.

LETTER XI.

Pay-Office, April 15, 1755.

A thousand thanks to my dear boy, for a very pretty letter. I like extremely the account you give of your literary life; the reflexions you make upon some West-Saxon actors in the times you are reading, are natural, manly, and sensible, and flow from a heart, that will make you far superior to any of them. I am content you should be interrupted, (provided the interruption be not long,) in the course of your reading, by declaiming in defence of the Thesis, you have so wisely chosen to maintain. It is true, indeed, that the affirmative maxim, Omne solum forti Patria est, has supported some great and good men, under the persecutions of faction and party-injustice, and taught them to prefer an hospitable retreat in a foreign land, to an unnatural mother-country. Some few such may be found in ancient times: in our own country also some; such was Algernon Sidney, Ludlow, and others. But, how dangerous is it, to trust frail, corrupt man, with such an aphorism! What fatal casuistry is it big with! How many a villain might, and has, masked himself in the sayings of ancient illustrious exiles, while he was, in fact, dissolving all the nearest and dearest ties, that hold societies together, and spurning at all laws, divine and human! How easy the transition, from this political to some impious ecclesiastical aphorisms! If all soils are alike to the brave and virtuous, so may all churches and modes of worship; that is, all will be equally neglected and violated. Instead of every soil being his country, he will have no one for his country; he will be the forlorn outcast of mankind. Such was the late Bolingbroke, of impious memory. Let me know, when your declamation is over. Pardon an observation on style: 'I received yours,' is vulgar, and mercantile; 'your letter,' is the way of writing. Inclose your letters in a cover, it is more polite.

LETTER XII.

Pay-Office, May 20, 1755.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

I am extremely concerned, to hear, that you have been ill, especially, as your account of an illness, you speak of as past, implies such remains of disorder, as I beg you will give all proper attention to. By the medicine your physician has ordered, I conceive, he considers your case in some degree nervous. If that be so, advise with him, whether a little change of air, and of the scene, together with some weeks course of steel waters, might not be highly proper for you. I am to go the day after to-morrow to Sunning Hill, in Windsor Forest, where I propose to drink those waters for about a month. Lady Hester and I shall be happy in your company. If your doctor shall be of opinion, that such waters may be of service to you; which, I hope, will be his opinion. Besides health recovered, the muses shall not be quite forgot: we will ride, read, walk, and philosophize, extremely at our ease, and you may return to Cambridge with new ardour, or at least with strength repaired, when we leave Sunning Hill. If you come, the sooner the better, on all accounts. We propose to go into Buckinghamshire in about a month. I rejoice that your declamation is over, and that you have begun, my dearest nephew, to open your mouth in public, ingenti Patriae percussus Amore. I wish I had heard you perform! the only way I ever shall hear your praises from your own mouth. My gout prevented my so much intended and wished for journey to Cambridge: and now my plan of drinking waters renders it impossible. Come then, my dear boy, to us; and so Mahomet and the mountain meet; no matter which moves to the other.

Adieu.

Your ever affectionate.

LETTER XIII.

July 13, 1755.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

I have delayed writing to you, in expectation of hearing farther from you, upon the subject of your stay at college. ~~No news is the best news~~, and I will hope now, that all your difficulties, upon that head, are at an end. I represent you to myself deep in study, and drinking large draughts of intellectual nectar; a very delicious state to a mind happy enough, and elevated enough, to thirst after knowledge and true honest fame, even as the hart panteth after the water brook. When I name knowledge, I ever intend learning as the weapon and instrument only of manly, honourable, and virtuous action, upon the stage of the world, both in private and public life; as a gentleman, and as a member of the commonwealth, who is to answer for all he does, to the laws of his country, to his own breast and conscience, and at the tribunal of honour and good fame. You, my dear boy, will not only be acquitted, but applauded and dignified at all these respectable and awful bars. So, macte tua virtute! go on, and prosper in your glorious and happy career: not forgetting to walk an hour briskly every morning and evening, to fortify the nerves. I wish to hear in some little time, of the progress you shall have made in the course of reading chalked out.

Adieu.

Your ever affectionate uncle.

Lady Hester desires her best compliments to you.

[FROM A FOREIGN JOURNAL.]

CRITICISM

On Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres. By Hugh Blair, D. D.

[Concluded.]

Can and could instead of may and might.

The difference between them can be clearly pointed out. 40. Some trivial, or misjudged circumstances, can be overlooked by the reader. 72.

If it be of that elevating, solemn, and awful kind, which distinguishes this feeling, we can pronounce it sublime. 75. The history of the English language can, in this manner, be clearly traced. 71. A plain native style can be made equally strong and expressive with this Latinised English. 188. Language can be rendered capable of this power of music. 248. How easily could it have been mended by this transposition! 260. This can be sometimes accomplished. 266. Even gloomy and dismal objects can be introduced into figures. 302. In solemn discourse this can often be done to good purpose. 328. This inaccuracy could have been remedied. 484. Most, or all of the matters, which can be the subject of public discourse. ii. 47. Formal introductions can, without any prejudice, be omitted. ii. 159. Passages can be produced. ii. 455. Ghosts, angels, and devils, can be conceived as existing. ii. 469.

The past time instead of the present.

If any should maintain that sugar was bitter, and tobacco was sweet, no reasonings could avail to prove it. 30. Old Horatius is reminded, that his son stood alone against three, and asked, What he would have had him to have done? 53.—The wish of Horatius must be referred either to the time of the combat, or to the time when the question is asked. In the former case, would it not be sufficient to say, 'What he would have wished him to do.' In the latter, 'What he would wish him to have done.' The sentiment, as our author has expressed it, is embarrassed, and requires some emendation.

Twisted columns always displease, when they are made use of to support any part of a building that is massy, and that seemed to require a more substantial prop. 89. The sentence contains three separate propositions, which required three separate sentences to have unfolded them. 447.—to unfold them.

Of instead of from.

In an author's writing with propriety, his being free of the two former faults seems implied. 189. The style of dean Swift is free of all affectation. 476. There may be writers much freer of such inaccuracies. 495. Crisostom may be read with advantage, as being freer of false ornaments than the Latin fathers. ii. 37. It is not free of the fault which I imputed to Pliny's Epistles. ii. 301. Tasso's Aminta is not wholly free of Italian refinement. ii. 330. Racine wanted the copiousness and grandeur of Corneille's imagination; but is free of his bombast. ii. 519.

On instead of in.

By the custom of walking often on the streets. 197. The spectator speaks only the language of description, which is always on a lower tone. 321. The capital of all nations, suddenly involved on one conflagration. 359. To place any modern writer on the same rank. ii. 38.

Among instead of in.

Among a nation so enlightened and acute, and where the highest attention was paid to every thing elegant in the arts, we may naturally expect to find the public taste refined and judicious. ii. 12.—The preposition among implies a number of things, and therefore should not be prefixed to a noun, which either denotes one single object, or an aggregate of many, taken collectively.

Never instead of ever.

Let a speaker have never so good a reason to be animated. ii. 56.

That instead of as.

A direction the more necessary, that the present taste of the age in writing, seems to lean more to style than to thought. 407. The harmony is the more happy, that this disposition of the members of the period, which suits the sound so well, is no less just and proper, with respect to the sense. 411. These rules are the more necessary, that this is a part of the discourse, which requires no small care. ii. 161.

Inverted sentences, which have an air of stiffness and affectation.

Considerable merit doubtless he has. 496. Of figures and ornament of every kind he is exceedingly fond. 397. Great virtues certainly he had. 14. No contemptible orator he was. ii. 16. Living examples of public speaking, it will not be expected that I should here point out. ii. 236. Imperfections in their works he may indeed point out; passages, that are faulty, he may shew. ii. 250. Orators, such as Cicero and Demosthenes, we have none. ii. 257. Of orations, or public discourses of all kinds, I have already treated fully. ii. 259. With digressions and episodes he abounds. ii. 266. In Dodsley's Miscellanies several very beautiful lyric poems are to be found. ii. 860. Of parables the prophetic writings are full. ii. 398. Of lyric poetry, or that which is intended to be accompanied with music, the Old Testament is full. ii. 401. Than Terence nothing can be more delicate, more polished and elegant. ii. 538.

In these sentences the grammatical order of words would be much more natural and agreeable, than this inverted arrangement.

Suppose a man should gravely and seriously ask a friend, to take a walk into his garden, in some such language as this;—'Into the garden let us walk, of flowers it is full, of fruit I think you are fond, on the trees some peaches are to be found, apricots this year I have none, to tea we shall return,'—he would be thought a coxcomb, or a pedant. Why then should such inverted expressions be used in our compositions?

Metaphors.

'From the influx of so many streams, from the junction of so many dissimilar parts, it naturally follows, that the English, like every compounded language, must needs be somewhat irregular. We cannot expect from it that correspondence of parts, that complete analogy in structure, which may be found in those simpler languages, which have been formed in a manner within themselves, and built on one foundation.' 172.—In this passage the English language is considered as a river and a structure. But these two images are inconsistent.

'Rules tend to enlighten taste, and to lead genius from unnatural deviations into its proper channel.' 6.—What has genius to do in a channel, which is literally the bed of a river?

'Good hopes may be entertained of those, whose minds have this liberal and elegant turn. Many virtues may be grafted upon it.' 12.—We can form no idea of grafting on a turn, or a tendency, which is neither a visible, nor an intellectual object.

'As Dr. Young's imagination was strong and rich, rather than delicate and correct, he sometimes gives it too loose reins. Hence, in his Night Thoughts, there prevails an obscurity and a hardness in his style. The metaphors are frequently too bold, and frequently too far pursued; the reader is dazzled, rather than enlightened, and he constantly on the stretch, to comprehend an space with the author. We may observe in the following metaphor, is shun out.' 313.—The imagination is confounded by this mixture of literal and figurative expressions, and this rapid transition from one metaphor to another.

'Dryads and Naiads, the genius of the wood, and the god of the river, were, in men of lively imaginations, in the early ages of the world, easily grafted upon this turn of mind.' 326.—The grafting of nymphs and genii is a new mode of propagation, which has never been thought of before, even by the celebrated Dr. Graham; and yet our professor represents it as an easy process.

'Comparison is a sparkling ornament; and all things that sparkle, dazzle and fatigue, if they recur too often. Similies should, even in poetry, be used in moderation; but in prose writings much more; otherwise, the style will become disgustingly luscious, and the ornaments lose their virtue and effect.' 348.—We may represent similes as sparkling ornaments of style, which dazzle and fatigue the reader's imagination; but we cannot at the same time, with any propriety, represent them as things unpleasing to the palate, or 'disgustingly luscious.'

'The real and proper ornaments of style are wrought into the substance of it. They flow in the same stream with the current of thought.' 365.—The ornaments of style are here considered as capable of being wrought into a solid substance; and, in the next sentence, represented as a stream flowing with a current.

There is the same confusion of ideas in the following passage: 'In his humorous pieces, the plainness of his manner gives his wit a singular edge, and sets it off to the highest advantage. There is no froth, nor affectation in it; it flows without any studied preparation; and while he hardly appears to smile himself, he makes his reader laugh heartily.' 382.

Lord Shaftesbury is ever in buskins, full of circumlocutions, and artificial elegance.' 397.—We may say, Lord Shaftesbury's writings are 'full of circumlocutions.' But if we substitute the author for his works, and introduce him in buskins, or in a personal character, we cannot so properly say, he is full of circumlocutions, as that he is fond of them.

'In that region which it [eloquence] occupies, it admits great scope; and to the defect of zeal and application, more than to the want of capacity and genius, we may ascribe its not having hitherto risen higher. It is a field where there is much honour yet to be reaped; it is an instrument, which may be employed for purposes of the highest importance.' ii. 44.—Eloquence is here described as something capable of rising, as a field, and as an instrument; but these are representations, from which it is impossible to form any consistent idea.

In our Review for August we observed, that there were many inaccuracies of style in these lectures. These passages, which we have now cited, will be sufficient to justify this observation; and may serve perhaps, in some respects, to shew, that the Eloquence of this country has not yet fixed her residence on the north side of the Tweed. Some of these improprieties may be thought too trivial to deserve the attention of a celebrated author, and others may probably be defended by analogy, or the example of preceding writers. But the greater part of them are real violations of grammar, or of that purity, propriety, and precision, which Dr. Blair himself has very justly recommended.

We shall conclude with the following extract from the ninth Lecture, which will be a sufficient apology for all the freedom we have taken with our author's performance in this article.

'Whatever the advantages or defects of the English language be, as it is our own language, it deserves a high degree of our study and attention, both with regard to the choice of words which we employ, and with regard to the syntax, or the arrangement of these words in a sentence. We know how much the Greeks and the Romans, in their most polished and flourishing times, cultivated their own tongues. We know how much study both the French and Italians have bestowed upon theirs. Whatever knowledge may be acquired, by the study of other languages, it can never be communicated with advantage, unless by such as can write and speak their own language well. Let the matter of an author be ever so good and useful, his compositions will always suffer in the public esteem, if his expression be deficient in purity and propriety. At the same time, the attainment of a correct and elegant style, is an object which demands application and labour. If any imagine they can catch it merely by the ear, or acquire it by a slight perusal of some of our good authors, they will find themselves much disappointed. The many errors, even in point of grammar, the many offences against purity of language, which are committed by writers, who are far from being contemptible, demonstrate, that a careful study of the language is previously requisite, in all who aim at writing it properly.

MISCELLANY.

[The ensuing criticism, exhibiting Johnson's opinion of Dryden's prose style, is preserved in the Port Folio, not only on account of the intrinsic merit of such an opinion, but because Gifford has recently declared himself in favour of the old style of writing, which has been absurdly banished or neglected, for the sake of the affected and Asiatic manner.]

It will not be easy to find in all the opulence of our language, a treatise so artfully variegated with successive representations of opposite probabilities, so enlivened with imagery, so brightened with illustrations, as Dryden's Essay on Dramatic Poetry. His portraits of the English dramatists are wrought with great spirit and diligence. The account of Shakspear may stand as a perpetual model of encomiastic criticism; exact without minuteness, and lofty without exaggeration. The praise lavished by Longinus on the attestation of the heroes of Marathon, by Demosthenes, fades away before it. In a few lines is exhibited a character, so extensive in its comprehension, and so curious in its limitations, that nothing can be added, diminished, or reformed; nor can the editors and admirers of Shakspear, in all their emulation of reverence, boast of much more than of having diffused and paraphrased this epitome of excellence, of having changed Dryden's gold for baser metal, of lower value though of greater bulk.

In this, and in all his other essays on the same subject, the criticism of Dryden is the criticism of a poet; not a dull collection of theorems, nor a rude detection of faults, which perhaps the censor was not able to have committed; but a gay and vigorous dissertation, where delight is mingled with instruction, and where the author proves his right of judgment, by his power of performance.

The different manner and effect with which critical knowledge may be conveyed, was perhaps never more clearly exemplified than in the performances of Rymer and Dryden. It was said of a dispute between two mathematicians, 'malim cum Scaligero errare, quam cum Clavio recte sapere;' that it was more eligible to go wrong with one, than right with the other. A tendency of the same kind every mind must feel at the perusal of Dryden's prefaces and Rymer's discourses. With Dryden we are wandering in quest of truth; whom we find, if we find her at all, drest in the graces of elegance; and if we miss her, the labour of the pursuit rewards itself; we are led only through fragrance and flowers. Rymer, without taking a nearer, takes a rougher way; every step is to be made through thorns and brambles; and truth, if we meet her, appears repulsive by her mien, and ungraceful by her habit. Dryden's criticism has the majesty of a queen; Rymer's has the ferocity of a tyrant.

His genius is always provided with matter, and his fancy never languishes in penury of ideas.

His works abound with knowledge, and sparkle with illustrations. There is scarcely any science or faculty that does not supply him with occasional images and lucky similitudes. Every page discovers a mind very widely acquainted both with art and nature, and in full possession of great stores of intellectual wealth. Of him that knows much, it is natural to suppose that he has read with diligence; yet I rather believe that the knowledge of Dryden was gleaned from accidental intelligence and various conversation, by a quick comprehension, a judicious selection, and a happy memory, a keen appetite of knowledge, and a powerful digestion; by vigilance that permitted nothing to pass without notice, and a habit of reflection that suffered nothing useful to be lost. A mind like Dryden's, always curious, always active, to which every understanding was proud to be associated, and of which every one solicited the regard, by an ambitious display of himself, had a more pleasant, perhaps a nearer way, to knowledge, than by the silent progress of solitary reading. I do not suppose that he despised books, or intentionally neglected them; but that he was carried out, by the impetuosity of his genius, to more vivid and speedy instructions; and that his studies were rather desultory and fortuitous than constant and systematical.

It must be confessed that he scarcely ever appears to want book-learning but when he mentions books: and to him may be transferred the praise which he gives his master Charles.

His conversation, wit, and parts,
His knowledge in the noblest useful arts,
Were such, dead authors could not give,
But habitudes of those that live;
Who, lighting him, did greater lights receive:
He drain'd from all, and all they knew,
His apprehension quick, his judgment true:
That the most learn'd with shame confess
His knowledge more, his reading only less.

Of all this, however, if the proof be demanded, I will not undertake to give it; the atoms of probability, of which my opinion has been formed, lie scattered over all his works; and by him who thinks the question worth his notice, his works must be perused with very close attention.

Criticism, either didactic or defensive, occupies almost all his prose, except those pages which he has devoted to his patrons; but none of his prefaces were ever thought tedious. They have not the formality of a settled style, in which the first half of the sentence betrays the other. The clauses are never balanced, nor the periods modelled; every word seems to drop by chance, though it falls into its proper place. Nothing is cold or languid; the whole is airy, animated and vigorous: what is little, is gay; what is great, is splendid. He may be thought to mention himself too frequently; but while he forces himself upon our esteem, we cannot refuse him to stand high in his own. Every thing is excused by the play of images and the sprightliness of expression. Though all is easy, nothing is feeble: though all seems careless, there is nothing harsh: and though, since his earlier works, more than a century has passed, they have nothing yet uncouth or obsolete.

He who writes much, will not easily escape a manner, such a recurrence of particular modes as may be easily noted. Dryden is always another and the same, he does not exhibit a second time the same elegancies in the same form, nor appears to have any other art than that of expressing with clearness what he thinks with vigour. His style could not easily be imitated, either seriously or ludicrously; for, being always equable and always varied, it has no prominent or discriminative characters. The beauty who is totally free from disproportion of parts and features, cannot be ridiculed by an over-charged resemblance.

ON SOME LITTLE ARTIFICES TO GAIN CONSEQUENCE IN VULGAR EYES.

Such is the natural pride of the human heart, that there is scarcely any trifling distinction, which can attract notice, that will not be pursued with eagerness, and fill the possessor's bosom with self-esteem.

One of the easiest, and therefore the commonest methods of drawing attention by trifles, is that of talking loud at all places of public resort. There is something so spirited in it, so charmingly careless, and it gives such an air of superiority, by seeming to despise all the hearers, as if they were no more than stocks and stones, that it seldom fails of exciting not only notice, but some degree of awe and admiration.

I have heard many a fine gentleman and lady, while they were strutting up and down a crowded walk, question each other on the last night's ball, or their engagements to dinner, in a voice so loud as silenced the rest of the company, and caused a general hum of inquiry, Who are these? Thus the end was answered. The spectators were awe-struck and brow-beaten, and the happy pair marched off in triumph, like a king and queen of Brentford, till the next morning, when they returned to make new conquests. From their volubility and vehement loudness, they acquired, among many silly listeners, the character of people of infinite sense and spirit.

Another method of gaining notice and admiration, is to swear and swagger at inns, or at any other place, where we are among our inferiors, or are unknown. It is, to be sure, wonderful to observe how respectful a reception he meets with, who, with a cockade in his hat, which is judiciously cocked over his eye, with a stick in his hand, and an oath in his mouth, enters an inn and calls about him with a voice like that of the men who cry peas and beans in the streets of London. There have been generals, admirals, colonels, and captains, who never appeared so formidable, nor displayed so much prowess, as in storming an inn in a country town. And the petty gentry, who imitate such heroes, consider themselves as personages of great consequence, when they break the bell wire by the violence of their ringing, frighten the landlady with their fierce looks, send the waiters scampering like men beside themselves, and, with their oaths, set the whole house, yards, and stables, in an uproar.

Knocking vehemently at a door, especially if it be done according to the latest method invented by people of fashion in the squares, adds very considerably to personal importance.

Singularity in dress is one of the commonest modes of seeking distinction; but by singularity I do not mean a deviation from the established fashion, but compliance with it carried to an extreme. An enormous pair of buckles has given many a young man a degree of confidence, which no learning or virtue which he possessed, could ever have supplied. A hat, a coat, a shoe, or a shoe-string, of a shape, or size, or colour, exceeding the ordinary mode, have fixed the eyes of a whole assembly, and gratified the ambitious wearer with the most heartfelt satisfaction.

Some, rather than not be noticed at all, will endeavour to draw the eyes of their fellow-creatures upon them by such profusion and expenses, as cause an execution in their houses, and force them to elope. Hunted by bailiffs and creditors, it is still some consolation to them, that they are the reigning topic. Vices are often practised with a desire of being rendered remarkable; and many plume themselves, as persons of the first consequence, if their profligacy causes them to become the subjects of paragraphs in a newspaper.

Vanity indeed operates with so violent a force, on some minds, that it seems to contradict itself, and defeat its own purpose, for, in pursuit of notice and distinction, it will even industriously seek disgrace.

As the desire of fame, or distinction, seems natural in man, I contend not against it, but I wish it to operate in urging to acts of singular beneficence and social utility, rather than to spend its force in trifles, follies, vanities, and vices.

But of the greater part of these ambitious persons whom I have just described, it may, I believe, be said, that they would act wisely to avoid, instead of seeking distinction, for they seem to be of that character, to which the emphatical words of an elegant, political writer may most justly be applied—'a character which will only pass without censure, when it passes without observation.'

If men find themselves insensibly impelled by the ambition of their nature, to seek distinction, let them learn to seek it by arts and virtues which embellish life, and diffuse happiness or convenience through the ranks of society. If they cannot do this, let them contentedly acquiesce in an innocent obscurity.

[In the subsequent Law Report, the honesty of a Hebrew agent, for a frank and unsuspecting sailor would not disgrace the practice of an American swindler, or a republican rascal.]

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

BROWN V. HART.

The plaintiff sued as administrator to his son, who had been a seaman on board La Pique. At his death a considerable sum was due to him for wages, and as his ship had been very fortunate in making prizes, he was entitled to a large share of prize money. But unfortunately, before sailing on his voyage, he had given a power of attorney to the defendant, a Jew sloop-seller, at Gosport, to manage all his affairs. When the plaintiff heard of his son's decease, he applied to Hart for an account of his estate. For a long time he received no answer; but at last old Moses produced an account, by which there was against him a balance of only 6l. 10s. Many of the articles with which he pretended to have supplied young Brown appeared quite unfit for his station and greatly overcharged; nor did he account for so much money as he must necessarily have received. The plaintiff therefore expressed himself dissatisfied, and threatened to bring an action. The Jew, a little intimidated, asked how much he would take? 'Why, d'ye see, Mr. Jew; (said the plaintiff) I'll let you off for 150l.' This demand was refused, and the present action was accordingly brought.

Upon an inspection of the account, after proof being adduced of the sums the defendant had received for the deceased, and improper charges being disallowed, it appeared that, instead of 6l. 10s. no less a sum was due than 225l. For this, by the direction of the judge, and to the joy of all present, the jury at once found a verdict for the plaintiff.

LEVITY.

[The ensuing humorous article is from the ingenious pen of G. L. Gray, the editor of the Norfolk Ledger.]

VIRGIL DEMOCRATISED;

Or, a Specimen of Mobocratic Latinity.

Duane has said a great deal about 'false abstracts,' 'mutilated quotations,' 'impotent perversions,' &c. &c. His knowledge of any, or every thing false, cannot be disputed. If he reads the Aurora he will seldom be without an example. Take, for instance, his attempt to introduce Virgil among his other authorities, in what he is pleased to entitle, his 'Vindication of the Democratic Constitution of America.'—He makes Virgil speak thus of Aristocracy:

—Malum quo non aliud velocius ullum
Mobilitate viget, vosque acquirit eundo;
Parva metu primo; mox sese attollit in auras,
Ingrediturque solo et caput inter nubila condit.

Duane is about as near being right in this particular as he usually is in others of more importance. We have found it true that not one of the real democratic editors in America, dare advance any bold assertion until the cue has first been furnished by the Aurora. As soon, therefore, as the organ had sounded the opinion of Virgil on aristocracy, the whole tribe open it in succession. And first the renowned conglomerator of wool and felt, Cheetham, the hat-making editor of the American Citizen, reports the Roman authority thus:

—Malum quo non aliud velocius ullum
Mobilitate viget, vosque acquirit eundo;
Parva metu primo; mox sese attollit in auras,
Ingrediturque solo et caput inter nubila condit.

We will excuse the frim CITIZEN on account of his frudence. The type of the Aurora is sometimes not very legible, and as the o could not be read in the word primo, he did well to stop where he did, lest he might have fallen into the same errors as the American; to whom let us listen:

—Malum quo non aliud velocius ullum
Mobilitate viget, vosque acquirit eundo;
Parva metu primo; mox sese attollit in auras,
Ingrediturque solo et caput inter nubila condit.

The Duanean Latin next falls into the hands of the American Patriot. Mr. Kennedy seems to have followed the text of Messrs. Pechin and Frailey, and, consequently, must be farther from the mark than either of his precursors.

—Malum quo non aliud velocius ullum
Mobilitate viget, vosque acquirit eundo;
Parva metu primo; mox sese attollit in auras,
Ingrediturque solo et caput inter nubila condit.

As there are a great many editors who have not yet touched the subject, we expect in the end, if the rage for new readings continues, to hear the Mantuan Swan sing a very curious ditty. Our friendship for Virgil induces us to request Duane henceforth to confine himself to vernacular vulgarity; and to murder no language but his own: at least to spare the ignorance of the poor herd, who must of necessity follow him, in the best manner they can, while pursuing the generous plan of giving instruction to the people.

In his universally admired description of FAME, the author of the Æneis has the following sublime passage, which has been deformed by the democratic editors.

Fama, malum quo non aliud velocius ullum:
Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo:
Parva metu primo; mox sese attollit in auras,
Ingrediturque solo, et caput inter nubila condit.

Æn. IV. v. 174.

Which is thus translated by Dryden; v. 174.

Fame, the great ill, from small beginnings grows;
Swift, from the first; and ev'ry moment brings
New vigour to her flights, new pinions to her wings.
Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size;
Her feet on earth, her forehead in the skies.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

The British booksellers announce an interesting work—Bibliotheca Britannica: A complete history of English literature, to be edited by Mr. SOUTHEY.

A late ingenious historian has very happily described, in a single paragraph, the character of the celebrated lord Ashburton.

DUNNING long enjoyed a high reputation at the bar, and filled the office of solicitor-general. He united a perfect knowledge of the law with a liberal view of politics. The meanness of his figure, the ungracefulness of his action, and the monotony of his voice, were all lost in the rapidity of his conceptions, the fluency of his words, the flashes of his wit, and the subtlety of his arguments.

VICES OF THE EUROPEAN SOLDIER.

[From a severe, but moral Poet.]

The clown, the child of nature, without guile,
Blest with an infant's ignorance of all,
But his own simple pleasures, now and then,
A wrestling match, a foot race, or a fair,
Is ballotted, and trembles at the news.
Sheepish, he doffs his hat, and mumbling, swears
A Bible oath, to be what e'er they please,
To do he knows not what. The task perform'd,
That instant he becomes the sergeant's care,
His pupil, and his torment, and his jest.
His awkward gait, his introverted toes,
Bent knees, round shoulders, and dejected looks,
Procure him many a curse. By slow degrees,
Unapt to learn, and form'd of stubborn stuff,
He yet by slow degrees, puts off himself,
Grows conscious of a change, and likes it well.
He stands erect, his slouch becomes a walk,
He steps right onward, martial in his air,
His form and movement; is as smart above
As meal and larded locks can make him, wears
His hat, or his plum'd helmet, with a grace,
And his three years of heroship expire'd,
Returns indignant to the slighted plough.
He hates the field in which no fife or drum
Attends him, drives his cattle to a march,
And sighs for the smart comrades he has left.
'T were well if his exterior change were all—
But wish his clumsy port the wretch has lost
His ignorance, and harmless manners too.
To swear, to game, to drink, to shew at home,
By lewdness, idleness and Sabbath breach,
The great proficiency he made abroad,
'T astonish, and to grieve his gazing friends,
To break some maiden's, and his mother's heart,
To be a pest where he was useful once,
Are his sole aim, and all his glory now.

JULIA MARIA!—A Jeu D'Esprit.

BY AMBROSE PITMAN ESQ.

In days of old—when first refinement's light
Broke thro' the mist of chaos and of night;
Our great great-grandmothers were giv'n alone,
Such humble Christian names as MARY and JOAN:
E'en Arc's heroic Maud the latter bore,
And Maud—a celebrated Queen of yore.
But such th' improvement of our polish'd age,
And such the revolutionary rage,
That milk and fish-fags now are Arabellas,
Louisas, Julias, Carolines, and Stellas,
As t' other day a fish-wench traip'd along,
And "Sprats as big as herrings," bo! her song:
She thus address'd—in accents far from mild—
Nay, Stentor like, her filthy wand'ring child.
"Julia Maria!—little imp of coil!
"Come from the kennel, come—you dirty Devil!"

The remembrance of every Oxonian will be hurried to the banks of the Isis, when he peruses the following Sonnet, commemorating the much loved scenes, witnessed at a famous seminary, the nursery of Genius, the abode of the Muses, the pride of the Loyal, and the scourge of Fanatics.

I never hear the sound of thy glad bells,
Oxford! and chime harmonious, but I say,
Sighing, to think how time has worn away,
'Some spirit speaks in the sweet tone that swells,
'Heard after years of absence from the vale,
'Where Cherwell winds.' Most true it speaks the tale
Of days departed, and its voice recalls
Hours of delight and hope, in the gay tide
Of life and many friends, now scatter'd wide
By many fates...Peace be within thy walls!
I have scarce heart to visit thee; but yet
Deny'd the joys sought in thy shades...deny'd
Each better hope, since my poor... died,
What I have ow'd to thee my heart can ne'er forget.

Epitaph on Miss Rose.

Here lies a rose, a budding rose,
Blasted before its bloom;
Whose innocence did sweets disclose,
Beyond that flower's perfume.

To those, who for her loss are griev'd,
This consolation's given,
She's from a world of woe reliev'd,
And blooms a rose in Heaven.

THE NATAL GENIUS.

A DREAM.

To — on the morning of her birth day.
By Thomas Moore, Esq.

In witching slumbers of the night,
I dream'd I was the airy sprite,
That on thy natal moment smil'd;
And thought I wafted on my wing
Those flowers, which in Elysium spring,
To crown my lovely mortal child.

With olive branch I bound thy head,
Heart's ease along thy paths I shed,
Which was to bloom through all thy years;
Nor did I yet forget to bind
Love's roses, with his myrtle twin'd,
And dew'd by sympathetic tears.

Such was the wild but precious boon,
Which fancy, at her magic noon,
Bade me to Nona's image pay...
Oh! were I, love, thus doom'd to be
Thy little guardian deity,
How blest around thy steps I'd play!

Thy life should softly steal along,
Calm as some lonely shepherd's song,
That's heard at distance in the grove.
No cloud should ever shade thy sky,
No thorns along thy pathway lie,
But all be sun-shine, peace and love.

The wing of time should never brush
Thy dewy lips' luxuriant flush,
To bid its roses withering die;
Nor age itself, though dim and dark,
Should ever quench a single spark,
That flashes from my Nona's eye.

ALBERT OF WERDENDORFF;

OR, THE MIDNIGHT EMBRACE.

A German Romance.

Nocturnus occurram furor. Hor.

Lord Albert had titles, Lord Albert had power,
Lord Albert in gold and in jewels was clad;
Fair Josephine bloom'd, like an opening flower,
But beauty and virtue were all that she had.

To rifle her treasure with each wily art
Of studied seduction Lord Albert essay'd;
Too well he succeeded! her innocent heart,
By virtue protected, by love was betray'd.

Full oft in her cot, at her casement, she'd sigh,
And gaze, sad and silent, on Werdendorff's walls;
Full oft gush'd the tear drops in streams from her eye,
When mirth reign'd triumphant in Werdendorff's halls.

When all in the castle were wrapt in repose,
Lord Albert would ponder on Josephine's charms;
Would leap the wide moat and the portal unclose,
To hie him in haste to his Josephine's arms.

When the moon hid in clouds, gave no tremulous ray,
O'er the moor dark and ferny to point out the road,
At her casement the maid would a taper display,
To guide her true love to her humble abode.

From the castle could Albert discern the loved spot,
When the bickering lustre gleam'd dim from afar,
Would speed him in safety to Josephine's cot,
And bless the kind beams of loves tutelar star.

Ah! maiden ill fated, too soon wilt thou find,
That vows can be broken that men can betray;
That men, fickle men, are less true than the wind,
That love, if illicit, too soon will decay.

The night waned apace, and her taper shone bright,
— "He comes not!"—she murmur'd, all pale and forlorn;

Another night pass'd, but in vain gleam'd the light,
He came not, for Albert was false and forsworn!

Why stream the gay banners from Werdendorff's
walls?
Why hastes to yon chapel the trimly-deck'd crowd?
A mistress to-day shall preside in our halls!
For Albert shall wed with Gumilda the proud!

To the winds the poor Josephine murmur'd her tale,
Each vision of fancy was faded and gone!
And aech shout of revelry, borne on the gale,
Said Albert was faithless, and she was undone!

With a tempest of maddening passions distress'd,
On the wings of despair to the castle she flew,
While love still'd the whirlwind that rag'd in her
breast,
And whisper'd delusive that Albert was true.

The portal she enter'd, the feasters among,
And mingled, unseen, in the revelling crowd;
But who were the gayest amid the gay throng?
Lord Albert the false, and Gumilda the proud!

Home sped the poor maid, from her proud rival's door,
Her bosom with anguish unceasing was torn;
The wind shook the rushes that waved on the moor,
And all, like her fortune, was dark and forlorn!

—"Fall on, chilling mists! thou art cruel," she said,
"But crueller far is Lord Albert to me!"
"Blow on, thou bleak wind! on my woe-stricken head,
"Thou'rt cold, but Lord Albert is colder than thou!"—

'Twas midnight—alone at her casement she sig'd,
When the low sound of footsteps struck faint on her ear,
And a voice in the accent of love softly cried,
—"My Josephine, haste thee, thy true love is here!"

—"Away to Gumilda! indignant she cried,
"To revel in pleasures at Werdendorff go!
"Why leave you, false traitor, my proud rival's bed,
"To add, by new insults, to Josephine's woe?"—

—"Oh, hush thee, my true love, revoke that command,
"For why should Lord Albert and Josephine part?
"Gumilda the proud can claim nought but my hand,
"But Josephine lords it supreme o'er my heart.

"My father commanded, his frowns awed my soul
"Forgive then the fault, nor impute it to me;
"As the mariner's needle still turns to the pole,
"My heart turns with fond adoration to thee,"—

With blandishments soft the deceiver essay'd,
With tones of affection, her bosom to move;
She smiled—but ye damsels forbear to upbraid,
Nor wonder that anger was vanquish'd by love.

Full soon on the board now the viands were spread,
The wine's lucious nectar in goblets shone bright;
The flower-footed Hours, wing'd by Extacy, fled,
And Josephine's eye beam'd with tender delight.

—"Adieu!" cried Lord Albert, "the first blush of morn
"Empurples the east, and the setting stars wane."
—"To Josephine when will Lord Albert return?"— —"At midnight's dark hour will he clasp her again."

Lord Albert sped onwards, his bosom beat high,
—"Hurra! from a mistress detested I'm freed!
"Gumilda, thy vengeance proclaim'd she should die!
"Gumilda, my soul has not shrunk from the deed!

"Alas! hapless victim! thy fluttering breath,
"Full soon will expire, amid agoniz'd pains;
"The cup that I gave thee was pregnant with death,
"And poison shall riot and boil in thy veins!

"At midnight's dark hour shall I clasp thee again?
"Fond maiden! that midnight thou never shalt see!
"Oblivion ere then shall thy senses enchain!
"Fond maiden ere then a pale corpse shalt thou be!"—

The dawn-light's first blush had illum'd the dell,
Lord Albert sped on, nor was cheer'd by the scene;
He sigh'd at each note of the iron-tongued bell,
That told the sad fate of the fair Josephine.

The smile of gay beauty, the blaze of the ball,
No peace to his bosom, no charm could impart;
He sigh'd mid the splendour of Werdendorff's hall,
For Conscience had wound her strong folds round his heart.

—"Arouse thee! my Lord," cried Gumilda the proud,
"What fiend has possess'd thee, and maddens thy brain?"—
Anon would he shudder, and mutter aloud,
—"At midnight's dark hour wilt thou clasp me
again?"—

His limbs, so athletic, were palsied by fear,
As midnight's dark hour was proclaim'd by the bell;
—"Full well," he exclaimed, "the dread summons I hear.

"Gumilda! it calls me, forever farewell!"—

The battlements shook with the echoing storm,
The thunder's loud peals burst on Werdendorff's wall;
The tapers burnt dimly, as Josephine's form
Glided forth from the portal, and reversed the hall!

All shrouded she was in the garb of the tomb!
Her lips they were livid, her face it was wan!
A death the most horrid had rifled her bloom,
And each charm of beauty was faded and gone!

—"Thy hand snapt my thread of existence," she said,
"And shalt thou unpunish'd, thou false one, remain!"
—"Tis midnight's dark hour, I am come from the dead!
"Delay'st thou, my bride-groom, to clasp me
again?"—

Thus saying, she dragg'd him perforce to her breast,
Imprinting a cold clammy kiss on his face!
Her lips, all so pale, to his forehead she press'd,
And clasp'd him full close in her noisome embrace.

Back started Lord Albert, entranced in surprise!
And, breathless with agony, sank on the floor:
Then raised to the sceptre his phrenzy-struck eyes,
Then closed them in darkness, to ope them no more!

Since then o'er the castle drear solitude reigns,
Its ramparts dismantled, are skirted with thorn;
The proud towers of Werdendorff scatter the plains,
The hall, once so festive, is drear and folorn!

The traveller full often the tale will inquire,
And wanders the time-stricken ruins between;
The peasants full oft will encircle the fire,
And talk of Lord Albert and fair Josephine:

Will tell what grim spectres the wand'rer appal,
Whose feet so unhallow'd o'er Werdendorff rove!
How lights, more than mortal, illumine the hall,
While Albert is clasp'd by his skeleton love!

Full oft will the damsel, 'mid eve's sober gloom,
Review each sad spot of the desolate scene:
Will shuddering pass by the libertine's tomb,
And weep o'er the lovely, but frail Josephine!

ODE TO THE GLOW-WORM.

BY PORTER.

Oft have I mark'd with curious view,
The green-ey'd radiance of thy hue,
Amid the shades of night:
And musing oft on Nature's laws
Have try'd to find the end and cause
Of thy mysterious light.
When elfin Fancy would suggest,
That Fairies rising from their rest,
On airy wings upborne,
Around thy lamp would circling meet
And join the dance with trackless feet
Till banish'd by the morn.
Avaunt! ye fictions of the brain;
None of th' ALMIGHTY's works are vain,
But all bespeak design:
'Tis Hymen's torch which Nature lights,
And thus her airy mate invites,
Observant of the sign.
Is this the work of lawless Chance,
That bids his thousand atoms dance,
In drunken roundelay?
Confounded Sceptic! learn to praise
That God, the wisdom of whose ways
His meanest works display.
With humbler pinions, Chymist! soar,
And learn that science to adore,
That could this reptile form.
Proud Athiest! turn thy jaundic'd eye
From yonder gem-bespangle'd sky,
And study this poor worm!

Miss Highley, a literary lady in England, has just finished a beautiful translation of Florian's Galatea, a well known pastoral romance, derived from the Spanish of Cervantes.

a fly, and inhabits the air.

Inscription for the tomb of a Mrs. Elizabeth Pidgeon, who died suddenly.

Weep, reader, the sad tidings here announc'd:
Death, that fell kite, on Betty Pidgeon pounc'd:
Yet, tho' her sudden flight our grief demands,
Her's is the Pidgeon house, not made with hands;
For in her life the serpent's wisdom shone,
And the Dove's innocence was her own.
Then, till Heaven wakes to happiness the soul,
Rest, gentle Pidgeon, in this Pidgeon hole.

On an amiable youth.

Here virtue lies... refrain the pious tear!
He meets that judgment, which he cannot fear.

AN EXCUSE FOR A KISS.

Addressed to Miss in consequence of her being offended at the author's saluting her, at a friend's table, after supper.

When pleasure dances in the sparkling eye,
And the gay moments innocently fly;
While social intercourse unbends the heart,
And nature speaks without the veil of art;
If strongly tempted by this scene of bliss,
The unguarded mortal dares to snatch a kiss!
Though rigid custom should the deed disown,
And nature claims it for her act alone,
The generous bosom may the offence forgive,
Disarm the frown and bid the offender live.
Yet while contrition marks your suppliant's prayer,
Who honours prudence in the youthful fair,
May no cold maxims ever disapprove
The kiss of friendship, or the sigh of love.

LINES

Inscribed on a leaf of Lowth's Grammar, which the writer presented to a young lady, the daughter of his friend.

Fair miniature of all thy mother's grace,
Gentle Theresa, whose first opening bloom
Foretells a lovely flow'r of rich perfume,
Now that thy tender mind doth quick embrace
Each character impress'd, these pages trace
With studious eye, and let thy thoughts assume Such classic dress, as grac'd the maids of Rome,
Free, elegant, and as thy manners chaste.

Anecdote of Lord Thurlow, while at Caius College, Cambridge.

To young Thurlow the Dean of his College once said,
[Sure his Reverence that day was dispos'd for a wrangle,
Through my casement I never can once put my head,
Without seeing you strolling about the quadrangle,
'And I, Sir,' the youth was not slow in replying,
[He, to brazen it out with an impudent face meant.]
'About the quadrangle can't stroll without spying
You thrusting your head, Mr. Dean, through the casement.'

INSCRIPTION FOR A TABLE,

Which was formerly used as a writing-desk, by Thomson, the poet.

Ye, who on things of simplest kind,
Can stamp the mystic worth of mind;
Who press the turf, where Virgil trod,
And think it like no other sod;
Or guard each leaf from Shakspear's tree
With druid, like idolatry:
Ye will this relic fondly view,
On which the sylvan scholiast drew,
With moral sweet and comment clear,
His record of the rural year,
While every season's change he trac'd,
With Shakspear's fancy, Virgil's taste.

The President of the United States is now supposed wholly absorbed in the contemplation of Gunboat No. 1. Some suppose that he means to navigate this vessel himself; but it is more correctly conjectured by others, that sable Sally is to be the chief pilot.

Earl Stanhope has invented, and after much labour brought to perfection, a contrivance applicable to any musical machine played on by the finger; as an organ, harpsichord, or piano; by which the music is printed by the mere operation of touching the note; so that copies of the music may be multiplied as often as any tune is played over. Ibid.

A Welch footman, lately come into the service of a gentleman of fortune, had nearly brought his master into an awkward predicament, from his mistress overhearing him say—'Indeed, your honor, her came in, and her went out, exactly at the time your honour ordered.' Ibid.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The rough stile of 'P' is sometimes the language of a porter; and too often descends from the heights of eloquence to grovel in the miry ways of Plebeian obloquy.

'The Ode to Popularity' is a home thrust in the Patriot's side. It is poetically descriptive, and politically just.

The verses of S. to Miss M. B. will probably propitiate a lady, and certainly will not offend the public.

The absurdities of American politics are notorious to all men of dignity and discernment, and X. enlarges on them, with all the triumph of vindictive glee. We are delighted with this writer, and participate with him in all his contempt for our imposture institutions.

We are fully of opinion that if we were to publish the satire against — the author would rue the experiment. He would rouse a lion. He would arise, with the gigantic arm of genius, and crush his adversary.

'CLIMENOLE' attracts general attention, and in the best sense of the word, is a popular writer. The herd of Jacobins and Infidels cower under his satirical stripes; and this nervous writer may exclaim with the exultation of Pope:

Yes I am proud, I must be proud to see
Men not afraid of God, afraid of me:
Safe from the bar, the pulpit, and the throne,
Yet touch'd and sham'd by ridicule alone.

SPEECH OF EVANDER TO HIS SON PALLAS

O mihi praeferitos referat si Jupiter annos!
Virgil Aen. book 8.

Oh that the bounteous gods would now renew
That strength, which once in boiling youth I knew,
Such as I was when in Preneste's sight,
Furious I swept the thickest ranks of fight,
Dyed with a crimson flood the slipp'ry fields,
And burnt in triumph piles of conquer'd shields;
Such as I was when king Herilus fell,
Plung'd by my faulchion to the shades of hell.
Although Feronia to her son had giv'n
Three souls, three spears—oh wond'rous gift of Heav'n!

Three spears he wav'd, my weapon thrice I sped,
And thrice the hero at my feet lay dead.
Such were I now, as in those hours of joy,
No pow'r should part me from my darling boy;
Nor should the proud Mezentius, swell'd with rage
Insult these locks, now silver'd o'er with age.
Elated, pour his sanguinary bands,
Widow my towns and desolate my lands.
But, oh, attend, immortal pow'rs above,
And first, thou sire of gods, almighty Jove;
Oh hear a prince who sway'd Arcadia's plains,
Grant my request, and ease a father's pains.
If fate reserve my Pallas for these arms,
From fields of death and battles dire alarms,
With blest return to glad my longing sight,
And both our hearts again in one unite;
Prolong my life till that propitious hour,
Then on this hoary head your vengeance pour;
But if my tears, immortal pow'rs, must flow,
And Pallas fall, afflict my soul with woe.
Now, now, ye gods! infix your deadly dart,
While fate lies hid, and hope yet cheers my heart;
While yet I hold thee in my fond embrace,
Dear boy, sole prospect of my future race,
Lest doleful tidings wound my painful ears,
And stain my furrow'd cheek with bitter tears.
Baltimore. L.

J'ai vu l'impie adoré sur la terre
Pareil au cedre il cachoit dans les cieux
Son front audacieux;
Il sembloit, à son gré-gouverner le tonnerre,
Fouloit aux pieds ses ennemis vaincus,
Je n'ai fait que passer—il n'étoit déjà plus.
RACINE.

TRANSLATION.

I saw the impious man on earth ador'd,
With haughty mien, tall, cedar-like he tower'd;
Amidst the clouds he rear'd his head on high,
And seem'd to rule the thunder of the sky;
His vanquish'd foes he proudly trampled o'er—
I pass'd—look'd back—and lo! he was no more.

To A.... on her marriage with Mr. R....

And must we then, Amanda, part?
Must I resign that heart forever?
That heart I thought so link'd with mine,
That nought but death the chain could sever.

Ah! no: we must not—shall not part,
'Tis yet no sin to love each other—
Thee as a sister I will love,
And thou wilt love me as a brother.

LOVE AND LIBERTY.

By R. Tyler, Esq.

I.

In bri'ry dell, or thicket brown,
On mountain high, in lowly vale,
Or where the thistle sheds its down,
And sweet-fern scents the passing gale;
There hop the birds from bush to tree,
Love fills their throats,
Love swells their notes,
Their song is Love and Liberty.

II.

No parent bird shall love direct,
His fair he seeks in plummy throng,
Caught by the plumage of her neck,
Or kindred softness of her song.
They sing and bill from bush to tree,
Love fills their throats,
Love swells their notes,
Their song is Love and Liberty.

III.

Some airy songster's feathered shape,
O! could my love and I assume;
The ring-dove's glossy neck he take,
And I the modest turtle's plume,
O then we'd sport from bush to tree,
Love fill our throats,
Love swell our notes,
Our song be Love and Liberty.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

SONG.

By THOMAS MOORE, Esq.

Come, tell me where the maid is found
Whose heart can love, without deceit,
And I will range the world around
To sigh one moment at her feet.

Oh! tell me, where's her sainted home,
What air receives her blessed sigh,
A pilgrimage of years I'll roam
To catch one sparkle from her eye.

And if her cheek be rosy bright,
While truth within her bosom lies,
I'll gaze upon her morn and night,
Till my heart leave me through my eyes.

Show me on earth a thing so rare,
I'll own all miracles are true;
To make one maid sincere and fair,
Oh! 'tis the utmost Heaven can do.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

These lines to a nymph beloved, will be instantly acknowledged as the production of MOORE.

To ROSA,

WRITTEN DURING ILLNESS.

The wisest soul, by anguish torn,
Will soon unlearn the lore it knew;
And when the shrining casket's worn,
The gem within will tarnish too!

But love's an essence of the soul,
Which sinks not with this chain of clay;
Which throbs beyond the chill control
Of withering pain, or pale decay.

And surely, when the touch of Death
Dissolves the spirits' mortal ties,
Love still attends the soaring breath,
And makes it purer for the skies.

Oh! Rosa, when, to seek its sphere
My soul shall leave this orb of men,
That love it found so blissful here,
Shall be its best of blisses then.

And, as in fabled dreams of old,
Some airy genius, child of time,
Presided o'er each star that roll'd,
And track'd it through its path sublime;

So thou, fair planet, not unled,
Shall through thy mortal orbit stray;
Thy lover's shade, divinely wed,
Shall linger round thy wandering way.

Let other spirits range the sky,
And brighten in the solar gem;
I'll bask beneath that lucid eye
Nor ENVY WORLDS OF SUNS TO THEM.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Imitation of the 44th Epigram of the 5th book of Martial.

Dentilla's teeth are white as snow;
Nigrina's black and brown;
But which are best, 'tis hard to know,
For one bought hers in Sanson Row,
The others are her own.

ROWLAND.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

From the Italian of Metastasio.

Ah, lovely Chloris! find a swain
Who hears thee speak and does not sigh,
Who sees thee smile, and does not die,
And then my proffer'd love disdain.
But when so many guilty are,
Must I alone your anger bear?
If captivating you will be,
The fault, dear, cruel girl, is not in me.

SELECTED POETRY.

SONNET

To an amiable girl.

Miranda! mark where, shrinking from the gale,
Its silken leaves yet moist with early dew,
That fair faint flower, the lily of the vale,
Drops its meek head, and looks, methinks,
like you.

Wrapp'd in a shadowy veil of tender green,
Its snowy bells a soft perfume dispense,
And bending, as reluctant to be seen,
In simple loveliness it soothes the sense.
With bosom bared to meet the garish day,
The glaring tulip gaudy undismay'd,
Offends the eye of taste; that turns away
To seek the lily in her fragrant shade,
With such unconscious beauty, pensive mild,
Miranda charms—nature's soft modest child.

MOORE'S ANACREON.

[The following is Moore's incomparable translation of the second Ode of Anacreon.]

Give me the harp of epic song,
Which Homer's finger thrill'd along;
But tear away the sanguine string,
For war is not the theme I sing.
Proclaim the laws of festal rite,
I'm monarch of the board to-night,
And all around shall brim as high,
And quaff the tide, as deep as I!
And when the cluster's mellowing dews
Their warm enchanting balm diffuse,
Our feet shall catch the elastic bound,
And reel us through the dance's round.
Oh! Bacchus, we shall sing to thee,
In wild, but sweet ebriety,
And flash around such sparks of thought,
As Bacchus could alone have taught!
Then give the harp of epic song
Which Homer's finger thrill'd along;
But tear away the sanguine string,
For war is not the theme I sing.

SONNET.

From Strangford's Cameens.

When from my heart the hand of fortune tore
Those smiling hopes that cheer'd mine earlier day,
Would that she too had kindly borne away
The sweetly sad remembrances of yore!
I should not then as now in tears deplore
My buried bliss, and comforts fast decay;
For love (on whom my vain dependence lay)
Still ling'ring on delights that live no more,
Kills all my peace—where'er the tyrant sees
My spirit taste a little hour of ease!
Fell star of fate! thou never can'st employ
A torment teeming with severer smart,
Than that which memory pours upon the heart
While clinging round the sepulchre of joy.

THE PROGRESS OF AFFECTION.

A SONG.

When the first dawn of Celia's charms
Rose to my unexpected sight,
Enraptur'd wonder, soft alarms
Fill'd every sense with new delight.
Yet, by the world's examples taught,
Which scorns the generous flame to own,
I little heeded, little thought
That Love is virtue's gift alone.

II.

When native sense and modest grace,
With manners artless, though refin'd,
Ensured the triumph of the face,
And gently chain'd the willing mind,
By just reflection undeceived,
Stern reason bow'd at beauty's throne,
Then first I thought, then first believ'd
That Love is virtue's gift alone.

III.

But when Affection's soft controul,
Beyond or sense, or Beauty's power,
Had purified, had fix'd the soul,
Once varying with the changeful hour,
By truth and tenderness I strove
To merit bliss till then unknown.
Ah, then I felt the power of love,
For Love is virtue's gift alone.

From the works of Lady Mary Worsley Montagu, lately published.

HYMN TO THE MOON.

Thou silver Deity of secret night,
Direct my footsteps thro' the woodland shade;
Thou conscious witness of unknown delight,
The lover's guardian and the muse's aid!

By thy pale beams I solitary rove,
To thee my tender grief confide;
Serenely sweet you gild the silent grove,
My friend, my goddess and my guide.

E'en thee, fair queen, from thy amazing height,
The charms of young Endymion drew;
Veil'd with the mantle of concealing night;
With all thy greatness and thy coldness too.

ORIGINAL CRITICISM.

FROM THE MONTHLY ANTHOLOGY.

The Miscellaneous Works of David Humphreys, Esq. late Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Madrid. New-York, T. & J. Swords. 8vo.

Poetry is said to flourish, previously to other arts, in the infancy of society; to attain elegance and correctness in its middle age; and thence, in its decline, to degenerate into the nuge canorae, the tinkling trifles of mere versifiers.

In the childhood of social life, when language is barren and poor, men of strong feelings are compelled, from defect of phraseology, to express their ideas by metaphor. Hence their minds receive a poetical cast, and superior geniuses start up, who, as inspired by the Epic, Lyric, or Dramatic Muse, celebrate the martial exploits of their countrymen, tune the lyre to the praises of their gods, or their mistress, or awaken sympathy, or excite merriment, by theatrical representations. Sublimity and originality are commonly the distinguished excellences of these elder bards.

As the social state improves, language becoming more enlarged, and more accurately defined, precision and elegance mark the writers of a polished age. From this period Poetry generally declines, and succeeding votaries of the Muses, finding all the best avenues to fame pre-occupied by their predecessors, strike out a new path, in pursuing which, they are entangled in affectation and sustian, in antithesis and pun.

The poetical history of Greece, Rome, France, and England, will confirm the justness of these remarks. But as, in reviewing productions in the English language, we have no immediate concern with ancient literature, or with French, we shall briefly review the progress of letters in England only.

Chaucer is the father of English poetry, and first introduced a classic taste into the country, though there are strong objections to the immoral tendency of his writings. But no great improvement was made in literature, till the reign of Elizabeth, when Shakspeare, Spenser, and Hooker produced their immortal works, and proved, that neither in imagination in poetry, nor in judgment in prose, were our ancestors inferior to the ancients. But our language was not brought to perfection till the reign of queen Anne, the Augustan age of England, when a host of writers arose, of superior excellence. Since that period, Poetry has been on the decline, and, with some few exceptions, nothing has been produced in the art, likely to obtain the wreath of immortality.

As the first European settlers in America were Englishmen, and in a state of considerable civilization on their arrival, though we may call America a new country, we cannot, with strict propriety, call its European inhabitants a new people. Their manners, habits, and language, were entirely English, and every difference, which may now subsist between the two countries, may have arisen from the long prevalence of republican habits, (for the habits of the eastern states were republican even under the government of the parent country,) and from the influence of our independent religious institutions.

It is not surprising then, that an English colony, seeking liberty in a wilderness, and necessarily attentive to procure the means of subsistence, should produce no great poets.

As our opulence increased, we were satisfied with importing books, without producing any of our own; and had we even courted the Muses, it is probable that we should have been what the English now are, mere imitators, since the age of good English poetry was past.

In reviewing therefore an American poem, it would not be fair to judge it by the standard bards of the Augustan age of England, because their own modern poets, if judged by that standard, will make but an indifferent figure. But if we judge the poetical productions of Colonel Humphreys by those of his own countrymen, he will appear in no inferior rank amidst the bards of Columbia.

The volume contains some treatises in prose, among which is the life of Colonel Putnam. This interesting piece of biography we have read with great pleasure, and we strongly recommend its perusal, convinced that it cannot fail of pleasing, since well authenticated facts are so happily described, as to resemble all the agreeable wildness of romance.

The principal poems are written on the following subjects. On the happiness of America. On the future glory of the United States. On the industry of the United States of America. On the love of country. On the death of General Washington. The volume commencing with an Address to the American armies during the revolution.

The reader will perceive from these subjects, that the Colonel is an ardent friend of his country, and, what is not less to his praise, his sentiments throughout the volume proclaim him an excellent and worthy man.

As from the nature of the subjects, there must necessarily be a degree of sameness in the poems: we shall not characterize them separately, which might prove tedious to the reader, but extract such passages, as may best acquaint him with the author's manner.

As when dark clouds, from Andes' towering head,
Roll down the skies, and round the horizon spread,
With thunders fraught, the blackening tempest sails,
And bursts tremendous o'er Peruvian vales;
So broke the storm on Concord's fatal plain;
There fell our brothers, by fierce ruffians slain.

p. 8.

These lines are poetical, though some may think the skirmish at Concord too trifling to be introduced by so tremendous a simile. The word ruffians is perhaps a little too harsh.

In mortal breasts shall hate immortal last?
Albion, Columbia, soon forget the past.

In friendly intercourse your interests blend.
From common sires your gallant sons descend,
From free-born sires, in toils of empire brave.
'Tis yours to heal the mutual wounds ye gave;
Let those be friends, whom kindred blood allies,
With language, law's, religion's holiest ties. * *

p. 40.

These lines contain correct sentiment, and sound politics. Individuals, after a battle, always shake hands, to show that they have no malice, and great nations pursue the same line of conduct. An unforgiving temper is the mark, equally of a little low mind, and of a hard unchristian heart.

Thou child of heaven and earth, a stream divine
From the first fountain feeds your veins and mine.
O man, my brother, how, by blood allied,
Swells in my breast the sympathetic tide?
Shall I not wish thee well, not work thy good,
Deaf to the endearing cries of kindred blood?
What! shall my soul, involved in matter dense,
(Ob-dur'd this bosom, and benumb'd this sense,)
Lose, grateful Sympathy, thy genial ray,
Quench'd in the dampness of this crust of clay?
No, give me, heaven, affections quick, refined,
The keen emotions, that entrance the mind;
What youthful bards, what ardent lovers feel,
The lover's rapture and the patriot's zeal;
The zeal that aims humanity to bless,
O, let me feel, and, what I feel, express.

With feelings not less strong than others born,
Affected sensibility I scorn.
Nor finds my breast benevolence or joy,
By generalising feeling to destroy.
I hate that new philosophy's strange plan,
That teaches love for all things more than man;
To love all mortals, save our friends alone,
To hold all countries dearer than our own;
To take no interest in the present age,
Rapt to the unborn with philosophic rage;
To make the tutor'd eyes with tears o'erflow,
More for fictitious than for real woe.

Then let my breast more pure sensations prove,
And on just objects fix appropriate love;
First on that God, whose wondrous works I scan,
Next on the noblest of his creatures, man.

p. 129.

We have made this long quotation rather from the excellence of its sense, than from the superiority of its poetry. The author shows himself here a disciple of the old and true school, and no friend to the fantastic and pernicious doctrines of the new.

Having thus far pointed out the excellences of these poems, it remains now, that we should proceed to take notice of their faults. This invidious and unpleasing task is always painful, but by no means the least necessary, or useful part in criticism,

While unborn ages rise, and call you blest.
The untamed forest bowed beneath their toil.
Unbounded deserts unknown charms assume.
Their uncomb'd locks loose floating on the wind,
Our innate springs and energies of soul.

p. 104. l. 266.

The epithets, here marked with italics, have all the accent on the penultimate, contrary to the practice of the best English authorities. These authorities we are bound to observe, whilst we employ the language, as we have no American standard. If every one has a right to accent as he pleases, and use whatever words are current among his associates, unknown to good authors, as Noah Webster, and other conceited innovators assert, the language will soon degenerate into a Babylonish dialect, and be fit only for the lowest of the populace. If the reader should think these remarks on words trifling, let him remember, that a false quantity in poetry is as great an offence, as a false concord in prose.

Or drag the wild beast struggling from his den
p. 11. l. 426.
The tame brute sheltered, &c. &c.
p. 32. l. 193.
And oft beneath the broad moon's paler day.
p. 32. l. 217.
Saw ye the fresh blood where it bubbling broke.
p. 53. l. 85.
The green waves blacken, &c.
p. 58. l. 298.
The black sides wrapt in flame, &c.
p. 60. l. 361.
The rank grass rustling, &c.
p. 106. l. 368.
Athwart the tall shrouds, &c.
p. 111. l. 357.
How teems the fresh mould, &c.
p. 174. l. 383.
The broad sun risen, &c.
p. 184. l. 772.
And clip his dim orb, &c.

In these lines, the emphatic word, in every instance, is the adjective, contrary to the usage of the best writers, and the obvious laws of propriety; because the substantive is evidently of more importance than the epithet. Churchill, in his Rosciad, censures this impropriety in the delivery of a player.

'To epithets allots emphatic state,
'Whilst principals ungrac'd, like lacqueys, wait.'

Swords turn'd to shares, and war to rural toil,
The men, who saved, now cultivate the soil.
In no heroic age, since time began,
Appear'd so great the majesty of man.

His ardent attachment to his country, doubtless betrayed the author into this assertion, which is not strictly conformable with the truth of history. The soldiers, both of Greece and Rome, in the zenith of their republicanism, were citizens, levied, by the executive, to serve during the existing war, and were discharged on its termination. Cincinnatus was summoned from the plough, to be invested with the insignia of a Dictator, which, after having accomplished the wishes of his country, he laid aside, and returned to the plough. Is the majesty of man less apparent in this celebrated Roman, than in our general?

The obstructed path, beneath the frequent tread,
Yields a smooth chrysal to the flying steed.
'Tis then full oft, in arts of love array'd,
The amorous stripling courts his future bride.
p. 33. l. 213.

The rhymes are here incorrect, the last couplet insufferable.

In quivering fear, with grief exquisite mourn.
p. 100. l. 142.

There is no instance in English poetry of the accent, in exquisite, being placed, as it is here, on the penultimate. It is always placed on the antepenultimate, as in this line of Dryden,
'In jewels set, and exquisitely gay.'

No cynic bard from licit joys restrains.
p. 104. l. 280.

There is no such word as licit, and we cannot allow the author, respectable as he is, to coin language. Licit is an authorized word, and yet, in no degree better than unlawful.

Soon would my song, like songs of Tirteus old.

This is the first time that we ever saw the old martial bard degraded to a dissyllable, and we hope that it will be the last. A diphthong may be revolved, by diaeresis, into two vowels, but a diphthong and a vowel cannot by any synoesis be contracted into one syllable. Tydeus may be either a dissyllable, or a trissyllable, but Tyrtæus must be the latter, because the penultimate is a diphthong. Tyrtæus, or, as the Latins write it, Tyrtæus, cannot be less than three syllables, and the second syllable must be long.

Having thus reviewed the poetry of this volume, we recommend it to the reader, notwithstanding these slight faults, which are common to almost all modern poets, as the work of an apparently good and sensible man, and true American. It would be absurd, to compare him with the great poets of England, nor would the author himself tolerate such gross flattery. But on the American Parnassus he makes no mean figure. If he has less fire than Dwight, he has also less smoke; if he has less accuracy than Barlow, he has also less coldness. His first poem we think his best; and the comparative inferiority of the others, may be reasonably accounted for, by their being composed in foreign countries, where, for many years, the author enjoyed few opportunities of conversing in his own language.

We have endeavoured, in our remarks, to be at once candid and just, and hope, that, in criticizing the author, we have given no offence to the man, for whose character and talents we entertain the highest respect. The volume comprises nearly 400 octavo pages, is printed on woven paper, and with a neat type, and ornamented with a neat engraving of the author, generally esteemed a good likeness.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ORIGINAL LETTERS

FROM THE EARL OF CHATHAM

TO HIS NEPHEW.

[Concluded.]

LETTER XIV.

Stowe, July 24, 1755.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

I am just leaving this place to go to Wotton; but I will not lose the post, though I have time but for one line. I am extremely happy that you can stay at your college, and pursue the prudent and glorious resolution of employing your present moments with a view to the future. May your noble and generous love of virtue, pay you with the sweet rewards of a self-approving heart, and an applauding country! and may I enjoy the true satisfaction of seeing your fame and happiness, and of thinking, that I may have been fortunate enough to have contributed, in any small degree, to do common justice to kind nature, by a suitable education! I am no very good judge of the question concerning the books: I believe they are your own, in the same sense that your wearing apparel is. I would retain them, and leave the candid and equitable Mr. to plan, with the honest Mr., schemes of perpetual vexation. As to the persons just mentioned, I trust that you bear about you a mind and heart much superior to such malice: and that you are as little capable of resenting it, with any sensations but those of cool decent contempt, as you are of fearing the consequences of such low efforts. As to the caution money, I think you have done well. The case of the chambers, I conceive, you likewise apprehend rightly. Let me know in your next, what these two articles require you to pay down, and how far your present cash is exhausted, and I will direct Mr. Campbell to give you credit.

ingly. Believe me, my dear Nephew, truly happy to be of use to you.

Your ever affectionate.

LETTER XV.

Wotton, Aug. 7, 1755.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

I have only time at present to let you know, I am setting out for London; when I return to Sunning Hill, which I propose to do in a few days, I shall have considered the question about a letter to  , and will send you my thoughts upon it. As to literature, I know you are not idle, under so many and so strong motives, to animate you to the ardent pursuit of improvement. For English history, read the revolutions of York and Lancaster, in Pere d'Orleans, and no more of the father; the life of Edward the Fourth, and so downwards all the life-writers of our kings, except such, as you have already read. For Queen Ann's reign the continuator of Rapin.

Farewel, my dearest nephew, for to-day.

Your most affectionate uncle.

LETTER XVI.

Bath, Sept. 25, 1755.

I have not conversed with my dear nephew a long time: I have been much in a post-chaise, living a wandering Scythian life, and he has been more usefully employed, than in reading or writing letters; travelling through the various, instructing, and entertaining road of history. I have a particular pleasure, in hearing now and then a word from you in your journey, just while you are changing horses, if I may so call it, and getting from one author to another. I suppose you going through the biographers, from Edward the Fourth downwards, nor intending to stop, till you reach to the continuator of honest Rapin. There is a little book I never mentioned, Welwood's Memoirs; I recommend it. Davis's Ireland must not, on any account, be omitted: it is a great performance, a masterly work, and contains much depth and extensive knowledge in state matters, and settling of countries, in a very short compass. I have met with a scheme of chronology by Blair, shewing all cotemporary, historical characters, through all ages: it is of great use to consult frequently, in order to fix periods, and throw collateral light upon any particular branch you are reading. Let me know, when I have the pleasure of a letter from you, how far you are advanced in English history. You may, probably, not have heard authentically of Governor Lyttelton's captivity and release. He is safe and well in England, after being taken and detained in France some days. Sir Richard and he met, unexpectedly enough, at Brussels, and came together to England. I propose returning to London in about a week, where I hope to find Lady Hester as well as I left her. We are both much indebted for your kind and affectionate wishes. In publica commoda peccem si longo sermone morer, one bent on so honourable and virtuous a journey as you are.

LETTER XVII.

Pay-Office, Dec. 6, 1755.

Of all the various satisfactions of mind I have felt upon some late events, none has affected me with more sensibility and delight, than the reading my dear nephew's letter. The matter of it is worthy of a better age than that we live in; worthy of your own noble, untainted mind; and the manner and expression of it is such, as, I trust, will one day make you a powerful instrument, towards mending the present degeneracy. Examples are unnecessary to happy natures; and it is well, that your future glory and happiness should be the case; for, to copy any now existing, might cramp genius, and check the native spirit of the piece, rather than contribute to the perfection of it. I learn from Sir Richard Lyttleton, that we may have the pleasure of meeting soon, as he has already, or intends to offer you a bed at his house. It is on this, as on all occasions, little necessary to preach prudence, or to intimate a wish, that your studies at Cambridge might not be broken by a long interruption of them. I know the rightness of your own mind, and leave you to all the generous and animating motives you find there, for pursuing improvements in literature and useful knowledge, as much better counsellors than

Your ever most affectionate uncle.

Lady Hester desires her best compliments. The little cousin is well.

LETTER XVIII.

Horse Guards, Jan. 31, 1756.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

Let me thank you a thousand times for your remembering me, and giving me the pleasure of hearing, that you was well, and had laid by the ideas of London and its dissipations, to resume the sober train of thoughts, that gowns, square caps, quadrangles, and matin-bells, naturally draw after them. I hope the air of Cambridge has brought no disorder upon you, and that you will compound with the muses, so as to dedicate some hours, not less than two, of the day to exercise. The earlier you rise, the better your nerves will bear study. When you next do me the pleasure to write to me, I beg a copy of your Electra and your Mother's Picture; it is such admirable poetry, that I beg you to plunge deep into it, and severer studies, and not indulge your genius with verse, for the present. Finish your Oratori Poeta. Substitute Tully and Demosthenes in the place of Homer and Virgil; and arm yourself with all the variety of manner, copiousness and beauty of diction, nobleness and magnificence of ideas of the Roman consuls; and render the powers of eloquence complete, by the irresistible torrent of vehement argumentation, the close and forcible reasoning, and the depth and fortitude of mind of the Grecian statesman. This I mean at leisure intervals, and to relieve the course of those studies, which you intend to make your principal object. The book relating to the empire of Germany, which I could not recollect is Vitriarius's Jus Publicum, an admirable book in its kind, and esteemed of the best authority in matters much controverted. We are all well: Sir Richard is upon his legs, and abroad again.

Your ever affectionate uncle.

LETTER XIX.

Hayes, near Bromley, May 11, 1756.

My dear nephew's obliging letter, was every way most pleasing: as I had more than began to think it long since I had the satisfaction of hearing he was well. As the season of humidity and relaxation is now almost over, I trust that the muses are in no danger of nervous complaints, and that whatever pains they have to tell, are out of the reach of Esculapius, and not dangerous, though epidemical to youth at this soft month,

When lavish Nature, in her best attire,
Clothes the gay spring, the season of desire.

To be serious, I hope my dearest nephew is perfectly free from all returns of his former complaint, and enabled by an unailing body, and an ardent elevated mind, to follow, Quo te Cælestis sapientia duceret. My holydays are now approaching, and I long to hear something of your labours, which, I doubt not, will prove in their consequence more profitable to your country a few years hence, than your uncle's. Be so good to let know, what progress you have made in our historical and constitutional journey, that I may suggest to you some farther reading. Lady Hester is well, and desires her best compliments to you. I am well, but threatened with gout in my feet, from a parliamentary debauch till six in the morning, on the Militia. Poor Sir Richard is laid up with the gout.

Your's most affectionately.

LETTER XX.

Hayes, Oct. 7, 1756.

I think it very long since I heard any thing of my dear nephew's health, and learned occupations at the mother of arts and sciences. Pray give me the pleasure of a letter soon, and be so good to let me know, what progress is made in our plan of reading. I am now to make a request to you in behalf of a young gentleman coming to Cambridge, Mr. * * * 's son. The father desires much that you and his son may make an acquaintance: as what father would not? Mr. * * * is one of the best friends I have in the world, and nothing can oblige me more than that you would do all in your power to be of assistance and advantage to the young man. He has good parts, good nature, and amiable qualities. He is young, and consequently much depends on the first habits he forms, whether of application or dissipation. You see, my dear nephew, what it is already, to have made yourself Princeps Juventutis. It has its glories and its cares. You are invested with a kind of public charge, and the eyes of the world are upon you, not only for your own acquittal, but for the example and pattern to the British youth. Lady Hester is still about, but in daily expectation of the good minute. She desires her compliments to you. My sister is gone to Howberry. Believe me ever,

My dear nephew,

Most affectionately yours.

LETTER XXI.

Hayes, Oct. 10, 1756.

DEAR NEPHEW,

I have the pleasure to acquaint you with the glad tidings of Hayes. Lady Hester was safely delivered this morning of a son. She and the child are as well as possible, and the father in the joy of his heart. It is no small addition to my happiness to know, you will kindly share it with me. A father must form wishes for his child as soon as it comes into the world, and I will make mine, that he may live to make as good use of life, as one that shall be nameless. is now doing at Cambridge. Quid voveat majus Maticula dulcis Alumno?

Your ever affectionate.

LETTER XXII.

St. James's Square, Aug. 28, 1757.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

Nothing can give me greater pleasure than the approaching conclusion of a happy reconciliation in the family. Your letter to * * * is the properest that can be imagined, and, I doubt not, will make the deepest impression on his heart. I have been in much pain for you during all this unseasonable weather, and am still apprehensive, till I have the satisfaction of hearing from you, that your course of sea bathing has been interrupted by such gusts of wind, as must have rendered the sea too rough an element for a convalescent to disport in. I trust, my dearest nephew, that opening scenes of domestic comfort and family affection will confirm and augment every hour the benefits you are receiving at Brighton, from external and internal medical assistances. Lady Hester and Aunt Mary join with me in all good wishes for your health and happiness. The duplicate * * * mentions, having addressed to me, has never come to hand. I am,

With truest affection,
My dearest nephew,
Ever yours.

LETTER XXIII.

St. James's Square, Oct. 27, 1757.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

Inclosed is a letter from * * *, which came in one to me. I heartily wish the contents may be agreeable to you.

I am far from being satisfied, my dearest nephew, with the account your last letter to my sister gives of your health. I had formed the hope of your ceasing to be an invalid before this time; but since you must submit to be one for this winter, I am comforted to find your strength is not impaired, as it used to be, by the returns of illness you sometimes feel; and I trust the good government you are under, and the fortitude and manly resignation you are possessed of, will carry you well through this trial of a young man's patience, and bring you out in spring, like gold, the better for the proof. I rejoice to hear you have a friend of great merit to be with you. My warmest wishes for your health and happiness never fail to follow you. Lady Hester desires her best compliments. Believe me,

With the truest affection,
Ever yours.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF MICKLE.

[A poet of sufficient merit to attract the regard, and to receive the liberal praise of the author of the Pursuits of Literature, cannot be degraded among the minor scribblers of a Sonnet, or the laborious weavers of a rebus and a charade. Yet, such is sometimes the capriciousness of the public taste, though Mickle can never be deprived of his glory, as an accomplished translator of a Portuguese epic, yet his poems are often neglected, while the feeble verse of more fashionable writers has been 'tota cantabitur urbe.' His 'Mary Queen of Scots' is not less pleasant to the general lover of poetry than to the partizan of the House of Stuart. His 'Pollio' has been always admitted into the basket of poetical gems, by every judicious collector. 'Hengist and Mey' a bishop of Dromore might approve, and 'Sir Martin' will not be disdained by the lovers of Spenser.]

Some particulars of the life of Mickle were given to the world in the 'European Magazine,' for 1789, by an intelligent writer, who was his intimate friend, and wrote from personal knowledge.

The facts stated in the present account, are chiefly taken from the information communicated in the 'European Magazine,' with the addition of some particulars collected from his correspondence with Lyttleton, inserted in the 'Anecdotes' of his life, prefixed to the edition of his poems in 4to, 1794.

William Julius Mickle was born at Langholm, in Dumfries-shire, September 29, 1734. He was the third son of the Rev. Alexander Mickle, minister of Langholm; who resided some time at London, and frequently preached at Watts's meeting-house, and was one of the translators of Bailey's 'Dictionary.' In 1716, he was presented to the parish of Langholm, by George the First, and about the same time married the daughter of Mr. Thomas Henderson of Ploughlands, near Edinburgh, by whom he had seven children. He died in 1758.

He received the early part of his education from his father in the country. After his death, he went to Edinburgh, and resided with an aunt, whose husband had been a brewer; who sent him to the High-School in that city,

Early in his life he discovered a propensity to poetry; but he often declared that he was by no means attached to his books, until the age of thirteen, when accidentally meeting with Spenser's 'Faery Queene,' he became passionately fond of the beautiful imagery of that enchanting writer, and began immediately to imitate him.

At the age of sixteen he quitted the High-School, and was employed to superintend the books of his aunt, who continued her husband's trade.

In October 1755, he commenced business for himself; but the event only added another to the numberless instances which prove that the pursuits of poetry and trade are incompatible; for though, from the extent of his dealings, he paid more duty to the excise, than any brewer in Edinburgh, he was unsuccessful.

Much of his time was probably devoted to study, as he frequently declared, that before he was eighteen years old, he had written two tragedies, and half an epic poem, all which he prudently consigned to the flames.

Some of his early performances appeared in the 'Scots Magazine,' one of which, intitled, 'On passing through the Parliament Close at Midnight,' was afterwards reprinted in the second volume of Donaldson's 'Collection of Original Poems, by Scotch Gentlemen,' 8vo. 1765.

In 1762, he published an ethic poem, intitled 'Providence, or Arandus and Emilec,' 4to. a languid, tedious, and incorrect performance, which, after some unsuccessful attempts 'to alter and shorten' it, was finally abandoned.

In the spring of 1763, he quitted Edinburgh, and went to London, to solicit a commission in the marine service; but in this application he met with a disappointment.

Having a very exalted opinion of Lyttleton whose character was then high in the literary world, he had sent him a copy of his Providence, previous to his departure from Edinburgh, accompanied with a letter, under the borrowed name of William More, in which he requested his opinion and criticism.

The letter was in a few months afterwards answered in a very polite manner, and a correspondence commenced between the peer and the poet; from which he derived no advantage, but the honour of his acquaintance, the communication of his remarks on his writings, and his encouragement to persevere in his poetical studies.

His Pollio, an elegiac Ode, Knowledge, an Ode, Mary Queen of Scots, an Elegy; were subjected to the revision of Lyttleton, and the two first appear to have received some corrections from his hand.

'I have read,' he writes him, July 15, 1763, 'with great pleasure, the very beautiful Ode you did me the favour to send me. The correction of a few lines would make it as perfect as any thing of that kind in the English language.'

He afterwards writes him, August 28, 1764, 'The first of the two Odes has all the merit that just sentiment, fine poetical imagery, elegant diction, and harmonious numbers, can give so trite a subject. There is also in some stanzas a sublimity of thought and expression, which raises it above the ordinary pitch of mere descriptive poetry.'

'As to the poem on the death of Mary Queen of Scots,' he adds, 'I will not criticise any part of it; because I wholly disapprove the subject; poetry should not consecrate what history must condemn; and it is as certain as history can render any fact, that (besides her criminal amours with David Rizzio and Bothwell) she was an accomplice in the murder of the king her husband. Read Thuanus or Hume (who have written her history more truly than Robertson) and you will be inclined to pity, not to praise her; nor will

Robertson himself, though he shades her crimes as much as possible, give you such an idea of her, as to make you think her a proper subject for the encomiums of a writer who means to serve the cause of virtue, not of party.'

'Though you have disapproved of the Ode on the Queen of Scots,' he writes his patron in return, September 8, 1764. 'I must think myself very happy in having shown it to your lordship. Nothing was ever farther from my thoughts, than to vindicate or deny her crimes, and if, while taken up with the subject, I have fallen into what might be looked on as endeavouring to give an amiable cast to her vices; now when your lordship has been so good as to warn me of it, I can have no reluctance to suppress a piece that was merely a sport of fancy. That Buchanan, Knox, and others, have sometimes forgot the honour of the historian, and indulged the rancour of party, is pretty certain. This, with the greatness of her sufferings (in some instances beyond what the most crooked policy could demand) pleads something in her favour, and it was this that misled me to think of writing an Ode on her death, without sufficiently weighing the propriety of the subject.'

'I would fain take this opportunity,' he adds, 'to mention the plan of a poem, which I have long had some thoughts of. The subject of it, if not the title, to be, The Cave of Deism.' Mr. Hume has asserted, that Mahometanism has been more salutary to the world than Christianity. And through all his works, there runs a most disingenuous manner of blending revelations with the fopperies and sinister inventions of men; and in a variety of such ludicrous dresses, he would expose Christianity to the contempt of his reader. Such a conduct, with his shameless assertion, that Polytheism was the first religion of mankind; his malevolence of the Reformation; the nonsense he writes about miracles; together with such like sentiments, from other infidel writers, would furnish out a part or character for the Keeper or Genius of the Cave. The description of the gloomy cave itself, with the vices that shelter in it—the genius of Mahometanism, with the finest countries lying in ruins behind her—that of popery, and that of genuine Christianity introduced as personages, with some proper action, might, I should think, afford materials for a poem of five or six hundred lines, which would fall naturally enough into the manner of Spenser.'

In a letter to Lyttleton, dated April 9, 1765, he gives the following account of his pursuits and difficulties. 'A situation that would enable me to cultivate the studies to which nature has led my inclination, was all the happiness I ever wished for; but any weak attempt I have made, has neither procured such, nor left much hope of it doing so. To write for the booksellers is what I never will do. Did my fortune enable me to do for myself in trade, I might expect some encouragement under governor Johnstone, of West Florida, to whose family my father was related; but as I prefer going abroad to any thing I could expect in a counting-house in London, I think I have reason to hope that major James Johnstone, brother to the governor, will befriend me so far, as to procure me, if in his power, some settlement in the East or West-Indies.'

'The risk of being cut off by the climate,' he adds, in another place, 'would no wise deter me from going to Jamaica, did it otherwise appear as the most proper step I could take, in which case your lordship's recommendation to Beckford, or Fuller, and mentioning me to your brother the governor, would be every thing I could wish. But as your lordship likewise mentioned the East-Indies, and as next to a clerkship in some of the public offices at home, I should prefer going thither, so I should be very happy, could any thing be done in it. The company have many resident clerks, and various places to bestow, and no doubt your lordship's interest with the directors would do a great deal.'

'In answer to your last letter,' Lyttleton writes him, 'I can only say that I have no acquaintance with any of the East-India directors; but if a recommendation to my brother will be of any service to you, I will give it in the manner I mentioned. I have not been able to see either Beckford or Fuller; but it will be time enough to speak to them some time next winter.'

'On fuller information,' he writes Lyttleton in return, 'there is only one consideration that would make me prefer the East to the West-Indies, the returning to England within two years, were I to go purser of an East-Indiaman; but as that is not my choice, my intentions must settle in the West, whither I shall go, as the best step I can take, with all convenient speed.'

'In my last letter to my brother,' Lyttleton writes him, November 6, 1765, 'I recommended you to him for his favour and countenance, as a man of fine sentiments, and good genius in poetry, if you should come to that island, while he continues there. Wherever you go I wish you health and happiness.'

'Your lordship's kindness,' he writes Lyttleton in return, December 6, 1765, 'in mentioning me to your brother, lays me under the greatest obligations; but as I would avoid the dangers attending an uncertainty, I some weeks ago accepted an offer of going as a merchant's clerk to Carolina.'

Thus ended his correspondence with Lyttleton; and though the only fruits of patronage he experienced were, his correcting his poems, and slightly countenancing him when he was little known in London, he always spoke of him with a respect bordering on reverence.

It is remarkable, that at this time he wrote his name William Mickle. The reason of his afterwards adding Julius to his name, is not certainly known.

From some circumstances, unknown to his biographers, he did not go to Carolina; but was employed as corrector of the Clarendon press in Oxford; a situation much more congenial to his taste, than that of a merchant's clerk.

In 1765, he published Pollio, an Elegiac Ode, written in the wood near Roslin Castle, 4to. It was written in 1762, on the death of his brother, and was the first poem which brought him into notice.

In 1767, he published The Concubine, a poem, in two cantos, in the manner of Spenser, 4to. which, after going through three editions, was improved, and republished in 1777, under the title of Sir Martyn, the former title, as he acknowledges in his introduction, giving a very improper idea both of the subject and spirit of the poem.

In 1769, he published a Letter to Dr. Harwood, wherein some of his evasive glosses, &c. in support of the Arian heresy, contained in his liberal translation of the New Testament, are pointed out and confuted, 8vo.

In 1770, his Mary Queen of Scots, an elegy; Knowledge, an ode; and Hengist and Mey, a ballad; were published in Pearch's 'Collection of Poems.' The note inserted at the conclusion of the elegy on Mary, was intended to obviate the objections which Lyttleton made to his defence of her character.

Many elaborate attempts have been made to rescue the character of the beautiful, but unfortunate Mary, from obloquy and reproach. The artifices of her insidious but inexorable rival, Elizabeth, have been clearly laid open by the masterly pen of Dr. Stuart. Elizabeth was undoubtedly the enemy of her fame, her fortune, and her life. Yet the conduct of the queen of England may be considered as in a great measure justified by the alarming combinations of Mary and her abettors; by the general circumstances of the times, and of the two countries; and by the rebellious disposition of a considerable portion of her subjects, exasperated by the suppressed but malignant bigotry of the old superstition, and ready to seize every opportunity of disturbing the reign of their triumphant enemy.

In 1770, he published Voltaire in the Shades, or Dialogues on the Deistical Controversy, 8vo. and about this period was a frequent writer in the 'Whitehall Evening Post.'

He had very early in life, read Casters's translation of the Lusiad of Camoens into French, and then conceived a design of giving an English version of it. Various avocations had, however, prevented him from executing his intention; though he retained the idea.

At length, having prepared himself by acquiring a knowledge of the Portuguese language, he, in 1771, published the first book as a specimen of his powers; and finding the manner in which it was performed approved by his friends, determined to devote his whole time to the completion of the work.

That he might do this without interruption, he quitted his situation at Oxford, and went to reside at a farm house at Forest Hill, where he adhered to his plan with such attention, that the translation, which had been printing while he proceeded on it, was entirely finished in 1775, and published under the title of The Lusiad, or the Discovery of India, an epic poem, &c. 4to. Oxford; with an Introduction, the History of the Discovery of India, the History of the Rise and Fall of the Portuguese Empire in the East, the Life of Camoens, a Dissertation on the Lusiad, and Observations upon Epic Poetry, and Notes and Illustrations, &c.

His publication came out under peculiar disadvantages. The Lusiad had been before translated into English verse, by sir Richard Fanshawe, 1655; but the manner in which it was done, gave but a faint idea of the beautiful original. It was written in a language but little cultivated by the muses. The writer was little known in this country, and of the translator's powers the public at that time knew still less.

In a letter to a friend, January 22, 1776, he says, 'Though my work is well received at Oxford, I will honestly own to you, some things have hurt me. A few grammatical slips in the Introduction have been mentioned; and some things in the notes, about Virgil, Milton, and Homer, have been called the arrogance of criticism. But the greatest offence of all, is what I say of blank verse. My versification, however, receives, a most general approbation.'

ON THE POLICY OF MAKING CONNEXIONS TO PROMOTE COMMERCE.

Purpura vendit

Causidicum; vendunt amethystina.

Juv.

IN the eye of reason there is certainly no necessary connexion between ostentation and excellence. Can the keeping of a chariot be a proof of pre-eminence of knowledge? Certainly not. But such is the world, that the physician on foot stands no chance of being employed, if his rival rides in his chariot.

The preference of the medical professor, who makes a fashionable appearance, to him that does not, has been always remarkable; so much so, that it is almost a proverbial question, What is a doctor without his chariot? Formerly large wigs, gold-headed canes, full-trimmed coats, and solemn looks, were considered as natural signs of profound knowledge. They are indeed now voluntarily laid aside by the gentlemen themselves; who seem to think it no disadvantage to appear young in person and easy in manners. But still the appearance of fashionable life, of servants and equipage, is a very powerful recommendation of them to public favour.

A similar unreasonable association of superior excellence, to a splendid appearance, seems visible in almost every art, trade, and profession.

And this it is which forms one of the most frequent excuses, in young persons, for launching out a little, as they call it, or living beyond their income.

In the lower orders of mercantile life, a young man begins trade with his little patrimony, or with the gift of a living parent, who, perhaps, distresses himself to raise a sum which, though moderate, might, under proper management, grow, like a handful of seed, to a large quantity. A shop, or rather a warehouse, (for, as Juvenal says, and every thing must now have a magnificent name), is hired at a considerable rent. It must, in the first place, be fitted up not only neatly and conveniently (for neatness and convenience are mean ideas), but elegantly, and sumptuously, in the newest taste.

.....Hic vivimus ambitiosa
Paupertate omnes

The door-posts are adorned with sculpture, and the name and trade exhibited in a gorgeous tablet adorned with a profusion of gold and colour. The counters, the drawers, the shelves, are mahogany; and the master and mistress are every day attired by the most fashionable hair-dresser, and descend (which is but rarely) from the sumptuous dining-room, to stand behind the counter, just as if they were going into a drawing-room or the presence-chamber.

Connexions are sought with the utmost diligence. To promote them, visits are paid and received, with all the formality of fashion. The glass in the dining-room is stuck round with gilt cards of invitation to dinners, suppers, balls, and assemblies.

Well; all this is very pleasing; but how goes on business in the shop—(I beg pardon) in the warehouse! O, the scrubs mind that. Mr. and Mrs. Diaper are too much engaged in dressing in the morning, and visiting in the afternoon, to regard the low concerns of the shop. The clerk, the journeyman, the apprentice, and the porter, are hired purposely for that business; but let Mr. and Mrs. Diaper alone: they know what they are about, they are promoting trade, by making connexions, and cutting a figure. "There is absolutely no succeeding in the present days, without cutting a figure."

But the misfortune is, every one is cutting a figure, to the utmost of their pecuniary abilities, and the connexions which Mr. and Mrs. Diaper make, are themselves making connexions, for the sake of advancing their interest. But none of them have a fund sufficient to support the expenses of the fashionable life which they affect; and, in the course of a few years, they all, in their turn, cut a figure, in the Gazette.

In higher classes, and in professions and employments, which might justly claim a right to genteel life, it is usual to go beyond the line of moderation and propriety, with the delusive idea, that the greater figure a man makes in the external circumstance of a fine house, a luxurious table, a splendid equipage, a tribe of servants, the more likely he is to succeed, and to be aggrandized. In the meantime, he himself is sapping the foundation of his own greatness, and the visionary fabric soon falls, to rise no more.

These ambitious persons, who hope to raise themselves by affecting a rank they cannot support, are well described in the celebrated fable of the frog and the ox. They and their families, after a short struggle, become ridiculous and pitiable. But the misfortune is not confined to themselves; for, though their magnificent appearance gained no credit with their superiors, yet it caused them to be trusted by their inferiors, by poor tradesmen, who supplied them with many articles, both necessary and superfluous, in the hope of serving themselves and feeding their families. These are usually great sufferers; for, being poor, and of little consequence, they stand the worst chance of having their demands satisfied. The debts of honour, and the expenses of fashion must first be paid; but the butcher, the baker, and the brewer, may come in perhaps for six-pence in the pound, when their customers are gone abroad to live genteely.

To make that appearance which our rank requires, provided our purse can pay the expense, argues a proper spirit. But it is surely folly, as well as wrong and robbery, in pursuit of a phantom, to expend on luxury and vanity, the property of those who, in the course of their honest callings, have given us confidence, and entrusted us with what was necessary to our subsistence, or what we considered as conducive to our pleasure and prosperity.

Children brought up to expenses and habits which they cannot support, often rue the folly of parents, who, catching at the shadow of honour or wealth, let go the substance, their own happy and independent competency.

ORIGINAL LETTER, BY DR. GOLDSMITH.

Cracow, Aug. 2, 1768,

MY DEAR WILL,

You see by the date of my letter, that I am arrived in Poland. When will my wanderings be at an end? When will my restless disposition give me leave to enjoy the present hour? When at Lyons, I thought all happiness lay beyond the Alps; when in Italy, I found myself still in want of something, and expected to leave solicitude behind me by going into Romelia, and now you find me turning back, still expecting ease everywhere, but where I am. It is now seven years, since I saw the face of a single creature, who cared a farthing whether I was dead or alive. Secluded from all the comforts of confidence, friendship, or society, I feel the solitude of a hermit, but not his ease.

The prince of  has taken me in his train, so that I am in no danger of starving for this bout. The prince's governor is a rude ignorant pedant, and his tutor a battered rake: thus, between two such characters, you may imagine he is finely instructed. I made some attempts to display all the little knowledge I had acquired by reading or observation; but I find myself regarded as an ignorant intruder. The truth is, I shall never be able to acquire a power of expressing myself, with ease, in any language but my own; and out of my own country, the highest character I can ever acquire, is that of being a philosophic vagabond.

When I consider myself in the country which was once so formidable in war, and spread terror and desolation over the whole Roman empire, I can hardly account for the present wretchedness and paucity of its inhabitants, a prey to every invader; their cities plundered without an enemy; their magistrates seeking redress by complaints, and not by vigour. Every thing conspires to raise my compassion for their miseries, were not my thoughts too busily engaged by my own. The whole kingdom is in a strange disorder.

der; when our equipage, which consists of the prince and thirteen attendants, had arrived at some towns, there were no conveniences to be found, and we were obliged to have girls to conduct us to the next. I have seen a woman travel thus on horseback before us for thirty miles, and think herself highly paid, and make twenty reverences, upon receiving, with extasy, about twopence for her trouble. In general, we were better served by the women than by the men on those occasions. The men seemed directed by a low sordid interest alone; they seemed mere machines, and all their thoughts were employed in the care of their horses. If we gently desired them to make more speed, they took not the least notice; kind language was what they had by no means been used to. It was proper to speak to them in tones of anger, and sometimes it was even necessary to use blows, to excite them to their duty. How different these from the common people of England, whom a blow might induce to return the affront sevenfold! These poor people, however, from being brought up to vile usage, lose all the respect which they should have for themselves. They have contracted a habit of regarding constraint as the great rule of their duty. When they were treated with mildness, they no longer continued to perceive a superiority. They fancied themselves our equals, and a continuance of our humanity might probably have rendered them insolent; but the imperious tone, menaces, and blows, at once changed their sensations and ideas: their ears and shoulders taught their souls to shrink back into servitude, from which they had, for some moments, fancied themselves disengaged.

The enthusiasm of liberty an Englishman feels is never so strong, as when presented by such prospects as these. I must own, in all my indigence, it is one of my comforts, (perhaps, indeed, it is my only boast) that I am of that happy country; though I scorn to starve there; though I do not choose to lead a life of wretched dependence, or be an object for my former acquaintance to point at. While you enjoy all the ease and elegance of prudence and virtue, your old friend wanders over the world, without a single anchor to hold by, or a friend except you to confide in.

Yours, &c.

In the Oriental Collections, page 187, by Sir WILLIAM OUSELEY, is the following sonnet or gazel, from the Divan of Jami, a poet, according to Mr. D'Israeli, characterized by the elegiac tenderness of his verse. I transcribed it, in the hope, that it may arrest the attention of the muse of ASMODEO.

'Last night, my eyes were closed in sleep, but my happiness was awake; the whole night, the live long night, the image of my beloved was the companion of my soul.

'Heavens! how did the sugared words fall from her sweet lips! Alas! all that she said to me in that dream, has escaped from my memory. Although it was my care, till break of day, to repeat over and over her sweet words.

'The day, unless illuminated by her beauty, is of nocturnal darkness to my eyes.

'Happy day, that first I gazed upon that lovely face!

'May the eyes of Jami long be blest with pleasing visions, since they presented to his view last night

'that object, on whose account he passed his waking life in expectation.

In the elegant volumes of a sprightly author, I find the following original remarks.

Invention is neither inspiration nor creation, as some, I believe, still imagine it to be. It is nothing but a sudden observation or a patient meditation; and there can exist but two kinds of invention; the one accidental, struck out from a rapid observation, and the other arising from combination, the fruit of long and ingenious meditation. Man creates nothing; he can only imitate, or combine what he finds out in nature; he can imagine no form, he can produce no notion of which the model is not in nature.

From accidental inventions man has derived great utility, but never has claimed any glory; but the invention of those arts, or those discoveries in which he has wrestled with nature, has agreeably flattered his pride. It will amuse an ingenious mind, to class under these two forms some traditional origins.

In the first and inferior kinds of inventions, may be ranked the following....A Tartarian hunter, wanting some wadding, observes a stone, covered with some flakes, resembling loose threads; but when he fires his piece, he observes that the gunpowder had no effect on the wadding. He returns to his village, consults his curate, and, half terrified, conceives he has about him some bewitched stuff. They throw it into a large fire; it does not burn, and they take it out entire. Such was the accidental origin of asbestos, called the incorruptible linen. Of the same class is that of glass. Some merchants in the sandy deserts rest their cauldrons on blocks of nitre, and kindle a fire; the nitre dissolving in the flame, and mixing with the sand, produces a transparent friable substance, which is glass. In the city of Tyre, a dog seizing on the fish conchilis, or purpura, his lips were observed to be tinged with that glowing "rosy red," and it received its name from the town and the fish, for it was called the Tyrian purple. Children playing in the shop of a spectacle-maker, with convex and concave glasses, arrange them in such a manner, that the church-steeple appeared to have removed itself near them. Their loud acclamations excite the curiosity of their father. The man of science looks through the glasses the hands of the children had arranged, and he discovers the telescope! Accident like discovered gunpowder, printing, and the quinquina; the latter perhaps more salutary than either of the former. Such has been the origin of many useful inventions, but in which the inventor could lay no claim to ingenuity.

The second class ennobles man; his dilated soul traverses through earth and heaven, and he almost aspires to the energy of a sublime creator. The ancients have recorded, that the exquisite combinations of music derived their origin from a philosopher, who stood listening to the strokes of a hammer on an anvil. It was by meditating on the knolls of old oak trees, and the pavements of London, that that sublime edifice, the Edystone, was raised in the tumultuous breast of the sea, by its great artist. The fact is recorded with great simplicity, by himself; and these knolls, and these pavements, whence he first stole the hints, are engraven in his singular work. One evening, in the cathedral of Pisa, Galileo observed the vibrations of a brass lustre, pendent from the vaulted roof, that had been left swinging by one of the vergers. The pensive eye of Genius meditated, and its soul struggled with vast ideas. Hence he conceived the notion of measuring time by the medium of a pendulum, and thus invented the elements of motion and mechanics. The origin of gravitation is perhaps more sublime, since the accident was more trivial. The charming art of engraving owes one of its branches to the meditation of a studious prince. Rupert perceiving a soldier scraping and cleansing his fusil, on which the night dews had fallen, and had rusted, he combined its effects, and from these conceived mezzotinto. I will add two others, which are extremely interesting. James Moore, employed to survey the fens, noticed that the sea made a curve line on the beach; and from this circumstance borrowed the hint to keep it out of Norfolk. A French bead-maker, observing that the water which had washed those small fish, called bleaks, was filled with luminous particles of a silvery hue, and deposited a sediment possessing the lustre of the most beautiful pearls, formed from it the pearl essence, which, with melted isinglass, is blown into thin glass globules, and produces artificial pearls.

LEVITY.

Written in Germany, on one of the coldest days of the century, by W. Wordsworth.

A fig for your languages, German and Norse,
Let me have the song of the kettle,
And the tongs and the poker, instead of that horse,
That gallops away with such fury and force
On that dreary dull plate of black metal.

Our earth is, no doubt, made of excellent stuff,
But her pulses beat slower and slower;
The weather at ferry was cutting and rough,
And then, as Heaven knows, the glass stood low enough,
And now it is four degrees lower.

Here's a fly, a disconsolate creature, perhaps,
A child of the rill or the grove,
And sorrow for him! this dull treacherous heat
Has seduced the poor fool from his winter-retreat,
And he creeps to the edge of my stove.

Alas! how he fumbles about the domains,
When this comfortless oven environ,
He cannot find out in what tract he must crawl,
Now back to the hills, and now back to the wall,
And now on the brink of the iron.

Stock still there he stands, like a traveller bemaz'd,
The best of his skill he has tried;
His feelers methinks I can see him put forth,
To the east and the west, and the south and the north,
But he finds neither guide post nor guide.

See! his spindles sink under him, foot, leg, and thigh,
His eyesight and hearing are lost,
Between life and death his blood freezes and thaws,
And his two pretty pinions of blue dusky gauze,
Are glued to his sides by the frost.

No brother, nor friend, has he near him, while I
Can draw warmth from the cheek of my love,
As blest and as glad in this desolate gloom,
As if green summer-grass was the floor of my room,
And woodbines were hanging above.

Yet, God is my witness, thou small helpless thing,
Thy life I could gladly sustain,
Till summer comes on from the south, and with crowds
Of thy brethren a march thou shouldst sound through the clouds,
And back to the forests again.

A humble Imitation of some Stanzas, written by W.
Wordsworth, in Germany, on one of the coldest days of the century.

'A fig for your languages, German and Norse,
Let me have the song of the kettle,
And the tongs and the poker.' W. W.

My Molly and I we sat down by the fire,
And she was preparing the vittle;
And as I was hungry, I had a desire
To ask her a question, and so I drew nigher,
And ask'd, had she put on the kettle.

The table was set, and the cups they were laid,
But Molly mov'd slower and slower;
At breakfast her speech it was cutting and rough,
At dinner, Heaven knows, it was crabbed enough,
But now it is fifty times more.

So-I thought I might hasten the supper perhaps,
If the fire a little I'd move;
For, said I, if I wait for this treacherous heat,
I fear 'twill be long ere my supper I eat,
So I put some more wood in the stove.

Alas! for the man that has married a shrew!
What perils his safety environ!
I scarcely had put on the stick, before Moll
Raps me over the head with the tongs—to the wall
I reel'd; for the tongs were of iron.

Stock-still then I stood, like a traveller bemaz'd,
The weight of her hand I'd oft tried,
But never the tongs: could I have got forth,
To the east and the west, and the south and the north
I'd have fled, without guide-post or guide.

See! my spindles sink under me, foot, leg, and thigh,
My eyesight and hearing are lost;
Between life and death my blood freezes and thaws,
I thought I was dead; or at least, by the laws,
I thought I should give up the ghost.

No table or chair was there near me, but I
At length just got hold of a poker,
And then to escape did I boldly presume,
I brandish'd my poker, and out of the room
I flew, for my Moll was no joker.

Yet, Heaven be my witness, if Molly should die,
How firmly her loss I'd sustain;
Though women their favours should offer in crowds,
As well might they spend all their breath on the clouds,
I ne'er would be wedded again.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, Dublin, May 18.

BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

Fitzgerald v. Hawksworth.

Yesterday, in the King's Bench, a verdict for 2500l. and 6d. costs, was given for the plaintiff against the defendant. Few trials at Nisi Prius have more engaged the public attention, or excited an higher degree of interest; and whether we consider the nature of the action, the portion of time it occupied, or the celebrity of at least one of the parties, it was eminently calculated to call forth much curiosity. The trial lasted three days, from Tuesday morning till late on Thursday evening.

The defendant is a young clergyman, who has figured as a preacher in most of the churches of this metropolis within the last five years, and whom his admirers consider as scarcely inferior to Kirwan himself. In the year 1794, Mr. Hawksworth, being then in his twentieth year, and on the point of taking his degree in College, became attached to Miss Fitzgerald, who was then scarcely sixteen. This young lady was the daughter of a respectable officer, who had retired from the service with much honour, but no great share of wealth, and had fixed his residence in Castletown, a beautiful village in the neighbourhood of Mountrath, in Queen's county. Mr. Hawksworth soon gained her affections, but still he was not satisfied, as his father was an enemy to early marriages, and, of course, an immediate union was impossible. Time or accident, he apprehended, might defeat his hopes, or a parent's authority consign her to the arms of another. In his letters, therefore, he urged her with all the ardour of a doting lover to enter into a solemn engagement never to marry any but him; and to encourage her to make this vow, he called upon his God to forsake him when he forsook her. These letters were read in evidence, and though they exhibited no very finished specimens of epistolary elegance, they seemed, at least, to flow from the heart, and were not ill adapted to make an impression on a girl of sixteen: at length they made that, and thus the connection continued until the year 1802.

Meanwhile, Mr. Hawksworth had been ordained—had become a popular preacher, and was much followed. In January, 1802, he called on a Mrs. Palmer, a particular friend of Miss Fitzgerald, and after some preliminary conversation, he told her he was ready to fulfil his engagement with Miss Fitzgerald, if her friends would give her 1000l. and begged she would communicate his intentions to them. Mrs. Palmer delivered the message. A council of war was summoned. Captain Fitzgerald, the father, agreed to give four hundred pounds; the uncle, also an old officer, agreed to give two hundred; and the brother to the young lady, who was then serving with his regiment in Malta, upon being written to, immediately promised to add the remaining 400l. out of the honorable earnings of his profession; and though he was then actually in treaty for a majority, he cheerfully postponed his own promotion to the happiness of a beloved sister—he did more, he came to Ireland to be a witness of that happiness.

Hawksworth seemed delighted with his arrival, every thing was settled, the wedding clothes prepared, a special licence procured, and even the ring purchased. Mrs. Hawksworth and young captain Fitzgerald went down to the country on Friday; the next day, Saturday, was to be the happy day; when lo! instead of the bridegroom, a billet doux was delivered to the company, at Castletown, begging to be excused, as he was obliged to go from home on pecuniary business. From this period until the action was brought, the interval was filled with evasion; the torch of love seemed completely extinguished, and the visions of his early days to have vanished forever. The action was then brought, and the verdict 2500l. is commensurate with his property.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Some time since, we announced, as preparing for the press, the new and complete Biography of SIR WM. JONES, by Lord Teignmouth. We learn from London that this highly interesting work has just appeared, in a royal quarto, with a Portrait, and Fac Simile. It is intitled 'Memoirs of the Life, Writings and Correspondence of Sir Wm. Jones,' &c. We shall soon receive a copy, and communicate to our readers, from so rich a repository, whatever is calculated to interest curiosity, or to awaken genius.

We also perceive with delight, that a new edition, being the fourth, with many farther additions, of Boswell's Life of Dr. JOHNSON, is just published. This biography is now generally known and acknowledged as one of the most entertaining volumes of Literary History, which can be found in any nation. It records the renowned opinions of one of NATURE'S NOBLEMEN, who as a moralist, philologist, poet and critic, almost—
Got the start of the majestic world,
And bore the palm alone?

THE COMPOSITION OF A KISS.

Cupid, if storying legends tell aright,
Once fram'd a rich Elixir of delight.
A chalice o'er love-kindled flames he fix'd,
And in it nectar and ambrosia mix'd:
With these the magic dews, which evening brings,
Brush'd from the Italian star by fairy wings:
Each tender pledge of sacred faith he join'd,
Each gentler pleasure of the unsporting mind—
Day dreams, whose tints with sportive brightness glow,
And hope, the blameless parasite of woe.
The eyeless chemist heard the process rise,
The steamy chalice bubbled up in sighs;
Sweet sounds transpir'd, as when the enamour'd dove
Pours the soft murmur of responsive love.
The finish'd work might envy vainly blame,
And 'Kisses' was the precious compound's name.
With half the God his Cyprian mother blest,
And breath'd on —'s lovelier lips the rest.

Anna, cease with envious care,
Thus to veil thy lovely face,
While beneath that shade of hair,
Buried lies full many a grace.

Where's the brow as ivory clear?
Where's the cheek's delightful glow?
Where's the nicely rounded ear,
And the well turn'd neck of snow?

Yet those auburn locks of thine
Down thy face that waving play,
And in wanton ringlets twine,
Who could bear to lop away!

Muse of eve and muse of matin,
Tune the lyre to Peter Patten;
Sweet is sugar, soft is satin,
Soft and sweet is Peter Patten.
Ye orators, both Greek and Latin,
Ye're nincompoops to Peter Patten.

Let Whitbread boast with steams his vat in,
More potent wert brews Peter Patten.
Their tropes let others put their hat in,
Pure from his head draws Peter Patten.
Opposition some grow fat in,
Though Dent be thin, yet plump is Patten.

Ye Statesmen wise, ye Patriots tatting,
Take for your guide great Peter Patten;
Ye jovial wights, ye drunkards catting,
Quir your bowl and vote with Patten.
Then talk no more of Flood or Grattan,
We boast imperial Peter Patten!

London paper.

The following is a New England paragraph of the first order.

Captain Stetson informs, that on Wednesday last, while on a fishing party, off Cohasset Rocks, he caught a Haddock; and upon opening it for the purpose of cookery, he found in the stomach three hundred and forty dollars!!—in old continental money, new emission. The paper was formed into a roll, and was but little injured!

[Boston paper.]

A ministerial paper asserts, in decided terms, that the French emigrants, who have been permitted to return home, have presented Buonaparte with no less than three hundred and sixty projects for the destruction of England! The number is so large, that we hope the Chief Consul will be distracted in his choice! [London paper.]

The late Mr. Townsend, walking down Broad street, Bristol, during an illumination, observed a boy breaking every window, which had not a light in it. Mr. T. asked him how he dared to destroy people's windows in that manner? "O," said the urchin, "it is all for the good of trade—I'm a glazier!" "All for the good of trade is it?" said Mr. T. raising his cane, and breaking the boy's head; "there then, you young rascal, that is for the good of my trade—I'm a surgeon." [ib.]

In the year 1587, it was decided at Grenoble, that a child, born by the wife of Mauleon De Beaumont, in the course of four years, during which he had been absent from her, was legitimate, and that he had been conceived by thinking on her husband. The decision was founded on the examination of midwives, who all declared that such had frequently been their case. [ib.]

A case has lately been decided, before one of the French tribunals, by which persons who have lived together publicly as man and wife, are held to be legally married, though no contract or proof of the celebration of their marriage can be produced.

A gentleman lately dining on a very tough piece of beef, began scratching his plate with his knife; and on being asked the reason, replied, to set his teeth on edge.

MORNING.

From yon high hill the orient dawn
But faintly streaks the azure heaven,
And now across the dewy fawn
The shepherd's fleecy pride is driven.

Sweet is the hour of infant day,
And sweet all Nature's calm repose;
I'll to the tall cliff's summit stray,
Ere the first sunbeam greets the rose.

O how sublime the opening view!
The morning rays expanding wide!
The long grass glittering with the dew!
The clouds that fringe the mountain's side!

The fogs fantastic shapes assume,
As in the west they melt away,
And soon the night's departing gloom
Is lost amid the blaze of day.

The twinkling stars now scarcely gleam,
The moon a paler lustre wears,
And from its visionary dream
Awakes the bustling world of cares.

The lowing herds their pasture seek,
And slowly wind along the vale;
With careless heart and glowing cheek,
The milk-maid wields the flowing pail.

Daughter of Innocence and Health,
Thy breast no rankling griefs annoy,
The rural virtues form thy wealth,
And crown thee with unfading joy.

The gaudy dame who sleeps till noon,
Her shatter'd system to repair,
Who keeps her vigils with the moon,
And scorns thy task and rustic fare,

In vain may envy thee the blush
That mantles in thy smiling face:
To her alone the hectic flush
Can yield a momentary grace.

Her nights of riot, days of rest
By slow degrees her health consume;
Corrosive passions gnaw her breast,
And lay her in an early tomb:

Whilst thou, within thy lowly sphere,
The pride of some untutor'd swain,
Enjoy'st with feeling heart sincere,
A bliss unknown to Fashion's train.

Give me, kind Heav'n! a gentle maid,
Like this, unknown to wealth or fame,
We'll seek some sweet sequester'd shade,
Nor court an evanescent name.

The field of glory—Fortune's sphere,
Shall ne'er my wandering steps receive;
To join in Folly's mad career,
I'll ne'er my humble cottage leave.

The blandishments of wealth or power,
Shall ne'er seduce my constant heart,
The joys they give but last an hour,
And everlasting cares impart.

Domestic love shall form the spell
To charm each little grief to rest,
Content beneath our roof shall dwell,
And animate each happy guest.

A friend, endear'd by sacred ties,
Shall nightly ope my cottage-door;
I'll envy not the great or wise,
But bless my lot, and God adore.

WRITTEN AT THE FALLS OF MOUNT IDA, (NEAR TROY.)

Like this, the scene where Fancy weaves
Her wildest, lightest, blooming flowers,
And forms the gay, fantastic wreaths,
That deck the infant Muses' bowers.

Then shall not here their vot'ry pay
The humble homage of her praise,
And eternize the fleeting day,
By warm, though weak and transient lays!

For here hath Nature's bounteous hand
Bestow'd the gifts that rival time,
Nor e'er could Prospero's magic wand
Create, like hers, the bold sublime,

Though, Ariel! such the mountain height,
Where thou didst tune thy fairy lyre,
And such the wood, where elfins light
Pursu'd the glimm'ring glow-worm's fire.

Yet, fairy sprite! no bold cascade
E'er wak'd for thee the echoing ground,
Nor call'd each dell and cavern's aid,
To raise the solemn swelling sound.

This torrent's whelming heedless force
Bespeaks the mind by passion sway'd,
That ne'er restrains its headlong course,
Though friends advise, and foes upraid.

And well it too displays the power
Of tyrant Fancy's giddy reign,
Who, while she sports her flut'ring hour,
Makes Reason fly her flow'ry plain.

IMAGINARY HAPPINESS.

The hapless man, whose real woes
His life's tranquillity destroy,
Resorts to Fancy for repose,
And learns to dream of peace and joy.

The bliss of love, of wealth and power,
Th' enraptur'd dreamer then enjoys;
All blessings gild th' ideal hour,
No grief appears, no pleasure cloy.

At length tir'd Fancy can no more
Relieve him from allotted pain;
Her pleasing scenes he now gives o'er,
And wakes to real life again.

SIMON figureth in your polite bon-ton poetry, somewhat after the manner of Mrs. RADCLIFF, in a delicate

DESCRIPTION OF THE MORNING.

Behold, my fair, the ruddy morn
Anticipate the day,
What gorgeous tints the sky adorn,
And gild the azure way!

The sombre mists, which gloomy Night
Had gather'd in the vale,
Are borne aloft, and wing their flight
Before the rising gale—

Now chang'd to clouds of varied hue,
In airy mazes dance,
Flitting athwart the welkin blue,
They gem the gay expanse,

See now the Sun advancing higher,
His full effulgent rays;
The mountain forest seems on fire,
Amid his servid blaze,

The plummy tenant of the grove
Sits perch'd on yonder spray,
And serenades his little love
With sweetest roundelay,

To taste the pleasures of the morn,
Is bliss without alloy,
Though Fashion's drowsy votaries scorn
To quaff the cup of joy.

But rise, my Teraminta, rise,
Your matchless charms display,
And let those rapture-beaming eyes
Add lustre to the day.

WRITTEN AT THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.

Solo e pensoso i pia deserti campi
From distant lands a wanderer came,
And fondly seeks a refuge here;
But in his breast still glows a flame,
And in his eye still gleams a tear.

In vain he views the rushing floods,
In hopes to lull his cares to sleep;
In vain he seeks the wildering woods,
In hopes that there he shall not weep.

The waters from their solid seat,
May hurl the struggling rocks away;
The forest, in its green retreat,
May shield him from the solar ray;

Yet cannot wash away the pain,
That to his inmost bosom clings;
Yet cannot guard his throbbing brain
From thought, that bitterest anguish brings.

For though, from native scenes remov'd,
To these far northern climes he flies,
Each object he once dearly lov'd,
Recurr's incessant to his eyes,

THE BRITISH SPY IN BOSTON.

LETTER I.

It has been observed, my dear S....., that eloquence is not the sole characteristic of the American senates; and I have had abundant reason to remark, that plain sense, strong judgment, ardent patriotism, predominate in the individual states, as in the national legislature. But that best 'harmony of sweet sounds,' the graceful and persuasive rhetoric, which thrills the nerves, and seizes upon the passions of the hearer, which charms, while it instructs, and seems to commiserate, even while it condemns—that must be looked for among a people, more ancient, more affluent, better defined, and more accurately defining than the unpatronised and self-taught individuals of the new hemisphere. If these observations be strictly applicable to the senatorial rank of the country, in considering another, and more accurately distinguished class of public speaking, forensic oratory, I am led to confess this appears to have been cultivated, with an assiduity, that indulges the hope, and speaks the promise of uniting, for its possessor, the luxury of wealth, with the aristocracy of power. In fact, this people, so tenacious of their rights, and so clear-sighted in their political jealousy, have permitted the individuals of the bench and the bar almost to monopolize the high and lucrative offices and endowments of the state, as of the national government. Thence, in my travels through the union, courts of law and justice have become the most important objects of my research, and the inevitable subjects of my impartial criticism. I have, indeed, marked the forensic talent of the nation, and found it of a description, wholly dissimilar to the prominent trait of senatorial dignity. I have heard eloquence, and discovered learning in the abodes of Themis, that might have stamped a new, and more sublime, character upon the American people. Whence, I have ceased to wonder at that influence and ascendancy, which the distinguished pre-eminence of its professors has merited and obtained.

Upon my first arrival in Boston, appearances were, to my view, greatly inauspicious. I found a large town, apparently devoted to trade, streets narrow, crooked, and not remarkably clean; fine houses, in wretched and almost inaccessible avenues, and commodious situations, disgraced by hovels. Such were the conspicuous features that met the first coup d'oeil. A further introduction taught me that these ill-situated mansions were the abode of hospitality, and within those humbler hovels oppression and misery were unknown. I recognized more of the old English whig, in the character of the Bostonians, than in any state in the union. Tolerating, liberal, and intelligent, yet marked by strong local prejudices, and inflexible animosities, while feeling freedom, and literally claiming independence, behind his counter the shopman inquires the news and arraigns the government; and the poorest mechanic reads the Gazette, reasons upon finance, and approves, or opposes, the diminution of taxes. Among this people, so congenial to the best portion of my own countrymen, inquiry has been forcibly awakened, and my anxious attention constantly occupied. Finding the supreme judicial court in session, I flew thither, with the solicitude of a mind, whose appetite for the new and the curious is never gratified to satiety. There I found talents, that were respectable, and genius, that was extraordinary; yet I must impartially acknowledge my astonishment at the general irregularity and inattention to forms that prevailed. Boys, just admitted as practitioners, were suffered, without reprimand from the bench, to indulge the vividness of their imagination, wandering, at will, through all the pleasant paths of romance, now pompous by soaring to bombast, then sinking to the pert simile, or the misapplied anecdote. Further, it was to be remarked of this generally respectable body, that their total inattention to the decorum of dress, and external distinction, must awaken in every foreigner some unpleasant sensations. The judges were dressed, or rather en deshabillé, in plain coats; and the apparel of the gentlemen of the bar was as diversified, as the proportions and faculties of their minds—an endless variety, from the excellent and extraordinary, to the mean and the flimsy. However the philosopher may pretend to despise mere external effects, men of the world must be sensible of their importance, as it regards the senses, and attaches to the understanding; for the ludicrous, which upon the present occasion is by no means applied, having a certain tendency to counteract respect, must, of necessity, arrest usefulness. Thence, I approve of a costume for all public characters, and think that the sanctity of an oath would be rendered more inviolable, under greater ceremony and solemnity, in the manner of its being administered. People without understanding, and destitute of the moral principle, may be influenced by their senses, and on their impression deterred from the commission of evil—Whence, allowing mere forms to be not intrinsically important, they are at least relatively good, respectable for their utility, and honourable in their observance.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF MICKLE.

In his Dissertation, after acknowledging his obligations to Mr. Magellans, and other Portuguese gentlemen, Thomas Pearson, Esq. of the East-India Company's service, for books and information, he adds, 'The approbation, expressed by several gentlemen of the East-India Company, on the appearance of the poem on the Discovery of India, gave the translator the greatest satisfaction. To governor Johnstone, whose ancestors have been the hereditary patrons of the ancestors of the translator, he is under all the obligations, which the warmest zeal to promote the success of his undertaking can possibly confer. To this gentleman, in a great measure, the appearance of the Lusiad in English is due. To the friendship of Mr. Hoole, the elegant translator of Tasso, he is peculiarly indebted. To James Boswell, Esq. he confesses many obligations. And while he thus recollects with pleasure the names of many gentlemen, from whom he has received assistance or encouragement, he is happy to be enabled to add Dr. Johnson to the number of those, whose kindness for the man, and good wishes for the translator, call for his sincerest gratitude. Nor must a tribute to the memory of Dr. Goldsmith be neglected. He saw a part of this version; but he cannot now receive the thanks of the translator. The manner in which his grace the duke of Buccleugh took the English Lusiad under his patronage, infinitely enhanced the honour of his acceptance of the dedication.'

In a letter to Mr. Boswell, preserved in his 'Life of Dr. Johnson,' he says, 'Before publishing the Lusiad, I sent Mr. Hoole a proof of that part of the introduction in which I make mention of Dr. Johnson, yourself, and other well-wishers to the work, begging it might be shown to Dr. Johnson. This was accordingly done, and in place of the simple mention of him which I had made, he dictated to Mr. Hoole the sentence as it now stands. Dr. Johnson told me in 1772, that about twenty years before that time, he himself had a design to translate the Lusiad, of the merit of which he spoke highly; but had been prevented by a number of other engagements.' Dr. Johnson, it is said, afterwards recommended it to Goldsmith.

During the time which Mickle employed in this translation, he had no other means of subsistence, than what he received as corrector of the Clarendon press; and when he relinquished that situation, he had only the subscriptions he received for the work, to support him. The difficulties that so narrow an income must occasion, may be more readily conceived than described. But, looking forward with the enthusiasm of genius, he would not suffer difficulties that might have discouraged meaner minds, to obstruct his progress, or damp his ardour.

'When, after five years unremitting attention,' says the writer of the anecdotes of his life, 'he had completed this great work, those friends who knew his circumstances, advised him to consider who would be the proper patron to whom he ought to dedicate such a poem. I am assured by one who lived with him in habits of great intimacy (the Rev. Mr. Simpson, of Chertsey, Bucks, formerly of St. Alban-Hall, London) that Mr. Mickle had repeated intimations from a questionable authority, informing him that several persons, then high in the naval department, it would be very acceptable to them, by the dedication of such a poem. As the subject would think themselves highly honoured, that he might depend on a princely acknowledgment; and they therefore advised him to think of the most worthy. This counsel he was at first inclined to, but the advice of Commodore

Johnstone turned the scale, and it was dedicated to the duke of Buccleugh.

'That he might omit,' says the writer of the account of his life, in the European Magazine, 'no prudential attentions to his future welfare, and with the hopes of reaping those advantages which usually attend so laborious a work, he applied to a person of great rank, with whom his family had been connected, for permission to dedicate it to him. 'The manner,' says the author, 'in which ——— took the English Lusiad under his patronage, infinitely enhanced the honour of his acceptance.' The manner, as the author frequently told his friends, was 'by a very polite letter written with his own hand.' But let not indigent genius, in future, place too much expectation on the generosity of patrons. After receiving a copy, for which an extraordinary price was paid for the binding, days, weeks and months elapsed, without the slightest notice. During this time, though the author had too much spirit to solicit or complain, it is to be feared that some of the misery so feelingly described by Spenser, fell to his lot.

Fall little knowest thou, that hast not tried,
What hell it is in suing long to bide; &c.

'At length a gentleman of rank in the political world, a fast and a firm friend to the author, and who afterwards took him under his protection, and by that means afforded him the independence he latterly enjoyed, waited on the patron, and heard with the indignation and contempt it deserved, a declaration, that the work was at that time unread, but had been represented not to have the merit it had been first said to possess; and therefore nothing could be then done on the subject of his mission. This paltry evasion, the solicitor declared, he believed arose from the malicious insinuations of a certain person about the patron; whose mistakes had received a proper correction in the preface to the Lusiad. We know not how true this suggestion may be, though, admitting the fact, it hardly alters the case. Mr. Mickle's account of this interview, in a letter to a friend, dated August 22, 1776, now lies before us, and we might probably do no disservice to the general interests of literature, were we to print it. We cannot, however, omit to suggest a doubt, whether there is not some small violation of moral rectitude, in a great man accepting from an indigent one, that compliment which is offered him, under, at least, an implied agreement, to receive some acknowledgment in return for the honour done him? It ought not to be concealed, that when the second edition of the Lusiad was published in 1778, Mickle was strongly recommended by a friend, to suppress the dedication. His resentment at the unworthy treatment he had received, had by this time been converted into contempt, and with great magnanimity he refused. Whoever will read the Life of Camoens, cannot avoid observing a striking similarity in the fortunes of the author and his translator, and he will probably not be displeased at the concluding note of the Lusiad. 'Similarity of condition, produced similarity of complaint and sentiment in Spenser and Camoens. Each was unworthily neglected by the Gothic grandees of his age; yet both their names will live when the remembrance of the courtiers who spurned them 'shall sink beneath the mountain tombs.'

That man that hath the innies scorn'd,
Arise, nor lead, be ever of a muse adorn'd.

The person alluded to is Dr. Adam Smith, who was the professed admirer of Hume, to whom Mickle was a declared antagonist, and once intended to have written and published An Heroic Epistle from David Hume to Dr. Adam Smith, in which the doctor and his pupil would have been rather harshly treated. Many of the verses, he, at the time, repeated to a particular friend; but the poem was never completed.

Such is the manner in which the dedication of the Lusiad was received, according to his biographers; who, in their indignation at the supposed neglect of his patron, seem not to have made sufficient allowance for the obligations his father was under to the family of Buccleugh. His examination of the popular arguments relative to the British commerce with India, in his Dissertation prefixed to the Lusiad, his 'favourite above all that he ever attempted in prose,' might displease the celebrated author of 'The Wealth of Nations,' who stood forth as the philosophical champion for the abolition of the monopoly of the English East-India Company; but it can hardly be supposed that the 'Epic Poem of Commerce,' a work that challenges the attention of the philosopher, the politician, and the gentleman, could be neglected by a nobleman, distinguished as much by his patriotism and benevolence, as his high rank and princely fortune, and whose love and patronage of literature and science, have obtained him the distinction of President of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and enrolled his name among the Fellows of the Royal Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons in that city.

In his dissertation prefixed to the Lusiad, after reflecting on the distressed situation in which Camoens was suffered to languish, he concludes his remarks with some stanzas, in the manner of Spenser, on the Neglect of Poetry, descriptive of what we may naturally conceive were his own fears for the fate of his translation. But poetry so splendid, so spirited, so harmonious, could not remain long unnoticed; and the applause of the public followed the appearance of the Lusiad in so high a degree, as soon to banish from his mind the momentary chagrin, which a few circumstances attending the publication had given birth to.

Notwithstanding the approbation with which the public had received his translation, by a letter to Thomas Caldecott, Esq. of the Middle Temple, who warmly patronised, and very essentially served him, while he was at Oxford, dated Forest Hill, December 20, 1778, it appears that he was by no means happy; and had projected an edition of his works by subscription, for which he had printed proposals: 'Besides the necessity which urges to this scheme, I am very desirous of giving an edition of my works, in which I shall bestow the utmost attention. Except on very popular or temporary subjects little or nothing is to be made of half crown publications, and this also inclines me to a quarto collection; which, perhaps, will be my final farewell to that blighted spot (worse than the most bleak mountains of Scotland) yclept Parnassus; for after this labour is finished, if governor J..... cannot, or does not, help me to a little independence, I will certainly bid adieu to Europe, to unhappy suspense, and, perhaps, also, to the chagrin of soul which I feel to accompany it.'

Previous to the publication of the Lusiad, he had been tempted to try his powers in dramatic composition, and wrote a tragedy, called the Siege of Marseilles, formed upon a story from the French history in the reign of Francis I. when the duke of Bourbon, at the head of a Spanish army, invaded his native country, and laid siege to Marseilles; which, with some recommendations from his literary friends, he transmitted to Garrick. The manager acknowledged, in a letter to a friend, that it contained many beautiful passages; but he added, that fine writing was not of itself sufficient to constitute a drama fit for public exhibition. Governor Johnstone, unwilling that the labour he bestowed on this work should be entirely lost, solicited the aid of Mr. Home, author of Douglas, to make some alterations. This was complied with, and the piece, after being inspected by Mr. Warton, was again submitted to the manager, and again rejected.

MISCELLANY.

HABITUDES AND CHARACTER OF THE DOG. (From Goldsmith.)

OF all the canine tribe, the dog has every reason to claim the preference, being the most intelligent of all known quadrupeds, and the acknowledged friend of mankind. The dog, independent of the beauty of his form, his vivacity, force, and swiftness, is possessed of all those internal qualifications, that can conciliate the affections of man, and make the tyrant a protector. A natural share of courage, an angry and ferocious disposition, renders the dog, in its savage state, a formidable enemy to all other animals; but these readily give way to very different qualities in the domestic dog, whose only ambition seems the desire to please; he is seen to come crouching along, to lay his force, his courage, and all his useful talents, at the feet of his master; he waits his orders, to which he pays implicit obedience; he consults his looks, and a single glance is sufficient to put him in motion; he is more faithful even than the most boasted among men; he is constant in his affections, friendly without interest, and grateful for the slightest favours; much more mindful of benefits received, than of injuries offered; he is not driven off by unkindness; he still continues humble, submissive, and imploring; his only hope to be serviceable, his only terror to displease; he licks the hand that has just been lifted to strike him, and at last disarms resentment, by submissive perseverance.

More docile than man, more obedient than any other animal, he is not only instructed in a short time, but he also conforms to the dispositions and manners of those who command him. He takes his tone from the house he inhabits; like the rest of the domestics, he is disdainful among the great, and churlish among clowns. Always assiduous in serving his master, and only a friend to his friends, he is indifferent to all the rest, and declares himself openly against such as seem to be dependent like himself. He knows a beggar by his clothes, by his voice, or gestures, and forbids his approach. When at night, the guard of the house is committed to his care, he seems proud of the charge; he continues a watchful sentinel, he goes his rounds, scents strangers at a distance, and gives them warning of his being upon duty. If they attempt to break in upon his territories, he becomes more fierce, flies at them, threatens, fights, and either conquers alone, or alarms those who have most interest in coming to his assistance; however, when he has conquered, he quietly reposes upon the spoil, and abstains from what he has deterred others from abusing; giving thus at once a lesson of courage, temperance, and fidelity.

From hence we see of what importance this animal is to us in a state of nature. Supposing, for a moment, that the species had not existed, how could man, without the assistance of the dog, have been able to conquer, tame, and reduce to servitude, every other animal? How could he discover, chase, and destroy, those that were noxious to him? In order to be secure, and to become master of all animated nature, it was necessary for him to begin by making a friend of a part of them; to attach such of them to himself by kindness and caresses, as seemed fittest for obedience, and active in pursuit. Thus, the first art employed by man was in conciliating the favour of the dog; and the fruits of this art were, the conquest and peaceable possession of the earth.

The generality of animals have greater agility, greater swiftness, and more formidable arms, from nature, than man; their senses, and particularly that of smelling, are far more perfect. The having gained, therefore, a new assistant, particularly one whose scent is so exquisite, as that of the dog, was the gaining a new sense, a new faculty, which before was wanting. The machines and instruments which we have imagined for perfecting the rest of the senses, do not approach to that already prepared by nature, by which we are enabled to find out every animal, though unseen, and thus destroy the noxious, and use the serviceable.

The dog, thus useful in himself, taken into a participation of empire, exerts a degree of superiority over all animals, that require human protection. The flock and the herd obey his voice more readily even than that of the shepherd or the herdsman; he conducts them, guards them, keeps them from capriciously seeking danger, and their enemies he considers as his own. Nor is he less useful in the pursuit; when the sound of the horn, or the voice of the huntsman calls him to the field, he testifies his pleasure by every little art, and pursues with perseverance, those animals, which, when taken, he must not expect to divide. The desire of hunting is indeed natural to him, as well as to his master, since war and the chase are the only employment of savages. All animals that live upon flesh, hunt by nature; the lion and the tyger, whose force is so great, that they are sure to conquer, hunt alone and without art; the wolf, the fox, and the tiger dog, hunt in packs, assist each other, and partake the spoil. But when education has perfected this talent in the domestic dog, when he has been taught by man to repress his ardour, to measure his motions, and not to exhaust his force by too sudden an exertion of it, he then hunts with method, and always with success.

There is no art in which our public prints more excel, than in the art of puffing, and no part of the union, in which it is practised with more success, than in New England, and in this our beloved town of Boston. As in these eastern states, it is rare to meet with an uncommissioned private, since our very publicans are field-officers, so, if we give credit to our weekly journals, our minds too are of a gigantic stature, and tower far above the pigmy geniuses of Europe. In the opinion of certain enlightened editors, our men are wiser than Solomon, and our women more beautiful than Venus.

If in the house or senate, a speech unusually popular and impressive, is delivered, we find in the next paper, a high-flown panegyric, in terms similar to these: "Yesterday Mr. A. in the debate that took place in the house, delivered a speech, which far surpassed the most sanguine expectations of his warmest admirers. It united the torrent of Demosthenes with the splendid conflagration of Tully, and in short, is above all eulogy. We hope shortly to be able to gratify the public with this unrivalled specimen of reason and eloquence."

Should a series of periodical papers be collected and published in a volume, we are immediately informed, "The volume now for sale has the fairest claims to the palm of immortality. It comprises the genteel humour and easy elegance of Addison, the rich colouring of Hawkesworth, and the majestic energy of Johnson. We may now boast of a work that will establish the fame of American literature on an immovable basis, and challenge the proudest productions of Europe."

Should a poem appear, however vicious in design, and defective in execution, the intrepid editor heroically asserts—"The world must now confess, that the muses have at length taken up their abode in Columbia. This poem vies with the happiest efforts of the European muse, in design and execution, and greatly excels all the bards of the old world in magnificence and originality of expression. The author, without flattery, may be styled the tenth muse."

So lavish, indeed, are our editors of their encomiums, that the death or marriage of the obscurest person in the community, seldom happens, without extravagant praises; as for instance—"Last Thursday was united in the bands of conjugal bliss, Mr. C. Scavenger to the lovely and all-accomplished Miss D." Then follows a scrap of poetry, which, if it prove either rhyme or sense, the reader finds himself agreeably disappointed.

"Died last Wednesday, after a short illness, Dermot Tipperary, lemon-seller. The public have sustained an irreparable loss in this worthy Hibernian, as his lemons far excelled all others, in thinness of skin and delicacy of flavour. The selectmen, and other connoisseurs in punch, uniformly declared, that none squeezed with so much ease, or tasted so well; and the first ladies of our metropolis have been known to refuse lemonade, when not made with the lemons of Mr. Tipperary. We hope that all those who have been refreshed by his fruit, will not fail to attend his funeral, which will proceed from," &c. &c.

This custom of praising every one in the same strains of extravagant encomium, would be equally silly and harmless, did it not swell the vanity of the ignorant, and expose us to the ridicule of strangers. I was once informed by a British officer, who was taken prisoner with Burgoyne, that he was thus accosted by an honest Yankee, who was his centinel: "Well, I guess you are very glad you are taken, eh! You never fared so well before. Good salt pork and beef every day, and a power of sauce. Why, they tell me, that in Britain, the king and nobles eat up all the meat, and the rest of the folks live upon porridge and potatoes." The officer was amused with the simplicity of the honest fellow, and thinking it no easy matter to deceive him, rather confirmed him in his error, leaving him highly elated with the imagined superiority of his country.

This vanity among the less informed part of our citizens, might lead us at times into a war, did not their love of money dread the expenses that would attend it. Thus, we are guarded against the consequences of one weakness, by the counteracting effects of another. Vanity is the most despicable of infirmities, and puffing generally injures those whom it intends to serve. When we find any one praised beyond his desert, our self-love takes the alarm, and leads us to inquire into his claims of superiority. On discovering that either as a speaker or a writer, he is but a mortal piece of mediocrity, our indignation is kindled against his insidious encomiast, and we feel inclined to detract even from the real merit he may possess.

An honest, but ill-informed citizen may think the Old South larger than St. Paul's, and the Mall superior to the Thuilleries. But men of sense should be above such prejudices, which are a perpetual bar to improvement, and expose us to the derision of foreigners. We are highly gifted as a nation, and inferior to none in proportion to our opportunities; and whilst all the world allow us to be six feet high, let us not quarrel with them, should they refuse to acknowledge us to be seven.

MISERIES OF A RETIRED LIFE. [From the Sentimental Magazine]

MR. EDITOR,

The advantages of retirement have been expatiated upon by many writers on moral topics, who very justly argue that it becomes a rational creature to devote some time to meditation upon past actions, of which he is to give an account, and to prepare for leaving a world, to which he is no more to return. All this is very easily comprehended, and the many other fine arguments in favour of retirement made a great impression upon me at one time. I should have been very happy, indeed, to have confirmed them by my own experience, had it not been for one little circumstance of considerable moment, in order to settle the question, namely, that after a long trial, I have found retirement impracticable.

In former days I was a tradesman in the city of London, and for many years carried on business with increasing prosperity. I may say, indeed, that every thing succeeded which I undertook; while others around me were driven by distress and disappointed speculations, by paper credit and accommodation bills, into the Gazette, I stood firm, and, upon 'Change, was universally reported to be a good man. From this character, you are not to wonder if I very rapidly passed into that of a warm man; and, in truth, having realized several thousand pounds, and advancing, at the same time, toward the down-hill of life, I began to be captivated by the beautiful descriptions presented to me of the happiness of retirement. Having few relations, to interfere with my inclinations, I met with no obstacles; I parted with my business, upon easy terms, to two industrious and faithful servants, who had lived some years with me, and deserved every return I could make; and having purchased a small freehold in the west of England, I bade an everlasting adieu to the bustle and noise, the smoke and confusion of a vast and overgrown metropolis.

It would be unnecessary to give you a particular description of my country residence; suffice it to say, that it was situated in a most pleasant vale, and possessed all those advantages which are so pompously, and often falsely, trumpeted forth by the auctioneers. Here I felt myself light as a bird that has escaped the confinement of its cage. Here I expected to enjoy the blissful transition from society to solitude, from care to ease, from vexation to tranquillity. But what are the hopes of man? I had not been here many weeks, before I discovered that something very essential was wanting to fill up the measure of my happiness, something which I could neither beg, borrow, nor buy; in one word, I wanted something to do. In the midst of retirement, my mind struggled for employment, and dragged me back to those days, when I knew not the misery of a vacant hour, and when every hour brought with it its pleasing anxieties or profitable engagements. Here were no employment, no calls, no avocations; here were no goods to look over and examine, no sales to attend, no custom-house business to be done, no attendance upon 'Change, no books to post, invoices to send, or bills to negotiate. These had been the employment of my former life; and deprived of them, I had nothing upon which I could learn to fix my attention. 'It was very singular,' you will say, 'that all this never occurred to me before.' Yet nothing is more certain, than that no such idea ever entered my head, till I had leisure to look my situation in the face, and contemplate myself as a solitary helpless, and useless being.

It was now suggested to me, that however true this might be, yet it was no more than what had happened to others. Gentlemen who retire are no longer to think of business; they are to partake of such sports and pleasures as the country affords, and lay up a stock of good health and spirits, prepare a vigorous old age, and bid defiance to care and time. This was bewitching language, and I listened to it with conviction; I entered with spirit into the views of my neighbours; but I soon found that the sports of the country are learnt with difficulty, and followed with a very bad grace by a mere man of-London business, who has reached his grand climacteric. I had been all my life, even from my boyish days, an industrious plodder behind the counter and the desk; it could not, consequently, be very easy to transform one of my habits, into a man of pleasure, and a keen sportsman. The first lessons I took were miserably unsuccessful, and attended by consequences, more of a painful than pleasurable nature; my attempt to follow the hounds was attended by a dislocation of the shoulder, which laid me up for six weeks; and, in my first attack upon a covey of partridges, I put out my shoulder again by the recoil of my piece. These violent amusements, in short, were not suited to my taste or capacity, and too evidently interfered with my safety, to be followed longer. Fishing, therefore, was recommended as a more easy and secure diversion; and I was soon instructed in all the mysteries of baits, and hooks, and bites, and worms; but, as before I had too much exercise, here I had too little, and had very nearly fallen into the river, fast asleep; when I gave up this pursuit also.

It now came into my head, especially as winter approached, that reading would fill up my hours agreeably. I never had an aversion to reading, as far as I can remember of my early likings and dislikings; but I had always found so much employment in business apparently, and perhaps really more urgent, that, for many years, my reading was confined entirely to a newspaper, with an occasional peep into the London Directory or the Red Book; and such a chain of reasoning or narrative, as other books contain, was not familiar to me. I imputed this, however, merely to want of time; and that obstacle being now removed, I flattered myself that I should be able to increase the advantages of retirement, by storing my mind with food for reflection. Books were accordingly provided; but here, as in hunting, fishing, and fowling, all was new and untrodden ground. When I had completed my library, I discovered that my bookseller had not, and indeed could not, send me what I most wanted, a taste and habit of reading. My sleepy fits came on again, and there are few of the eminent writers of the present day (whatever they may think of their genius) whom I have not honoured with the approbation of a nod.

One resource was yet left. I now began to think that company would serve to divert me, and kill the heavy hours: for that purpose I cultivated the acquaintance of an extensive neighbourhood. My wealth, and I hope, my manners, which were at least inoffensive, procured me an easy introduction into many agreeable families. But here too, I was doomed to experience the misfortune of having gone through life with one stock of ideas, and that a very small one, 'of no use to any person but the owner.' The conversation of my friends turned upon subjects with which I was totally unacquainted. Now and then, when the newspaper came in, I could expatiate upon London politics, and the comparative merits of many great London politicians. But this could not last long: my stock of politics was the smallest of all my property, and I was too far from Guildhall, or St. Stephen's Chapel, to procure a fresh supply. During the greater part of my visits, I was condemned to hear long debates on subjects foreign to my understanding. The state of wheat, barley, and oats; the modes of rearing and feeding cattle; the farm-yard and the dairy; the cutting down of timber, and the planting of potatoes, were often discussed with great warmth, and at great length: but all was unintelligible to me; nor could I find a man in the whole parish, who understood any thing about nainsooks and bandannoes, soosayes and taffeties, and calimancoes, muslinets or dimities. I began to have a very indifferent opinion of their capacities; I believe they had none of mine, and it was more than once whispered in my hearing, that, 'your Londoners know nothing out of the sound of Bow bell.'

In this uncomfortable situation I remained for nearly two years; my health became affected from the lowness of my spirits, and the indolence of my habit; and I know not what might have been the consequence, if I had not, at length, taken the resolution to revisit society again. I am now most happily and comfortably placed as a partner in that very house, to which I once bade adieu, as I thought, forever. I trust I am now cured of a passion for retirement; but as I perceive many of my acquaintances listening to the representations which once deceived me, I am desirous, by your insertion of this letter, to warn them against the error. Few men of any description are qualified to enjoy retirement, or to render it salutary. Men of mere business are the least of all so. Their habits, tempers, and talents, are all disqualifications of an insuperable kind. Active employments, connected with fair and honest advantages, may prolong their days in health and comfort; but to exchange bustle for idleness, without the power to render idleness harmless, is a desperate attempt; and it is extreme folly, at the decline of life, to barter that which may be depended upon, for that which is uncertain, in the highest possible degree.

I am, Sir, your humble servant,
THOMAS KERSEYMERE.

[Volney's Travels in America have just appeared in an American dress. This fantastic foreigner thus describes the diet of the North American, who will doubtless be offended at the presumption of the philosopher, for saucily animadverting on the melted butter, the hot bread, the viscid puddings, and other happy and healthful particulars in the simple cookery of our innocent republicans, who are blest with such complying constitutions, that, it is well known, they can swallow and digest any thing.]

It is an important duty of the government to enlighten their people, as to the consequences of that pernicious diet, which they have borrowed from their ancestors, the Germans and English. We may venture to affirm, that if a premium were offered for a regimen most destructive to the teeth, the stomach, and the health in general, none could be devised more efficacious for these ends than that in use among this people.

At breakfast, they deluge the stomach with a pint of hot water, slightly impregnated with tea, or slightly tintured, or rather coloured, with coffee; and they swallow, almost without mastication, hot bread, half baked, soaked in melted butter, with the grossest cheese, and salt or hung beef, pickled pork or fish, all which can with difficulty be dissolved.

At dinner, they devour boiled pastes, called, absurdly, puddings, garnished with the most luscious sauces. Their turnips and other vegetables are floated in lard or butter. Their pastry is nothing but a greasy paste, imperfectly baked. To digest these various substances, they take tea, immediately after dinner, so strong that it is bitter to the taste, as well as utterly destructive of the nervous system. Supper presently follows, with salt meat and shell-fish in its train. Thus passes the whole day, in heaping one indigestive mass upon another. To brace the exhausted stomach, wine, rum, gin, malt spirits, or beer, are used with dreadful prodigality.

These modes of diet are not unsuitable to the Tartarian tribes, from whom the people of the west of Europe were originally descended, yet they employ none of these pernicious stimulants. Their wandering and equestrian life makes them capable of digesting any thing; but when nations change their climate, or sink into the wealth, refinement, and ease of a stationary people, the whole mass undergoes material alterations. The ploughmen of Germany or England may copy their hardy ancestors without much inconvenience; but not so those that dwell in cities, and pass their time in a slothful or sedentary manner, and still less those who change the chills and damps of their native climate for a torrid region, like Georgia or the Carolinas. Habit itself, though almost omnipotent, cannot reconcile this system to so repugnant a climate. Hence it is, that the English are the least able to contend with the evils of tropical climates, of any people of Europe, and their American descendants must abjure the example, or they will incur the same inconveniences.

ON LIFE—AN ALLEGORICAL VISION.

(From a British Essayist.)

A gentle ascent led to a lofty eminence, and on the summit, was a level plain, of no great extent. The boundaries of it could not indeed easily be ascertained; for as the ascent, on one side, was easy and gradual, so the slope on the other continued almost imperceptible, till it terminated at once in abrupt declivity.

At the first entrance of the hill, I observed great numbers of infants, crawling on beds of primroses, or sleeping on pillows formed by the moss. They frequently smiled, and their sweet countenances seemed to express a complacency and joy in the consciousness of their new existence. Many indeed wept and wailed, but their sorrow, though pungent, was short, and the sight of a pretty leaf or flower would cause a smile in the midst of their tears; so that nothing was more common than to see two drops trickling down cheeks which were dimpled with smiles. I was so delighted with the scenes of innocence, that I felt an impulse to go and play with the little tribe, when just as I was advancing, I felt a wand gently strike my shoulder, and turning my eyes on one side, I beheld a venerable figure, with a white beard, and in a grey mantle elegantly thrown around him.

'My son,' said he, 'I see your curiosity is raised, and I will gratify it; but you must not move from this place, which is the most advantageous spot for the contemplation of the scene before you.'

'Yon hill is the Hill of Life, a pageant which I have raised by the magic influence of this wand, to amuse you with an instructive picture.'

'The beauteous innocents, whom you see at the foot of the hill, present you with the idea of angels and cherubs, and of such is the kingdom of Heaven. Simplicity and innocence are their amiable qualities, and the more of them they retain in their ascent, the happier and lovelier shall they be, during the rest of their journey.'

'But raise your eyes a little. You see a lively train intent to learn, under the sage instructors who accompany them, the easiest and safest way of ascending and descending the hill which lies before them. They often run from the side of their guides, and lose themselves among the shrubs that blossom around them. Some give no ear to instruction, and consequently are continually deviating among thorns, thistles, nettles, and brambles. Their errors are at present retrievable, and few fall in the pitfalls with which the hill abounds. Joy illuminates their countenances. Theirs are the ruddy cheek, the sparkling eye, lively spirits, and unwearied activity. They retain a great share of the innocence with which they set out, and therefore they are cheerful. Envious age, if reason were mature! But folly, wantonness, forwardness of temper, and ignorance, greatly interrupt and spoil their enjoyments. Fruits of delicious taste grow around them, and flowrets of the sweetest scent and most beautiful colour, spring up beneath their feet. But they soon grow tired of this lower part of the hill, and ambitiously aspire at higher eminences.

'Behold them a few paces higher. They advance with eagerness, and many of them forsake the guides which have conducted them thus far in their ascent. They hasten in their course, nor do they adhere to the direct road, but deviate without scruple. Some indeed return, but the greater part climb the hill by paths of their own choice, full of difficulty and danger. The pitfalls, which are placed in every part of the hill, are in this part very numerous, and not easy to be avoided by those who forsake the high road. There are indeed no parts of the hill, in which a guide is more necessary than here; nor any, in which the travellers are less inclined to seek his assistance.

'You see the beauty of the blossoms. You hear the music of the birds. All nature seems to conspire in affording delight; but too many of the travellers preserve not that innocence and simplicity which are necessary to give a taste for the pleasures which are allowed. Instead of plucking the flowers which are known to be safe and salutary, they desire none but such as are poisonous. The aspiring ardour of the travellers urges them to continue the ascent, and by this time, you see, they have reached the level summit, where you observe a prodigious crowd, all busy in pursuit of their several objects. Their faces are clouded with care, and in the eagerness of pursuit they neglect those pleasures, which lie before them. Most of them have now lost a great share of their original innocence and simplicity, and many of them have lost it entirely.

'And now they begin to descend. Their cheerfulness and alacrity are greatly abated. Many limp, and some already crawl. The numbers diminish almost every step; for the pitfalls are multiplied on this side of the hill, and many of the travellers have neither strength nor sagacity to avoid them. Many delightful scenes remain. Fruit in great abundance grows around them. But the greater part, you may remark, are careless of the obvious and natural pleasures, which they might reach and enjoy, and are eagerly digging in the earth for yellow dust, on which they have placed an imaginary value. Behold one who has just procured a load of it, under which he is ready to sink. He totters along, in haste to find a hiding-place for it; but before he has found it, himself is hidden from our eyes, for lo! while I speak, he is dropping into a pitfall. Most of his companions will follow him; but you see no one is alarmed by the example. The descent is become very steep and abrupt, and few there are who will reach the bottom of the hill. Of those few not one advances without stumbling on the edge of the pitfalls, from which he can scarcely recover his feeble foot. Ah! while I speak, they are all gone.'

And is this a picture of life? said I; alas! how little do the possessors of it seem to enjoy it! Surely some error must infatuate them all. O say, what it is, that I may avoid it, and be happy.

'My son,' said my benevolent guide, 'do not hastily form an opinion derogatory from the value of life. It is a glorious opportunity, afforded by the Creator, for the acquisition of happiness. Cast your eyes on yonder plain, which lies at the bottom of the hill, and view the horizon.'

I looked, and lo! a cloud tinged with purple and gold, parted in the centre, and displayed a scene, at which my eyes were dazzled. I closed them awhile, to recover the power of vision, and when I opened them, I saw the figure of a person in whom majesty and benevolence were awfully united. He sat on a throne with every appearance of triumph, and at his feet lay a cross. And I heard a voice saying, 'Come again, ye children of men.' And lo, the plain opened in more places than I could number, and myriads of myriads started into existence, with bodies beautiful and glorious. And the voice proceeded, 'In my Father's house are many mansions. Ye have all fallen short of the perfection for which ye were created; but some have been less unprofitable servants than others, and to them are allotted the more exalted places of bliss; but there remain mansions appropriated to all the sons of men. I have redeemed the very worst of them from the tyranny of death. Rise, therefore, to your respective mansions. Enter into the joy of your Lord.' He said; when the sound of instruments sweeter than the unpurged ear ever heard, rang throughout Heaven's concave. And the glorified bodies beneath rose like the sun in the east, and took their places in the several planets, which form what is called our solar system. I was transported with the sight, and was going to fall on my knees, and supplicate to be admitted among the aspiring spirits, when, to my mortification, I thought I was suddenly placed on the side of the hill, where I had to climb a steep ascent. I wept bitterly, when my guide remonstrated with me on the unreasonableness of my tears, since none were to be admitted to glory, who had not travelled the journey which I had seen so many others travel. 'Keep innocence,' said he, 'do justice, walk humbly.' He said no more, but, preparing to depart, touched me with his rod, and I awoke.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In tumbling over some musty manuscripts, I lately met with one, which seems to merit a better fate than to be buried in 'the dull obscurity, to which its author consigned it. It is written in the Latin language, and is entitled, 'Poemata, Autore Johanem Hall; but your readers will, no doubt, rejoice to learn, that it has been 'lately translated out of its primitive idiom, by the care and studie of R. Buttersby.' The dedication by Mr. Hall is dated at 'St. Johns, 1646.' The writing of that age is so much disfigured by absurd contractions, that I have been obliged to exert no small degree of 'care and studie,' to exhibit a correct copy of Mr. Buttersby's version. My trouble, however, will be amply remunerated, if the enclosed satire shall afford any assistance to you, or contribute to the entertainment of your readers.

Notwithstanding much industry of research, the following are the only particulars I have been able to learn of this ancient gentleman.

JOHN HALL, a poet of distinguished learning, was born at Durham, in August, 1627. At St. John's college, where he received a part of his education, he was esteemed one of its brightest ornaments. From this place he removed to Gray's Inn, London, and was shortly after called to the bar; but entering into the politics of those factious times, he attracted the notice of Parliament by his writings, and was accordingly sent into Scotland, to attend 'a zealot of rebellion,' Oliver Cromwell. He was afterwards distinguished by other marks of favour, which evince the sense that was then entertained of his abilities.

Unfortunately he was too much addicted to pleasure, and he fell a sacrifice to his too great indulgence in it, on the 1st day of August, 1656. In 1646, during his residence at Cambridge, he published 'Horae Vacivae,' or Essays, which are themselves a sufficient proof of his talents. In the same year, when he was but nineteen, his poems were published. He has the honour of being the first English translator of Longinus; his version entitled, 'The Height of Eloquence,' was published in London, 1652, in 8vo. He also translated from the Greek 'Hierocles upon the golden verses of Pythagoras,' prefixed to which is an account of himself, by John Davis, of Kidwelly by whom it was published in 1657, 8vo. Several of his poems are preserved in the 'Select Collection,' reprinted from a little volume, which is now become exceedingly scarce. A number of them may also be found in the second part of Cleiveland's works, 8vo. 1687.

In the Satire which I send, will be discerned much originality of thought, expressed in very nervous, if not poetical language. The unfortunate delusion, which bewildered the minds of the fanatics of that day, occasioned an inundation of pamphlets, as devoid of truth as they were of sense. Against the mischievous tendency of these works, it appears, our author directed the force of his satire, but whether with as much success as our modern satirist, I am unable to learn. Gifford enjoys a glorious triumph, in which he has not been equalled by any writer, either of ancient or modern days.

SEDLBY.

SATIRE I.

Pray let me alone—what do you think can I
Be still, whilst pamphlets they like hailstones fly
About mine ears? Ah! how every other day
Such huge gigantic volumes doth display,
As great Knockfergus self could hardly bear,
Though he can on his knee th' Ale-standard rear,
To see such paper tyrants reign, who press
Whole harmless realms to death, which not the less
Are dog'd by worse fates; tobacco can
Calcind them soon to dust, the dripping pan,
Pack them to the dunghill, if they Groc'ry meet,
They do the office of a winding-sheet:—
How better were it for you to remain
(Poor squires!) in ancient rags, than thus sustain
Such antick forms of tortures; than to lie
In sweating tubs, and thus unpitied fry
I are common drudges of the world; if i' France
A pedant mend his shoes, you must advance
To France forthmeet, and there demurely stand,
Cloth'd in old fustian rags, and shake the hand
With every greasy Dutchman, who, perhaps,
Puts you in the self-same pocket with his scraps;
Or if you into some blind convent flee,
Y'are inquisition'd strait for heresie,
Unless your daring frontispiece can tell
News of a relie, or brave miracle;
Then are you entertain'd, and desk'd up by
Our lady's psalter, and the rosary;
There to remain, till it their wisdoms please
To let you loose among the novices.
But if you light at court, unless you can Audaciously claw some young nobleman,
Admire the choicest beauties of the court,
Abuse the countrie parson, and make sport,
Chalke out set formes of compliments, and tell
Which fashions on which bodies might do well,
No surer paints my ladie, than you shall
Into disgrace irrevocably fall.
But if you melt in oily lines, and swell
With amorous deepe expressions, and can tell
Quaint tales of lust, and make antiquitie
A patron of blacke patches, and deny
That perrucks are unlaw ful, and besaint
Old Fesoboll, for shewing how to paint;
Then th'art my golden book, then must thou lie
Adorn'd in plush, or some imbrodery,
Upon her lady-ships own couch, where ne're
A booke with tasha religion dare appear.
Thus may ye wretched shreds comply and bend
To every humour, or your constant friend,
The stationer, will never give you room,
Y'are younger brother's volumes from home.
Yet to speak truly, 'tis your most deserts
To run such various hazards, and such twarts.

Suppose ye with the world is peopled, now
 With cockneys or old women, that allow Canon to every fable; that can soon
 Persuade themselves the ass drunk up the moon,
 That faries pinch the peccant maides, that pies,
 Do ever love to picke a witch's eies,
 That monsieur Tom Thumb on a pin's point lay,
 That Pictres food the devil nine times a day.
 Yet such authentique stories do appeare
 In no worse garb than folio, and still beare
 No meaner garb * than Aristotle's name,
 Or else descent from reverend Plinie claim;
 One in a humour gives great Homer the lie,
 And pleases to annihilate poor Troy;
 Another scourges Virgill 'cause 'tis said
 His fiction is not in due order laid:
 This will create a monster, this will raise
 A ne'er found mountain, this will pour out seas.
 This great Camillus to a reckoning calls,
 For giving so much money to the Gauls.
 This counts, how much the state of Egypt made
 Of frogs that in the slime of Nilus laid,
 Wee'l not digest those gudgeons, the world is now
 At age, it'd not toward dotage grow,
 That starch't out beard that sits in Porphyrie chayre,
 And but for crowns light-headed, cannot beare.
 Barthius has read all books, Jos. Scaliger
 Proportion'd lately the diameter.
 And the circle Gallies found,
 Though not drunke, thinking that the earth ran round,
 Tycho has tumbled down the orbs, and now
 Fine tenuous ayre doeth in their places grow.
 Maurolyens at length has cast it even,
 How many pulses journey 'tis to heaven,
 A world of such knacks, we know think ye then
 Sooner to peep out, than to be kick't from men;
 Whether ye gallop in light rithmes, or chose
 Gently to amble on in a York-shire prose;
 Whether ye bring some ill-digested news
 From Spanish surgeons, or Italian stewes;
 Whether ye furiously raise som false alarm,
 And in a rage the Janisaries arme;
 Whether ye reinforce old times, and con-
 What kind of stuffe Adam's first suit was on;
 Whether Enos' toes had corns; or whether he Did cut his beard spade-wise, or like a I:
 Such brokage as is this will never do't,
 Wee must have matter and good words to boot.
 And yet how seldom meet they? most of rithmes
 Rally in tunes, but speake no sense like chimes, Grave deepe discourses full as ragged be,
 As are their author's doublets, you'll not see
 A word creepe in that cannot quickly shew
 A genealogie to th'Arke of Noe,
 Or at the least pleads not prescription
 From that great cradle of confusion:
 What pamphlet is there? where some Arabick
 Scours not the coast? from whence you may not pick
 Some Chinese character or mystic spell,
 Whereon the criticks for an age may dwell,
 Where there's some sentence to be understood,
 As hard to find as where old Athens stood.
 Why do we live, why do our pulses beat?
 To spend our bravest flames, or nobler heat
 On such poor trifles? to enlarge the day
 By gloomy lamps, yet for no other pray
 Than a moath-eaten Radix, or to know
 The fashion of Deucalion's shoe,
 It will not quit the cost, that men should spend
 Themselves, time, money, to no other end:
 That people should with such a deale of pains,
 Buy knowing nothing, and wise men's disdains?
 But to prevent this, the more knowing sort
 Of parents will to handicrafts resort,
 If they observe their children do produce
 Some flashings of a mounting genius,
 Then must they with all diligence invade
 Some rising calling, or some gainful trade;
 But if it chance they have one leaden soule,
 Born for to number eggs, he must to school,
 'Special if some patron will engage
 Th'advowson of some neighbouring vicarage;
 Strange hedly medley! who would make his swine,
 Turn grey hounds, or hunt foxes with his kine.
 Who would employ his saddle-nag to come,
 And hold a trencher in his dining-room!
 Who would engage our James, that knows not what
 His cassock's made of, in affairs of State?
 Or pluck a Richelieu from the helm, to try
 Conclusions, to still children, when they cry?
 Who would employ a country schoolmaster,
 To construe to his scholar some new found star!
 Your leaden creatures yet shap'd out to rule
 Perpetual dictators in a school,
 Nor do you want your rods, though only fed
 With scraps of Tully and coarse barley-bread:

* Hiatus.

Great thread-bare princes, which like chesse-knights
 No longer than your master gives you leave, [brave
 Whose large dominions in some brew-house lies.
 Asses commands over you, you ever boies,
 Who still possesse the lodgings next the leads,
 And cheat your ladies of their waiting-maids.
 Who, if some lowly carriage do befriend,
 May grace the table at the lower end,
 Upon condition, that ye fairly rise
 At the first entrance of the potatoe-pies.
 And when his lordship for discourse doth call,
 You do not let one dram of Latin fall,
 But tell how bravely your young Mr. swears,
 Which boy best likes his fancy, and what;
 How much he undervalues learning, and Takes pleasure in a sparrow-hawk well mann'd;
 How oft he beats his foot-boy, and will dare
 To gallop when no serving-man is neare;
 How he black-berries from the bushes caught,
 When antidoted with a morning's draught;
 How rather than he'll construe Greek, he'll chuse
 To English Ovid's Arté into prose:
 Such talke is for his lordship's palate, he Takes much delight in such like trumperie,
 But still remember ye, forbear to presse
 Unseasonably som morall sentences,
 Take heed by all means how rough Seneca
 Sally into your talke, that man, they say,
 Rails against drinking healths, and merits hate,
 As sure as Ornis mock't a graduate,
 What a grand ornament your gentry would Soon lose, if every rug-gown might be bold
 To rayle at such heroick feates! pogy who Could honour's mistress health, if this grow
 Once out of fashion! 'las fine idols they Ere since poore Cheapside crosse in rubbidge lay,
 Ere since the play-houses did want their praises,
 And players lay asleepe like dormouses,
 Have suffred too much, be not so soone
 With tender beauties, they had once some power,
 Take that away, what do you leave them? what?
 To marshall fancies in youngsters' hats.
 And well so too, since feathers were cashier'd,
 The ribbands have been to some office rear'd.
 'Tis hard to meet a hampressado, where
 Some ells of fancies do not straight appear
 Plaister'd and bedaub'd o'er, and garnish'd,
 As feathers in a southern hackney's head,
 Which, if but tied together, might at least
 Trace Alexander's conquest o'er the east.
 Or stich't into a loop, supply anew
 With annuary cloakes the wandering Jew.
 So learn'd an age we live in, all ere now
 Turn'd poets, since their heads with fancies glow.
 'Las! poets! yes, o bear me witness all
 Short-winded balades, or whate'er might fall
 Within the verge of three half quarters, say,
 Produce we not more poems in a day,
 [By this account] than waves on waves do brake,
 Or country justices false English speake:
 Suppose dame Julia's Messet thinks it meet
 To droop or hold up one of its hinder-feet,
 What swarnies of sonnets rise! how every wit
 Capers on such an accident, to fit
 Words to her faireship's griefe? but if by fates
 Some long presumptuous slit do boldly grate
 Don Hugo's doublet, there's a stir, as though
 Nile should his ancient limits overflow,
 Or some curst treason would blow up the state,
 As spire as gamesters ever to rise too late,
 But if some fortune cogge them into love,
 In what a fifteenth spheare then do they move?
 Nor the least tittle of a word is set
 That is not flaukt with a short epithet.
 What rocks of diamonds presently arise,
 In the soft quagmires of two squinting eyes,
 How teeth discolour'd, and half rotten too,
 Transformed into pearle or ivory.
 How every word's changed to a finest note:
 And Indian gummes are planted in her throat.
 Speake in good earnest; are they not worse than boys
 Of four years old, to dote on painted toyes?
 Yet, oh how frequent! most our sages shake
 Off their old furies, and needs with lawrells take.
 That it will be no wonder to rehearse
 The crabbiest of geometrie in verse:
 Or from the dust of knotty Sawrer see
 A strange production of some poetrie:
 But stay, too lavish muse, where run you—stay,
 Take heed, your tongue lcke not your teeth away,
 Besides ye have other bus'nesse, and you might
 More fitly far with teares than gall endight.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

The Rev. W. LISLE BOWLES is supposed, by the best judges, to have imitated Petrarch in that difficult composition, a Sonnet, more successfully than John Milton, or Charlotte Smith.

 The following, addressed to a pastoral stream, the pride of Caledonia, is soothing, both to the ear and the heart. The seventh and eighth lines are enlivened by a thought singularly happy; and the whole is a high finished picture of romantic scenery, which will always delight the rural enthusiast.

SONNET TO THE RIVER TWEED.

O Tweed, a stranger, that with wandering feet
 O'er hill and dale has journeyed many a mile,
 If so his weary thoughts he might beguile,
 Delighted turns thy beauteous scenes to greet.
 The waving branches, that romantic bend,
 On thy late banks a soothing charm bestow;
 The murmurs of thy wand'ring wave below,
 Seem to his ear the piny of a friend.
 Delightful stream! though now along thy shore,
 When spring returns in all her wonted pride,
 The shepherd's distant pipe is heard no more,
 Yet here with pensive peace could I abide,
 Far from the stormy world's tumultuous roar,
 To muse upon thy banks, at eventide.

The following is of the same character.

Clydsdale, as thy romantic vales I leave,
 And bid farewell to each retiring hill,
 Where fond attention seems to linger still,
 Tracing the broad bright landscape; much I grieve,
 That, mingled with the toiling crowd, no more
 I may return, your varied views to mark,
 Of rocks, amid the sunshine, tow'ring dark,
 Of rivers winding wild, and mountains hoar,
 Or castle, gleaming on the distant steep.
 For this a look back on thy hills I cast,
 And many a soften'd image of the past,
 Pleas'd I combine, and bid remembrance keep,
 To sooth me with fair views, and fancies rude,
 When I pursue my path in solitude.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

The Rev. Mr. Harris has issued proposals, for publishing the Journal of his Tour in the Territory North West of the Allegany Mountains; to be illustrated with Maps and Views. The prospectus leads us to expect much topographical information respecting an interesting part of our country, of which there have been published only vague and exaggerated accounts; with some curious particulars of the appearance, dimensions, and, probable, history, of the prodigious forts and pyramidal mounds on the banks of the Muskingum and Scioto—the solitary evidences of a great population in some remote, forgotten period.

It is hoped, that a work so valuable and curious, will be favoured with the most liberal patronage.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

MANSION HOUSE.

COFFEE HOUSE ROBBERY.

Yesterday John Simpson, a gay, fashionably dressed young man, seemingly about twenty-six or twenty-eight years of age, was charged, before the Lord Mayor, with having robbed several coffee houses and hotels, for some months past, and for whose apprehension a reward of twenty pounds had been advertised by the Society to prevent swindling.

Mr. Fathers, of the Guildhall coffee house, gave in evidence, that the prisoner came into his coffee house on Thursday night, about ten o'clock, and ordered supper and a bed for the night. A waiter from the city coffee house, Cheapside, who happened soon after to call upon business, seeing the prisoner, informed the witness, that he was the person who, about two months ago, had robbed them of property to the amount of sixteen pounds. Upon looking more directly at the prisoner, Mr. Fathers discovered him to be the man, who, about three months since, had slept in his house, and robbed a Mr. Watson, from Glasgow, of linen and other articles, to a considerable value, for which Mr. F. had paid six pounds. There not being an officer at hand, the prisoner was allowed to go to bed, when he was secured. Upon searching his person, there were found upon him a curious instrument for opening trunks, drawers, &c. so constructed as, by a gentle pressure of the hand, to yield a purchase equal to 200 weight; also a bunch of skeleton keys. When taken to the Poultry Compter, the waiter of the city coffee house identified the shag small-clothes worn by the prisoner, to be those stolen from a gentleman in their house. The prisoner had the address afterwards to change them for nankeen pantaloons, but after a strict search, they were found in the prison. The master of the New Hummums proved the prisoner's coming to his house, and, from his genteel appearance, procuring a bed there, on the 12th instant, pretending he had come from the gala at Vauxhall, but he decamped in the morning, carrying with him a gold watch and two pocket-books, the property of a gentleman who slept in the next room. The number of the watch, and maker's name were produced, which exactly corresponded with those of the gold watch found in the prisoner's possession. Upon being asked from whom he obtained the watch, who he was, and how he got his living? he said that he had the watch from a Jew, in exchange for clothes: that he was an officer of His Majesty's ship Victory, but had not yet joined her; that he had served on board the Isis, of fifty guns, and that he was a gentleman.

To carry on his schemes with more security, he always paid his bill before he went to bed; and never gave his boots or shoes to be cleaned, pretending that he was a member of some volunteer corps, and must go early to drill.

Mr. Eaton, the solicitor for prosecuting swindlers accompanied by several keepers of coffee houses, attended, but the examination being then over, the additional charges were not preferred, and the prisoner was committed for further examination.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The friends of the late Dr. Linn perceive with pleasure that proposals have been issued, by John Conrad and Co. of this city, for publishing, by subscription, 'A narrative Poem, founded on some events, in early Christian History, and designed, in part, to illustrate the effects of religion on the manners of barbarous nations.' An additional value is conferred on this posthumous work, by the promise of a Biography of its amiable and ingenious author. This we know will be written by a Man of Letters, abundantly well qualified for the task, and not only intimate with the deceased Poet, but with all the beauties of fine writing. We wish this work brilliant success, because we have always viewed the character of the author with respect, and because the profits of the publication are destined for his bereaved family, who, from merit, as well as from misfortune, are entitled to the benevolence of every liberal spirit.

Messrs. Poyntell and Co. of this city, propose to put to press immediately, Lord Teignmouth's Memoirs of the Life, Writings and Correspondence of Sir WILLIAM JONES. This delightful Biography of a most learned Scholar, not more remarkable for the wonderful extent, and variety of his talents, than for the consummate diligence with which he exercised, and the noble use to which he applied, them, will, we venture to predict, be perused with greater interest than any work of the class since the publication of Boswell's Johnson. We have studied it with the most eager curiosity, and with continued satisfaction; and it is our duty to recommend it to every polite scholar, who is willing to be incited and encouraged in the race for literary renown, by the glorious example of Sir W. Jones, who, in the well-balanced words of his elegant Biographer, was equally qualified to explore the beauties of nature, the works of art, the discriminations of character, and the productions of science.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

CUPID AND FOLLY.

Imitated from Fontaine.

In Cupid all is mystery—
His wings, his torch, his quiver, and his bow;
The god's strange tricks and history,
But few can say they know.

For me, I own myself, as well I may,
In love's nice arts a novice quite—
And only mean to tell you in my way,
By what mishap the urchin lost his sight;
Whether his blindness has improv'd our lot,
The lover must decide—for I cannot.

Folly and Cupid were one day,
Engag'd in friendly game at play—
Observe, the last had then his sight,
And could discern the day from night;
They soon, for children will be jarring
Contrive to find a cause of sparring.
Cupid, mild in disposition,
And seeing her a strapping wench,
Suggests to bring it for decision,
Before their godships on the Bench;
But Folly heeds not right or wrong,
She pertly cries, with flippant tongue,
"How dare you, child, contend with me?"
Then with many a scratch she greets him,
And at length so soundly beats him,
That he could neither walk nor see.

When Venus views her darling boy,
Her love, her sweet, her only joy,
In such a plight—she fills the skies
With threats and screams, and clam'rous cries:
Think—she was woman, and was mother,
And then you may conceive the pother—
Juno, and Jupiter, and Nemesis,
The catchpole of the starry premises,
And all the gods, astonish'd, stop their ears;
At last she says, with gushing tears—
"Look at my Cupid, and conceive
How much, as mother, I must grieve—
Quite blind, and bruise'd from top to toe,
He cannot move without his crutches—
That hussy, Folly, made him so,
Would that I had her in my clutches!
Revenge me on the wicked imp,
The wretch who thus has made him limp,
Drive her from Heaven—scourge the jade with rods,
Oh! grant me vengeance—grant it quick, ye gods."
The gods then summon'd to the hall of state,
In order due deliberate—
Each fact upon the cause dependent,
Is heard from plaintiff and defendant
And all the circumstances weigh'd,
With every just allowance made,
The matter clear—the crime defin'd,
Unanimous, the gods decide—
That as 'twas plain she made him blind,
Folly should be Cupid's guide.

MADRIGAL FROM QUEVEDO.

See, Lisis, where the sculptor's art
Has form'd thine image of this polish'd stone,
All perfect he perform'd his part,
Which nature has not done.

Has nature form'd thy bosom white,
Lo! how the marble mocks the mountain snow!
Thy charms unrivall'd meet the sight,
And this is matchless too.

O'er thy fair cheek, that hue she spread
That hue, that flies and flushes there so oft,
She made thy lips so roseate red,
Thy lips that seem so soft.

Ah, Lisis, maid of marble heart,
Here justly art thou form'd by him alone,
For here thou seemest what thou art,
So cold—so hard—in stone.

SONNET.

By the Rev. W. L. Bowles.

Evening, as slow thy placid shades descend,
Veiling with gentlest hush the landscape still,
The lonely battlement and farthest hill
And wood; I think of those that have no friend,
Who now, perhaps, by melancholy led
From the broad blaze of day where pleasure haunts,
Retiring, wander mid thy lonely haunts,
Unseen; and watch the tints that on thy bed
Hang lovely, to their pensive Fancy's eye
Presenting fairy vales, where the tir'd mind
Might rest beyond the murmurs of mankind,
Nor hear the hourly moans of misery:
Ah! beautiful views, that Hope's fair gleams the while,
Should smile like you, and perish as they smile.

What Goldsmith has finely observed of the swan, may be applied to the symmetrical figure of a beautiful woman.

In the exhibition of her form there are no broken or harsh lines: no constrained or catching motions: but the roundest contours and the easiest transitions. The eye wanders over every part with insatiable pleasure, and every part takes new grace from new motion.

The operas of Bickerstaff are among the most popular of the lighter performances on the English stage. The dialogue is correct, and the music approved. The songs of Lionel and Clarissa are sung, with enthusiasm, by amateurs, and encored, with glee, by the sons of nature. The opera writers in Great Britain are generally distinguished for the spirited appropriate style, which they employ in what is called, in dramatic language, the finale, or concluding song of the piece. The following is an example:

Come then, all ye social pow'rs,
Shed your influence o'er us;
Crown with bliss the present hours,
And lighten those before us.

May the just, the generous kind,
Still see that you regard 'em;
And Lionel forever find
Clarissa to reward 'em.

Love, thy godhead I adore,
Source of sacred passion:
But will never come before
Those idols, wealth or fashion.

May, like me, each maiden wise
From the fop defend her;
Learning, sense, and virtue prize,
And scorn the vain pretender.

Why the plague should men be sad,
While in time we moulder?
Grave, or gay, or vex'd, or glad,
We every day grow older.

Bring the flask, the music bring,
Joy will quickly find us;
Drink and laugh, and dance, and sing,
And cast our cares behind us.

D'Israeli, describing a female delineator, has the following picturesque expressions.

While the fair painter was occupied in desecrating on the beauties of Mary and Cleopatra, she rolled on her lover two orbs of beauty so sparkling, that neither those of Mary or Cleopatra could have told more intelligently the secrets of a bosom, that had gradually quitted its gause.

The same writer, speaking of a waspish Welchman, introduces a pair of whimsical similes.

He was as cold, yet as fiery as a flint from his own shire, and as offensive to society, as the smell of one of his own leeks.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In life's gay morn, young Mary's eye
With magic transport fir'd my heart;
With her I vow'd to live and die,
But cruel fortune bade us part!

Fate urg'd me to the stormy main;
I bade my blooming bride adieu!
The loud winds swell'd the watry plain:
The vessel vanish'd from her view.

She saw, she died.—Blow on ye winds!
Ye cannot now distract me more;
Dash me, where frost the ocean binds,
Or throw me on the burning shore.

Since that bright eye, that shone on me,
Clos'd, in the earth's cold bosom lies
Oh death! in kindness set me free,
To meet my angel in the skies!

And do I then wonder, that Julia deceives me,
When surely there's nothing in nature more common?
She vows to be true, and while vowing, she leaves me,
But could I expect any more from a woman?

O! woman, your heart is a pitiful treasure,
And Mahomet's doctrine was not too severe,
When he thought you were only materials of pleasure,
And reason and thinking were out of your sphere.

By your heart, when the fond sighing lover can win it,
He thinks that an age of anxiety's paid;
But, oh! while he's blest, let him die on the minute,
If he live but a day, he'll be surely betray'd.

[The following sarcasm, from the pen of T. Moore, Esq. is well aimed at the fustian style of Della Crusa et id genus omne.]

Good reader! if you e'er have seen,
When Phoebus hastens to his pillow,
The mermaids, with their tresses green,
Dancing upon the western billow:
If you have seen at twilight dim,
When the lone spirits' vesper hymn,
Floats wild along the western shore;
If you have seen through mist of eve
The fairy train their ringlets weave,
Glancing along the spangled green
If you have seen all this—and more—
God bless me! what a deal you've seen.

STANZAS.

BY MR. P. L. COURTIER.

So you say, that my looks now no longer convey
The language that once was to you most de-lighting;
This you say, but forget, at the same time to say,
How long you have ceased to be also inviting.

Restore me the dimple that played on the cheek,
And the eyes in mild lustre so gratefully beaming,
And the tongue, that in accents of music would speak,
When of love and of hope my fond bosom was dreaming.

Yes, be the same girl that I once could adore,
My eyes and my heart by thy beauties en-
chaining;

Be this! and, in conscience, I think that no more
Any cause wilt thou find for reproof and complaining.

O that time, which can reason and friendship mature,
Should the frailty of softer affection discover,
Should declare that, however important and pure,
Too vain are the sighs and the vows of the lover.

And yet, on reflection, perhaps I gave rise
To the change and the evils I thus am lamenting;
Obscur'd the sweet radiance that shone in those
eyes,
And taught to that tongue the sad art of tor-
menting.

If so, and my girl can the truant forgive,
Who too long may her charms and her graces
have slighted,
He will now do his best in contrition to live,
And be with those charms and those graces delighted.

CANZON.

BY CAMOENS.

[Viscount Strangford's Translation.]

'Armore! que brando à bello,' &c.

Thou pride of the forest! whose dark branches spread
To the sigh of the south-wind their tremulous green,
And the tinge of whose buds is as rich and as red
As the mellowing blushes of maiden eighteen!

On thee may the tempest in gentleness blow,
And the lightnings of summer pass harm-
lessly by;
Forever thy buds keep their mellowing glow,
Thy branches still wave to the southernly sigh.

Because in thy shade, as I lately reclin'd,
The sweetest of visions arose to my view,
'Twas the noon of the soul—'twas the transport of mind—
'Twas the happiest of moments that ever I knew.

For this shalt thou still be my favourite tree,—
In the heart of the poet thou never canst fade;
It shall often be warm'd by remembrance of thee,
And the dream which I dreamt in thy tremulous shade.

FROM THE PORTUGUESE OF CAMOENS.

[Viscount Strangford's Translation.]

Silent and slow now freshning breezes blow,
Where groves of chestnut crown yon shadowy sleep,
And all around the tears of evening weep,
For closing day, whose vast orb westering slow,
Flings o'er th'embattled clouds a mellow glow;
While hum of folded herds and murmur deep,
And falling rills, such gentle cadence keep,
As e'en might soothe the weary heart of woe.
Yet what to me is eve, what evening airs,
Or falling rills, or ocean's murmur sound,
While sad and comfortless I seek in vain
Her, who, in absence, turns my joys to cares,
And as I cast my listless glances round,
Makes varied scenery but varied pain?

Extract from an Address to the 'Friends of the British Literary Fund,' on the Anniversary of the Institution, April 12, 1804.

Written and recited by W. T. Fitzgerald, Esq.

'Bless'd be the hour, when first your gen'rous
care
Bade Learning hope, and Genius not despair!
As Spring's soft show'rs refresh the wint' red earth,
And give to Nature renovated birth,
So you at happy intervals appear,
The pledge and promise of a fruitful year.

'When warm with hope, in life's aspiring
morn,
The tints of fancy ev'ry scene adorn;
The glowing landscape charms the scholar's view,
And youth believes the fairy prospect true!
But soon experience proves his eye betray'd,
And all the picture darkens into shade.
The noble fervour of his early days,
His thirst of fame, his love of honest praise:
All that could make his ardent mind aspire,
And kindle fair ambition's sacred fire!
Like fleeting visions of the heated brain,
Dissolve in poverty, and end in pain.
Timid—abash'd—he seeks a patron's eye—
His modest voice, half stifled with a sigh,
Can all his complicated sorrows shew,
Or tell the hist'ry of an author's woe:
The gift of eloquence in vain he tries,
Grief in his heart, and want before his eyes!
Accents on which the charm'd attention hung,
Then lose their pow'r, and falter on the tongue:
Check'd by cold looks, he hopeless turns away
And like the valley's lily shuns the day!
But you shall seek him in his lonely shade,
And, when by all deserted, bring him aid;
Raise to bright hopes, and stimulate to fame
The bard, who else had died without a name.
Unseen you bless—and what you nobly give,
Assists the press, and bids it's vot'ries live:
Let no cold policy your aid withhold,
Because some prostitute, that press for gold;
Some Proteus writers, varying with the hour
The tools of faction, or the slaves of pow'r!
Whose venal pens corruption still may buy,
To hide the truth, and propagate the lie!
For, though the letter'd garden may disclose
The night-shade mingled with the fragrant rose;
Shall we the rich and free parterre destroy,
Because some poison grows? some weeds annoy?
And while we thus a rude reform pursue,
Root up the evil and the blessing too?

THE BRITISH SPY IN BOSTON.

LETTER II.

I continued at the supreme court of judicature, listening and observing, until the important juncture, when Theophilus Parsons, 'THE GIANT OF THE LAW,' as he is aptly denominated, opened his impressive argument. To a mind, naturally acute, comprehensive, mighty, and original, he is said to unite a memory so retentive, that what he has once added to the rich store of his understanding, no lapse of time, no pressure of occupation, can ever arrest. This treasure of professional knowledge is the inexhaustible fund, whence the unlearned, and the indolent obtain their daily supplies of precedent and authority; for he imparts his intellectual wealth, with the liberal indifference of one, who feels the unrivalled ascendancy of his own attributes and acquirements. I had the pleasure of measuring, with all the faculties I possess, the proportion of his mind with the management of an intricate cause, brought for the enormous sum of four hundred thousand dollars, against the heir of the late lieutenant governor of the commonwealth. I found the general opinion, previous to the opening of the case, against the probability of the plaintiff's recovering more than thirty or forty thousand dollars, and under an inferior genius, it is to be presumed, such would have been the award. Never have I found greater legal ability, nor more professional faithfulness, than were displayed by Mr. Parsons, upon this interesting occasion. The opposite counsel were the attorney general, and Samuel Dexter, men of distinguished talents, and respectable standing; but compared with the brilliancy of his mind, all other vividness appeared dim, every glow of the imagination faint and colourless. In fine, the pre-eminent powers of this man, his laborious research, his strong and comprehensive view of each circumstance, and his judicious arrangement of the whole, obtained for his client the extraordinary sum of one hundred and six thousand dollars, which has almost made me a convert to the opinion of the great Frederic, upon the propriety of shackling or restraining the ascendancy of genius, nor permitting that to influence the decrees of justice. A mere statement of facts, given in common-place terms, would probably have bestowed on the plaintiff his forty thousand dollars, and prevented the insolvency of the poor heir at law. Respecting Mr. Parsons, I find it a general sentiment to anticipate success, wherever he is engaged, and to consider the palm of victory as decidedly his due. Hence, most fortunate are they, whose placidity shall first possess his assistance: and hence, the multiplicity of his employments, and the honourable assiduity, with which he devotes himself to the interest of his client, would insure him a princely fortune, were his disposition rapacious, or in any degree avaricious. But, liberal in his temper, and moderate in his desires, at the head of his honourable profession, his fees are said not to be proportionate to his individual importance, and extortion of every kind a stranger to the character of his practice and his propensity.

Theophilus Parsons has been announced, by some fastidious foreigners, as the only lawyer, in the genuine, and most extensive sense of the term, that America has produced. This is saying too much—He is, indisputably, the first, the most learned in authorities, the most powerful in argument, of the greatest ingenuity in foiling his opponent—Of a wit, impromptu and sarcastic, while his astonishing mind, always at home, now plunging into the deep and intricate recesses of unexplored jurisprudence, then lightly skimming round the flowery fields of fancy, ever superior, and never trivial, even in trifles, with a heart of benevolent feelings, untainted by avarice, and unwarping by ambition, a morality unimpeached and unsuspected, and a temper marked by forbearance and good humour, that disarms enmity, and turns aside the arrows of professional envy and rivalry, it were to be presumed that respect and affection, like handmaids, would attend, and honours would court his acceptance. This is not found, and why it is not, would, to a merely speculative understanding, appear absurd or nugatory. Still, for a man, thus endowed, thus dignified, there remain private respect, individual affection, and universal applause. Were this a world of angels, it might be thus; but Theophilus Parsons, with a mind, in which the amiable, the great, and the good, are blended, has constitutional negligences, characteristic peculiarities, and incidental deficiencies. Whence, those who shrink from his superiority, take shelter in his imperfections, and derive consolation from the blemishes, that appear to mingle with his attributes. Secluding himself from the circles of gay life, and never partaking the conversation of that sex, which refines and civilizes, no attentions are lavished upon his person, no regard bestowed upon the decorums of fashion, and though not naturally ugly, he becomes, by these means, both uncouth and unpolished; and, while the sublimity of his genius should intitle him to unguished admiration, the cut of his coat, the strangeness of his wig, or the colour of his buckcloth, are the objects of exulting remark, and the subjects of reprehension. In this respect, as in many others, like the chief justice of the United States, Mr. Parsons disregards or despises every external attention to dress, or address, appearing in his own person rather to consult what will deform or repel, than the neatness of habilitment, or the grace of decoration. It may be urged by the before-named philosopher, that truly the coat, a man happens to put on, does not change the original character of his mind—possibly, not wholly nor essentially, yet we are told by the poet,

"Even from the body's purity, the mind Receives a secret, sympathetic aid."

Hence, a careless disregard to cleanliness, and propriety of apparel, has a tendency to diminish self-respect, and indirectly deprive us of the estimation of others, by generating familiarity, and contracting that distance which separates the extreme of character. To speak the plain language of truth and experience, it is most certain, that while we consent to live with the men of this world, and to be seen by the women of it, a moderate and modest attention to its fashions, its customs, its social and its public regulations, is important to the greatest, as much as to the least, if we would command respect, conciliate esteem, or even be rescued from the cutting contempt of derision. Theophilus Parsons is beyond all this; planting his pleasures where his honours have grown so thick upon him, decidedly the greatest man in Massachusetts, desiring no recreations, and ordinary delights, it may be asked, why is he not called to grace, and to govern, either in the cabinet, or the senates of the nation? As a rhetorician, more solid than ornamental, his voice not melodious, but powerful, and less provincial than many of his brethren, his manner irresistibly impressive, and his political knowledge in proportion to his other acquirements, why are these elevated properties confined to the ordinary or extraordinary calls of jurisprudence? Of this problem, frequently urged by me in different societies, I have obtained the following solution. Mr. Parsons has long been the leader of a political 'Faction,' as it is termed, which, in avowed opposition to the republican or democratic powers, that now hold the reins, and direct the vehicle of the supreme authority, no situation, adequate to his merit and pretensions, can be offered for his advancement, and why he was not sought under the former administrations, is to be accounted for on other principles, since, as a distinguished member of the convention for forming the present Federal Constitution, his political knowledge was greatly conspicuous; but disdain the lure of office, and innumerable of public honours, though persevering and inflexible in his party-opinions, he seeks no personal benefit, is too elevated for patronage, and too independent for recompence. This is well understood; and when Mr. Adams, in the late and last hours of his perished authority, attempted to bestow upon him a transient, and perhaps equivocal advancement, with that straightness, and dignity of mind, which are truly his own, he instantly rejected the benefit, that, induced by no personal friendship, could confer no additional honour.

Finally, it is my opinion, and you, my dear S....., will value it according to its worth, that among the first civilians of our own country, and before the greatest judiciary it has ever produced, Theophilus Parsons would be estimated, honoured, and preferred, as one, whose attributes entitl'd him to the ennobling character of a GREAT LAWYER.

BIOGRAPHY. THE LIFE OF MICKLE.

The conduct of Garrick strongly excited his resentment; he determined to print the tragedy, begun it, and sent the first sheet of it to the manager. The motives which led him to the first, appear in the preface to the play; what induced him to the latter, he has described in a letter to Mr. Hoole, dated November 5, 1773.

I have just received a letter from Mr. Ballantyne, wherein he acquaints me, that you seemed sorry that Mr. Garrick had seen a proof sheet of the preface to my play. Mr. B. also expressed his surprise how he should have obtained it, and supposed that some person who wished me ill, had sent it, that he might be prepared to prejudice the public against me.

'The truth is, I sent it to him in a blank cover. Let him be prepared as he will. Half a year ago I declared my resolution to my friend Mr. Boswell. He wrote me two earnest dissuasive letters, but in vain. I have maturely considered every circumstance; I have passed the Rubicon, and I will proceed. In a letter to Mr. Boswell, sent off only three days ago, I told him that I should look upon any farther dissuasive as thus, in plain English: "What do you think the public will mind such a scribbler as you? No, my friend, take my advice fold your hands together, submit to the infallibility of Mr. Garrick, and starve." I have also cited the same sentence in a letter now on the table, to governor Johnstone. 'I have passed the Rubicon, I say, but I am not a Kenrick. No friend shall blush for me. I know what I owe to them and to myself. If I am possessed of any satirical abilities, Mr. G. shall feel them. I have planned a new Dunciad, of which he is the hero. As soon as I finish the Lusiad, I shall set about it. If you think proper, you may mention this in any company.'

He was afterwards advised to try its fate on the Edinburgh theatre, but governor Johnstone thinking it might interfere with the completion of the Lusiad, recommended him to lay it entirely aside, until the translation was finished. To this he consented; and when the Lusiad was finished, another friend recommended to him to revise the play, and offer it to Mr. Harris. This was accordingly done, but was still unsuccessful. After this repulse he relinquished all expectations of advantage from the theatre, though he afterwards permitted a person to show the unfortunate play to Mr. Sheridan, and here too it had the same success as with the other managers. Had he lived, he always declared his intention of printing it in the collection of his works.

The approbation which had crowned his translation of the Lusiad, and the respectable name which he had now attained in the literary world, soon banished from his mind the mortifications he suffered from the ill success of his tragedy.

The first edition of the Lusiad being soon sold, he immediately prepared a second, with improvements, which was published in June 1778. For this Mr. Mortimer presented him with an etching, and on the death of that excellent artist, February 4, 1779, he wrote an epitaph for him.

In 1779 he published a pamphlet, entitled 'A candid examination of the reasons for depriving the East India Company of its charter, contained in the history and management of the East India Company, from its commencement to the present time; together with strictures on some of the self-contradictions and historical errors of Dr. Adam Smith, in his reasons for the abolition of the said company, &c.'

About this time, some of his friends had it in contemplation to recommend him to the notice of his majesty, as worthy of a pension. Doctor Bowth, bishop of London, from a knowledge of his virtue and talents, intimated his readiness to give him ordination, with a promise of some provision in the church; but this mode of life was not agreeable to his disposition.

While the scheme of publishing his poems by subscription, was ripening, in which, from the exertions of his friends, he had great reason to hope for success, his friend governor Johnstone was in May 1779, appointed to the command of the Romney man of war, and he immediately offered to appoint him his secretary, in order that he might partake of any good fortune which might attend the cruise. So strict was his regard to the engagement he had previously made with his friends, from whom he had received a few subscriptions for his poems, that it was found a very difficult task to persuade him to accept this offer. It was at length suggested to him, that a new situation would open a new scene, which would enable him to add what might render his volume still more acceptable to his subscribers; under this impression he engaged, and fulfilled his appointment during the remainder of the year.

In November he arrived at Lisbon, and was appointed by the commodore joint agent for the prizes which were taken. At this place he was considered as the translator of the Lusiad, and received with the most flattering marks of attention. There, and in the neighbourhood, he remained for more than six months.

During his stay, he composed his Almada Hill, an epistle from Lisbon, published in quarto, 1781; and collected some particulars concerning the history, manners, and customs, of the Portuguese, which he never arranged.

The Royal Academy being opened while he was at Lisbon, he was present at the ceremony of its commencement, and had the honour to be admitted a member, under the presidency of one of the most illustrious characters of the age, prince don John of Braganza, duke of Lafões; who presented him with his own portrait, as a mark of his regard.

On his return to England, it was thought necessary that he should stay in London, to attend the proceedings in the courts of law, respecting the condemnation of some prizes; and he did not therefore attend the commodore during his last expedition to the Cape of Good Hope, nor did he any more go to sea.

In 1782, he came forward as an advocate for Chatterton's title, in the Rowleian controversy, and published an ironical pamphlet, intitled, 'The Prophecy of queen Emma, an ancient ballad, lately discovered, written by Johannes Turgottus, prior of Durham, in the reign of William Rufus; to which is added, by the editor, an account of the discovery, and hints towards a vindication of the authenticity of the poems of Ossian and Rowley,' octavo.

On the 6th of June, 1782, he married Miss Tomkins, daughter of the person with whom he resided at Forest-Hill, while he was engaged in translating the Lusiad.

The fortune he acquired under commodore Johnstone, now enabled him to retire to literary leisure and independence. He accordingly took a house at Wheatly, a few miles from Oxford, where he devoted his vacant time to a revision of his poetical works and tragedy, which he proposed publishing by subscription.

The efficient patronage of commodore Johnstone will be remembered to his honour. On the death of his real friend and patron, May 24, 1787, he showed his affection and gratitude to his memory, in some elegiac verses, a copy of which he sent to the gallant Lord Rodney, begging his opinion and correction of the first note, and he received the following answer, dated Albemarle street, May, 16, 1788. 'Nothing can give me more real pleasure, than the affection and gratitude shown by you to the memory of our worthy friend George Johnstone. It is impossible for me not to approve of the verses of the translator of the Lusiad, which, without flattery, in my poor opinion, are equal, if not superior, to Pope's translation of the Iliad. It is impossible not to be pleased with both. Both instil into our minds the glorious idea of doing our duty to our country, and that life without honour is a burden.'

'Your note relative to the intelligence sent me in 1761, I think full enough. The intelligence was of that consequence, that without it, every Spanish province in the West Indies had been prepared, as I did not receive orders from England till Martinique was taken, and I had sailed to attack Domingo, in which time my cruisers had taken every Spanish packet that had sailed from Spain with the declaration of war. And the very day I received Mr. Johnstone's dispatches, I sent them to Jamaica, desiring the governor to lay an embargo, and the admiral to seize all Spanish ships; which was done accordingly, and the Spanish governors, totally ignorant of the war, till Sir George Pococke and the British fleet came in sight, some months after, off the Havannah Mr. Johnstone, therefore, may be properly said to have taken the Havannah.'

'With infinite pleasure I beg you will put me down as a subscriber to your works, and beg you will do me the honour of calling upon me, when you come to town.'

During the last years of his life, he occasionally afforded some assistance to the European Magazine, the Fragments of Leo, and several of Reviews of books came from his hand. In September 1788, at the request of a friend, he wrote a song called Eskdale Braes, in honour of the place of his birth, a country most beautifully Arcadian, in the center of that district, on the border of Scotland, which is thus described by Dr. Percy, in his 'Reliques of Ancient English Poetry,' 'Most of the finest old Scottish songs have the scene laid within twenty miles of England, which is indeed all poetic ground, green hills, remains of woods, clear brooks. The pastoral scenes remain; of the rude chivalry of former ages happily nothing remains, but the ruins of the castles.'

This song, in commemoration of a spot, in itself of little importance, but dignified by the birth of heroes, who have bled in defence of their country, and poets, who have given new harmony to the language, was intended to be set to music by James Balmain, Esq. commissioner of the excise, and brother-in-law to commodore Johnstone; so that we should have an Eskdale song, written by a bard of Eskdale, and set to music by a native of the same place.

This was the last composition he lived to finish. After a short illness, he died at Wheatly in Oxfordshire, October 25th, 1789, in the 55th year of his age. He was buried at Wheatly. He left a son, with but a scanty provision, whom his executors, Francis Wastie, Esq. of Gt. Milton, Oxfordshire, and Mr. William Ballantyne, merchant, Savage Gardens, have placed with the Reverend Mr. Nailor at Hammersmith, in order that he may be qualified for admission, on the foundation of Winchester college.

His Poems, including the pieces formerly printed separately, except 'Providence,' with the 'Sorceress,' and other original pieces, and the tragedy of the 'Siege of Marseilles,' were collected and published by subscription, in one volume, quarto, 1791, with some 'Anecdotes' of his life "in which are comprised several letters from the late Lord Lyttleton," with the benevolent purpose of raising a sum to assist the education and provision of his son. His Poems, reprinted from the edition 1794, with his verses on passing through the Parliament Close of Edinburgh, at midnight, and some smaller pieces, selected from the Introduction to the Lusiad, and the 'Anecdotes' of his life, are now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry. His poem on Providence he himself thought too incorrect for republication.

MEMOIRS OF ROBERT BAGE, AUTHOR OF 'MOUNT HENNETH.'

[The following slight sketch of the witty author of "Henneth" was addressed by his friend Hutton of Derby to the Editor of the Monthly Magazine. Mr. Bage, however reprehensible for want of orthodoxy, is certainly eminent in that class of Novelists, who strive to make men merry as well as wise. His characters are well grouped, his stories narrated with humour, his style is always sprightly, and his moral useful.]

I waited, and earnestly wished, to see in your Magazine some memoirs of the late worthy Mr. Robert Bage. But none appearing after so urgent a solicitation, I think myself bound to pay a tribute to a departed friend whom I dearly loved, who stood one of the first in my esteem, whom I have known perhaps longer than any man living, and with whom I have lived in the closest friendship fifty years.

This uncommon but excellent man was born Feb. 29, 1728, at Darley, a hamlet in the parish of St. Alkmund's, Derby, where his father worked a paper-mill. Though he lived to the age of seventy-three, he could not celebrate more than eighteen birth-days.

His mother died soon after his birth, when his father removed to Derby, but kept the mill. He quickly married a second wife, and, as I resided in the same street, and near him, I well remember he buried her in 1732. He soon procured another, buried her, and ventured upon a fourth, who survived him.

Robert was put to school, so that I did not perfectly know him till 1735, when he was seven years old. He had made at that age such a progress in letters, that he was the wonder of the neighbourhood: he was then in the Latin tongue. My father often held him up to me for imitation, I being much bigger and older. I was then but little acquainted with him, for he moved in a sphere more elevated than I. At this time he was completely master of the manual exercise, and I saw him instructing some young men. He afterwards was trained to his father's business.

In about 1751 he married a young lady, who possessed four accomplishments which seldom meet in one woman, fortune, beauty, good sense, and prudence; I might add a fifth, necessary for the peace of a family, good nature. I have reason to think he found more happiness in domestic life than is usually experienced. Having embraced the marriage state, he entered upon a paper-mill at Elford, four miles from Tamworth, which he conducted to the time of his death.

Some men's capacity opens at a late day, and some wither soon after the meridian of life, but Robert Bage's opened and shut with his existence. His enlivening sun shone with vigour during a long period of years. His talents, humanity, honour, and generosity, appeared, through the whole of his life, conspicuous to all who knew him. I could bring numberless incidents to establish every trait of his character: but as this would lead me into too wide a field, I shall confine myself to one or two proofs to each assertion. The powers of his mind were amazingly strong; these, in the early part of his life have already been noted. During my acquaintance with him he learnt music, and the French and Italian languages, without a master. Being inclined, in 1760, to learn the abstruse branches of mathematics, he applied to Thomas Hanson, a celebrated teacher, and spent a night in Birmingham once a week for instruction. As I was intimate with both, I sometimes attended, and before the scholar had been a month, I could easily perceive, though no adept myself, he was able to teach his master. nay, even set him fast. Perhaps part of this victory might arise from the easy fluency with which Mr. Bage delivered himself, while the master of figures was better formed for thinking than speaking.

His humanity will appear from his treatment of his servants, and even his horses, who all loved him, and whom he kept to old age.

Trade, which is thought to corrupt the mind, made no such impression upon him. His dealings were stamped with rectitude; he remarked to me, "Fraud is beneath a man." He had no other love for money than to use it, or he might have left a much larger property than he did. In February, 1756, he asked me to spend the evening with him. He proposed a connection (not a partnership) which I accepted, and which continued, with small variations, according to the mutations of time, till the day of his death. From that date, perhaps, I have paid him 500l. a year, upon the average, and always with pleasure, which proves the simple point, I was treated with honour. During this long course of forty-five years he never gave me one cause of complaint. His honour, and peaceable temper, will farther appear from a remark he made while we travelled in a chaise from Wolsey-bridge to Tamworth, in October 1795—he had then been in partnership with a person in another concern near fifteen years—"that they never had one word of difference since they met."

His generous cast of mind will appear from two, among many, incidents. I accidentally remarked that, "I had seen a distant relation of his, who was out of employment."—"Give him," (says he) upon my account (though he did not know him) five shillings a week till he gets into work." When the rioters, in 1791, had cruelly destroyed my property to a large amount, and obliged me, with my family, to run away without a shilling, and none durst take us in, we drove, among other places, to the castle at Tamworth. I asked the people of the inn if they knew me? "No."—"I have no money to pay my way, or property to pledge." Their looks fell. "I am known to Mr. Bage, of Elford, whom I will request to pay my bill." Their looks and my credit rose together. He cheerfully paid it, blamed me for not coming to his house, and I could never prevail upon him to accept a return.

With all these rich talents and rare endowments he was mild in the extreme; an enemy to no man, and, I believe, never had one himself.

His reason for becoming an author was singular, and such as would have driven another out of authorship. I shall state the cause, and deliver the result as given me by himself in the chaise above-mentioned. About the year 1765 he was induced to enter into partnership with three gentlemen in a wholesale iron-manufactory. The pursuit continued about fourteen years, then dissolved, when it appeared he had lost a sum, which I have now forgotten, perhaps 1500l. Fearing the distress of mind would overcome him, he took up the pen to turn the stream of sorrow into that of amusement; a scheme worthy a philosopher. His first production was Mount Henneth, in 1781, which he sold for 30l. His succeeding works followed nearly upon the same terms. The public are in possession of his writings, and have given him an ample return of praise. Excellent as they are, yet, in my opinion, his private letters, of which I must have received more than a thousand, surpass them. They are replete with vivacity, witty turns, and fine humour, spontaneously springing, without effort, from the heart.

A sketch of this amiable man may be seen in Hutton's History of Derby, 1791, where he possesses a niche among the worthies of that place. I shall transcribe the passage.

"If we find a pleasure in drawing a valuable character which has left the stage, that pleasure must be double when we treat of those who still adorn it; because we revere both the character and the man. This, in the present case, is my pleasing task. The man I now delineate is a native of Derby, but left it at an early period. He amuses the world and himself with novel productions of a superior class, as Mount Henneth, Barham Downs, The Fair Syrian, James Wallace, &c. wherein is an excellent picture of life, a full display of character and sentiment. These have travelled to the continent, passed through the Frankfort-press, and appeared to the world in a German habit.

"Although fortune never made him conspicuous in the great world, she gave him what was preferable, affluence and content. In directing a paper-mill may be found that head which is able to direct empires; that judgment, which can decide in difficult cases; a penetration, which can fathom the human heart, and comprehend various systems of knowledge; a genius, which constitutes the companion for Newton in philosophy, for Handel in music, for Euclid in mathematics; a master of the living and dead languages, and all, like the wealth of a merchant who rises from nothing, acquired by himself. Nay, I should even rank him with that learned body, the physicians, if he were not defective in the art of killing.—That rectitude, which is rarely found, is here obscured from the public eye, but is a pearl of great price, and a credit to our species. Though a diminutive figure, yet one of the most amiable of men; and though barely a Christian, yet one of the best. I have known him fifty-six years; his friendship is an honour; I have long possessed it; to which I shall add another, by writing his name with my own. Should he frown at this liberty, I will take twice as much: should he retort, I will take my revenge by drawing a complete character; for he has amply furnished me with materials."

This worthy man afterwards charged me with too strong a colouring. I told him in reply; I was not used to heap praise upon any man wholesale, therefore took every expression to pieces, and shewed him the firm foundation on which I built. He seemed satisfied, and returned a smile.

Four or five months prior to his death, he paid me a visit. I was secretly alarmed to observe his countenance changed, his constitution breaking, as if threatening a dissolution. When we parted, I took what I thought an everlasting farewell. As he went out of the house, he shook hands with my nephew (a boy of thirteen), and said, with a smile, "Farewell, my dear lad, we shall meet again in heaven!" Though spoken in the jocular stile, it seemed to indicate a sensibility of his approaching end.

Still declining, and attended with feverish symptoms, but sensible to the last, he left the world September 1, 1801, after a life of seventy-three years, six months, and one day.

His person was of a smallish size, about five feet three inches, and of a spare habit, not robust, but his constitution good. He left an amiable widow to lament his loss, by whom he had three sons; one of them died a young man, an affliction he severely felt, the others are in genteel situations, and inherit a large portion of their father's talents.

WILLIAM HUTTON.

Birmingham, Dec. 5, 1801.

ORIGINAL CRITICISM.

[From the Monthly Anthology.]

The Constitutionalist: addressed to men of all parties in the United States. By an American.

"Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, is requisite: not only that you discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority; but also—that you resist, with care, the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext."

WASHINGTON.

Philadelphia: Maxwell, 1804.

The object of this little pamphlet is to expose some of the wild, political heresies of the present day. It is addressed to "men of all parties," but it is more particularly designed for the meridian of Pennsylvania, where the whirlwinds of democracy rage without controul, and threaten to sweep away in their course every vestige of the republican principle. The author endeavours to elucidate and establish, in this work, the truth of the following position:—that the judicial department of government, in this country, possesses the legitimate power of declaring null and unoperative any act of the legislature, which is contrary to the constitution. He supports this doctrine by the authority of judge Tucker, of Virginia, in his learned and elaborate notes on the commentaries of Sir William Blackstone; by the opinion of Mr. Patterson, one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, expressed in his charge to the jury in the case of Dorrance, lessee against Sanborn; by an appeal to the history of other nations; and by strong and animated reasoning.

In the course of this work, the author mentions a curious experiment, which is worthy the attention of politicians. By the first constitution of Pennsylvania, a tribunal, denominated the council of errors, was created for the sole purpose of preserving the constitution. It was the duty of this to inquire, "whether the constitution had been preserved inviolate, and whether the executive and legislative branches had performed their duty, as guardians of the people, or exercised other or greater powers than those, with which they had been constitutionally invested." This tribunal accordingly undertook, at various times, to specify cases, in which they judged, that the constitution had been violated. Many of the alleged infringements were perpetrated by legislative acts. But this censorial tribune did not answer the purposes of its institution. A temporary dependant body, chosen immediately by the people, with the right to complain, but without the power to reform public abuses; it was regarded with contempt in proportion to its weakness. This experiment demonstrated to the framers of the present constitution of Pennsylvania, the wisdom and necessity of vesting the power of judging laws as well as offenders, in men, permanent by the tenure of office, and independent of the other branches of government.

The Roman censor could degrade from the patrician rank any member, whose conduct merited expulsion. In like manner, there ought, in every state, to be a supreme judicial power, co-ordinate with the other departments of government, invested with authority to blot from the judicial code every unconstitutional act. The author of this pamphlet, shews the necessity of such a power by the opinions of political writers, and by the experience of history. Wherever the legislature arrogates to itself the power to judge and determine in judicial matters, liberty cannot exist. The correctness of this principle, as applicable to our own country, may be shewn by an example. Suppose that the legislature of any one of the states should enact a law, which should impair the obligation of contracts. This would directly infringe a principle of the Federal Constitution, which is of superior obligation; and therefore it would require in the state a power, independent of the legislature, to declare such law null.

As this pamphlet is very short, we make no extracts, but refer our readers to the original. The author writes with the facility of one, accustomed to composition. His style is plain, and derives no aid from rhetorical graces. A spirit of candor pervades the work. The political opinions are stated with an independence, which is worthy of praise; to advocate the independence of the judiciary is a most unpopular task in these democratic days. The author* was formerly, we are told, a disciple of the dominant party in Pennsylvania. But disgusted with the excesses of his party, he has ceased to minister to its rage. Many honest minds have been perplexed with a similar thralldom: but few have had the courage to throw off the yoke; fewer still to vindicate their independence with dignity and success.

R.

Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, held at Philadelphia, for promoting useful Knowledge. Vol. V. Philadelphia. Dobson. 1802.

This volume, one of the very few that ever issue from the American press, will not, we apprehend repay the labour of him who may be induced to wade through it. It contains a few insulated facts of little importance, and some very unsuccessful attempts at theory. The six first papers are communicated by Dr. Priestley, and are distinguished, if possible, by a more eminent want of scientific precision, than even his periodical volumes of chemical experiments. They are apparently the scourgings of his old diaries, eked out with some desultory and inconsistent remarks; a few notices of the present state of his ever-varying opinions; and several attacks, very temperate indeed, but proportionably feeble, upon those discoveries, which his total want of genius for philosophizing has obliged him to leave to men who did little more, in the way of practice, than repeat his experiments. Upon these six articles we shall content ourselves with offering a few very general criticisms.

In the first place, the experiments, where they are at all uncommon, have evidently been made with impure substances. We should exceed all bounds, were we to quote examples of results, which are obviously owing to the presence of extraneous matters, although they are ascribed by Dr. Priestley to the exhibition of certain simple and homogeneous substances. All his assertions, in those cases, should evidently have been made with respect to the impurities, not the bodies, which he pretended to use. Secondly, The language of these tracts is full of discordant theory. It is indeed a most uncouth and motley assemblage of terms, taken both from the old and new nomenclature. Lastly, We must be excused for suspecting very great inaccuracy in some of the facts; or, at least, in the conduct of the experiments which are related. This may, in some of these instances, be accounted for, partly by the first, and partly by the second remark, which we have just made. But the statement in p. 3. that caustic fixed alkali was sent in a state of vapour through a tube containing iron, and gave an acidulous liquor in the receiver, is to us utterly incredible, and inexplicable, upon any supposition, but that of the grossest inaccuracy, either in making or describing the experiment. It is scarcely necessary to add, that these papers defy all attempts to analyse them, even if there were any inducement to undertake the task. The same remark may be applied to the greater number of the articles contained in this volume. We shall therefore only notice the few exceptions to this observation, which we have been fortunate enough to meet with; and at present we shall begin with what we consider as the most interesting communication that the present publication has to boast of—the short and distinct statement, given by Mr. Strickland, of the uses to which the thermometer may be applied in Navigation.

This very valuable communication consists of two well kept and concise journals, with a letter, sketching the inference that may be drawn from the observations, and a chart of the Atlantic, on which the voyages that gave rise to the observations themselves, are clearly traced. Mr. Strickland performed these two voyages across the Atlantic, in the years 1794 and 1795. The first object of his experiments was, to ascertain the existence of a current, which he suspected to flow as a branch of the gulf stream, in a northerly or north easterly direction. The observations recorded in the outward-bound journal appear fully to verify this conjecture, and they prove also the regularity with which the temperature of the sea varies, according to the proximity of soundings. We shall enable our readers to judge for themselves upon these points, by giving a summary of the most important and conclusive trials.

The temperature of the water near the Lewes island was about 56 degrees of Fahrenheit. From thence to the longitude of 11 degrees 15' west, it gradually increased; and for eleven days, during which the vessel passed through nineteen degrees of longitude, the temperature remained at 58 degrees, which is supposed by our author to be the ordinary heat of the Atlantic, above the latitude of 50 degrees in autumn. In longitude 30 degrees 43' west, the temperature suddenly rose 30 degrees, and continued to rise while the vessel passed through eight degrees of longitude; when the temperature had increased no less than 10 degrees. Again, the temperature fell in longitude 41 degrees west, and continued fluctuating between 64 and 62 of Fahrenheit. But when the vessel had made a little farther progress, the temperature rose to a still higher degree than before; and after remaining for some time at 72 degrees, it again fell, and continued falling, until, in longitude 48 degrees, the thermometer stood at 52 degrees, and the vessel was found to be on the great bank east of Newfoundland.

The subsequent observations, both in the outward and home-ward bound voyages, concur to shew that at the longitudes above-mentioned, the temperature of the seas rises and falls in the manner now described; and that on the approach of the vessel to soundings, it uniformly falls. There is a difference of no less than 20 degrees of Fahrenheit, between the temperature near the great bank, and the temperature on the edge of the gulf stream.

It appears, farther, that in that part of the vessel's course where the great rise was experienced, vast quantities of gulf weed were observed floating, and great shoals of flying fish. This circumstance greatly strengthens the first conclusion which the thermometrical observations so plainly suggest, viz. that so high as latitude 50 degrees north, a branch of the gulf stream is to be found, sent off in a northerly direction from the main body, which moves in an easterly course. But in the middle of this stream it would appear that there is some interruption; for the temperature suddenly falls, continues low for a considerable breadth, and then rises to its former height. The journal, too, makes no mention of any gulf-weed or flying fishes in this part of the course. Our author accounts for this very singular intermission of the northern branch, by supposing some colder current to flow in from the north-west. But we cannot easily conceive such a phenomenon; and are inclined to suspect Mr. Strickland of considerable inaccuracy in his ideas upon this matter. How can a stream of water be interrupted by a cross stream, or cut by such a stream at any angle? If two currents meet in an oblique angle, part of the water will be thrown back, and part, will move off in a diagonal path. But surely the continuity of one stream can never be interrupted by a new stream and then resume its former course. We can imagine the gulf stream to be divided by one flowing from the same quarter, in the very same direction: But why should this middle stream be colder than the other?—It is, on the other hand scarcely possible to figure two streams meeting in the same line, without forming an indissoluble union. Yet some phenomenon of this nature appears to be indicated by the observations, if the thermometrical experiments of our author can be relied on. Or, perhaps, a large bank, or island, divides the gulf-stream into two, protecting a large portion of the ocean in the middle of those currents. Such a supposition, indeed, appears to us the most probable of any which can be made, to account for the observations.

Before leaving Mr. Strickland's very interesting paper, we must gratify our readers with relating a fact equally honourable to both of the parties concerned in it. Mr. Strickland conceived, that the thermometer might be applied to the important purposes of indicating the approach of land, and settling the courses of the great currents. For accomplishing the latter object, he proposed the equipment of a vessel, which may be devoted to the employment of making various runs across the Atlantic, at different latitudes, with persons qualified to conduct thermometrical experiments, in the manner pointed out by the present paper. But he communicated the other part of his plan to the captain of the vessel in which he sailed; and although this gentleman very naturally entertained, at first, the strongest prepossession against all such ideas, he was soon prevailed upon, by examining the results of Mr. Strickland's observations, to give them no small degree of confidence.

He was at last, 'so much pleased with the accuracy of the thermometer, and with the security in which he had sailed in consequence of it, and so clearly perceived the advantage to be derived from it in many instances, that he declared, he would never more go to sea without one.' p. 92. 93.

This circumstance reflects great honour upon Captain Allyn, a member of that profession, which of all other, tends most to form habits of bigotry and indiscriminate prejudice against every innovation. But, at least equal praise is due to Mr. Strickland, who could succeed in convincing an old seaman, that the chart and the compass are in some cases less faithful guides than the thermometer.

The nineteenth article, appears, to us, deserving of some attention. It contains a very brief statement of a most singular fact, a fact which, if well authenticated, opens a new and curious analogy between the habitudes of the animal and vegetable kingdoms. Colonel Bull, of Virginia, a gentleman, we are told, of information and veracity, relates, that in digging through a rich bottom of low ground, well covered with oak and other trees, his workman discovered, at the depth of between five and six feet, a blossom, not in full bloom, of a lilac colour, growing from a root. This proved, upon examination, to be the same kind of blue flower that grew on the surface. But the Colonel thinks, that it must have been all along under ground, as the soil was a loamy, solid clay, in which large trees flourished, and must have taken some centuries to form. If this unexpected phenomenon, should prove to have been accurately observed, we shall possess, a case of vegetable torpor, similar to the case of animals supporting their existence in the heart of blocks and trees. Mr. Bull's account is, however, extremely meagre and unsatisfactory.

The want of refinement in the arts and in belles lettres, is by no means the only circumstance that distinguishes our kinsmen in North America, from the inhabitants of the eastern hemisphere. They appear to be proportionally deficient in scientific attainments. The volume now before us, contains the whole accumulation of American discovery and observation, during a course of peaceful years. It extends to 328 pages; of which 89 (including the valuable paper of our countryman Mr. Strickland) are contributed by foreigners; 150 consist of journals kept by a person sent to make meteorological and astronomical observations, that is, notes of the weather, and of the geographical position of certain places in the territory of the United States; the remaining 89 pages, upon more general subjects, are, we believe, the work of Americans; and we will venture to say, that of all the academical trifles, which have ever been given to the world, these 89 pages are the most trivial and dull. Our readers will judge with what difficulty this mite has been collected, when we mention the subjects of several communications.

One article, is a demonstration of the figure of the earth, in answer to the hypothesis of St. Pierre. Our readers will doubtless feel some indignation, at finding that a public scientific Body admit, into its Transactions, any communication which can, for a moment, ~~rescue~~ ^{rescue} the ridiculous effusions of the sentimentalist, now alluded to, from the contempt with which they were universally received all over Europe, by every man of the slightest pretensions to science.

Another paper, contains the description of some person's patent for improved fire places. It is exactly an ill-written newspaper advertisement. Two papers are inserted upon the culture and cure of peach trees; and, in order to eke out the natural deficiency of matter, an essay on Vegetables, Polypi, and Insects, by M. de Nemours, is admitted to occupy thirteen pages. After looking at the following extracts from this nauseous thing our readers will probably agree, with us in thinking, that no daily print, on this side of the Atlantic, would have inserted it, in the vacant space of a column, during the greatest scarcity of news. The following is the introduction:

'Il est très facile et peut-être assez naturel, à un animal aussi ravageur que l'homme, de traiter avec peu de considération les plantes qui se laissent dévorer si paisiblement.

'Cependant je ne voudrais pas avoir offensé les Roses.

'Personne n'est plus disposé que moi à croire, avec les anciens, que tout arbre est pazole, ou la prison, d'une nymphe.' p. 104.

The following is the conclusion of this paper: 'Cet oxigène dont les fleurs sont si avides, et dont elles se pénètrent si rapidement, en si énorme quantité pour leur petit volume, est l'air vital par excellence. Il les embrase, elles aiment elles jouissent—sont-ce les amours de la plante qu'elles font? sont-ce les leurs? ce sont tous les deux. La mère ne peut être entièrement insensible au bonheur de ses enfans, d'enfans qui font partie de son propre corps.—La plante est devenue papillon; ou pour mieux dire elle s'est couverte d'une foule de papillons: plantes de l'un et de l'autre sexe, qu'elle a tirés de son sein, et qui semblables presque en tout aux autres papillons, ont une vie très courte, la dépensent en voluptés sans songer à l'entretenir, exhalent leur tendresse en parfums; occupent avec délices et sans relâche de la généra-tion; et se fanent dès qu'elle est consommée laissant... au fonds d'un ovare... des œufs... fécondés et féconds.

'Trouvez vous la parité suffisamment exacte? jugez vous encore que la distance soit incommensurable entre la nymphe: ou les nymphes d'une minceur et l'aine d'un ciron.

'Je ne décide rien. Je ne suis qu'un enfant curieux. Je vous apporte les fleurs que j'ai cueillies, et les papillons que j'ai pu attrapper. Savans professeurs, dites moi ce que c'est?' p. 115. 116.

Some of the American philosophers themselves seem to have adopted the language of the ludicrously sentimental class to which the author of this singular paper belongs, and to have thought it a good substitute for the eloquence and power of fine writing which Providence has denied to their race. In p. 55, a naturalist discussing the causes of the poisonous qualities observed in some honeys, alludes to a species of erica, (we believe the erica vulgaris), by the name of 'blooming heather; and quotes Burns, in a foot note, as his authority. He afterwards talks of the bees 'quaffing of the nectar of the flowers.' p. 57. He describes certain savannas, as 'finely painted with the flowers of the kalmia angustifolia.' p. 59. Instead of tame bees, he is pleased to say 'cultivated bees' p. 65. This author (Dr. Smith Barton) is a great quoter; and by the manner in which he cites, but more especially by his remarks upon classical learning, we are inclined to suspect, that a man who reads the easier Latin poets may not be met with every day in North America.

The ancients, who, in some respects at least, were equal to the moderns, appear to have paid much attention to this subject. Virgil and Columella have both told us what plants ought to grow about apiaries. It is unnecessary to repeat, in this place, what the two Roman writers have said on the subject. The Georgics of the Mantuan poet are in the hands of every man of taste; and the work of Columella should be read, wherever agriculture engages the attention of gentlemen.' p. 69.

We cannot resist the temptation of transcribing the following passage from the same paper. The moralizing part of it is truly American; and the epithet applied to Virgil's description of Galatea, is one of the most amusing that we have ever heard beyond the sound of Bow-Bell. It is only necessary to add, for the information of the American academics, that the quotation is nothing at all to the purpose, as there is no allusion to honey from the beginning to the end of it.

'To assist, and to direct the labours of these little insects, the knowledge and the hand of man are required. Let, then, this interested being be at least attentive to his own benefits and pleasures. Let him carefully remove from about the habitations of his bees every fetid or poisonous vegetable, however comely its colour or its form. In particular, let him be careful to remove those vegetables which are noxious to himself. In place of these, let him spread the 'marjoram, and thyme, and other plants, 'the love of bees,' and his labours will be rewarded. He may, then furnish his table with a honey not inferior to that of Mount Hermetus, or Athens; nor to that of Sicily, to which Virgil has so handsomely alluded in the seventh Eclogue:

Nerine Galatæa, thymo mibi dulciore Hæle, Candidior cygnis, hedera formosior albâ.

L. 37. 38. ' p. 69. 70.

Meanly as our readers may be disposed to think of the American scientific circles, they appear to be highly prized by their own members. The Society, whose labours we have been describing, attaches to itself the name of 'Philosophical,' with peculiar eagerness; and the meeting-house, where the transactions of its members are scraped together and prepared for being inaccurately printed, is, in the genuine dialect of tradesmen, denominated 'Philosophical Hall.'

We have dwelt longer upon this article than its merits justify; not so much for the sake of the work, as for the purpose of stating and exemplifying a most curious and unaccountable fact—the scarcity of all but mercantile and agricultural talents in the New World.

SKETCH OF BUONAPARTE.
[From a late traveller.]

After having waited nearly two hours, the band playing the Marseilles Hymn, the colours preceding him, the signal was given, of the first consul's approach. Attended by his suit of general officers, he first paraded round the ranks of the infantry, who were inclosed within the rails. Then proceeding through the great central gates, where I had posted myself, so as to command almost the whole of the review, a petition was presented to him, which he returned, with mildly observing, that he should not receive any on that day. A man of diminutive stature, with a sallow, bony face, with a meditating eye, there was nothing particularly extraordinary in his countenance, and his appearance was mean. He had a pensive air, seemingly oppressed with thought, and the cares of government, and was pale, as though he dreaded assassination. He was dressed even shabbily plain, having on, with a plain cocked hat, a plain blue coat, a white waistcoat, leather breeches, and turndown boots, as well as I observed; though I was too much occupied in studying the head, to regard the details. He was mounted on a cream-coloured horse. The day that I saw Buonaparte at St. Cloud, he appeared cheerful, lively and active; but this day he looked rather gloomy. This gloom about him, perhaps, arises from too great an exertion of the mental faculties. I do not know whether it arose from the influence of his melancholy, but the whole scene was rather a dull one. It was nothing to be compared to the review of the guards by the Prince of Wales, in Hyde Park. He marched along with doubtful steps, while his seemingly exhausted soul dreaded a disaster, and trembled at the elevated situation in which he found himself placed. His situation appeared far from enviable, and I could not help thinking it quite strange and unnatural.

Non equidem invidio, miror magis.

SKETCH OF ABRAHAM TUCKER, ESQUIRE.

[For our own sake, as well as from a hope, that it may interest the most venerable of our friends, we have turned over many pages of biography, to discover some sketch of the author of "The Light of Nature Pursued," one of the most original books to be found in the English language, or perhaps in any language. Our researches, though long and frequent, have afforded but very imperfect information. The following is all which, at present, can be found respecting a man of wonderful genius, who united the jarring powers of Reason and Fancy, in a manner as beautiful as it is rare.]

Abraham Tucker, Esquire, a curious and original thinker, was a gentleman of affluent fortune, and author of "The Light of Nature Pursued," 9 vols. octavo, of which the five first volumes were published by himself in 1768, under the assumed name of 'Edward Search, Esquire,' and the four last after his death, in 1777, as "The Posthumous Work of Abraham Tucker, Esq. published from his manuscript, as intended for the press by the author." Mr. Tucker lived at Betchworth castle, near Dorking, in Surrey, an estate which he purchased in the early part of his life. He married the daughter of Edward Barker, Esquire, by whom he had two daughters, one of whom married Sir Henry St. John, and died in his lifetime; the other survived, and now lives at Betchworth castle. He lost his eyesight a few years before his death, which happened in 1775. To describe him as a neighbour, landlord, father, and magistrate, it would be necessary to mention the most amiable qualities in each. It is unnecessary to add, that he was very sincerely regretted by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, and who stood connected with him in any of those relations.

ON THE PECULIAR HAPPINESS SUPPOSED TO ATTEND A LIFE OF CONTEMPLATION

[From a British Essayist]

"I no sooner enter my library," says Heinsius, "than I bolt the door, and shut out lust, ambition, and avarice, whose mother is idleness, and whose nurse, ignorance; and taking my seat among the illustrious spirits around me, I look down with pity on the rich and great, who are strangers to such refined and exalted enjoyments."

If a life of study can produce happiness so pure as Heinsius has described; if it can exclude lust, ambition, and avarice; if it can give an elevation above the rich and great; who would not fly from the world and seize that CHIEF GOOD, in the recess of his library, which he has vainly toiled for in the road of ambition and avarice?

But no recess is sufficiently retired, no occupation sufficiently pure, to exclude care and contamination. Man bears within his bosom, where-soever he conceals himself, and whatsoever he does, the seeds of evil and misery.

Philosophers may describe the happiness of contemplative life, and students flatter themselves that they are out of the reach of corruption; but does experience justify a persuasion that philosophers and students are happier and more innocent than all others? A perusal of their lives will evince the truth, that it is not in man to secure himself from the assaults of passion, and the corruption of vice, by withdrawing his person from the society of the multitude. Volumes have been written on the peculiar misery of the learned, and I wish it could be asserted with truth, that on shutting the doors of their book rooms, they at the same time shut out desire, avarice, and ambition.

Men of that activity of mind which ranges through all nature and art, see more clearly, and feel more sensibly, than the common tribe whose attention is fixed on the passing scene. All the objects of desire, avarice, and ambition, exhibit themselves to their eyes, in the most glowing colours and in the most engaging forms. Their taste, cultivated and refined by continual exercise of its powers, is enabled to discover charms which escape vulgar notice. Their leisure and freedom from the ordinary cares of life, cause their hearts to fix on what their imaginations have admired. It cannot be wondered at, therefore, if contemplative men, instead of being exempt from the tumults which disturb others, have felt themselves agitated by external things with peculiar force. Their enjoyments have been high, their sufferings keen, and their failings singularly deplorable.

I fear, therefore, that truth must resign those pretensions to that unmolested felicity, which students have sometimes claimed, as the privilege of their learned solitude. In common with all the sons of men they partake of misery; and they are under some peculiar circumstances, which aggravate the woe which it is their destiny to share.

To secure the happiness that is allowed to man, they must, like others, have recourse to virtue and wisdom, not merely to retreat, or to contemplation. With virtue and wisdom, I believe, their employments will be found highly conducive to a most exalted state of sublimity; for their employments are pure and refined, intellectual and even heavenly, compared with the gross delights of animal sense. He who places his happiness in gluttony and debauchery, must acknowledge, while he boasts of his pleasure, that he is renouncing the most honourable part of his nature, his reason; and that he is assimilating himself; as much as he is able, with the brutes whom he proudly disdains.

I cannot help thinking, that the platonic philosophy, mixed, as it is, with much folly, deserves more regard than it usually receives. It tends to make man value himself on his MIND. It teaches to seek enjoyment in the exertions of the discursive faculty, and to aspire at an intellectual excellence, which, though it may never reach, invites by its beautiful appearance, to heights of improvements which it would never otherwise have attained. Platonism, when carried to extremes, like all other doctrines, terminates in nonsense; but under the regulation of reason, it leads the mind to a state of celestial enjoyment and angelic perfection.

Happy would it have been for the contemplative part of mankind, if the honours which are almost universally allowed to Epicurus, had been reserved for Plato. Christian and rational Platonism leads to the perfection of the human soul: nor should the scrupulous be ashamed of uniting with Christianity, a philosophy, which, when its extremes are avoided, is all pure, all spiritual, all divine in its nature and tendency.

If the superior light of Christianity had not irradiated the world, there is no philosophy which the aspirant after excellence would wish to prevail in preference to Platonism, divested of its visionary eccentricities. No philosophy contributes so much to raise man to the exaltation which he may conceive to adorn a spiritual nature. No philosophy exalts him so much above the body, and furnishes him with ideas so congenial to all that we consider as celestial.

But common sense, and common experience, affirm, after all, that whoever attempts to reach undisturbed happiness by flights of contemplation above the usual ken of mortals, commonly finds himself precipitated at last, like Icarus in the fable.

Superior degrees of happiness are not to be expected solely from a skill in arts and sciences from study, and from retirement; but chiefly from those virtues, and good qualities, in which even the illiterate find it, from prudence, temperance, justice, fortitude, and contentment. The boast of felicity without these is but the rant of pride, and the rhapsody of inexperienced speculation.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

ODES FROM ANACREON.

The two following odes, which, as Mr. Moore remarks, may be called companion-pictures, have perhaps never been excelled in their kind, in any language. At the same time that we are charmed with the fire and fancy of the poet, and the melody of his numbers, we are gratified with an insight into the taste of the ancients in beauty.

Thou, whose soft and rosy hues
Mimick form, and soul infuse;
Best of painters! come, portray
The lovely maid, that's far away;
Far away, my soul! thou art;
But I've thy beauties all by heart.
Paint her jetty ringlets straying,
Silky twine in tendrils playing;
And, if painting hath the skill,
To make the spicy balm distil,
Let every little lock exhale
A sigh of perfume on the gale.
Where her tresses' curly flow
Darkles o'er the brow of snow,
Let her forehead beam to light,
Burnish'd as the ivory bright.
Let her eyebrows sweetly rise
In jetty arches o'er her eyes,
Gently in a crescent gliding,
Just commingling, just dividing.
But hast thou any sparkles warm,
The lightning of her eyes to form?
Let them effuse the azure ray,
With which Minerva's glances play.

And give them all that liquid fire
 That Venus' languid eyes inspire.
 O'er her nose and cheeks be shed
 Flushing white and mellow'd red;
 Gradual tints, as when there glows
 In snowy milk the bashful rose.
 Then her lip, so rich in blisses,
 Sweet petitioner for kisses!
 Pouting nest of bland persuasion,
 Ripely suing love's invasion
 Then beneath the velvet chin,
 Whose dimple shades a love within,
 Mould her neck, with grace descending,
 In a heaven of beauty ending;
 While airy charms above, below,
 Sport and flutter on its snow.
 Now let a floating, lucid veil
 Shadow her limbs, but not conceal;
 A charin may peep, a hue may beam,
 And leave the rest to Fancy's dream.
 Enough—'tis she! 'tis all I seek:
 It glows, it lives, it soon will speak!

And now, with all thy pencil's truth,
 Portray Bathyllus, lovely youth!
 Let his hair, in lapses bright,
 Fall like streaming rays of light;
 And there the raven's dye confuse
 With the yellow sunbeam's hues.
 Let not the braid, with artful twine,
 The flowing of his locks confine;
 But loosen every golden ring,
 To float upon the breeze's wing.
 Beneath the front of polish'd glow,
 Front as fair as mountain snow,
 And guileless as the dews of dawn,
 Let the majestic brows be drawn,
 Of ebon dies enrich'd by gold,
 Such as the scaly snakes unfold,
 Mingle in his jetty glances,
 Power that awes, and love that trances;
 Steal from Venus bland desire,
 Steal from Mars the look of fire,
 Blend them in such expression here,
 That we by turns may hope and fear!
 Now from the sunny apple seek
 The velvet down that spreads his cheek;
 And there let beauty's rosy ray
 In flying blushes richly play;
 Blushes of that celestial flame,
 Which lights the cheek of virgin shame.
 Then for his lips that ripely gem—
 But let thy mind imagine them!
 Paint, where the ruby cell uncloses
 Persuasion, sleeping upon roses;
 And give his lip that speaking air,
 As if a word was hovering there;
 His neck of ivory splendor trace,
 Moulded with soft, but manly grace;
 Fair as the neck of Paphia's boy,
 Where Paphia's arms have hung in joy.
 Give him the winged Hermes' wand,
 With which he waves his snake wand;
 Let Bacchus then the breast supply,
 And Leda's son the sinew / thigh.
 But oh! suffuse his limbs of fire
 With all that glow of young desire,
 Which kindles, when the wishful sigh
 Steals from the heart, unconscious why.
 Thy pencil, though divinely bright,
 Is envious of the eye's delight,
 Or its enamour'd touch would shew
 His shoulder, fair as sunless snow,
 Which now in veiling shadow lies,
 Remov'd from all but Fancy's eyes.
 Now, for his feet—but hold—fear—
 I see a godlike portrait there;
 So like Bathyllus!—sure there's none
 So like Bathyllus, but the sun!
 Oh! let this pictur'd god be mine,
 And keep the boy from Samos's shrine!

† —But hold—fear—
 I see a godlike portrait there—[Ec.] This is very spirited, but requires explanation. While the artist is pursuing the portrait of Bathyllus, Anacreon, we must suppose, turns round, and sees a picture of Apollo, which was intended for an altar at Samos; he instantly tells the painter to cease his work—that this picture will serve for Bathyllus—and that, when he goes to Samos, he may make an Apollo of the portrait of the boy which he had begun.

"Bathyllus," says Madame Dacier, "could not be more elegantly praised, and this one passage does him more honour, than the statue, however beautiful it might be, which Polycrates raised to him."

Phoebus shall then Bathyllus be,
 Bathyllus then the deity.

THE EMBARRASMENTS OF FALSE SHAMF.

A London taylor, as 'tis said,
 By buckram, canvas, tape and thread,
 Sleeve, linings, pockets, silk, and twist,
 And the long expensive list,
 With which their uncouth bills abound,
 Though rarely in the garment found;
 By these and other arts in trade,
 Had soon a pretty fortune made;
 And did what few had ever done,
 Left thirty thousand to his son.

The son, a gay young swagg'ring blade,
 Abhor'd the very name of trade,
 And lest reflections should be thrown
 On him, resolv'd to quit the town,
 And travel where he was not known.
 In gilded coach, and liv'ries gay;
 To Oxford first he took his way:
 There beaux and belles his taste admire,
 His equipage and rich attire;
 But nothing was so much ador'd,
 As his fine silver-hilted sword;
 Though short and small, 'twas vastly neat,
 The sight was deem'd a perfect treat.
 Beau Banter begg'd to have a look,
 But when the sword in hand he took,
 He swore by Gad it was an odd thing,
 And look'd much like a taylor's bodkin.
 His pride was hurt by this expression,
 Thinking they knew his sire's profession.
 Sheathing his sword, he sneak'd away,
 And drove for Glo'ster that same day,
 There soon he found new cause for grief;
 For, dining on some fine roast beef,
 One ask'd him which he did prefer,
 Some cabbage or a cucumber?
 The purse-proud coxcomb took the hint,
 Thought it severe reflection meant;
 His stomach turn'd, he could not eat,
 And so made an ungenteel retreat;
 Next day left Glo'ster in a wrath,
 And bade his coachman drive to Bath.
 There unsuspected fresh abuse,
 Because the dinner was roast goose:
 And that he might no more be jeer'd,
 Next day to Exeter he steer'd.
 There with some bucks he drank about,
 Until he fear'd they found him out:
 His glass not fill'd, as was the rule,
 They said 'twas not a thimble full:
 The name of thimble was enough—
 He paid his reckoning, and went off.
 He then to Plymouth took a trip,
 And put up at the Royal Ship,
 Which then was kept by Caleb Snip.
 "Snip!" "Snip!" the host was often call'd,
 At which his guest was so much gall'd,
 That soon to Cambridge he remov'd,
 There too he unsuccessful prov'd:
 For though he fill'd his glass or cup,
 He did not always drink it up.
 The scholars mark'd how he behav'd,
 And said a remnant shan't be sav'd;
 The name of remnant gall'd him so,
 That he resolv'd to York to go:
 There fill'd his bumper to the top,
 And always fairly drank it up:
 "Well done," says Jack, a buck of York,
 "You go through stitch, Sir, with your work."
 The name of stitch was such reproach,
 He rang the bell, and call'd his coach.
 But ere he went, inquiries made,
 By what strange means they knew his trade.

"You put the cap on, and it fits."
 Replied one of the Yorkshire wits:
 "Our words in common acceptation,
 Could not find out your occupation;
 'Twas you yourself gave us the clue,
 To find out both your trade and you.
 Vain coxcombs and fantastic beaux,
 In every place themselves expose,
 They travel far at vast expence,
 To shew their wealth and want of sense;
 But take this for a standing rule,
 There's no disguise can screen a fool."

SINGULAR ADVERTISEMENT.

Mr. George Martin, an American, having, by a sedulous attention to his profession, acquired a knowledge in boot and shoe making, proposes on Wednesday, September 5th, at Mr. Ellis's tavern, to exhibit to the inspection of the public, a boot of his own workmanship, which has four feet, one leg, one heel, with a bell in the centre, made on a wooden last, without any apparent sign how or where the last and tree were taken out. He will also exhibit a shoe, without any seam or opening, which will puzzle the most penetrating eye to discover the aperture out of which the last was taken. He will also exhibit a specimen of his common wearing work, which is far superior to any imported. All the above have been examined by several gentlemen in Boston and its vicinity, before the tree and last were taken therefrom, and acknowledged it to have been the greatest curiosity of the kind they had ever seen; no alterations have since been made. The public may be assured there is no paste, glue, or cement of any kind used.

He will also perform on the SLACK ROPE, various evolutions; displaying feats of activity in a workman-like manner: viz. he will work on a turn pump in seven different positions. Mr. Martin does not wish to be considered a rope-dancer or a tumbler—his only aim is to procure a small pittance to enable him to set up his business, and furnish to his fellow-citizens the neatest boots and shoes that can be made. [Eastern paper.]

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The article from the Edinburgh Review, deriding the 'Philosophical Hall' of Philadelphia, is a proof of the unexampled severity, with which either old offenders, or youthful trespassers are castigated in that Journal. But it would be invidious to suppose that the 'satiric thong' is brandished over the Americans alone; for the wounded vanity of many a British sufferer still tingles with the smart of the scourge. While we do homage to the genius, wit, and erudition of the gentlemen and scholars, who thus keenly reviewing the literature of the age, contemptuously trample the trash of an hour, we must affirm, with a confidence justified by truth, that they err, respecting the total penury of talents in America. We are not without eloquent orators and sagacious statesmen; and though a taste for classical learning is by no means general, yet there are some men, in this new world, who keep aloof from the frantic follies of their countrymen; and, studious of Roman and British models, unite, with the Caledonian spirit, and the honour of the Highlands, an ardent zeal for a purer literature, than what the barbarian, the republican, the fanatic, or the new philosopher can supply.

We hail the return of "CLIMENOLE." His wish shall be a law to the Editor. We invite the communications of this learned correspondent, and respectfully request that, if it be practicable, he would furnish us with a satire every week. To gratify the impatience of the public and the Editor, as well as to prevent abruption, or incorrectness in the printing, it is desirable that several essays be forwarded at once.

"The BRITISH SPY" has a ready insertion. We must enjoin it upon the ingenious author, to furnish us, as soon as possible, with the continuation of the series. He is now pledged to periodical punctuality.

"FLORIAN" does not keep his promise. We hope he will soon oblige us with the stipulated speculations.

Why does "ITHACUS" linger by the turbulent Falls of Niagara, or mope under the mournful yews of the wilderness? Such a spirit as his should slum, with loathing, every savage scene, and seek the society of the wits and the belles.

The "RURAL WANDERER" is received, and welcomed.

Would you know where Freedom dwells?
Where jovial hearts carouse and sing;
Haunt these grotts, explore these cells,
Here every subject is a king.

Sprightly Mirth inhabits here,
And Joy, that knows no listless pause;
For how should we dull mortals fear,
Who square our lives by Pleasure's laws

What's Fortune? Is it Chance, or Worth?
Peasant and prince their race must run,
Nor is there that poor spot on earth,
But's cherish'd by the genial sun.

SONG.

Like a very gallant, I will compliment all,
I'll leer and ogle the pretty,
Tell the short ones they're neat, the majestic,
they're tall,
And call all the homely ones witty.

Thus, agreeable falsehood passing for truth,
I shall tickle their vanity snugly,
Talk of prudence to age, and of pleasure to youth,
And console with a fortune the ugly.

To the pale I'll on delicate lilies begin,
To the florid I'll hold forth on roses,
Call squinting a leaf; find a smile in a grin,
And proportion, where chins kiss with noses.
Thus, agreeable falsehood, &c.

SONG.

Truly, friend Gil, thou choosest well,
Taking a helpmate homely,
For ofttime sad tales they tell
Of wives, who are too comely.

But cheer thee, Perez, and be gay,
From furnish'd brows exempted,
For how can she e'er go astray,
Who never will be tempted?

For thieves do never rob the poor,
A pebble's not a jewel,
Fruits do not blossom on a moor,
Fire burns not without fuel.

Up with thy heart then, Gil, be gay,
From furnish'd brows exempted,
Thy wife can never go astray,
For she will ne'er be tempted.

SONG.

Come, every man, now give his toast,
Fill up the glass, I'll tell you mine,
Wine is the mistress I love most;
This is my toast—now give me thine.

Well said, my lad, ne'er let it stand
I give my Chloe, nymph divine,
May Love and Wine go hand in hand;
This is my toast—now give me thine.

Ammen. I give my wife, d'ye see;
May all, to make her blest, combine,
So she be far enough from me—
This is my toast—now give me thine.

Let constant lovers, at the feet
Of pale fac'd wench, sigh and pine,
For me, the first kind girl I meet,
Shall be my toast—now give me thine.

You toast your wife, and you your lass,
My boys, and welcome; here's the wine,
For my part, he who fills my glass,
Shall be my toast—now give me thine.

Spirit, my lads, and toast away:
I have still one with yours to join,
That we may have enough to pay,
This is my toast—now give me thine.

SONG.

[The ensuing verses by Dibdin, contain a very exquisite compliment to Beauty, and a very pleasing sally of invention.]

Devoted to Celia, and blest in her arms,
How I thril'd with delight, as I ran o'er her charms,
When I thought—on each grace as I gaz'd with surprise,
For pre-eminence pleaded her mouth and her
eyes;
Like counsel this open'd, and t' other replied,
Appealing to me, as the judge, to decide.

Her mouth, opening sweetly, thus said with a smile,
'Tis I who the torments of lovers beguile;
I can speak, I can sing, I can vent the fond sigh,
And vain may eyes promise, if I should deny;
Then while rows of pearl, vermil lips sweetly hide,
On our different charms 'twere not hard to decide.'

With ineffable sweetness, while looking me through,
Her eyes careless cry'd—'Why I can speak too,
And in such charming language, so made to controul,
That of sensible lovers it goes to the soul:
Mouths may fib; but eyes to the heart are the guide,
'Twere no difficult task on our charms to decide.'

Transported with rapture, I cried with an oath,
'Charming eyes, charming mouth, I'm in love with you both;
To express your sweet influence no language
has terms,
One makes me a promise, which t'other confirms;
Your words and your looks are my joy and my pride,
On your different claims then how can I decide?'

[The following song by Dibdin, and sung by a hackney coachman, in character, will divert the reader, by the quaintness of that London slang, merrily styled St.
Giles's Greek.]

Here I am, my good masters, my name's Teddy Clinch,
My cattle are sound, and I drives to an inch;
From Hyde Park to White Chapel, I well know
the town,
And many's the time I've took up, and set down;
In short, in the bills I'll be bound for't there's not
A young youth, who, like Teddy, can tip the long trot.

Oh the notions of life that I see from my box,
While flats of all kinds are about me in flocks:
The sot whom I drive home, to sleep out the
day,
The kind one, who plies for a fare at the play,
Or your gents of the law, there, who, four in a lot,
To Westminster hall I oft tip the long trot.

My coach receives all, like the gallows or sea;
So I touch but my fare, you know all's one to me;
The men of the gown and the men of the sword,
A ma'am or a gambler, a rogue, or a lord;

To wherever you're going I well kow the spot,
And do you tip a tizzy, I'll tip the long trot.

[Joshua Sylvester, the translator of Du Bartas, in his Ode to Astrea, has sometimes quaintly, but oftentimes naturally described a lover's admiration of the beauty of his mistress.]

'Tis not for thy beauteous eyes,
Though the brightest lamp in skies,
In his highest summer shine,
Seems a spark, compar'd with thine.
'Tis not, beauty's empress,
The amber ringlets of thy tress,
Curling to the wanton wind,
That so fast my freedom bind;
'Tis not all the dews ambrosial,
Of those pretty lips so rosial,
Make me humble at thy feet.
Though the purest honey sweet,
That the muses' birds do bring
To mount Hybla, every spring,
Nothing near so pleasant is,
As thy lively, lovely kiss;
'Tis not, O my Paradise,
Thy forehead evener than ice,
Though the silver moon be fain,
Still by night to mount her wain,
Fearing to sustain disgrace,
If by day she met thy face:
'Tis not, maid, thine ivory neck
Makes me worship at thy beck;
Nor that pretty double hill
Of thy bosom panting still;
Though no fairest Leda's swan,
Nor no sleekest marble can
Be so smooth or white in show,
As thy lilies and thy snow;
'Tis not all the rest beside,
Which thy modest veil doth hide;
Though Diana being bare,
Not Leucothoe, passing rare,
In the chrystal flowing springs,
Never bath'd so beauteous things.
'Tis a something more divine,
'Tis that peerless soul of thine;
'Tis thine all-admired wit,
Thy sweet grace and gesture fit,
Thy mild pleasing courtesie,
Makes the triumph over me,
And for thy fair soul's respect,
I love the rosin flames that reflect
From thy bright translucent eyes,
And thy golden hair likewise,
And those orient pearly rocks,
Which thy lightning smile unlocks,
And the nectar-passing blisses
Of thy honey-sweeter kisses,
And thy fresh and rosy cheeks,
Whence Aurora blushes seeks,
And the snow-exceeding skin
Of thy neck and dimpled chin,
And thy pure and lily hand,
Soft, and smooth, and tender, and
Those five nimble brethren small,
Arm'd with pearl shell helmets all,
And those ivory marble mounts,
Either, neither, both at once,
For I dare not touch to know
If they be of flesh, or no.

THE BRITISH SPY IN BOSTON.

LETTER III.

IN my last, I was induced to give you, my dear S—, a full length drawing of the "GIANT OF THE LAW," to trace the bold and distinct features of his character with precision, and possibly with presumption. The American world having given him no adequate competitor, and his native town, though rich in legal ability, viewing him as the only oracle of professional knowledge, I have been assiduous in marking and comparing him, in my mind's eye, to all that I have known clever, or extraordinary at home.

But among the many honourable properties of his character, perhaps that of his LEARNING ought to have been considered as the most transcendent, since in America it is the most rare, while in that, and in every country, where the people is free, and enlightened, where the laws are written, and may be understood, an accurate knowledge of those laws must constitute the first and greatest attribute of their professors. The poetic glow of imagination, the fine scintillations of wit, the rapidity of perception and the ingenuity of a discriminating judgment, are as nothing, without the rich and solid foundation of law-reading. It is this, which constitutes the profession, intitling its possessor to the denomination of A LAWYER. We expect every artist to have studied the theory and principles of his art, and shall that calling, which implies the greatest supremacy of mind, be least understood, and most superficially acquired? Wherever the question shall be brought to the test between the natural brilliancy of what is termed genius, and the ascendancy of acquirement, directed by good sense, it is most certain, that the event will decide the principle. In Mr. Parsons, I have found all in an eminent degree united, and conspicuous, and thence have given more time to his delineation, than any single subject had a right to command. Of what remain, a sketch must answer, since the multitude of heads, that constitute the original group before me, will not admit time, for each, to have a full length, neither to be finished with all the nice touches of correct colouring.

After much inquiry, and great attention given to the pretensions of his brethren, I have considered Harrison Gray Otis, as entitled to the next rank, and as having in Boston no superior, except that great man, who has no equal. Mr. Otis is, in age, under forty, and consequently among the youngest of those, who have professional eminence; and to such, as expect wisdom to be derived from grey hairs, his introduction will be considered premature and indecorous. But, holding the precedent of talent beyond that of seniority, Harrison Gray Otis is, in my judgment, next entitled to our animadversions. Many years since, in the early youth of this gentleman, before his judgment was ripened, and ere his talents had obtained maturity, charmed by the brilliancy of powers, that gave the promise of growing greatness, his native district elected him to represent them at the national legislature. The result of this choice disappointed expectation. Mr. Otis was rivalled and excelled by two men of the same profession, and from the same county, who, greatly his seniors in age, are considered, in some points, rather his inferiors at the bar. These were Samuel Dexter and Fisher Ames; men, distinguished and honoured for rare and respectable qualities, and whom I shall thence take a future opportunity of introducing to your acquaintance. The young Mr. Otis, when in Congress, was much too juvenile for the station, in which he stood, classed with, and in opposition to some of the proudest talents, and the best learning of the Union: consequently, less formidable to his opponents, and less applauded by his constituents, than a proper consciousness of his own powers must have convinced him, were justly his due. Whence, having been twice chosen by a flattering majority, he declined a re-election, and returned to the duties of his profession, it seems, with a determination to recover that ascendancy, which had been incidentally wrested from his genius. In this, he was successful; for Nature had done much to insure him the victory, in giving him a fair, open countenance, a fascinating smile, a graceful address, and a voice of melody, better attuned by himself, to the varied modifications of the mind, with less localism of tones and pronunciation, than any of his brethren. Clear, distinct, and forcible, his extempore speaking has an irresistible charm, and leaves his hearers more delighted, if not better instructed, than any voice I have heard in New England. In law knowledge he is, at present, neither overflowing nor deficient, and is every day adding, by his industry, to his already respectable acquisitions. More than any of his associates at the bar, is he animated in argument, and successful in the pathos of personal appeal. Qualities, such as these, have necessarily acquired him great individual influence; and being a favourite member of the state legislature every competitor was distanced, and the Federal party united to a man, in conferring upon him the distinguished honour of the speaker's chair. This he has, in effect, graced and dignified. Prompt, lucid, and generally impartial, his deportment is fitted to soften the rancour of party animosity, and his smile to conciliate the virulence of opposition. Possibly, his refinement may sometimes appear to border upon finesse, and the polished benevolence of his accent to degenerate into adulation, by which he seems to neglect proper discrimination; and, resembling the greater light in the firmament of heaven, permits the kind glance of his eye to shine equally upon the good and upon the evil. Still, the most enthusiastic of his many friends and admirers, consider the speaker's chair as the prelude to a more exalted station, even that of chief magistrate to the state, since the present worthy and unassuming, but unsocial and unpatronizing character, who presides, is said to be wearied with a rank, uncongenial with the humility of his temper, and inauspicious to the retirement of his habits.

Mr. Otis is rich, liberal, and hospitable; his house appears to be the abode of social elegance, and the temple of domestic happiness: whence his political adherents are found to be his personal friends. His virtues, his talents, and his manners, uniting the general suffrage of respect, with the more irresistible claim of merited affection.

A REVIEW POLITICAL AND LITERARY.

No. 12.

Memorabilia Democratica, or the history of democracy. Containing a full and true account of that venerable science; interspersed with anecdotes, characters, and speeches, of eminent democrats, ancient and modern. Ornamented with thirty engravings of American democrats. By SLAVESLAP KIDNAP, Esq. Foolscap 2 vols. 4to. pp. 1651.

Washington—Printed by Samuel H. Smith, for Duane and Cheetham, and Adams, and F. Blake, proprietors of the work.

It is a cause of great regret to me, that I cannot accompany the future criticisms of Mr. Kidnap, on Mr. Jefferson's philosophical works, as I have done his former, with transcripts, at length, of the essays, on which he remarks. This method is no longer practicable. The works, which he now proceeds to notice, are too long and laborious, to be displayed, at large, in the narrow limits of a weekly publication. I shall content myself, therefore, with laying before the public, those extracts and references, which Mr. Kidnap makes, in the course of his observations. Those, who desire to see these essays, in all their bulk, must submit to the task of prying open, for themselves, the heavy quartos of the American Philosophical Society. On this account, as well as on others, I lament extremely, that the proposal, made by one of its most intelligent members, did not prevail in that body; and which was, to publish their "Transactions," in the form and size of "three penny gifts for children." Certainly, such a plan would have promoted, in a high degree, that darling project of this society; a design as laudable as it is feasible, and which is known by the name of "A universal diffusion of knowledge." For, it is easy to perceive that no science, in this American world, receives such universal and ready encouragement, as that which is, at once, cheap, and within a narrow compass. These two qualities, indeed, coincide very exactly with the extent both of the puruses and the minds of most of our great men; whether commoners or philosophers. Concerning which two last-mentioned concomitants, I have observed, they are, for the most part, inseparable, in American greatness. For it has been my lot, to find very few men, whose puruses were not always in their minds; unless it were those, who are, perhaps, full as numerous, whose minds are never out of their puruses. Had the proposal of this member, in relation to the form and size of the "Transactions," succeeded, it would have been, undoubtedly, attended with the happiest effects. For, in the first place, those sage philosophers, of three and four years old, by that frequent attrition, which their habits of severe investigation never fail to make them bestow on works, submitted to their inspection, would have occasioned, in due time, a call for a second edition of those invaluable labours. An event, which, under the existing discouragements of size and unwieldy matter, is, now, never likely to happen. In the next place, inasmuch as these infant philosophers are very apt to squabble among themselves, and make the neighbourhood ring, with their clamours, about the works, put into their hands, it is, also, very likely, that, in such case, the labours of this society would, before this time, have made some noise in the world. A consequence, which, however desirable, has never yet followed them. Mankind being, and always having been, in relation to them, in a most quiescent and indifferent state; and so are likely forever, hereafter, to continue. I know, that it was objected to this proposal, when it was made, that the communications of the members of this association would be, probably, of a higher order of subjects, and in a more exquisite style of execution, than would suit with the capacities of the literati of the cradle and nursery; and that on this account, chiefly, it was rejected. I cannot wonder, that such an objection should prevail within the circle of that society; as, I have observed, men are generally inclined to set an undue value upon their own literary, as well as natural offspring. But, without it, an objection, of such a nature, could not possibly have been of any weight; inasmuch as, it cannot be denied, that by far the greater number of their publications are entirely upon a level, both in matter and style, with those celebrated philosophical transactions, which are circulated, under the names of "Jack the Giant Killer," "Mother Goose's Melody," and other high-sounding titles. From actual experiment, I have found Mr. Heckelwelder's story of "the grasshoppers and ninekiller," as recorded in the 124th page of the fourth volume of the works of that society, an excellent substitute for those interesting narratives, "There was a frog lived in a well;" and "Who killed Cock Robin?" That dreadful account of the unknown, and unseen animal, in Mr. Jefferson's Memoir, page 253, of the same volume, "whose roaring resembled thunder," and "whose eyes were like two balls of fire," is also, both in sentiment and in adaptation to the capacities of infants, not a whit behind, and certainly equal, in point of authenticity, to that terrible story of "The wolf and Little Red Riding Hood." Indeed, the association is so natural, and the likeness so strong between these two famous histories, that my little boy, a child of three years old, never reads this memoir, by Mr. Jefferson, but he involuntarily stops, at the words, "two balls of fire," and exclaims, "Oh! Grand-mama, what two great eyes you've got." As to Dr. Barton's Memoir on Amphibia, and that heroic hunt, to which he and Mr. Peale submitted, after "frozen rattlesnakes in the winter," all for the sake of science and of memoir-writing, it is so entirely that species of philosophy, in which children's fancies delight, that I have never known them tired with its perusal. His happy talent at description, and that rare accomplishment of amplification in details, which has enabled him to spin out an account of a very trifling pursuit into a story of twenty quarto pages in length, are doubtless the causes of that preference, which these young philosophers show for his labours, and which I shall hereafter have occasion more particularly to notice. I know of nothing more terrible, either in ancient or modern history, than that narration of his encounter with the rattlesnake, which makes a part of his memoir, and is told in the 376th page of the volume. It is, in truth, an union of two of the most remarkable adventures of Hercules;—that with the hydra, and that with the poisoned shirt. For, he tells us, though with more circumlocution, that, with his left hand, he seized a wounded and frozen rattlesnake by the throat, and squeezing open its mouth, with scissors, in his right, he cut into its jaws, when, mirabilia dictu! "two or three drops of venom flew out on his finger!" Oh! Modern Philosophy—quid non mortalia pectora cogis?

Having thus brought this masterly digression to a happy conclusion, according to the most approved rules of modern discipline, I now return, with infinite delight, to extract from Mr. Kiddnap's chapter on Mr. Jefferson's philosophical works.

"The next subject, on which Mr. Jefferson's genius is exercised, and which the immortal works of the Philosophical Society preserve, is one, entirely suited to his taste, and, in every respect, adapted to the comprehension of his mind. It commences in the 246th page of the volume before quoted, and is intitled, "A Memoir on the discovery of certain Bones of a Quadrumed, of the clawed kind in the Western parts of Virginia: by Thomas Jefferson, Esquire."

It will tend to throw some light upon this essay, and explain the exultation, which Mr. Jefferson, in the whole course of it, discovers, on account of its subject, if I relate an anecdote, which was told to me during my residence, in the spring of 1795, near the place of that great man's nativity, and which was universally circulated in that neighbourhood. It was said that Mr. Jefferson's mother, when she was big with our philosopher, dreamed, that she was brought to bed of "a femur," and "an ulna," crossed after the manner of those bones, on tombstones. The good lady was greatly disturbed at this vision, and could have no rest, until she had consulted all the fortune-tellers, in that part of the country, upon its prognostic. Their predictions, however, were little satisfactory. For, notwithstanding all agreed that the child, with which she was pregnant, would, some how or other, have a singular affinity with bones, each had a different opinion, as to the mode, in which this connexion would take place. It was said, by the first to whom she applied, that he would be a great conqueror, and, like Alexander or Caesar, raise a great monument to his glory, by the bones of those he had slain in battle. But, as there was no death's head in the vision, this soon yielded to milder interpretations. The next person, of whom she inquired, answered, that he would be either a great surgeon, or a great farrier; but which, it was beyond his art to divine. A third thought it was pretty plain he would be a sexton. And a fourth had no doubt at all that he would be an excellent hangman; one of whose perquisites is, usually, the skeleton of the convict. I could not, however, learn, that during infancy or childhood, he gave any signs of an extraordinary genius, in the direction which the dream seemed to indicate. It is true, when a boy, he was very fond of picking bones; but, whether it was from an appetite for the integuments, or a desire to view the periosteum, Mr. Jefferson himself assured me he was never able to determine. He was a youth of a very quiet and peaceable demeanour, shunning turbulent "arenas," and amusing himself, a thing not uncommon with boys, at his age, with collecting the skeletons of such animals, as came in his way. There was nothing, however, so remarkable, in this conduct, as to render a vision necessary to be a precursor of his eminence. It is true, he had, before he arrived at manhood, preserved, in a state, nearly perfect, the skeletons of a mouse, (mus Americanus) two kittens, (felis domesticus) and a bull-frog, (rana ocellata). He had, besides, the cranium of a monkey, the vertebrae of a boar, and the os sacrum and os coccygis of a goat. In addition to which, his ornithological collections were extensive. I recollect well that his art of putting together geese, and making them move at his election, was much celebrated. Having also, by means of his intimacy with the cook, the reversion of the poultry, which was eaten in the family, he had a rare exhibition of chicken's skeletons; all perfect, except in one particular, and in this, all were deficient. A circumstance, very extraordinary, and worthy of record, as it displays, in a strong point of view, the prevailing instincts of this great man. For notwithstanding his love of science, and his anxiety for a perfect chicken skeleton, he never could bring himself to look at the drum-stick; his natural antipathy to the instrument, whose name it bears, and his terrors at that "bloody arena," in which it is so principal an agent, was so great, that he always fell into convulsions, at the sight, which all his philosophy could not conquer. Doubtless, this antipathy and this instinct are, also, the sources of those two prudential maxims, which have been the pole-stars of his life, and which he has thus beautifully expressed; "Never break my bones on any account;" and, "It is the first inquiry of a wise man, how to save his bones."

I thought it proper to state these circumstances, inasmuch as they tend to justify Mr. Jefferson's own interpretation of his mother's vision, when he came at full age; and which was, that he was destined to be—A GREAT OSTEOLOGIST. In consequence of which he set up, after having served a due apprenticeship, the trade of a philosopher, and at the same time that he was willing to be thought attentive to the other branches of the business, he really bent his whole mind to the department of bones. At first he had no other stock to trade upon, but what was common to the whole company of philosophers: but, by the discovery, and appropriation to his exclusive use, of these bones of the Green Briar-cave, he acquired a stock of his own, by an industrious application of which alone, he has been enabled, under the smiles of the Philosophical Society, to rise to be one of the first dignitaries of American literature. On this account, Mr. Jefferson considers, and justly, that the dream of his mother, and the predictions of the fortune-tellers have been fulfilled. "LITERALLY" says he, "I HAVE MADE MY FORTUNE BY BONES." It is no wonder, therefore, that this essay upon these Green Briar bones, is held by Mr. Jefferson's admirers, and by himself, in high esteem. Certainly it forms the most solid basis of his literary fame: some of the merits of which I shall now attempt to discuss.

As it is impossible to insert this exquisite criticism, on account of its length, in the present, I defer it, with great regret, until the succeeding number, when I dare promise the public abundant delight and instruction.

BIOGRAPHY. THE LIFE OF MICKLE.

On the following character of Mickle, given by the writer of the account of his life in the "European Magazine," the editor of these poems observes, "that having known him intimately, and known him long, he thinks it strictly just."

"To those who are unacquainted with Mr. Mickle's writings, we need not point out the beauty, the strength, or the variety of his versification, the harmony of his numbers, and the vigour of his imagination. These are so apparent, that we risk nothing in declaring our opinion, that they must sooner or later force themselves into the notice of those who at present are strangers to them. Leaving his literary character, therefore, to find its own value, we shall confine ourselves to speak of him as a member of society. He was in every point of view a man of the utmost integrity, warm in his friendship, and indignant only against vice, irreligion, or meanness. The compliment paid by Lord Lyttleton to Thomson, might be applied to him with the strictest truth; not a line is to be found in his works, which, dying, he would wish to blot. During the greatest part of his life, he endured the pressures of a narrow fortune without repining, never relaxing his industry to acquire by honest exertion that independence which at length he enjoyed. He did not shine in conversation, nor would any person from his appearance have been able to form a favourable judgment of his talents. In every situation in which fortune placed him, he displayed an independent spirit, undebaased by any meanness, and when his pecuniary circumstances made him on one occasion feel a disappointment with some force, he even then seemed more ashamed at his want of discernment of character, than concerned for his loss. He seemed to entertain with reluctance an opnion, that high birth could be united with a sordid mind. He had, however, the satisfaction of reflecting, that no extravagant panegyric had disgraced his pen. Contempt certainly came to his aid, though not soon; he wished to forget his credulity, and never after conversed on the subject by choice. To conclude, his foibles were but few, and those inoffensive; his virtues many; and his genius very considerable. He lived without reproach, and his memory will always be cherished by those who were acquainted with him."

In this portrait of Mickle, his few imperfections are commendably thrown into shade, but his virtues are faithfully delineated, and cannot fail to impress the most advantageous idea of his character. Religion appears to have been a leading feature in his mind; but the zeal against infidelity which induced him to plan his Cave of Deism ought not to have rendered him insensible of the value of two such men as David Hume, and Adam Smith, so far as to circulate among his acquaintance the Heroic Epistle in ridicule of these ornaments of philosophy. To have threatened Garrick with a Dunciad if he refused to get up a very moderate tragedy, would seem inexcusable, were not the genus irritabile vatum almost proverbial.

The character of Mickle, as a poet, ranks very high among his countrymen. His versification is undoubtedly very vigorous and manly; but certainly not equally remarkable for correctness. It unites the freedom of Dryden with the force and harmony of Pope. The English Lusiad is a truly classical performance, and stands unrivalled by any productions of the kind in our language, but the English Iliad. His Sir Martyn, Almada Hill, Pollio, and Mary Queen of Scots, if he had written nothing else are sufficient to entitle him to a classical distinction among the poets of our nation.

Of the Luciad he is not only an able translator, but spirited advocate. He has very judiciously prefaced his translation with a copious and satisfactory introduction to the history of the poem, and accompanied it with notes that were necessary to give it proper elucidation. The narrative is liberal and elegant, interspersed with many sensible observations, and just political reflection. In the critical part of his notes, he merits great praise; but he has sometimes, perhaps rather stepped out of his way. The lively and ingenious, though inaccurate and ill-grounded criticisms and misrepresentations of Voltaire, respecting the Lusiad, have drawn from his pen such a severity of animadversion and reprehension, as seem scarcely justifiable, when occasioned by a difference chiefly affecting a point of taste. Voltaire, admits the Lusiad to be a work justly deserving of a distinguished rank in epic poetry, a work abounding in beauties, and exhibiting also some striking defects. It is, as he affirms, a poem without a plan; without unity; without propriety; for the machinery exhibits a monstrous combination of Christian and Pagan mythology. Vasco de Gama the hero of the poem, for instance, prays to the God of Israel in a storm, and the goddess Venus comes to his relief, "But we are told," says Voltaire, "that the machinery is allegorical; thus Mars is clearly designed to represent Jesus Christ, and Venus the Virgin Mary. All this may be true, but I own I should not have suspected it." He is not satisfied with eagerly defending the propriety of this allegorical interpretation, and with stating the obvious answer to the objection respecting the unity of the action, but he recriminates upon Voltaire, and exposes him to contempt and detestation. In his analysis of the Lusiad, he enters deep into the merits of the poem, and finds it possessed of all the spirit, and great component parts of the epic. The result of his examination of the machinery, and construction of the poem, on the principles of the Epoee, will satisfy men of taste and elegant researches. Men of minuter studies, and sentiments left enlarged, may, indeed, cavil at what they think some deviations from the epic system; that system which scholastic formality and mechanical minds have drawn from those great archetypes, who themselves know no rule but the implicit pursuit of nature.

If we consider only the state of the Iberian poetry at and even after, the time when Camoens wrote me must look upon his Lusiad as a wonderful performance. He was the original poet of his country. He had not, like Tasso, a Dante to smooth his way, nor like Milton, a Spenser. Around him all was obscurity, and even an affectation of obscurity. The Spaniards looked with the highest veneration on the writings of Balthazar Gracian, and Luis de Gongora, because they were abstracted and unintelligible. Even their great poet Lopez de Vega, wrote in the same strange enigmatical style; a whimsical heterogeneous mixture of the enflure of the French, and the conceits of the Italians, interwoven with the sombrous, but fantastic ground of the Moresca. When these defects of the national poetry are considered, those of Camoens, in particular, will be thought the more excusable, and his excellences will do him the greater honour.

"Homer and Virgil" says Mickle "have been highly praised for their judgment in the choice of the subjects which interested their countrymen; and Statius has been as severely blamed for his uninteresting choice. But though the subject of Camoens be particularly interesting to his countrymen, it has also the peculiar happiness to be the poem of every trading nation. It is the epic poem of the birth of commerce. And in a particular manner the epic poem of whatever country has the controul and possession of the commerce of India. An unexhausted fertility and variety of poetical description, an unexhausted elevation of sentiment, and a constant tenor of the grand simplicity of diction complete the character of the Lusiad of Camoens; a poem which though it has hitherto received from the public most unmerited, and from the critics most unmerited injustice, was yet better understood by the greatest poet of Italy. Tasso never did his judgment more credit than when he dreaded Camoens as a rival, or his generosity more honour, than when he addressed his elegant sonnet, "Vasco le cui felici, &c." to the hero of the Lusiad."

Of the extraordinary talents of his illustrious contemporary, Tasso, appears to have been perfectly sensible. Montesquieu in his "Spirit of Laws," has, with a degree of impartiality, by no means peculiar to his character, allowed that the Lusiad unites the charms of the "Odyssey" with the magnificence of the "Æneid;" he might have added, with the majestic spirit and divine energy of the "Iliad." The fire of the Mæonian bard glows in the eye of Camoens, while he bears upon his aspect the serene dignity of the Mantuan muse. But he not only unites the power of composition that characterize the three ancient poems; he associates their different interests. The strong unconquered passions, the martial ardour, and stormy valour of the heroes at Troy, are powerfully represented in Gama's narrative of the Lusians and their wars. His piety, his tender attachment to his country, and affection for his prince, make us feel every thing for him that we have felt for Virgil's hero; and whatever attention, curiosity or concern the,

Qui mores hominum multorum vidit—could possibly excite in the reader all these must be awakened in a more interesting manner by the author of the Lusiad. He subscribes to Voltaire's assertion, when he calls it une nouvelle espèce d'Epoee; but though the happiness of Camoens in the novelty of his subject must be acknowledged, yet it is certainly much in the manner and spirit of the "Odyssey," the conduct of which he has omitted to analyse.

MISCELLANY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The following excellent essay, written by a gentleman in England, and addressed to the Editor, will be perused with pleasure by the Johnsonians.

The Candide of Voltaire, and the Rasselas of Johnson, morally and literally compared.

"The means are different, but the end the same."

It is nearly impossible to read the Candide of Voltaire, and Johnson's Rasselas, without an involuntary comparison of their respective excellencies. The subject of each, human life, is equally important; and though they both agree as to its misery, yet the modes of treating it forms the most striking contrast in the characters and the styles of the two men, and, in a very happy manner, discriminates their turn of national thought. There is a conciseness and an elegance in the Frenchman, that is inimitable. He is here, as in all his other writings, evidently above his subject; plays with it as with a toy, and his narration everywhere sparkles with the corruptions of an active, and mercurial imagination. Humour heightened by the most cutting irony, is his predominant feature, and his caricatures ever extort the laugh of approbation. The judgment of the reader is hurried away by the variety, and rapid succession of the scenes, the novelty of the incidents, the vivacity of the diction, and the irresistible ridicule pervading the whole. The miseries of mankind claim no more of his compassion than their follies. Neither the sufferings of Candide, nor those of his acquaintance, once awaken the sigh of sympathy, and the vicissitudes they undergo, however extraordinary and cruel, with singular felicity, are made the source of our delight. The obstinate prejudices of Pangloss, his pertinacious adherence to his favourite maxim in spite of experience, and in the midst of the heaviest affliction and universal calamity, sharpen the shafts of ridicule which the author levels against him with happiest effect; while the wavering doubts, the unbounded generosity, and amiable simplicity of his pupil, divert, reconcile, and endear him to us to the last. In no part hardly have we leisure to feel a moral. The selfish baseness and unfeeling ingratitude of mankind, serve but to provoke our mirth, and we are prepared for the burst of humour which commonly follows the most atrocious actions. We indeed remember our own Miss Cunegund and smile at former prejudices, satisfied that there are finer castles than Tundor Ten Tronk, and if the want of more than two-and-seventy armorial quarterings in our escutcheons did not prevent the union of our first loves, death or some other fatality, in all probability, had done it for us. And these are among the most serious reflections that Candide offers to the mind, or recalls to the memory. His six de-throned kings, though true to historic fact, serve only as figurants to fill up his grand carnival masquerade, and the awful example they furnish of the instability of human grandeur and power, scarcely strike us. Even the insensible depravity of the Dutch sailor during the earthquake, drawn in true costume fails to raise our indignation and abhorrence. He too cracks his jokes amid the most tremendous, and desolating scenes, the groans of the dying, and the mingled presence of the dead; and we behold a magnificent and populous city, with all its "gorgeous palaces, solemn temples, and cloud-capt towers," buried with its inhabitants without a groan. The author is always sure to please. He addresses himself constantly to the senses of his readers, and the feather of his pen tickles the brain, without correcting the heart. His actors are a kind of harlequins, who undergo such transformations on the natural, as we see them on the artificial stage, and our pleasure arises from the same cause in both;—the skill with which we are deceived; while the exquisite colouring of the scenes, and the dexterity in changing them, complete the delusion. At one time, they are wantonly butchered; at another, solemnly hanged; then they are burned, for our amusement: when lo! a new deception, and we behold them once more to be deceived again. Such are the magic powers of Voltaire's wit!

* In justice to Mr. Voltaire, it ought to be observed, that the remark of the old man on the banks of Prepenis, in respect to the cultivation of his garden, deserves to be written in letters of gold.

How different are our emotions in reading the Prince of Abyssinia! While our imaginations luxuriously indulge in the description of the Happy Valley, we have barely time to catch a glimpse of supposed bliss, when Rasselas steps forth and obscures it. The solemnity of the style increases with the importance of the story. Our interest in the fate of the prince never forsakes us for a moment. Our hopes soar on the artificial wings of his friend the mechanist, and when he drops, our fears rise. We behold him in the lake, lend a help to draw him ashore, and then retire with Rasselas to a temporary dejection, which soon gives way to hope for a happier event. We next follow the prince to the middle of the mountain, work with him until day-light is discovered beyond the prominence, and issuing with him to the top, our fancy, with rapture, beholds "The Nile, yet a narrow current, wandering beneath us." Our hearts, too, in unison with his, "Seem to bound like prisoners escaped, and we share in the delights of a wider horizon." With Imlac also, we recollect, with increase of sensibility, the sensations, which vibrated within us, on our first casting our eyes on the "Expanse of the mighty deep." We embark with him "On the world of waters, cast our eyes round with pleasing terror, think our souls enlarged by the boundless prospect, and imagine we could gaze for ever, but soon find ourselves grow weary with looking on barren uniformity;" and while we recognise these images, thus reflected on our memories, "We enjoy, for a moment, the powers of a poet."

The survey of mankind which follows, their various habits, professions, and employments, leave a deep impression on the mind, and the heart is always mended through the understanding. Every chapter is, indeed, a moral, and wisdom teaches in every page. The author's reasoning shines with all the splendour and force of truth; his diction glows with imagery, and is every where profuse of all the beautiful and sublime decorations of eastern style and phraseology. The whole work, moreover, may be considered, as has been justly observed, "A beautiful poem in prose," original in its construction, and abounding in the most important and penetrating observations; at once solid and refined, awful and profound; often new, and always just; and the reader, whatever may have been the vicissitudes of his own life, is taught the useful lesson—to be contented in the sphere it has pleased Providence to appoint him. Voltaire waltzes in sallies of sportiveness; commits his genius to the wings of fancy, and, regardless of probability, explores regions of imaginary nature, and paints them in the most fascinating colours. The images he chiefly presents to the mind, please from their novelty, and the spell that gives the principal interest to his heroes, is nothing less than absurdity itself. Of men, he draws the individual, rather than the species, and manners rather than life. His characters are, however, finely drawn, highly contrasted, and artfully discriminated; and though he contents himself with a comparatively narrow observation of the different modes of human existence, yet, is the sphere of his heroes' actions expanded over the old and new world. His reflections and deductions are few, and seldom serious: for how can we expect morality from him, who reasons only to deride. Johnson, rejecting sprightliness, indulges in stately solemnity; takes a less excursive range: but his descriptions and characters embrace all the modifications of life and manners, from a court to a cottage; from the lucubrations of the learned, to the diurnal avocations of the peasant. The great and invariable outlines of human nature are thus filled up with all the different shades and tints of colouring that give existence to his picture, and prove the copy's faithfulness to the grand original.

His delineations and conclusions are adapted to men of letters, rather than to the unthinking and vulgar. Hence, the Frenchman has the most numerous admirers, and the Englishman the most select. The former wrote to delight only; the latter blends instruction with amusement. All can laugh with the one, but few have the philosophy to moralize with the other. Of inventive powers, as distinct from the effusions of mere fancy, in which Voltaire so much excels, Johnson must claim pre-eminence. The former having borrowed his Country of El Dorado, and means of arriving there, partly from history, and partly from the Arabian Nights Entertainments.* It is the Happy Valley, in a larger scale, and is a singular coincidence of train of thought, that both authors should have conceived the same plan to demonstrate the impossibility of contentment in this world. But Johnson's is all his own, tradition, according to Milton, having placed the Paradise which secured the progeny of the Abyssinian monarchs on mount Omara, and he himself has chosen a mount for our first parents, in his own scheme.†

How far Johnson's exceeds Voltaire's in richness and luxuriance of imagination, and justness of conception, the readers of Rasselas and Candide may determine; and they may also decide the preference between the learned, and comprehensive definition of the various qualities essential to a poet, so eloquently described by Imlac, and the keen sagacity; and fastidious delicacy, exemplified in the most noble and erudite critick, Pococurante. As to style, it would be difficult to choose where both are models in their respective ways, and alike demand equal admiration.

The performance of the one, is a personal satire on an individual,‡ as well as a general one on mankind, embellished with the most ludicrous, yet the most acute, poignant, and, sometimes, malignant sarcasms on human nature with which profligacy itself could have attired it: that of the other, an affecting, but true likeness of man's frailties, his weaknesses, and his wants, such as he really is, without the broad mirth of unfeeling humour to hide them.

The reflections, that follow are solemn and sad; and nothing but the hope which offers of perfect happiness in another world can recompense us for the misery we have seen experienced in this.

* Vide Sinbad's Sixth Voyage.

† The scholar may amuse himself by comparing the Happy Valley with the celebrated gardens of the Roman Flora, and the Grecian Alcivous; and those of the African Hesperides, and the Asiatic Horti Adonis. Milton's description yields to neither.

‡ Leibnitz.

But it should be remembered, in favour of the author of Rasselas, that as men would laugh rather than weep, the design of Candide has an accidental advantage to which genius can lay no claim. It must be, after all, confessed, that, though the Frenchman places every thing in a ridiculous point of view, the Englishman throws a sombre cast over his picture, that accords with his constitutional melancholy, and national phlegm. Yet it is somewhat remarkable, that both authors should leave the mind in a kind of suspense: Candide being in doubt at the last, whether all is not for the best; and Rasselas seeing throughout all the diversified conditions of men, happiness nowhere to be found, determines without fixing the choice of life, to return to Abyssinia. The grave and saturnine may safely solace themselves with Candide, while the frolic and the gay would do well to attend to the history of Rasselas.* B. B.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE RURAL WANDERER. NO. 19.

Facilis est ad beatam vitam via; inite modo boni auspiciis, ipsisque diis bene juvantibus. SEN.

Philosophers, in all ages, have been too fond of describing a virtuous life, as a life of labour, danger and privation. Vice has been delineated with a thousand charms, by those who have made it their profession to recommend the love of virtue; and the portrait of virtue has superabounded with gloomy and repulsive shades. Pleasure has been represented sleeping upon beds of roses, and Wisdom wandering among wilds and precipices. The system of Solomon, indeed, is more rational than those of most coetaneous or modern sages: he was decided in the opinion, that the ways of wisdom are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths, peace. This delightful doctrine is confirmed and fortified by the splendid genius of Montaigne. Virtue, says that charming writer, is not, as the schoolmen represent her, placed on the top of a steep mountain, rough and inaccessible. They who have approached her, on the contrary, find her seated on a fine, fertile, and pleasant plain, from whence she beholds all things below her: and, if we labour to find her, our way lies through shady and green roads, sweet, flourishing and pleasant, of an easy and smooth ascent, like that of the celestial arch.

'Facilis descensus Averni,' says a very eminent poet, and 'Facilis est ad beatam vitam via,' says a philosopher, of little less celebrity. Some have exhorted us to love virtue for its own sake, and others, from the consideration, that the hardships of a virtuous life will be remunerated by ultimate profit and pleasure. But, in all my wanderings, I have found but few who represent the path to its temple, as pleasant and alluring. In this respect, it may be desirable to found a new school of wise men, and moralists. Even the mind of the Colossus of modern learning was tinged with the gloomy superstition of antiquity. He describes, however, with that eccentricity of thought, peculiar to himself, the path of piety, rosy, pleasant, and melodious, in its avenue; but dusty and uneven in its high-way. His oriental Wanderer, in the commencement of his journey, listens to celestial music, is fanned by zephyrs fragrant with the essence of the primrose, and sprinkled with the dews which descend from groves of spices; but the ardour of noon induces him to decline to a more pleasant road, cool, verdant, and flowery, but leading to destruction.

* It is a curious and well known fact, that Voltaire, and Johnson were writing their histories about the same time, without either being privy to the other's design. Johnson wrote his "In seven evenings to defray his mother's funeral expenses." What time Voltaire employed to finish his is not known. Vide Boswell's Johnson.

It is time to give to Virtue what is Virtue's due, and to tell the truth, and the whole truth, to all who feel an inclination to make a pilgrimage to her temple. Montaigne's description of her situation is a correct one; and equally correct is the idea of Seneca, that the way to happiness is plain and easy. Without virtue there can be no happiness; and the innocent peasant is happier than the guilty prince. How superior was Cincinnatus, guiding the plough over his little farm of seven acres, to Caesar, enthroned, flattered, idolized. The rural dictator walked in no other paths, but those of piety and peace, except when his country was in danger; and the moment his victorious arm had scattered the foes of Rome, he returned, to study nature, on the bank of his rivulet, splendidior viro, and to worship his household gods, in his own humble mansion. His life was one continued scene of mingled serenity and sublimity. It was the very quintessence of terrestrial felicity. Caesar wandered in the ways of pleasure and ambition; he found them ornamented with poisonous flowers, and their brilliancy shaded with clouds of malignant gloom. When his friend at a rustic hamlet among the Alps, inquired of him whether envy and ambition inhabited that gloomy retirement, he gravely answered: "I had rather be the first man here, than the second in Rome." He would have preferred the monarchy of Malta to the dictatorship, less than perpetual, of the universe. How tasteless his pleasures! How tormenting his ambition!

STEPHEN SORROWFUL'S LAMENTATION.

[From a British paper.]

MR. EDITOR,

I am that insulated being called an Old Bachelor; a creature wearisome to myself and beloved by no one. I have spent the noon of my days in a single state, from the dread of incurring the expenses incident to a married life with a woman who had nothing; and now sorely do I repent that I had not generosity enough to overlook this consideration in favour of a charming girl that I truly loved, and who wanted nothing but fortune to recommend her. I was formerly clerk to her father, then a merchant of great respectability, but some years after greatly reduced by the unfortunate turn of affairs in the late contest between us and America. When he failed I was settled in the world, and might have saved his amiable girl from many a year of fatigue and distress into which their poverty immersed them; but with sans froid, for which I now detest myself, I then stood aloof, tore my thoughts from the sweet Eliza, and driving forward into the heart of the city, determined to lose myself in the recesses of counting-houses and the accumulation of money; thus voiding all the plagues and expenses of a family, for which I deemed the society of an elegant and affectionate woman by no means an equivalent. Alas! Mr. Editor, I now see how I miscalculated; how much such a partnership would have been for my advantage in the long run. I now put the mutual participation of pleasure and pain, the endearments of our children, that flattering interest which Eliza would have taken in me (for whom, by the way, nobody now cares a straw); I put all these on the credit side of the ledger, and find in the opposite page only such a portion of expenses as I have actually brought upon myself, by being drawn in to give tavern dinners, and a thousand other extravagancies that young men know not how to avoid. You will easily see, when a just account is made out, what I have gained, or rather what I have lost. Instead of the bright hearth and smiling faces of my family, instead of sitting down in the midst of beings who owe life to me, and portioning out their little meal with the delicious sensations of a father, I take my solitary chop at a coffeehouse, and afterwards saunter to the theatre, where venal beauty spreads her net, and I am caught! Alas! here is no mind, here is no modesty to make sentiment interesting. After having seen a public entertainment with Eliza, with delight might we have passed the remainder of the evening! her taste and sensibility would have made us live the hours over again with additional pleasure; her bosom would have been my harbour in the storms of life, and there I should have found resources from ennui in the calm season of prosperity; in the day of sickness her voice could have whispered comfort, and, in my dying hour, the pure invocation, of my children might have availed me at the throne of grace. What a sad reckoner have I been, Mr. Editor! I am now as gray as a badger, and have not a single relative in the world; I have long retired from business, but my fortune brings me no enjoyment, my dog leads nearly as rational a life; I eat, and drink, and sleep, alternately, as he does, for I now fear to become the prey of some indigent dame, who would overlook my grey hairs and infirmities, in consideration of coming in for a third of my wealth, and therefore avoid much commerce with the sex, from which, though I might once have derived happiness, I can now only expect trick, or at best ridicule. But what can a man do who has let avarice run away with him in his youth, when all the social affections should have been at their out-posts to prevent it? All that remains for such a man (after the example of a culprit going to execution), is to warn the multitude how they fall into this error; to assure them that the good which is not participated is not half enjoyed; and that those who abandon a young woman from motives like mine, as they do not deserve happiness, so they never will obtain it. And moreover, Mr. Editor, if you print this, please to add, that an equal mixture of love and prudence forms the only and most delicious conserve they will have the faculty of relishing all their life long: either, taken separate, is drejudicial; one being too austere, and the other too sweet: they must be blended, to render them happily effective, and if any persons have skill enough to make up the composition after my recipe, I shall not have bemoaned myself, nor you have inserted this, in vain.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.

STEPHEN SORROWFUL.

On falling into the indolence of old age prematurely.

There prevails an opinion, that, after a certain age, the mind, like the body, having arrived at its compleat size, ceases to admit of that increase which we call improvement. Many appearances seem to justify such an opinion; but I am inclined to believe, that, though the mind at a certain age, may, from several causes, shew a tendency to become stationary, yet its tendency may be counteracted by extraordinary efforts and exertion. The machine, by long operation, may have incurred the impediments of excessive friction, or some of the wheels may be nearly worn out; but a little oil judiciously applied, and a few repairs ingeniously made, may restore its motions and augment its force.

One considerable proof, that, when the mind has reached the acmé of its improvement, it becomes for a little while stationary, and then retrograde; is drawn from observing that the second or third production of an author is often inferior to his first, even though the first, were the produce of his juvenile age.

But is it not probable that the exertions of the author may have been remitted after having obtained the distinction which first stimulated his earlier diligence? Success operates on the minds of many like the luxuries of Capua, on the soldiers of Hannibal, after the passage of the Alps, and the conquest at Cannæ.

When the strength of the body begins to decline, its companion seems to indulge it, with a sympathizing indolence. The road that leads to repose is smooth, flowery, and seducing; and many there are who enter it, long before repose is necessary. If they could acquire self-command enough to avoid the charms of the syrens, they might still make great advances in climbing the steep of science and virtue. But it must be allowed that greater efforts are required than the generality of mankind are disposed to make, at any time in their lives, and much less in their decline.

Yet the history of literature affords many animating examples, to prove that great works may be produced after the middle of life, Sophocles and Theophrastus composed excellent works when they were nearly a hundred years old. Our own Milton, whose Paradise Lost is an effort of mental activity equal to any which antiquity can boast, did not begin it, till he had arrived at that age when, in the opinion of many, the mind is receding from excellence.

Julius Caesar Scaliger, who became a prodigy of learning, did not commence the study of Greek till he was near forty. He did not even know the Greek characters till about that time; nor did he devote himself entirely to a life of letters till he was forty-seven. His days till then had been spent in an unsettled manner, chiefly in the army, with habits and dispositions unfavourable to study. But he had a mind which, like that of his namesake, the Roman conqueror, was formed to bear down all obstacles; and age, instead of abating his vigour, served but to harden and corroborate the sinews of his intellect.

It seems indeed reasonable to suppose, that works which depend on the warmth and vigour of the imagination, on pathos and sensibility of heart, would always be produced in the greatest perfection at an early period; but the examples of Sophocles and Milton, who wrote the finest poetry, the one in extreme old age, and the other at a mature age, serve to prove that theories concerning the human mind are too fallacious to be entirely relied on. The defects and failures of nature may be in great measure supplied or prevented by prudence and perseverance. But laziness and want of spirit suffer them to creep on before nature intended.

Thus is life in effect abbreviated. Early old age and early dotage are introduced by an abject dereliction of our own powers. We labour to increase our fortunes, and suffer our faculties to run to ruin without reluctance. But it is surely worth while to contend strenuously for their preservation. Of how little value are the enjoyments of life, when we come to vegetate in stupidity, in the midst of all that, should delight our senses, inform our understanding, enrich our memory, and glitter on our imagination! It is worth while to pursue every method which has a tendency to prolong our mental existence. Among these I will venture to enumerate, a constant yet moderate exercise of our abilities, a daily accumulation of new ideas, a recollection of the old, a rule over the passions, and temperance in wine and all the pleasures of the glutton and debauchee. We often accuse time and nature for decays which are caused by our own neglect. Instead of immersing ourselves in the pursuit of wealth, which we shall never enjoy, and honours, which are empty bubbles, let our desire be to preserve our faculties unimpaired to the last, and to shine, as the sun shines bright through the whole of its progress; and though with abated heat and effulgence at the close of it, yet with a serene and venerable lustre, till it descends to the other hemisphere.

From "The Repertory".

THE CARAVANSARY.

The knowledge of the ancient languages has always been considered highly useful by those best qualified to decide; and the most distinguished writers and speakers in their own language have uniformly proved the greatest proficient in Greek and Roman literature. The superiority of this branch of education, over all others, is so generally acknowledged in England, that it is exclusively honoured with the illustrious titles of scholarship and learning. By a scholar and a man of learning, they understand one profoundly acquainted with classical literature, and critically conversant with the Greek and Latin authors.

Indeed, if it be considered, that a person will write and speak English with taste and elegance, in proportion to his classical knowledge, and that the greatest orators and authors in the language, have been formed in the school of the ancients—one would reasonably conclude, that the superiority of this knowledge would never be called in question. Classical learning alone, if he has genius, will enable a man to make a much greater figure in the world, than all the science in the universe, without it.

The object of literature, is men and manners; the object of science is material substance and external nature. The one fits us for action, the other for speculation. By the study of literature we become historians, orators, poets, and statesmen; and gain that knowledge of mankind, and those powers of language, which enable us to serve them by our eloquence, or amuse and instruct them with our literary productions. Science has little connection with life and manners, except when applied to mechanical purposes, and the mere mathematician is of all animals the dullest and most useless. Mathematicks may be useful to discipline the mind, and to form part of the superstructure of education, but if you would have the building either useful or ornamental, the ground work must be classical literature. Barrow, in his late treatise on education, justly observes, that the best classical scholars always make the best mathematicians. It is true, that they do not generally pursue the mathematics, because men of lively imagination and of an extensive range of thought, are not fond of confining themselves to the dryness of demonstration on subjects not immediately interesting.

Who are the first writers in the English language? Addison, Johnson, Hume, Gibbon, and Robertson. How were they educated, and by what means did they attain the excellence which has immortalized them? By classical literature.

Who are the first orators and statesmen now living? In England, Pitt and Fox are allowed to transcend all others, whose literature, particularly that of the latter, is chiefly classical. Mr. Fox, says the author of the Pursuits of literature, is fond of Greek, and Dr. Joseph Walton, a most competent judge, bears testimony to his profound knowledge and exquisite taste in Grecian literature.

If we ask the same question with respect to those who have distinguished themselves on the bench and at the bar, we shall receive the same answer, and find, on examination, that Hardwicke and Mansfield, Dunning and Erskine, were educated in the school of the ancients. Lord Hardwicke was one of the chief writers of the Athenian letters, a work with which the Abbé Barthelemi was so greatly pleased that he declares, in a letter to Lord Dover, that, had he been previously acquainted with it, he should not have undertaken his elegant travels of Anacharsis.

Those who depreciate ancient literature, are either ignorant declaimers, or conceited philosophers. The decline of it in France, was, probably, one cause of their revolution. Mere men of science undertook to write on political, moral, and religious topics, which can be understood and explained to advantage by men of literature only.

I shall conclude this paper with the sentiments of the great Johnson, which must have much more weight with men of sense and virtue, than the united opinion of the whole National Institute, with his Imperial majesty at their head.

"The purpose of Milton, as it seems, was to teach something more solid than the common literature of schools, by reading those authors that treat of physical subjects; such as the Georgick, and astronomical treatises of the ancients. This was a scheme of improvement which seems to have busied many literary projectors of that age. Cowley, who had more means than Milton of knowing what was wanting to the embellishments of life, formed the same plan of education in his imaginary college.

"But the truth is, that the knowledge of external nature, and the sciences which that knowledge requires or includes, are not the great or the frequent business of the human mind. Whether we provide for action or conversation, whether we wish to be useful or pleasing, the first requisite is the religious and moral knowledge of right or wrong; the next is an acquaintance with the history of mankind, and with those examples, which may be said to embody truth, and prove, by events, the reasonableness of opinions. Prudence and Justice are virtues and excellencies of all times and of all places; we are perpetually moralists, but we are geometricians only by chance. Our intercourse with intellectual nature is necessary, our speculations upon matter are voluntary, and at leisure. Physiological learning is of such rare emergence, that one man may know another half his life without being able to estimate his skill in hydrostatics or astronomy; but his moral and prudential character immediately appears.

"Those authors, therefore, are to be read at schools, that supply most axioms of prudence, most principles of moral truth, and most materials for conversation; and those purposes are but served by poets, orators, and historians.

"Let me not be censured for this digression as pedantic or paradoxical, for if I have Milton against me, I have Socrates on my side. It was his labour to turn philosophy from the study of nature to speculations upon life; but the innovators, whom I oppose, are turning off attention from life to nature. They seem to think, that we are placed here to watch the growth of plants, or the motions of the stars. Socrates was rather of opinion, that what we had to learn was, how to do good and avoid evil."

CRITICISM.

[From the Edinburgh Review.]

John Woodvil: a Tragedy. By Charles Lamb. To which are added, Fragments of Burton, the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy. Robinsons. London. 1802.

We have often regretted, in perusing the dramatic compositions of the ancients, that we do not possess any of those earlier specimens of the art in its state of rudeness, from which the merit of succeeding dramatists might best be determined. It is always a consolation to badness, that there is something worse; and the greater number of our tragic writers have therefore a just ground of complaint against the fraud of the stages of antiquity, which, by transmitting only their best productions, have deprived them of the power of looking back to pieces inferior to their own. We have dramas of Eschylus, indeed; but Eschylus, 'pallae repertor honestae,' had already raised poor barefoot Tragedy on buskins, and given her a comfortable cloak to her back. Our loss would be irreparable, were it not for a fact, which, though very obvious, has been strangely overlooked;—we have still among us men of the age of Thespis, and indeed of every age, since men first ventured to compose. There is not a single century, to which we cannot find, at present, corresponding tastes and faculties of every kind: and it is surely by their own qualities, that men should be estimated and arranged, and not by the revolutions of planets, which are foreign bodies, and have no more relation to the earth which is animated, than that which was burned or buried in the earliest priests of Bacchus.

In the drama, however, though we have had innumerable specimens of the imperfect, which, in composition, is by much the most common species of fast time, we have long expected in vain a specimen so truly perfect, as to approach the purity of the great father of the stage; and we own, that our disappointment has been greater at this failure of genius, as in that inferior division of the art, which consists in recitation, we have often been gratified with a glimpse of the original flautrum. At length, however, even in composition, a mighty veteran has been born. Older than Eschylus, and with all the spirit of originality, in an age of poets, who have had before them the imitations of some thousand years, he comes forward, to establish his claim to the ancient hircus, and to satiate the most remote desires of the philosophic antiquary.

The tragedy of Mr. Lamb may indeed be fairly considered as supplying the first of those lost links, which connect the improvements of Eschylus with the commencement of the art. We shall not, however, insist that it be received with complete acquiescence, till we have given a short account of its fable, and afterwards compared it with those ideas of the most ancient drama, which may be inferred as best suited to the known manners of the time.

Sir Walter Woodvil, having been an active partizan of the commonwealth, is obliged to fly, at the restoration of Charles, and a price is set upon his head. He chooses, however, to remain in England, with his younger son Simon; and they spend their time chiefly in Sherwood Forest:

"Nigh which place, they have ta'en a house,
In the town of Nottingham, and pass for foreigners
Wearing the dress of Frenchmen."

His elder son, the hero of the tragedy, who, with views of ambition, had attached himself to the royal party, takes possession of his paternal estate, and abandons himself to every profligacy, with a crowd of riotous companions. In a fit of intoxication, he reveals to Lovel, one of his pretended friends, the place of his father's concealment; and Lovel, with a single companion, hastens to the forest, to seize Sir Walter; but, awed by the undaunted appearance of the father and the son, they 'both slink off;' and Sir Walter, knowing by whom the information must have been given, dies of horror at John's treachery. On learning all the consequences of the communication he had made, the wretched inebriate is seized at once with head-ach and remorse: and the drama concludes with a narrative of his mysterious feeling of the forgiveness of heaven, at an early hour, on Sunday morning, as he was kneeling in the church of S. Mary Ottery, 'on a little hassock in the family pew.' On rising, he had 'yearned to say his prayers in the church;' and flying to it, 'found the door wide open, whether by negligence he knew not, or some peculiar grace to him vouchsafed, for all things felt like mystery.' The narrative is addressed to Margaret, an orphan ward of his father, who, early betrothed to John, and feeling herself slighted by him, had fled from the profligacy of his house to Sir Walter, in the forest, on whose death she returned, to comfort his repentant son. The artifice with which the poet prepares his audience, for the narrative must be admirably productive of theatrical effect. It introduces, what we believe is a novelty on the stage, a peal of church bells giving their summons to morning service.

* See Johnson's life of Milton.

[A noise of bells heard.]

MAR. Hark the bells, John.
JOHN. Those are the church bells of St. Mary Ottery.
MAR. I know it.
JOHN. St. Mary Ottery, my native village,
In the sweet shire of Devon;
Those are the bells. p. 100.

The exactness of John's information is of peculiar use, as Margaret, having been some time at Nottingham, may be supposed to have forgotten the name of the parish, and perhaps of the sweet shire itself; and the cautious and solemn iteration at the close, in an affair of much moment, gives an emphasis to the whole, that is almost inimitable.

Of the most ancient drama, the plot would certainly have no regular union of events, all gradually converging into one. It would be simple; in what may strictly be called fable, though apparently complicated, from the want of bearing of the few parts upon each other. Above all, it would be very turbulent, and would probably consist chiefly of the buffooneries of slaves, and the incoherent follies of intoxication. The first great actors are said to have been 'peruncti facibus ora,' a visor, admirably typical of a drunkard, and of peculiar beauty, in the eyes of a 'spectator functusque sacris, et potus, et exlex.' Accordingly, we find in Mr. Lamb's tragedy, that half of the dialogue is spoken by servants and drunkards; nor is it wonderful, since, at the period of the action, as the hero of the piece expresses it, 'now universal England getteth drunk.' On drunkenness, indeed, the whole is founded; for the only tragical incidents of the piece arise from a discovery made in the thoughtlessness of intoxication.

With the importance of gesture on the ancient stage we are well acquainted; and it is evident, that the author means a great part of his eloquence to be performed in that expressive way, as he has introduced a considerable portion of dialogue, which, in mere language, is almost insignificant. In the following passage, in which four servants are represented drinking, all the eloquence is in the cup, which has thus as fair a claim, as any of those who hold it, to be considered, as a person of the drama.

DANIEL. Here's to thee, brother Martin. (drinks.)
MARTIN. And to thee, Daniel. (drinks.)
FRANCIS. And to thee, Peter. (drinks.)
PETER. Thank you, Francis. And here's to thee. (drinks.)
MARTIN. I shall be fuddled anon. p. 4. 5

In the same scene, the characters become so very brief, that if due care be taken by the manager, to give them grave faces, they might almost pass for ministers of state, in the disguise of serving men.

FRANCIS. Well, I have my suspicions.
PETER. And so have I.
MARTIN. And I can keep a secret.
FRANCIS. (To Peter.) Warwickshire you mean. (Aside.)
PETER. Perhaps not.
FRANCIS. Nearer perhaps.
PETER. I say nothing.

The ministerial silence of Lord Burleigh is great; but even silence itself is nothing to this. Three characters are afterward introduced, that appear but once, and say only a few words; so that, as they must have been created for some great purpose, it is evident, that a vast deal has been left to the bodily eloquence of the actors.

(Enter, at another door, three calling for Harry Freeman.)
Harry Freeman, Harry Freeman.
He is not here. Let us go look for him.
Where is Freeman?
Where is Harry?

(Exit the three, calling for Freeman.)

We may remark here, as tending to increase that confusion so happily expressive of drunkenness, the ingenuity of the artifice, by which four speeches are given to three persons, without stating to whom the fourth shall belong.

(To be continued.)

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

From a correspondent in London, says the Editor of the Charleston Times we have been lately surprised with the following interesting information:

"After devoting a suitable portion of this letter to the Political state of the country, some remarks on its Literature will not prove unacceptable. You may no doubt have heard that the celebrated SOUTHEY has employed his talents for some time past in composing an Epic Poem, founded on the pretended exploits of MADOC, the Welsh Navigator, who is supposed to have discovered America several centuries before the birth of COLUMBUS.—This work has already appeared, and adds no insignificant wreath to that immortal crown of glory, which the whole literary world has unanimously decreed him. The Poem is contained in twenty four books, and is, in my opinion, infinitely superior to the same Author's Joan of Arc.—But what will surprise, and since you are a Student at Law, what may afford you much greater pleasure, is a publication, not many days out, under the title of,

COMMENTARIES ON THE LAWS OF ENGLAND, VRSIFIED BY EDWARD LEICOMB—FROM THE TEXT OF SIR WILLIAM BLACKSTONE.

"The motives for such an extraordinary publication will be best explained by the Translator himself, from whose preface I shall make a short extract, requesting at the same time, your confidence that no opportunity shall be lost of transmitting a copy for your perusal.

"The advantages," continues Mr. LEICOMB, after enumerating the difficulties attendant on his arduous undertaking, "must be obvious at the first sight, to the meanest capacity. The utility of verse in the communication of knowledge is really incalculable—its aid to the memory is inconceivable, in rendering the recollection of what we would wish to retain far easier than any other mode which has been yet adopted. This important truth has been incontrovertibly established by the experience and approbation of every succeeding age. Another important reason for which I was induced to undertake this work, is the preference which youthful minds generally give to poetical ornament.—After dwelling on the majestic and sublime descriptions of Homer and the Mantuan Bard, and other pleasing pursuits which precede the study of the law, the Student enters with disappointment on the dry and unentertaining doctrines of Jurisprudence, and pursues them often with disgust. I hope in some measure to obviate this serious inconvenience, by clothing in verse the Lectures of Sir William Blackstone, which is generally the first book that is put into the young Student's hands." Thus, continues Mr. L.—But I will fill the remainder of my paper with one or two quotations from this curious work.—The first book only has yet appeared; and in the second chapter is the following paragraph, which varies very little from the text:—

"Thus when the Great Unknown from nothing form'd
This universe, and out of Chaos wild
And Anarchy created matter, he
On it impress'd fixed principles and Laws,
Without whose agency 'twould cease to be,
When he imparted motion to the World,
Of motion he established certain Laws.
To which all bodies, moveable themselves,
Did erst submit. So when the artist forms
Of wondrous mechanism, the little Watch,
Whose faithful hand describes the varying hour,
So long as faithful to the laws prescrib'd,
Its operations prove, it moves compleat,
And answers every end for which 'twas form'd"

And in chapter 9, Book 1st, are the following remarks on the Statue of ELIZABETH, for Provision for the Poor:—

"Whereas, if only they whom cheerless want
And Poverty with all its woes depress—
If only they who, heirs to Misery,
Ne'er knew the comfort of a wintry garb,
Were clothed, and for their labour amply paid,
Soon Industry would smile in every cot,
And sweet Contentment on each feature beam;
The humble Peasant would no more repine,
But work with pleasure at his daily task;
No murmurs would the blithesome Swain express,
Nor e'er disquietude his rest disturb.
Well would he know, that when the band of time
Had scatter'd o'er his head the frost of age,
Or weakness had enfeebled every limb,
Then and then only, would the rich stretch forth
The fostering hand of comfort and of ease;
Or when the tender spring of Innocence and Youth
Forbad his offspring for themselves to toil,
Mild Charity would for each want provide,
And watch them with a Parent's gentle care."

SKETCH OF CHRISTOPHER ANSTET, ESQ.

The celebrated author of the Bath Guide. He is an officer in the army, and published the above excellent poem, in the year 1767. Upon its first appearance it was very generally read and admired, and has most signally survived the temporary reign so commonly the lot of similar productions. This may, however, be justly attributed to its playful and humorous satire, levelled rather at the group of whim and folly, than against individual eccentricity: and as the aggregate character experiences little variation in the course of thirty or forty years, so is it natural that it should long be recognized and admired, when delineated by the pencil of so skilful a master. Some years afterwards Mr. Anstet published "An Election Ball, in Poetical Letters from Mr. Inkle at Bath, to his Wife at Gloucester, with a Poetical Address to John Miller, Esq. at Batheaston Villa:" which, though inferior to the former poem, abounds with a considerable degree of wit and humour. He likewise published a Poetical Paraphrase upon the Thirteenth Chapter of the first Book of Corinthians: which serves to evince, his due estimation of his prominent talent in the first instance, and that he then succeeds best when he takes in hand subjects of a Lancel and ludicrous cast. He is also author of "The Priest Dissected," a Satire: "Ad. C. W. Bampfylde, Epistola Poetica Familiaris:" and the Farmer's Daughter, a Poetical Tale founded on fact, published in 1795, with the laudable view, "to set innocence on its guard, and to promote the cause of virtue." This unfortunate damsel had been seduced by a military officer, and was afterwards deserted by him: filled with anguish, shame, and remorse, not without some remains of love for the destroyer of her innocence, she left her father's house in search of her perfidious lover, and perished through fatigue and cold, in one of the inclement nights of the severe winter of 1794. To the elegant pen of this gentleman have also been attributed some beautiful verses, addressed to a friend, which appeared some time ago in the Bath Herald.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[In the Gentleman's Magazine for July, 1804, the latest which has reached America, we find the following beautiful poem. It is intitled, "Ode for his Majesty's Birth-day, June 4, 1803, written extempore by THOMAS MOORE, Esquire, Poet Laureat for Ireland, pro tempore."]

Where is now the smile that lighten'd
Every hero's couch of rest?
Where is now the hope that brighten'd
Honour's eye, and Pity's breast?

Have we lost the wreath we braided
For our weary warrior men?
Is the faithless olive faded?
Must we pluck the bay again?

Passing hour of sunny weather!
Lovely in your light, the while,
Peace and Glory wed together,
Wander'd through our fairy isle!

And the eyes of Peace would glisten,
Dewy as a morning sun,
When the timid maid would listen
To the deeds her chief had done.

Is the hour of dalliance over?
Must the maiden's trembling feet
Waft her from her warlike lover,
To the desert's still retreat?

Fare you well! with sighs we banish
Nymph, so fair, and guest, so bright;
Yet, the smile, with which you vanish,
Leaves behind a soothing light.

Soothing light, that long shall sparkle,
O'er yon warrior's sanguine way,
Through the field, where horrors darkle,
Shedding Hope's consoling ray.

Long the smile his heart will cherish,
To its absent idol true;
While around him myriads perish,
Glory still will sigh for you.

Sacred chain, from heaven descended,
Chain, that Britain calls her own,
Which, by FETTERS, PURS and SPLENDID,
BIND'ST A PEOPLE TO THE THRONE.

Blest, we hail the morn, that shining,
Fair and welcome from above,
To the ties so softly winning,
Adds another link of love.

Brightly may the chain be lengthen'd,
Through the lapse of future hours,
When the links, by glory strengthen'd,
Peace again shall deck with flowers!

SELECTED POETRY.

TO VESPER.

Thou, who beholdst with dewy eye,
The sleeping leaves, and folded flowers,
And hear'st the night wind lingering sigh,
Through shadowy woods, and twilight bowers;
Thou wast the signal once that seem'd to say,
Hilarious beating breast reprov'd my long delay.

I see thy emerald lustre stream,
O'er these rude cliffs, and cavern'd shore;
But here, orisons to thy beam
The woodland chauntress pours no more;
Nor I, as once, thy lamp propitious hail,
Seen indistinct through tears; confus'd, and dim,
and pale,

Soon shall thy arrowy radiance shine
On the broad ocean's restless wave,
Where this poor, cold swoln form of mine
Shall shelter in its billowy grave,
Safe from the scorn the world's sad outcasts prove.
Unconscious of the pain of ill-requited love.

BALLAD.

In one thou'dst find variety,
Cried Dick, would'st thou on wedlock fix;
I rather should expect, cried I,
Variety in five or six,
But never was thy counsel light,
I'll do't, my friend,—so said, so done,
I'm noos'd from life, and Dick was right,
I find variety in one.

Her tongue has more variety
Than music's system can embrace;
She modulates through every key,
Squeaks treble, and growls double base.
Divisions, runs, and trills, and shakes,
Enough the noisy spheres to stun;
Thus, as harsh Discord music makes,
I find variety in one.

Her dress boasts such variety,
Such forms, materials, fashions, hues,
Each animal must plunder'd be,
From Russian bears, to cockatoos.
Now 'tis a feather, now a zone,
Now she's a gipsy, now a nun;
To change like theameleon prone;
An't this variety in one?

In wedlock's wide variety,
Thought, word, and deed, we both concur,
If she's a thunder-storm to me,
So I'm an April day to her,
Devil and angel, black and white:
Thus, as we Hymen's gauntlet run,
And kiss, and scold, and love, and fight,
Each finds variety in one.

Then cherish Love's variety,
In spite of every sneering elf,
We're Nature's children, and an't she,
In change, variety itself?
Her clouds and storms are will'd by Fate,
More bright to shew her radiant sun;
Hail, then, blest wedlock, in whose state,
Men find variety in one.

[In the "Hunter of the Alps," a very new opera, by Mr. Dimond, junr. Bausta, the Boniface of the scene, sings the following]

SONG.

I keep a snug inn by the side of the road,
Where all, who bring money, are welcome to bait;
The muleteer grins, when he spies my abode,
For I take in the traveller early and late:
An equipage stops, and I bow to the stranger,
The rules may keep fast, or must feed on the manger;
While the pride of my larder I shew to my lord,
And a delicate chicken cook up for his board:
'Tis true, that my poultry is sometimes found tough,
Yet, six years ago, it was tender enough.
If folks chance to cut little, they'll sleep more at ease,
And enjoy a down bed, very noted—for fiças!
Still from worlds old or new,
Paris, Spa, or Peru,
Born next the north pole, or hatch'd under the line,
Guests from each quarter,
The Turk and the Tartar,
The Russian, the Prussian,
Hollanders, Polanders,

Gentiles and Jews,
Here mix and confuse,
And all of them—all of them—flock to my sign—
Should a guest, in a passion, despite of my care,
Complain of ill lodging, and rail at bad fare,
I've always a salvo to keep conscience still,
And, to balance short commons present a long bill.
So, if there was nothing to eat, he should say,
He'll find, to his cost, there is plenty to pay.
Perhaps, for extortion, I meet with a curse,
But I pocket an oath, when I draw out a purse:
For though evil words often wound a good name,
Yet gold makes an excellent plaister for fame;
And when honour lost with cash gain'd I divide,
The weight of the argument rests on my side.

SONNETS FROM SHAKSPEARE.

BY ROMEO, ON FIRST SEEING JULIET.

Act I. scene 4.

Ah! who is she who dazzles thus the sight,
And bids the glimmering torches burn more clear,
Whose beauty hangs upon the cheek of night,
Like a rich jewel in an Ethiop's ear?

But, ah! her beauty seems for earth too dear,
So much her charms all living charms out-shine:
And, ah! too rich for use, how much I fear,
That beauty, such as hers, can ne'er be mine.

Yet will I duly watch her place of stand:
Sure, love before this night I never knew,
And with her touch make happy my rude hand,
For ne'er such beauty blest my wondering view.
All charms I now resign, that once were dear,
And henceforth—ever—vow my sole devotion here.

TO NIGHT, BY JULIET.

Act III. scene 2.

Thou lingering Sun, withdraw thy envious light,
And, Darkness, spread thy sable veil between;
Then shall my Romeo, shrouded by the night,
Leap to these arms, untalk'd of, and unseen.

Lovers the darkling path of bliss can find,
And need not borrow from the day its aid:
Beauty supplies a light, for love is blind,
And seeks congenial shelter in the shade.

Come, gentle Night, give Romeo to these arms,
Ah! give him now, and when my love shall die,
Cut him in little stars: he'll lend thee charms,
And add such glories to the dusky sky,
That all the world, in love with Night, shall pay
No worship to the garish face of Day.

ON A PANE OF GLASS.

Wise was the man, with emblematic hand,
Who first on this transparent plate of sand,
The name of woman, Nature's fairest queen,
Display'd, engraven with the diamond keen.
Well knew he, that the glass and jewel join'd,
Were truest emblems of her face and mind:
In lovely woman, for from woman flows,
The chief, the truest blessing life bestows,
A thousand charms—a thousand faults unite:
As frail as glass, though as the diamond bright.

THE BRITISH SPY IN BOSTON. LETTER IV.

IT is asserted that FISHER AMES, as a member of the national legislature, attained greater celebrity, and was entitled to more unmingled applause, than any orator, who, since the establishment of its constitution, had graced that honourable assembly. This appears to have been derived neither from the effect of mature learning, nor individual weight of character, since he had not reached the meridian of his days, had risen the architect of his own fortune, and, until subsequent to the period of his election, was unheard of, and a stranger, beyond the dimensions of his native state. Consequently, his merit must have been uncommon, and the properties of his mind impressive and original. To no American has Fame been more kind, nor extended more far. Thence, upon my arrival in this country, my warmest prepossessions were his, and my most anxious desire to form his acquaintance. In the latter I have hitherto been disappointed.—But I have seen, and heard him—rendered interesting by the apparent decay of health, and that awakened sensibility, which engages every eye, and affects every heart. I have read his speech upon the British Treaty, and have found it good, very much beyond mediocrity, and well calculated to please, to influence, and to excite, even at will, the feelings and the understanding of his auditors; though under any circumstances, excepting those of the individual speaker, the egotisms, with which it abounds, might be considered reprehensible; but, these circumstances admitted, they become justifiable, and possibly, commendable. Certainly no specimen of American eloquence has, since the revolution, possessed equal ability to move, to charm, and to electrize. This effect is to be looked for in the speaker, rather than in the composition—A man of pleasing appearance, just reaching the meridian of his years, surrounded by personal friends, and connected by every tie, that adds a value to existence, become the patient but incurable victim of a hopeless disease, yet resisting the inevitable evil, and animated even to inspiration by the great occasion, without effort presenting himself before the assembled wisdom of his nation, richly endowed with fluency of utterance, force of expression, and pathos of manner, these increased and improved by the adventitious circumstances, under which he was situated, every female heart responding to his articulation, and even the philosophic mind unable to resist its impulse, the hissing serpent of personal envy and malevolence silent and benumbed, and the more ferocious spirit of party prejudice charmed into ecstasies, or conciliated into toleration. Fisher Ames is beloved. The pleasantness of his humour, the felicity of his wit, and the rich brilliancy of his imagination, enable him to shine as a companion, and give to his colloquial powers an attraction, which assimilates him more, and brings him nearer, than any man of his country, to the fascination of address, the enchantment of words, and ideas, that characterise and elevate the mind and manners of Charles Fox, delighting every heart, and attaching every understanding. At the Bar, it is decidedly my opinion, Mr. Ames should seldom appear, and is never invincible; since with but little law learning, a sensibility unrestrained and inadmissible, a wit pointed and direct, but never malevolent, whose scintillations glance upon the brain, touching and kindling every sensation of the heart, but neither lighting the judgment, nor guiding the understanding, an imagination glowing, varied, and prolific, with all the gorgeous power of fancy, and all the luxury of words, to delight and to astonish—for such a man, and such a mind, to be shackled by the rules of courts, and confined to the sterility of common form, and common-place argument, would be a miracle, and is a misapplication of fitness and capacity ever to be lamented, while in the appropriate path of their original inclination, no rival influence would eclipse, no superior light diminish their brilliancy. Still, my dear S—, Mr. Ames, in his best state, lays no claim to the perfection of oratory. The voice, that vehicle of the human understanding, that attractive or repulsive attribute of mere sound, and yet of mighty sensation, under whose defects and deficiencies fine genius loses half its ascendancy, and to whose happy modulation all the sensibilities, under the direction of mind, are obedient, this faculty in Mr. Ames is not unqualified. Fluent, easy, selected, as his diction decidedly is, he has some particular tones that are rustic or local, and his accent is in a great degree provincial; difficulties which disappear under the ascendancy of his eloquence, and which, not unlike that of my friend and preceptor, leaves but little for regret, and much, (how very much!) for delight and approbation.

Mr. Ames is also considered one of the best writers of his country; the eloquence of his essays, like that of his public speaking, is fervid, feeling, highly ornamented, constructed to delight the ear of taste, and fashioned to affect the heart of sensibility, yet, probably, more calculated to astonish than to convince, or to convert. Whence his opponents confess his talents, approve his honesty, admire his wit, and are delighted with the richness of his imagination, but deny the ascendancy of his arguments, and affect to reject what they have yet found no champion sufficiently bold or able to counteract.

Is it not true, my S—, that of all the professions, which lead to the exertions of mind, that of the law gives the least chance of producing an author of extraordinary merit, on any subject detached from the theory and practice of his own calling? The technical style of its composition, the rules of court, the set habits and fixed formalities of pleading, shackling the mind, arresting the ideas, and imprisoning the free exercise of the imagination, giving constraint to all the graceful eccentricities of original genius. Hence we find our great Erskine a poor pamphleteer and hence within the precincts of parliament—in which situation he was by his friends and admirers expected to appear omnipotent—we find his capacities sinking below the level of his least formidable antagonists. In some future letter, when I have more accurately considered the subject, I hope to analyze the cause, and consider its probable corrective or preventive. At the same time, if my leisure and means of information shall authorise the attempt, I will endeavour to take an impartial view of the existing state of literature in the United States, considering the scale of genius, the progress of improvement, the encouragement to writers, and the increase or decrease of readers of taste, and just criticism. Also the comparative powers of the different authors that have already appeared, with the aggregate of the whole, including the abstruse sciences, and les belles lettres. Possibly I should find it less arduous to give a correct statement of the commerce of the country, its agricultural survey, or its architectural improvements. Of these also I am not unmindful, and, provided opportunity is auspicious, you, my dear S—, shall not find me negligent.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF MICKLE.

[Concluded.]

To the character of the Lusiad, as given by Mickle, every reader of taste will very freely consent; and he has done himself the highest honour in making his author live in the fulness of his spirit, and in all the strength, harmony, and beauty of our heroic verse. The most delicate strain of gallantry, and the high spirit of Spanish honour, while in its unstained days, breathe throughout the Lusiad. Description riots, and the graces of imitative and sentimental harmony abound in every page. On the principal beauties of the poem it is unnecessary to enlarge. The death of the beautiful Inez, an episode, in the third book, is distinguished by a tenderness and sweetness of numbers. The battle of Aljubarota, in the fourth, and the sea storm in the sixth, are described in all the strength of rough nervous verse. The fiction of the apparition of the Cape of Tempests, in the fifth, in sublimity and awful grandeur of imagination, is perhaps unequalled in human composition. The description of the spectre, the awfulness of the prediction, and the horror that breathes through the whole, till the phantom is interrupted by Gama, are in the true spirit of the wild and grand terrific of an Homer or a Shakspeare. The numbers which relate the behaviour of Gama, while a prisoner in India, in the beginning of the ninth book, have a peculiar loftiness and grand simplicity; and the description of the Island of Love, in the same book, contains the most beautiful landscapes of rural painting, presented in successive scenes, in the softest and most melodious versification.

It is with concern, that the present writer is obliged to observe, that, notwithstanding the epic powers of Camoens have received their due honour in our language, by the elegant and spirited translation of Mickle, and the subject being commercial, and, therefore, seeming so peculiarly calculated for Great Britain, the English Lusiad has not yet attained the celebrity it merits. But the time must come, when it will be universally read, and then it must be universally admired. That its merits may be more generally known, he has recommended it to be reprinted among other poetical translations, designed as a supplement to this collection of the 'Works of the British Poets.'

His Sir Martyn, or the Progress of Dissipation, is the longest and most elaborate of his original poetical compositions. Among the numerous imitations of Spenser, it will not be easy to point out one that will so well bear a comparison with the original. It indicates a warm and fruitful imagination, with much taste. The design and spirit of the poem deserve great praise. After an invocation to the genius of Spenser, and the proposition of the subject, Sir Martyn's first attachment to his concubine, his levity, his love of pleasure and dissipation, with the influence over him which she assumes, are described. The effects of this influence are next exemplified in the different parts of his relative character,—in his domestic elegance of park, garden, and house;—in his unhappiness as a lover, a parent, a man of letters;—behaviour as a master to his tenants, as a friend and a brother;—and in his feelings in his hours of retirement, as a man of birth and a patriot. The poem closes with an allegorical catastrophe. The reasons he gives, in his preface, for having adopted the manner of Spenser, are, 'That the fulness and wantonness of description, the quaint simplicity, and, above all, the ludicrous, of which the antique phraseology and manner of Spenser, are so happily and peculiarly susceptible, inclined him to esteem it, not only as the best, but the only mode of composition adapted to his subject.' Though the relation between verse of Gothic structure, and the Progress of Dissipation may not generally be allowed, yet it cannot be denied, that the imitation is very successfully performed, with respect to the metre, the language, and the fiction. He has the same style of harmony, and the same spirit of enthusiasm, which distinguish the poetry of Spenser. His descriptions are equally copious and luxuriant, and are embellished with the same degree of imagery, and heightened by the same colourings of animated fancy.

His Almada Hill, an Epistle from Lisbon, is very properly styled 'A Supplement to the English Lusiad,' and well deserves to be adopted into the native language of the Portuguese Homer. He opens his epistle with a well-drawn picture of a joyless winter day in England, contrasted with the genial influence of a warmer clime! After hinting at what will probably be the cause of our political decay, he enters more immediately upon the subject of the poem, which abounds with local picturesque views by land and sea, and historical incidents, from the time of the Romans to the great earthquake in 1755. The descriptive parts are, he tells us, strictly local; and they have every appearance of being truly characteristic and appropriate. The names of Viriatus, Sertorius, Lucan, Trajan, &c. are happily introduced. After cursorily pointing out the 'mighty deeds the lofty hills of Spain of old have witnessed,' he notices the change of manners that has prevailed in consequence of the subversion of the Roman empire, by the irruption of the Goths and other northern tribes; and though the causes he assigns for that peculiar character which has since marked each of the different divisions of Europe, may not be historically true, yet the ideas he has started on this subject are at least poetical and ingenious. The diseased chivalry of romance is contrasted with the chivalry of wisdom and honour, as he styles the religious fury of crusading, which the present writer cannot agree with him in admiring. The fall of Lisbon's naval throne, occasions some boding thoughts on that of London. The naval glory of the Portuguese, during the time they first established themselves in Asia, and the fate of Gama, have their due place; with the massacre of the Moors at the taking of Lisbon, that of the Jews and Christians in 1505, the revolution that set the duke of Braganza on the throne, a sublime description of the earthquake, &c. The duke of Lafoens receives a high eulogium, in the conclusion, for his taste in the belles lettres, history, &c. The general poetical merit of the epistle is very considerable. The sentiments may sometimes be thought exceptionable; but the versification is spirited and harmonious; though it would have been more so, had he less frequently made one verse run into another. In attempting bold innovations in language, he has, in some instances, violated metaphorical propriety. Of the peculiar advantages of the epistolary form of composition, he has not, perhaps, availed himself so much as he might have done; excepting at the commencement of the poem, he seems in a great measure to have lost sight of the friend to whom it is addressed. He is, indeed, twice afterwards adverted to; but from the manner in which it is done it seems as much with the view to fill up the measure of the verse, as to awaken and direct the attention to any striking object. The writer of epistles, if he wishes to make them as interesting as their nature will admit, should lose no opportunity of appealing, where it can prudently be done, to the feelings and sentiments of those to whom he is supposed to be addressing himself.

His Pollio, an Elegiac Ode, is characterised by genuine enthusiasm, vigour of thought, and natural expression. The description of Roslin Castle has dignity and characteristic propriety. There is likewise considerable merit in the description of the retreats where he had experienced with his brother the happy amusements of young simplicity; which naturally renew his grief and complaints for his loss.

His Elegy on Mary queen of Scots, evinces strong powers of imagination, a brilliant fancy, and true sentimental feeling. The imagery is various and rich; the expression is at the same time beautiful and bold; and the sentiments are tender and interesting. They who think differently from him with respect to the character of Mary, must allow, that her misfortunes are lamented, and her virtues and accomplishments are commended, in numbers equally harmonious and tender.

His Knowledge, an Ode, is nervous and elegant, both in sentiment and expression; and though, by reason of its philosophical tenor, the descriptive part is less luxuriant, yet the colouring is not languid, nor are the descriptions inanimated.

His Hengist and Mey, and the Sorceress, are not inferior to the best imitations of the ancient heroic ballad. The Sorceress is conceived with much fancy. It was written at the request of a friend, who possessed Mr. Mortimer's picture of 'The Incantation,' as a story to the painting. From this picture Dixon engraved a very fine print.

His Eskdale Braes, he has characterised in a letter, which he sent to a friend with the song, 'The ballad, indifferent as it is, has too much poetical expression, and is too clear of low nonsense and absurdity, ever to become popular.'

The elegant stanzas on Mr. Servinton, were built on an incident somewhat similar to that which he has made the groundwork of his Sir Martyn, and may be considered as a miniature picture of the consequences of dissipation. The stanzas on the neglect of Poetry are beautifully pathetic. Of his smaller pieces, the Epitaph on Mr. Mortimer is the most successful. In the Stanzas to a young lady studious of Botany, he makes the primrose a flower which lingers to the winter season; on the contrary, it is, as its name denotes, an early production of the Spring, and does not linger even to the approach of Summer.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The French, who appear to have early perceived a marked feature in the character of Mr. Jefferson, have recently given to the world a letter from this gentleman, addressed to 'C. Lacépède, member of the Institute.' This letter is published in the 25th number of a periodical work, printed in Paris, intitled, 'La Decade philosophique, litteraire et politique,' in the following words: "We believe we shall give pleasure to our readers in presenting them with a translation of the following letter, addressed by Mr. Jefferson, president of the United States, to C. Lacépède, member of the Institute. They will find in it, independent of some curious facts for the learned, that simplicity of tone, which one loves to discover in persons eminent by their station, and that respect for talents, the infallible sign of an elevated soul."

As it may be some gratification to the American reader to see this letter in an English dress, I here subjoin a translation of it, from the aforesaid periodical work, to which I have annexed a few remarks, to be given a place or not in your paper, as you may think proper.

Letter from Mr. Jefferson, President of the United States, to C. Lacépède, member of the French Institute.

Washington, February 24, 1803.

I have just received, by Mr. Paine, the copy, which you had the goodness to send me, of your discourse at the opening of your lectures for the ninth year. From the rapid perusal I have given it, I anticipate the pleasure I shall experience, in reading it more attentively, the first instants of leisure I have at my disposal.

I have been struck with the philosophic spirit that dictated the paragraph of your discourse, [page 10.] 'Soon will enterprising travellers visit the Mississippi and Missouri, which no European eye has yet seen.' We know, that at this very moment, we have travellers exploring the Missouri to its source, and who are also charged to discover that river, which ever it may be, which may originate the nearest to it, and empty itself into the western ocean. This excursion, through our continent will give us a general idea of its form, population, natural history, productions, soil, and climate. It is also by no means improbable that this scientific journey may procure for us some new information relative to the Mammoth, as well as the Megatherium, of which you make mention [page 6]. You have, perhaps, seen in our Philadelphia transactions, before our reading what M. Cuvier had said of it, that we had found here the remains of an enormous unknown animal, which we have named Megalonyx, on account of the prodigious length of its claws. It is probably the same animal, and there are signs of its ancient, and even present, existence. The voyage, which we have undertaken, and which may be accomplished in the space of two summers, will, we hope, illuminate this fact.

* Lacépède here alludes to investigators to be sent, under Buonaparte, in consequence of the transfer of Louisiana by Spain to France. Mr. Jefferson converts this observation to his own use, by giving that foreknowledge to the Frenchman, which he would deny to Moses and the Prophets. The Frenchman, according to Mr. Jefferson, foresaw, before the sale of Louisiana to the United States, the expedition of secretary Lewis.

I have, for a long time, been fatigued with the eternal repetition of the phrase, man in his state of nature, by which is meant, man in his savage and stupid state, with his faculties not yet developed. If such is the state of nature, the fœtus, in its embryo state, would be its highest term or degree, for then is discovered its least development. Surely there is nothing more contrary to nature, in the development of the faculty of perception and thinking, than in the increase of its body. You will hence perceive how greatly I have been charmed to see this false idea combatted by you, [p. 8]. 'Among all living and sensible beings, the art or skill of any species is its nature. The industry, which proceeds from this alone, and which it has not received from a different species, is the completion of its natural attributes. One would have a very imperfect idea of its essence, who should be ignorant of the extent of the development of its faculties.' The examination of the different races of men, which you propose, under this point of view, will produce a classification, which has not hitherto been sufficiently valued.

M. de Buffon has supposed that the Moose of America was the Rein-Deer of Europe; that the Deer of America was the Roebuck, and what we improperly call the Panther, was the Cougar. I procured for him the skeleton, the skin, and horns of a Moose, seven feet high; the horns of our Deer, and the skin of an animal, improperly called Panther. He was thoroughly convinced that he had received imperfect notions of all these animals, and promised to correct these articles, in his next publications. I believe he did not live long enough to publish another volume. Have any posthumous works of his been published, and do they contain the corrections here mentioned? I presume that the parts of animals, which I sent to him, are still in the cabinet, which has been so happily confided to your keeping.

You will have heard that a skeleton of a Mammoth, tolerably complete, has been carried to London by Mr. Peale, from whence he proposes to take it to Paris; thus you will have it in your power to see this colossal creature, and to compare it with the elephant.

To return to the principal object of my letter: I thank you for the friendly communication of your discourse, and the occasion which it has furnished me for turning my steps, for a moment, from the arid paths of politics, to the fruitful fields of nature. I intreat you to accept the assurances of my great consideration and my respect.

(Signed) TH. JEFFERSON.

The Paines, the Palmers, and anti-christians of the present day, will no doubt be gratified to learn that so late as the date of the above letter, (Feb. 24, 1803) its writer still adhered to the infidel philosophy which supposes different races of man. Mr. Jefferson rejoices that the labours of his correspondent, Lacépède, are to be employed in 'a new classification of the different races of men,' founded on the relative extent of their faculties. Did Mr. Jefferson reflect, that such a classification would establish the inequality of men, and thereby destroy not only one of the elements of our proclamation of independence, which declares that all men are born equal, but the authenticity of the Scriptures, which inform us, that all men are descended from Adam.

Why, it may be asked, should Mr. Jefferson be tired of the phrase, 'man in a state of nature.' The phrase is well understood, and withal very correct, when properly used. Man, before he enters into what is distinguished by the 'civilized state,' is said to be 'in a state of nature.' The phrases are thus employed in contrast with each other. There can be no doubt, but the development of the human faculties is more or less procrastinated or quickened by circumstances; such as the means of easy or difficult subsistence, climate, education, revolutions in nature, and revolutions in governments; but that the greater or less degree of development of men born and living in different countries, under totally different circumstances, shall be considered as constituting them different races of men, requires other and better reasons to support it, than any that have yet been assigned by the new philosophers.

Mr. Jefferson observes, if a state of nature is applicable to man, whose faculties are not yet developed, the embryo fœtus would be the highest term or grade of the state of nature; because, in that state, his faculties have received their least development. Is this reasoning, or what is it? Can any philosopher be named, modern or ancient, who ever said or thought, that man in a state of nature, had none of his faculties developed. Man, without any of his faculties developed, would lose the characteristic of man, and take his place among the beasts. It is to be wished, that our president had reserved his observations on this head, till 'the first instants of leisure he had at his disposal,' when they might have passed through (like that promised C. Lacépède's communication) a more mature digestion.

But, whilst Mr. Jefferson expresses the fatigue he experiences, on having eternally repeated the phrase, 'man in a state of nature,' has he no apprehensions, that the philosophers of Europe, who are entitled to that name, will laugh at seeing him eternally mounted upon the mammoth, and his ridiculous inquiries after his moose's skeleton, his deer's horns, and panther's skin. And is he not afraid also of the sneers of every man of common sense in the United States, when he suggests the probability of his scientific voyagers discovering a living megalonix in the territory of Louisiana? I would that he had consulted, before his putting of these things to paper, Erasmus on Folly, whether the toys and gimcracks of philosophy has ever yet made a philosopher; whether the road to the temple of Fame is that which he has actually taken; and whether the bones, horns and skins of animals, or even becatombs of the megalonix, brought from the wilds of Louisiana, at the expense of the mouth of Labour, could secure him the smallest niche in that immortal edifice.

It is to be lamented, if we connect Mr. Jefferson's character with that of the American people that the same precious littleness, we see enter into his philosophy, should also preponderate in almost every thing of a political nature, which comes from his pen. Perhaps his communications to congress ought to be left to the constitutional critics. There are, however, some curious things in his last, calculated to surprise, and which may have a tendency to prolong its existence, beyond the usual age of an ordinary message. We find in it, for example, that the interior frontier of the United States can be 'effectually' defended, by erecting some additional trading-houses, without the least support from, or necessity for, garrisons or military force; and, that the sea board and our harbour may, in like manner, and without the aid of fortresses, be defended by 'gun-boats,' which will require only to be manned by the 'seamen and militia of the place, in the moment they are wanting.' It is true, he suggests, that certain 'auxiliary means' may be subjoined, to render this last mode of defence more complete: but as he cautiously avoids using any expression, which might excite the idea, that he thereby intended fortifications, or an augmentation of the navy, it is to be presumed, that what is here meant, is something more effectual than either or both, which will be divulged in due season.

One other remark on this message. The president, on the very threshold of his communication, and in the tone of tender sympathy, expresses no little pleasure that the other nations of Europe have not been drawn into the war, raging between the two great belligerent powers; in different words, that England cannot induce other European powers to make a common cause with her. Why is this a reason for rejoicing in the United States? And wherefore does he volunteer between France and England? Was he ignorant that England alone was desirous of allies, and that allies may be essential to the establishment of the peace of Europe on a just and solid basis? Did not policy, therefore, and the rules of neutrality equally demand from him perfect silence on this subject.

I conclude, by sincerely hoping, that the dread of war which is forever escaping from our president, in season, and out of season, and his curious systems of defence, may not bring upon the United States incalculable evils; and yet, it must be for wise, though unknown purposes, that this man is permitted, by Providence, to reign over us.

AN OBSERVER.

[From a British Essayist.]

ON THE IMPRUDENCE OF URGING INCORRIGIBLE DUNCES TO A LEARNED PROFESSION.

Inque eo vel maxime probavi summum illum doctorem Alabadensem Apollonium, qui, cum mercede doceret, tamen non patiebatur eos, quos judicabat non posse oratores evadere, operam apud sese perdere, et ad quam evadere artem putabat esse aptum, ad eam impellere atque hortari solebat. Satis est enim cæteris artificibus percipiendis, tantummodo similem esse hominis, et id quod tradatur, vel etiam inculcetur, siquis forte sit tardior, posse percipere animo, et memoria custodire.

CIC. DE ORAT. lib. i. sect. 28.

Of the multitudes, who are intended for the liberal professions, and furnished with the opportunities of a liberal education, the majority appears to be endowed with only such a share of natural talents, as enables them to reach a mediocrity of excellence; and many are so little favoured by nature, as to continue, after much labour and time bestowed in vain, utterly incapable of receiving benefit from literary instruction.

The mediocrists, if I may venture to give them that name, constitute the greater part of mankind, and become very useful and respectable members of society. They are found to undergo labour with patience, and to rise, by care and perseverance, to heights of excellence, which even genius, attended with idleness, cannot attain. Their understandings are not bright and shining; but they are strong and solid: and who does not know that the pick-axe and the spade would be in no respect the better for the acuteness of the razor; and that, in ordinary work, the hammer, the beetle, and the mallet, are as necessary as the chisel?

Of the mediocrist I do not at present speak, but of the dunce; of him whom the ancients would have stigmatised with the epithet Boetian, and of whom they would have said, rather harshly, that his soul was given him only to preserve, like salt, his body from putrefaction.*

Such boys are certainly to be treated with mildness and compassion. Ridiculous as their blunders appear, they ought to be passed over with tacit connivance, or the gentlest reproof. They can no more avoid their stupidity by any efforts of their own, than the blind and deaf can supply the defects of their senses, by their own exertion. Their happiness should be consulted by their parents, and by all humane persons who are connected with them; and they should be placed in such situations in life, as may least expose them to contempt, and enable them to act their part with the most decency. The scope of my present attempt is to contribute what can be contributed to their ease and their credit. As to their improvement in learning, he, to whom the task of instructing them is allotted, has an employment like the rolling of the rebounding stone, or the filling of the perforated vessel. Pretenders, incited by interested motives, are indeed ready to undertake it with boldness; but honest men, and men of sense, will acknowledge, what they cannot but feel, that it is impossible.

I say, it is the duty of parents to consult the honour and happiness of such boys; but whether to place them at Latin school, and to confine them there ten or twelve years, and then to send them to college seven more, in order to fix them in a pulpit for life, is to consult their honour and their happiness, is a question to be determined by actual experience and observation. It appears to me that such a plan renders them as uneasy as their dull dispositions are capable of being, and at the same time exposes them to insult and ill-usage.

I will endeavour to describe the three states of such unfortunate boys; at school, at college, and in their profession.

At school, the dunce passes the dreary hours, days, and years, from seven to seventeen, under a restraint, which, to him must have all the horrors of imprisonment; for he has no relish for those employments, no desire for that excellence, the pursuit of which might fill the tedious interval. He sits patiently under the rod and cane, at a form, making dog-ears to dirty dictionaries. He is the last in his classes, a mere dead weight, the torment of his instructors, and the laughing-stock of his livelier companions. His ears are stunned with reprimands, and his back galled with stripes. He paces along, like the mill-horse, always driven on, but never advancing. The school-room is to him a Bastille or a slave-galley. No bright idea from his books cheers his gloomy way; and if nature had not given him an incrustation of stupidity, like the shell of the oyster or the tortoise, he would be more wretched than the negroes of the West Indies, groaning under an Egyptian bondage. But if his ease is thus secured, it is not so with his honour. He is the standing butt of ridicule, the scorn and outcast of the little society.

At length he is emancipated, not in consequence of his attainments, but his age. Too tall for school, he is sent to college. There, indeed, he feels himself at liberty; and soon learns to fill up the vacancies, which dogs, horses, and guns, leave him, with ale, port, and gentle slumber. He finds no difficulty in procuring from good-natured companions the exercises which are required. He can purchase them of some poor servitor, unless his father has been slack in his remittances. So far well; but there are examinations, which must be undergone in person. Here he is miserably exposed; and, if not quite destitute of feeling, wretchedly uneasy from the fear of a disgraceful repulse. After much trouble, he goes through the ordeal, by the candour of good-natured judges, who would rather strain a point of conscience, than ruin a young man's interest and expectations; especially, as there is a good living purchased for him, that only waits for his acceptance of it. He obtains his degrees and his orders at last; but not without misery and disgrace. Rejoiced at gaining the ultimate object of his education, he mounts his hunter, and turns his back on schools, colleges, libraries, and books, the bane of his happiness, the causes of his dishonour.

He takes possession of his vicarage. He likes the house, the stables, the dog-kennel, the pasture ground, and the income; but the church and the pulpit are the great drawbacks of his felicity. He has no inclination for clerical or literary employments. He hates the sight of a book, and would as soon think of shooting his best pointer, as composing a sermon. He is strict and rigid in collecting his tithes; but when the business is done, he finds his time an intolerable burden; and knows no method of alleviating it, but in such amusements as give offence to the serious part of his parish. He becomes a kind of gamekeeper and huntsman to all the esquires around, acts as master of the ceremonies at all the little balls, and plays so keenly at whist (for dunces often excel at cards), that most people are afraid to sit down with him.

He is not unconscious that he is acting out of character. He perceives that he is not respected as a clergyman, though courted by the lower orders, as a bon companion. He consoles himself by the consideration, that not himself, but his parents, were blameable, who placed him in a profession most repugnant to his nature and inclinations. He feels himself, as a clergyman, like a fish out of water, a dog taught to dance, or a learned pig.

Had he been fixed in a shop, or in any mode of life, where learning is not required, he might have been happy and respectable. He would have made a good brewer, grocer, draper, builder, brazier, pewterer, or plumber, though he is but a sorry divine. In his present situation, he is as unhappy as his blunt feelings will allow him to be; and as to credit and esteem, he is as little respected as the sexton of his parish.

I conclude, therefore, that parents, who bring up dunces to the church, because they are dunces, do not consult the honour and happiness of their children; but expose them to as much misery as their natures are capable of feeling, and to as much disgrace, as can easily be incurred, without the commission of a crime.

LEVITY.

MODERN MANNERS AND STYLE.

[From a British paper.]

Although it may appear presumptuous to anticipate any of the decisions of posterity, it seems not improbable, that a century hence, the present may be denominated the age of taste. Taste is a word which occurs more frequently than any other in all our printed annals; and our posterity must naturally imagine that it was a principle which in our times pervaded all animated nature and all movable art. What it is, those who come after us may be as much at a loss to define, as we are ourselves; but that it is something, and a very important something, they must conclude from every species of evidence.

It would, however, be prudent in us to afford our children's children some data by which they might form an idea of this universal principle or passion. We cannot, it is hoped, be wholly inattentive to our character in future times; it behoves us, therefore, to remove those perplexities which obscure them, and must hereafter render our conduct paradoxical. But in what manner we can do this, by what laws we shall reduce our taste to a common standard, by what means we shall limit the objects of taste, or persuade our successors that we have not forgotten the meaning of the word, are difficulties which appear insuperable. So many usurpers have arisen to dictate in all matters of taste, and to extend its boundaries over persons and things, it was never intended to control, that we despair of seeing a regular government established in place of that revolutionary tribunal, which changes its laws and regulations, at least, every moon, and leaves no room for reflection or appeal to original principles.

At this season of the year taste presides over routes, and balls, and dinners. In these, we perceive that it consists of the aggregate of crowded rooms, chalked floors, and variegated lamps. When these are described by the able historian whose province it is to record such associations, we seem to have all which association can give us. In those splendid entertainments which formerly were denominated dinners and suppers, but which, by a fortunate coalition, are thrown into one, and called dinner-suppers, taste is displayed in an exhibition of articles, some of which are not intended, and some are unfit, to be eaten; and extreme taste, or that which merits and receives the eulogiums of the historians above mentioned, consists in the lateness of the hour of assembling. Hence some have supposed that taste is more particularly connected with midnight, and that the light of the sun, for some reasons not openly avowed, has of late years become particularly obnoxious to persons of true taste.

When we have once agreed to regulate our time by the principles of taste, it is but a slight transition to place our dress under the same control; but here it must be confessed we are every day departing farther and farther from any thing like a standard. A few years ago, taste prescribed that dress should not only be applied to decorate the person but to become an integral part of the human body; hence the addition of cork rumps, wax bosoms, and other articles necessary to complete the work which Nature had very unaccountably left unfinished. But taste, which sometimes enjoins superfluities, will occasionally deny its votaries common necessities; and accordingly has lately prescribed that nature, which by the former experiments was found incapable of improvement, should be publicly exposed, and those objects displayed which had been concealed for near a century before. This is now, in a great measure true taste, and has been attended with some very singular effects in the manufacturing world. We are assured by an eminent artist, that a dress may now be made so exceedingly fine and thin, that it may be either carried in a pocket-book, or conveyed by the two-penny post to any part of the town.

But while this taste prevails with the female habiliments, the gentlemen have a rule of taste peculiar to themselves, and which can best be described by saying, that it is the very reverse of the former.—With the ladies, it is the object to show how little will do for dress; with the gentlemen, how much they can carry without fatigue. Hence the total disuse of silk, linen, and cambric, and the substitution of broad-cloth and leather. But this too is taste, and as such has the effect of law. The lords of the creation have tailors and boot-makers for their preceptors, and jockies or coachmen for their examples. With such instruction, how can they be otherwise than deeply learned in affairs of taste?

In our amusements, we have likewise a taste appropriate to them: This in the drama is no longer the province of the author, but of the scene-painter, the scene-shifter, and the carpenter; nor would it be just to deprive the musical composer of his due share in this compound taste, for he has done wonders. By dressing the author's dialogue sometimes in a solemn suite of semibreves, and sometimes in the plain garb of minims; by sometimes helping him out with crotchets, and sometimes pricking him on with quavers and semiquavers, he has given to gross nonsense a refined taste, and has kept incapacity out of sight with astonishing ingenuity.

In books, too, there is a taste not very different from this; for as in the drama our taste depends on the painter, and carpenter, and the musician, so in books we owe it to the stationer, the printer, the engraver, and the book-binder. The stationer affords superfine wire-wove paper hot-pressed; the printer supplies types as fine as copper-plates, "with a rivulet of text flowing through a meadow of margin;" the binder makes the author pass for a man of taste, by his elegant

But while every article of life has a taste affixed to it, it cannot be concealed that some have very seriously objected to the word; and at present, if our information be not incorrect, another is substituted which is yet more unintelligible, and consequently better adapted to general purposes. This is STYLE. One man lives in a very genteel style, while another rode his horse last Sunday, in the park, in a very pretty style. Mrs. Siddons's style of playing Lady Macbeth is much admired, but not more than Mr. Hoby's style of boot-tops. Mr. Fox's style of oratory is supposed to resemble that of Demosthenes, but no comparison has yet been found for the style in which Lady——'s ball-room was chalked last Wednesday. Few men are much commended for their prudent conduct in domestic arrangements; but some of the most celebrated heroes of Bond street are celebrated for doing things in style.

So general is the application of this magical word, that the newspaper critics have had a prodigious addition to their necessary employments, and are sometimes expatiating on the style of an epic poem, and sometimes descanting on the style of a grand dinner; sometimes examining the style of a treaty, and at other times enlarging on the style of a song; sometimes displaying their architectural taste on the style of a suit of rooms, and sometimes proving the diversity of their talents in the style of a pas des deux; sometimes informing us that a member of parliament spoke in an animated style, and sometimes expatiating on the interesting style of a girl who appeared at the Old Bailey for stealing quart-pots; sometimes they describe the most stylish dresses at the Opera, and sometimes they repose on the style of Madame Recamier's bed, or instruct us in the style which has changed a tub into a chariot, and a coach-box into a dicky.

From these specimens it appears that style may in time accomplish the abolition of taste, and that upon the whole it may be more safe and useful, since there are a few who yet remember the old meaning of taste. It remains, however, to be added, that there are some affairs of high life and low life, to which neither taste nor style can be applied. There is nothing yet said to be stylish in the common disorders to which mankind are subject, such as fevers, &c. nor have we heard of any man of fashion having a fit of the gout in a good style. Nervous complaints, indeed, are in some degree connected with style, and there are taste and elegance in the hectic flush, of which we hear frequently. But, in general, pain is not very interesting, nor is there any standard of taste in agonies. As to death, it has long been voted a bore, and no person of ton will allow it to be mentioned with patience.

Nor has style been yet extended to the affairs of the nation; nobody speaks of the style of the late war (which indeed was somewhat confused) nor of the late peace. An act of parliament has yet nothing genteel or stylish about it. Nor are the courts of law under any order in this respect. We hear now and then of a barrister giving a stylish dinner, or making a stylish figure at a masquerade; but he deserves none of this praise when he addresses a jury. Our judges give no charges in a stylish manner; and although criminals are dressed in style, and "look very interesting," they are transported or hanged in the most vulgar manner imaginable. It cannot be denied, however, that some men, by an excess of attention to the fleeting style or taste of the day, have brought themselves into those situations which are extremely awkward for a gentleman, because nothing in which he is accomplished can be of the least service.

R. S.

CRITICISM.

John Woodvil: a Tragedy. By Charles Lamb. To which are added, Fragments of Burton, the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy. Robinsons. London. 1802.

(Concluded.)

If the plot and characters of 'John Woodvil' be not sufficient to establish its antiquity, its language will powerfully concur. The most ancient versification was probably very rude. That of Mr. Lamb is at least of equal rudeness, and has sometimes even a greater resemblance to the varieties of ancient measure, than to the unvarying English heroic. The servants, to preserve that due respect, which should always be paid to rank, speak in prose; but the gradation is not nicely observed, as Mr. Sandford, the steward, talks as good blank verse as his master. He thus heroically rates his inferiors;

Which of you, as I entered, spake of betraying?
Was it you, or you, or, thin face, was it you? p. 14.

Margaret, the ward, though a tender female, talks also in very becoming and resolute blank verse:

I pray you, spare me, Doctor Sandford,
And once for all believe, nothing can shake my purpose.

Nor are the sentiments less characteristic of the age, than the versification. The figures are often very bold, and have all the careless indelicacy of merely ancient manners. In a soliloquy, John thus describes the variety of his passions;

Ambition, Pleasure, Vanity, all by turns,
Shall lie in my bed, and keep me fresh and waking.

Even old Sir Walter gives the following advice to his son;

You to the court, where now your brother John Commits a rape on Fortune. p. 47.

In page 74, after the very courteous question, 'Or stay; you keep no wench?' the last word is beautifully varied in a climax of synonymies, and, in page 77, there is a protracted simile, for which our page is much too modern.

Of the real language of feeling, there is not any which can offend the nicest antiquary. On the contrary, there is a very laudable want of it, in a situation, in which there was a great risk of error. We allude to the speech of Simon, after the sudden death of his father, which is so striking an instance of danger shunned, that it is worthy of insertion:

How is it with you, Sir Walter? Look up sir; the villains are gone. He hears me not, and this deep disgrace of treachery in his son hath touched him even to the death. O most distuned and disempowered world, where sons talk their aged fathers into their graves! Garrulous and diseased world, and still empty, rotten, and hollow talking world, where good men decay, states turn round in an endless mutability, and still for the worse, nothing is at a stay, nothing abides but vanity, chaotic vanity.—Brother, adieu!

There lies the parent stock, which gave us life,
Which I will see consign'd with tears to earth:
Leave thou the solemn funeral rites to me,
Grief and a true remorse abide with thee. p. 83.

The prediction, that he is to weep at the funeral, has a pathos truly original, though certainly rather inconsistent with the unequal division which he afterwards makes, reserving only the funeral rites to himself, and consigning all the grief to his brother, to have and to hold forever.

The passages which we have already quoted, are, we trust, sufficient to justify our opinion of the age of the present drama. We might have selected many other passages of equal antiquity. The whole is indeed almost uniformly venerable, and will be justly appreciated by all who are desirous of possessing a complete specimen of the drama in its state of pristine rudeness.

The tragedy is accompanied with two little pieces, a 'balad from the German,' which, though it have not made Schiller more pathetic, has certainly, in converting him to methodism, made him much more pious; and 'Helen,' a song in which though we sometimes discerned the manner of that person of quality, who assisted the wits of Queen Anne's reign, we thought, till we had read the appended fragments of Burton, that it was, in every respect, an original piece, and an original of more value, from the probable rarity of any future productions, which might resemble it. It is addressed to a lady, whose love the author is supposed to have long sought in vain, and for whom, when at length compliant, he finds that his love has perished. But the most singular circumstance is, that with love surpassing that of Pygmalion, he still weeps to the picture of her whom he scorns, 'nor ever sleeps, complaining all night long to her.' Such violence of distress must be merely the continuance of an old habit; and it is perhaps only physically, because her tenderness would interfere with this habit, that he no longer feels regard for the living Helen. The real reason of his coolness he leaves us to guess, by putting it in the form of a query.

Can I, who loved my beloved,
But for the scorn was in her eye;
Can I be moved for my beloved,
When she returns me sigh for sigh? p. 106.

We own, that we do not discover the reason of this impossibility. That any one should love scorn merely as scorn, is inconceivable; and her sympathy is certainly no reason for the change, unless he prefer his own solitary grief to her for whom he grieves. If he had frankly owned, that she was now not so lovely as when younger, we should at least have understood his meaning; but, in that case, he would not have been enamoured, till the very moment of her melting, as the deteriorations of age must have been gradual, and not dependant on a single smile. The two lines which close the poem,

Helen, grown old, no longer cold,
Said, "You to all men I prefer." p. 107.

are most singularly placed. At the beginning, they would have been very communicative; but at the conclusion, they tell us nothing; since the fact, without the knowledge of which the preceding verses must have been unintelligible, was therefore graciously expressed before. Mr. Lamb had perhaps heard, that poems of this kind should end with a point; and wisely reflecting, that the beginning of any thing is as much a point as its end, was too good an economist of his time, to consume it, in elaborating and polishing an useless conclusion.

The extracts from a common-place book of Burton, are recommended only by their quaintness and party-coloured learning. There is one sentence, which Mr. Lamb introduced perhaps as descriptive of his own compositions.

The fruit, issue, children, of these my morning meditations, have been certain crude, impolite, incomposite, hirsute, what shall I say? verses. p. 125.

If this was really intended by him, we must add to the praise we have already given him for poetic talent, our still higher commendation of the justness of his criticism; nor is it a matter of little moment to us, that we are thus able to commend with a safe conscience, when we remember, that Mr. Lamb is that friend of Coleridge, whose verses he deems so worthy of all honour, as to fix his direst anathema on the presumptuous critics who shall venture to express their disapprobation; 'Quem si quis non amet, illum omnes Gratiae et Veneres odere.' FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ADVICE TO A JOURNALIST.

The pleasure afforded by your journal will be much enlarged, by adorning it, occasionally, with

* Preface to the Poems of Coleridge, Lloyd, and Lamb, 2d edit.

those little fugitive pieces of merit, with which the port-folios of the curious are filled. There are verses of the duke of Nevers, of the earl Anthony, Hamilton, (born in France) which breathe, sometimes, poetic fire; at others, the smooth facility of the epistolary style. There are a thousand charming little works of Messrs Dussé, St. Aulaire, Farrand, la Faye, Fleubat, the president Hénault, and many others. Trifles of this kind, were formerly sufficient to establish the reputation of the Voitures, the Sarasins, and the Chapelles. Such merit was then rare. It is now more common, and contributes less to celebrity; but it does not afford less pleasure to delicate readers. Our songs are superior to those of Anacreon, and their number is astonishing. There are some in which morality and gaiety are blended, and which, if announced with art, would by no means debase a serious journal. The publication of such a song as the following, from the pen of the author of le Double Veuve, would tend to improve the taste without corrupting the morals.

Philis, plus avare que tendre,
Ne gagnant rien à refuser,
Un jour exigea de Lisandre
Trente moutons pour un baiser.

Le lendemain nouvelle affaire,
Pour le berger le troc fut bon,
Car il obtint de la bergère
Trente baisers pour un mouton.

Le lendemain Philis, plus tendre,
Craignant de déplaire au berger,
Fut trop heureuse de lui rendre
Trente moutons pour un baiser.

Le lendemain Philis, plus sage,
Aurait donné moutons et chien
Pour un baiser que le volage
A Lisette donné pour rien.

As new books, worthy of your examination, do not present themselves every day, these little fragments of literature will very well fill the void of your journal. If there be any works in prose or verse, which make a noise in Paris, on which opinions are divided, and which require liberal and luminous criticism, then it is that you should dare to act as a master to the public without seeming to be so; and conducting them, as it were, by the hand, point out the beauties without emphasis, and the faults without acrimony.—Thus will you render that criticism amiable in you, which, in others, is regarded with detestation and contempt.

One of my friends, examining three epistles of Rousseau, in verses of ten syllables, which some time since excited much complaint, made of the second, in which all our authors are insulted, the following examen, of which I present you a specimen, dictated by justice and moderation. The epistle which he examined commences thus:

Tout institut, tout art, toute police
Subordonnée au pouvoir du caprice,
Doit être aussi conséquemment pour tous,
Subordonnée à nos différens goûts.
Mais de ces goûts la dissemblance extrême,
A le bien prendre, est un faible problème;
Et quoi qu'on dise, on n'en saurait jamais
Compter que deux l'un bon, l'autre mauvais.
Par des talens que le travail cultive,
A ce premier pas à pas on arrive;
Et le public que sa bonté prévient,
Pour quelque temps s'y fixe et s'y maintient.
Mais éblouis enfin par l'étincelle
De quelque mode inconnue & nouvelle,
L'ennui du beau nous fait aimer le laid,
Et préférer le moindre au plus parfait, &c.

The examen follows:

This first verse, Tout institut, tout art, toute police, seems to have the defect, I do not say of being prosaic, for all these epistles are so; but of being prose rather too feeble, and destitute of elegance and perspicuity.

La police seems to have no connexion with the taste in question. Again, is the term police admissible in verse?

Conséquemment is hardly admissible in elevated prose.

The repetition of the word subordonnée would be vicious, even were the term elegant, and is intolerable; for this term is an expression more appropriate to business than to poetry.

La dissemblance does not seem to be the proper word. La dissemblance des goûts est un faible problème: I do not believe that to be French.

A le bien prendre appears to be an expression too useless and too vulgar.

Finally, it seems that a problème is neither weak, nor strong: it may be easy or difficult, and its solution may be weak, equivocal, erroneous.

Et quoiqu'on dise, on n'en saurait jamais
Compter que deux, l'un bon, l'autre mauvais.

Not only does amiable poetry with difficulty admit of this air of dilemma, and such a want of embellishment; but reason is offended to see in eight verses, that all art is subordinate to our different tastes, and that still there are but two tastes. Arriver au goût pas à pas, is also, I think, a mode of expression rather improper, even in prose.

Et le public, que sa bonté prévient.

Is it la bonté of the public? or is it la bonté of the taste?

L'ennui du beau nous fait aimer le laid.
Et préférer le moindre au plus parfait.

1. 'Le beau et le laid' are expressions appropriate to low comedy. 2. If we love 'le laid,' it is unnecessary to add that we prefer le moins parfait. 3. Le moindre is not grammatically opposed to le plus parfait. 4. Le moindre is a word which is never admissible in poetry, &c.

Thus did this critic shew, without acrimony, the imbecility of these Epistles. There were not thirty verses in all the works of Rousseau, composed in Germany, which escaped his just censure. And the better to instruct young persons, he compared this work with another of the same author, on a literary subject, nearly similar. He cited the verses of the Epistle to the Muses, an imitation of Despréaux; and this object of comparison was more persuasive than the most solid and subtle discussions.

From the exposition of all these verses of ten syllables, he took occasion to shew that verses of five feet ought never to be confounded with marotic verses. He proved that the style, which is called that of Marot, is admissible only in an epigram or a tale, as the figures of the Calot are only admissible in the grotesque. But when we deck reason in verse, when it is necessary to paint, to move the passions, to write with elegance; then this monstrous mixture of the language, which was in use two centuries ago, with that of our time, appears to be the most reprehensible abuse, which has crept into poetry. Marot spoke his language—let us speak ours. This confused medley excites as much disgust in judicious men, as the combination of Gothic with modern architecture. You will have frequent occasion to destroy this false taste. Young persons addict themselves to this style, because, unfortunately, it is easy.

It perhaps, was not without difficulty, that Despréaux elegantly said;

Faites choix d'un censeur solide et salulaire,
Que la raison conduise et le savoir éclaire,
Et dont le crayon sûr d'abord aille chercher;
L'endroit que l'on sent faible, et qu'on veut se cacher.

But if it be very difficult, is it very elegant to say?

Donc si Phoebus ses Œhecs vous adjuge,
Pour bien juger consultez tout bon juge,
Pour bien jouer, hantez les bons joueurs;
Surtout craignez le poison des loueurs;
Acostez vous de fidèles critiques.

We must not, however, condemn familiar verses in these pieces of poetry; on the contrary, they are, like the joints of the human body, or rather, like repose on a journey, necessary.

Nam sermone opus est, modo tristi, saepe jocoso,
Defendente vices modo rhetoris, atque poetæ,
Interdum urbani parentis viribus, atque
Extenuantis eas consulto.

Every thing should not be ornamented, but nothing ought to be disgusting. An obscure and grotesque style is not simplicity; it is affected vulgarity.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

ANN HUNT & SMITH.

Mr. Garrow stated, that in this case he certainly had not to present persons of high or exalted situations in life, nor the case of a very young lady, who had been romantically enamoured of her lover, and considered the loss of him as the greatest of all possible evils which could happen to this mortal state: but he had to present to the Jury the case of a decent woman, keeping a small shop, who complained of a Breach of Promise of Marriage, against the Defendant, who was a man of her own rank and station in life. Although the parties were neither of them very young, yet he knew that the Learned Serjeant on the other side would not contend that a woman at the age of 35 might not fairly look forward to many years of comfort in the matrimonial state. He should prove that the Defendant courted her, and solicited her hand in marriage, to which she gave her consent. He should also prove, that in consequence of this the Defendant himself signed the authority for publishing the banns, as a necessary preliminary to the ceremony. But, however, from some cause or other best known to the Defendant himself, he thought proper to alter his opinion, and he sent a person (no better than his own errand boy) to forbid the banns publicly in the Church, having by this disgraced the Plaintiff publicly before all her neighbours, and for which, of the present action, she sought to recover a compensation from the hands of the Jury.

The first witness called to prove the plaintiff's case was one John Paterson. He begged he might not be interrupted by any questions from the Counsel, and he would state the whole affair. He knew the Defendant very well, he was a stone-cutter, and kept two shops, one at Riverhead, the other at Tunbridge. The Plaintiff, the widow Hunt, also lived at Tunbridge, where she kept a grocer's and chandler's shop. In the month of February last, Smith told him he thought he should marry again, and that he had found a woman who would suit him. The witness told him that if he was not quite provided, he also knew a woman, who, he conceived, would be the very thing for him. They then proposed to have a pint or two of beer together at Tunbridge, which they did.—The witness then observed, that he would take him to a shop where they would buy a penny worth of sugar-candy, and there he might see the very lady herself, of whom he had been speaking. The plaintiff accordingly went to the shop, bought a penny-worth of shag tobacco, instead of sugar-candy. He returned shortly to see the witness, and told him he had engaged to go back and drink tea with the Lady. The witness, from his ludicrous manner of telling the story,

MELANGES OF LITERATURE, AND LITERARY ANECDOTES.

I comprehend under the name of Melanges of Literature, all the detached fragments of history, of eloquence, of morality, of criticism, and those little romances, which so often appear. We have master-pieces in all these departments. I do not ber of fine works in the belles lettres. It is true, the facility of this species of composition produces a crowd of authors; we could count four or five thousand, within the last century. But a reader acts with respect to books, as a citizen does towards men. We do not live on terms of friendship or believe that any nation can boast of so great a familiarity with all our contemporaries; we make choice of a few friends. We ought not to be more alarmed at finding a hundred and fifty thousand volumes in the king's library, than at seeing seven hundred thousand persons in Paris. Works of pure literature, in which we often find agreeable matter, afford amusement to the well-bred man; relaxation to the studious man, in the interval of his labours, and maintain, in the nation, that intellectual refinement, and that delicacy, which form its character.

Do not condemn, with severity, every thing that is inferior to la Rochefoucault or la Fayette, every thing that is not as perfect as the Conspiracy of Venice, by the abbé de St. Real, as agreeable and as original, as the Conversation of Father Canaye and the marshal Hocquincourt, composed by Charleval, and to which St. Evremont has added a sequel, less pleasant, and rather languid; in fine, every thing, that is not as natural, as delicate, as sprightly, as the voyage, although rather unequal, of Bachaumont and la Chapelle.

Non, si primores Maconius tenet
Sedes Homerus, Pindaricæ latent,
Cæaque, et Alcæi minaces,
Stesichorique graves camenæ:

Nec, si quid olim lusit Anacreon,
Delevit ætas; spirat adhuc amor,
Vivuntque commissi calores
Æolii fidibus puellæ.

In the exposition, that you shall make of those ingenious productions, sporting, as they do, with your readers, and strewing flowers, with those authors, of whom you shall speak, you will not adopt the severity of some critics, who wish every thing to be written in the style and taste of Cicero and Quintilian. They exclaim, that eloquence is enervated, that pure taste is gone, because a brilliant oration has been pronounced at an academy, which would not be proper at the bar. They wish that a tale should be written in the style of Bourdeloue. Will they never distinguish times, places, and persons? Do they desire that Jacob, in the Paysan parvenu, should express himself in the manner of Pelisson or Patru? A noble, masculine eloquence, rejecting little ornaments, is suitable to all great works. A thought, too affectedly refined, would be a blemish in the discourse of the eloquent Bossuet, upon universal history. But in a light work, in a compliment, in a piece of pleasantry, all the sprightly graces, simplicity or finesse, the most trifling ornaments, find their place. Let us examine ourselves. Do we speak of business, in the style of table talk? Books are pictures of human life; some should be solid, others pleasant.

Neglect not, in citing the ingenious traits of all these books, to designate those, which have some resemblance to them among other nations, or in our ancient authors. Few thoughts are suggested, that may not be found in Seneca, in Grætan, in Montaigne, in Bacon, in the English Spectator. To compare them together, (and in this does taste consist) is to excite authors to say, if it be possible, new things; it is to encourage emulation, the mother of the arts. What a gratification to a delicate reader, to perceive, at one view, those ideas, which Horace has expressed in negligent verses, but in words so expressive; what Boileau rendered with so much correctness; what Dryden and Rochester have revived and embellished with the fire of their genius! These parallels resemble comparative anatomy, which gives us a knowledge of nature. Thus will you frequently shew, not only what an author has said, but what he might have said; for if you merely repeat his expressions, where is the utility of a journal?

Particular attention should be paid to literary anecdotes, respecting which the public ought to be informed, that every person may enjoy that which belongs to him. Tell the public, for example, the chef-d'œuvre d'un inconnu, or Mathanasius, is from the pen of M. de Sallengre, and of an illustrious mathematician, perfectly versed in every kind of literature, and in whom wit and erudition are blended; finally, that it is from the pen of all those persons, who were engaged, at the Hague, in conducting the Literary Journal; and that M. de St. Hyacinthe produced the song with many remarks. But if, with this piece of pleasantry, an infamous pamphlet be connected, worthy of a member of the vilest rabble, and written, undoubtedly, by one of those corrupt Frenchmen, who migrate to foreign countries, to disgrace the belles lettres and their native country, depict the horror and the ridiculousness of this monstrous assemblage.

Be always foremost to defend good authors against the attacks of obscure Zoiluses; unravel the artifice of envy; proclaim, for example, that the enemies of our illustrious Racine procured some old forgotten pieces to be reprinted, in which they inserted more than a hundred verses of this admirable poet, for the purpose of inspiring a belief that he had purloined them. I have seen one of them, entitled 'St. John the Baptist,' in which an almost entire scene of 'Berenice' was inserted. Those wretches, blinded by passion, were insensible even to the difference of style, and imagined that we might be deceived; so absurd is the fury of jealousy.

In defending good authors against ignorance and envy, which impute bad works to them, be equally attentive to prevent the attribution, to great men, of books, in themselves, perhaps good, but to which it is attempted to give celebrity, by employing illustrious names, to which they do not belong. The abbé de St. Pierre revives a bold and difficult project, he publishes it, under the name of a dauphin of France. Shew, in decorous language, that a person ought not, without the strongest proof, to attribute such a work to a prince, born to govern.

This project of pretended universal peace, attributed to Henry IV, by the secretaries of Maximilian de Sulli, who composed his memoirs, is nowhere to be found. The Memoirs of Villerot speak not of it; no trace of it appears in any work of that time. Add, to this silence the consideration of the state, in which Europe then was, and see whether so wise a prince as the great Henry, was capable of forming a project, whose execution was impossible.

If the famous book, under the title 'The Political Testament of the Cardinal de Richelieu,' be reprinted, which, I am informed, is intended, shew how doubtful it is that this minister is the author of it.

I. Because the manuscript was never seen nor known by his heirs, nor by the minister, who succeeded him.

II. Because it was printed thirty years after his death, and was not previously announced.

III. Because the editor does not even dare to mention the name of the person from whom he received the manuscript, what has become of it, in whose hands it has been deposited.

IV. Because the style is very different from that of the other works of the cardinal de Richelieu.

V. Because they give him a signature, which he did not use.

VI. Because there are many ideas and expressions in this work, unsuitable to a great minister, addressing himself to a great king. It is not probable, that so polite a man as the cardinal de Richelieu, called the maid of honour of the queen la du Fargis, as if he had spoken of a public woman. Is it probable that the minister of a king, who had attained his fortieth year, gave him lessons more proper for a young dauphin, who is receiving his education, than for a monarch at a mature age, on whom he was dependent?

In the first chapter, he proves that chastity is indispensable. Is a discourse of this kind proper in the mouth of a minister, who publicly kept more mistresses than his master, and who was not suspected of so much reserve with them? In the second chapter, he advances this novel proposition, that reason ought to be the rule of conduct. In another, that Spain, by giving a million a year to the Protestants, had made the Indies, which supplied this money, tributary to hell: an expression more worthy of a bad orator, than of a wise minister, as the cardinal was. In another, he calls the duke of Mantua 'this poor prince.' Finally, is it probable, that he would have related to the king certain bon mots of Bar-true, and a hundred similar trifles, in a Political Testament?

VII. How could the author of this Political Testament make the Cardinal de Richelieu say, (in the first pages of the work) that as soon as he was called to the council, he promised the king to humble his enemies, the Hugonots, and the great men of the kingdom? Should it not have been remembered, that the Cardinal de Richelieu restored to the council by the favour of the queen-mother, was only the second in that council for more than a year, and that he was then far from having the ascendancy over the mind of the king, and far from being prime minister?

VIII. It is pretended, (in the second chapter of the first book) that during five years, the king expended, in the war, sixty millions a year, which are equal to about one hundred and twenty millions of our money, and that he did this, without ceasing to pay the ordinary expenses of government, and without the aid of extraordinary supplies. And, on the contrary, (in the ninth chapter of the second part) he says, that in time of peace, about thirty-five millions a year were saved, from which it was still necessary to make a considerable deduction. Is there not an evident contradiction in these two calculations?

IX. Is it probable that the Cardinal de Richelieu called the parliaments 'sovereign courts,' and proposed, (Chap. 9. part 2.) that the taxes shall be paid to these 'sovereign courts'?

X. Is it probable that he proposed the suppression of the excise on salt? and is not this the project, rather of an idle politician, than of a great statesman?

XI. Finally, is it not incredible, that a minister, in the midst of the most vigorous war, should have entitled a chapter, 'Succinct narration of the actions of the king, until the peace'?

These are sufficient reasons for doubting that this great minister was the author of this book. I remember to have heard it said, in my childhood, by a very well informed old man, that the 'Political Testament' was the work of the abbé Bourzeys, one of the first academicians, and a man of very slender talents. But I believe it is more easy to know whose book this is not, than to discover the true author. Observe the weakness of human nature. This book is admired, because it is considered as the work of a great man. Were it known to be the production of the Abbé Bourzeys, it would be no longer read. Thus doing justice to all the world, weighing every thing in an exact balance, exert your whole force particularly against calumny.

We have seen, in Holland and elsewhere, some of those periodical works, apparently intended for instruction, but in fact composed for the purpose of defamation; we have seen authors, whom cupidity and malignity have transformed into mercenary satirists, and who have publicly sold their scandalous productions, as Locusta sold poisons. Among those, who have thus disgraced literature and humanity, permit me to mention one, who, as a reward for the greatest service that one man can render to another, declared himself, during so many years, my most cruel enemy. He has publicly printed, distributed, and sold an infamous libel, which merited all the severity of the laws: he has been afterwards seen, with the same hand, which had written and distributed these calumnies, disavowing them with almost as much ignominy, as he had published them. 'I should consider myself dishonoured,' said he in his declaration delivered to the magistrates, 'I should consider myself dishonoured, if I had had the smallest participation in this libel, which is a barefaced calumny, written against a man, for whom I entertain the highest sentiments of esteem, &c.

Signed, L'Abbé DESFONTAINES.

To such miserable extremities is a person reduced, when he makes so detestable a use of the art of writing.

I have read in a book, which bears the title of Journal, that it is not astonishing that the Jesuits sometimes espouse the cause of the illustrious Wolf, because all the Jesuits are atheists.

Courageously denounce these execrable arts of injustice, and make the authors of these infamous productions feel, that public contempt and indignation will be eternally their portions.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF J. LANGHORNE.

[The author of the "Fables of Flora" has too many titles to the admiration of the friends of Genius, to be neglected in a miscellany, whose constant object is, to do justice to literary merit. We wish to attract attention to this writer, for another reason. He is the best translator of Plutarch's Lives, that has yet appeared. A very vulgar version, and, unfortunately for the interests of correct taste, a very common one in America, was published many years ago, under the abused name of Dryden. The genius of that poet was as little concerned in that vile translation, as the honesty of the literary jobbers, who caused the Greek to be done into English. It was wholly unworthy of the original, and a disgrace to the learning, as well as the style of the hirelings, who undertook it. They probably never had read the Greek, except in a French page, and their style was modelled after the 'Alsatia' pattern of Sir Roger L'Estrange. LANGHORNE has done justice to the injured Greek, and exhibited the strength and grace of a pure English style.]

Of the personal history of Langhorne, the present writer is sorry, that the information he has obtained, is so scanty, that he must give his Life to the world, much more briefly than his rank in literature and poetry deserves.

John Langhorne was born at Kirkby-Stephen, on "the banks of the Eden," in Westmoreland, as appears from Burn's "History of Westmoreland," vol. I. p. 549, his "Ode to the River Eden," and his "Stanzas to the Genius of Westmoreland," in the "Effusions of Friendship and Fancy," vol. I. let. 25. The year of his birth is not ascertained. His father was the Rev. Joseph Langhorne of Winston; who, dying when he was young, left him and his brother William, to the care of his mother, whose virtues he has commemorated in his Monody on her death, 1759.

Source of my life, that led my tender years,
With all a parent's pious fears,
That nurs'd my infant thought, and taught my mind to grow.

The place of his education is unknown, nor does it appear from what seminary he obtained the academical honours, by which he was distinguished. His name is not to be found in the list of graduates either of Oxford or Cambridge.

From some circumstances which may be collected from his poems, he seems to have resided, between the years 1756 and 1758, near Studley, in Yorkshire. His "Elegy written among the Ruins of Pontefract Castle," is dated 1756, and his "Verses, left with the Minister of Ripendon," are dated 1758.

The first notice we find of him as an author, was in 1758, when several pieces of poetry, written by him, were inserted in "The Grand Magazine," a periodical work, published by Mr. Ralph Griffiths, the proprietor of the "Monthly Review," which continued only three years.

His first publication was "The Death of Adonis, a Pastoral Elegy, from Bion," 4to, 1759; which was followed in the same year, by "The Tears of Music, a poem to the memory of Mr. Handel, with an Ode to the River Eden," 4to.

After entering into holy orders, he became tutor to the sons of Robert Cracroft, Esquire, of Hackthorne, in Lincolnshire; and published, at Lincoln, a volume of "Poems on Several Occasions," 4to, 1760, for the benefit of a gentleman. In the preface to this volume, he says, "If any one, into whose hands this work may fall, should be dissatisfied with his purchase, let him remember that they are published for the relief of a gentleman in distress; and that he has not thrown away five shillings in the purchase of a worthless book, but contributed so much to the assistance of indigent merit. I had rather have my readers feel that pleasure, which arises from the sense of having done one virtuous deed, than all they can enjoy from the works of poetry and wit." The same year he published a "Hymn to Howe," 4to.

In 1760, he was at Clarehall, Cambridge, and wrote a poem on the accession of his present majesty, and the year following, an Ode on the Royal Nuptials, printed in the Cambridge collection of verses, and afterwards in "Solyman and Almena."

Soon after, he removed to London, engaged as a writer in the "Monthly Review," espoused the interest of Lord Bute, and became a frequent and successful publisher of various performances in prose and verse.

In 1762, he published "The Viceroy," a panegyric poem, addressed to the Earl of Halifax, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; which was followed, in the same year, by "Solyman and Almena," 12mo, an eastern tale; "Letters on Religious Retirement, Melancholy, and Enthusiasm, 8vo;" and "The Visions of Fancy, in four elegies."

In 1763, he stood forth in defence of Scotland, so rudely attacked by Churchill, in his celebrated "Prophecy of Famine," and published "Genius and Valour, a Pastoral Poem, written in honour of a Sister-kingdom," 4to. This poem is "inscribed to the Earl of Bute, as a testimony of respect from an impartial Englishman."

In the same year, he published "The Effusions of Friendship and Fancy, in several Letters to and from Select Friends," 2 vols. 12mo; "The Letters that passed between Theodosius and Constantia, after she had taken the veil, now first published from the original manuscripts," with a dedication to Warburton, 12mo; and "The Enlargement of the Mind, Epistle I. to General Crawford, written at Belvidere," near Dartford, in Kent, 4to. The second edition of the "Effusions" was published in 1766, with alterations and additions.

His connection with the "Monthly Review," and the desire he had shewn of discountenancing the prejudices of the times, and of testifying his respect for the character of Lord Bute, in his "Genius and Valour, exposed him, with Dr. Francis and Mr. Murphy, to the censure of Churchill, in the following lines of "The Candidate."

Why may not Langhorne, simple in his lay,
Effusion on Effusion pour away;
With Friendship and with Fancy trifle here,
Or sleep with Pastoral at Belvidere?
Sleep let them all with dulness on her throne,
Secure from any malice but their own.

In 1764, he published Sermons 2 vols. 12mo.

Having dedicated the "Letters of Theodosius and Constantia" to Warburton, he became known to that eminent prelate, by whose interest, it may be presumed, he was, in December, 1765, appointed assistant preacher at Lincoln's Inn.

The same year, he published "The Correspondence between Theodosius and Constantia, from their first acquaintance, to the departure of Theodosius," 12mo, with a poetical dedication to Coleman; "The poetical works of Mr. William Collins, with Memoirs of the Author, and Observations on his Genius and Writings," 12mo; Letters on the Eloquence of the Pulpit, 8vo; The Enlargement of the Mind, Epistle II. to William Langhorne, M. A." 4to.

His brother, to whom he inscribed this epistle, was himself a poet, and published "Job, a Poem," 4to, 1760, and "A poetical Paraphrase on some part of Isaiah," 4to, 1761. The habitudes of early affection seem to have been improved, by a similar-

ty. of taste and pursuits, into a friendship of uncommon ardour and sincerity.

—Thou partner of my life and name,
From one dear source, whom Nature form'd the same,
Allied more nearly in each nobler part,
And more the friend than brother of my heart!

In 1766, he published his "Poetical Works," in 2 vols. 12mo, with a poetical dedication to the Honourable Charles Yorke. This collection, included the pieces formerly printed separately, and The Fatal Prophecy, a Dramatic Poem, in five acts, written in 1765.

The same year, among other successful writers, he fell under the censure of Kelly, on account of some criticisms imputed to him, in the 'Monthly Review,' in the following harsh and illiberal invective in his 'Thespis, or Examination into the Merits of the principal Performers at Drury-Lane.' 4to.

Triumphant Duncce, illustrious Langhorne, rise,
And while whole worlds detest thee, and despise,
With rage uncommon, cruelly deny
Thy hapless muse ev'n privilege to die;
While Theodosius, basely torn from night,
Reeks, festers, stinks, and putrifies to sight,
And mad Constantia damns thy recreant name,
To drive with Flecknoe down the sink of Fame.
Say, with what charm, what magic art thou blest,
That grief or shame ne'er rankle in thy breast;
That ev'n mere instinct never points a way,
To fly from man, and refuge from the day?
Ne'er kindly tells thee of some pitying grave,
To snatch the blockhead, and to hide the slave?—
Oh! that like Langhorne, with a blushing face,
I bore the stroke of merited disgrace,
Like him, with some fine apathy of soul,
I stood the thunder, in its mightiest roll,
Smil'd, when the bolt indignantly was hurl'd,
Or gap'd, unconscious, on a scolding world!
Then could I view, with temper in my look,
The just damnation of a favourite book;
Could see my labours, with unaching eye,
Form the grand outwork of a glibet-pye,
Pil'd in nice order, for the suburb stalls,
Or sent in carts to Clement's at St. Paul's.
Then the sharp censure, or the biting jeer,
Had fall'n, all blunted, on my nerveless ear;
And leagu'd, perhaps, with ——— I might stand,
To save or damn, at random, through the land;
To blast each work of excellence, e'er known,
And write eternal praises of my own.

About this time he obtained or purchased the valuable rectory of Blagdon in Somersetshire, and was appointed a prebendary of Wells. He was also in the commission of the peace for the county of Somerset, and distinguished himself as an active and useful magistrate.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

Of the other Harangues of Cicero.

Perhaps, in translating this morsel, I have yielded, without perceiving it, to the pleasure of shewing you how much Cicero honoured the art of poetry. But I had another motive to undertake the translation of this discourse, and of several other choice passages in the orations of Cicero; it is because there are scarcely any authors whose works are less known by those who understand not his language. There is no translation which is generally known. Nothing of his works is generally read but his letters, which have been well enough translated by the abbe Montgault. The version of the philippics against Cataline, by the abbe D'Olivet is very indifferent, and I have not made any use of it any more than of those which Tourcil and Auger have given of Demosthenes and Eschines.

It is a pleasure to except from this condemnation, avowed by all good judges, the translation of some harangues of Cicero, forming a volume, which appeared some years ago, composed by two masters of the university of Paris, who have given proof of their modesty by taking seats among us, under the title of pupils, after having proved their talents to write and to teach, the two brothers Guérout, who are united by a taste for the same studies, as well as by natural and civic fraternity. Their work attests an equal knowledge of the two languages, and of the oratorical style, and leaves nothing to be desired except the continuation of a labour, which will always be an honourable and precious merit with all the lovers of letters and antiquity. For myself, desiring to make known by examples the eloquence of the two greatest orators of Rome and Athens, I chose not to depend on any thing, but which the reading of them inspired, and my zeal was not arrested by the difficulty of making speak in our language, writers so superior, and particularly Cicero, whose singular elegance and inexpressible harmony cannot be preserved entire in any translation. Whatever may be wanting in mine, at least I shall derive from it this advantage, that you may easily perceive how very different is this manner of writing of the ancient, from that which unfortunately is at this day too much in fashion. There is nothing in all that you have heard which savours of research, of affectation, of swelling; nothing false, nothing strained, nothing perplexed. All is sound, all is clear, all is felt; all arises from a natural source, and flows to its object. There is nothing of that miserable pretension of writing to display wit, which, as Montesquieu has so well observed, is a very little thing. They always draw our attention to their object, and never to the efforts of the author. There are none of those multiplied flashes, resembling those of artificial fire-works, which, after having dazzled for a moment, leave nothing after them but darkness and smoke; they are the light of a fair day, which pleases the eye without fatiguing it, which enlightens without dazzling, and diffuses without exhausting itself.

If the talent of eloquence is a sword against crimes, it is also the buckler of innocence, and Cicero knew how to use it for both purposes, with the same power, and the same success. We have seen him prosecute villains; we must now see him defend faithful and courageous citizens. The two species of war, the offensive and the defensive, are often confounded together in the civil and political order of things, as in military science, and it is necessary to be equally prepared for both, when one has devoted his talents to the public cause. For the friend of virtue is necessarily the enemy of crimes, and he who shall believe himself able to divide two inseparable things, will deceive himself very much, and will misconceive of both. 'He, who hates not crimes sufficiently, has not enough of the love of virtue:' this is an axiom of morality; and there is another in politics, that 'there can be no treaty with the wicked, at least until they are absolutely out of a condition to do mischief,' until then their device is always the same. 'Whoever is not for us, is against us.' This is their principle, and their conduct is conformable to it. We may be sure that as soon as they believe themselves strong enough, they will spare the weak man, whom they despise, no more than the firm man, whom they dread. Weakness, moreover, which we must clearly distinguish from prudence: the one is the absence of power, and the other is only the measure of it. Weakness, we cannot too often repeat it, whether in public authority, or in a private character, is the greatest of all faults, and the most mortal of all dangers. Voltaire has characterised it in that verse,

A tyrant, who yields to crimes, and destroys virtues.

Tyrant, here, is a just expression: for weakness, like tyranny, annihilates the natural right of man, and takes away his faculties. Cicero, who was generally very prudent, was also sometimes weak: it is so natural and so common to have the defect which lies nearest to our good qualities! Cato and Brutus committed faults by an excess of energy, and Cicero committed others by an excess of circumspection; but Cicero at least was never weak as a public man; he was only so as an individual, accordingly his faults injured only his own glory, but those of Brutus and Cato injured the public cause. I know of but one occasion where Cicero, by a moment of pusillanimity, lost the cause of a generous citizen, one of his best friends, of Milo. If he had shewn as much firmness, as in that of Sextius, he would equally have triumphed. These two causes are now to engage our attention.

One of the most beautiful pleadings of Cicero is that which he pronounced for the tribune Sextius. We may judge whether he ought to apply himself to this defence with warmth: it was in some sense his own cause that he pleaded. He gratified, at once, two very lawful sentiments, his hatred of Clodius, the most furious of all his enemies, and his gratitude towards Sextius, one of his most ardent defenders. We must recollect, that, four years after his consulate, he experienced the fate which he had foreseen. He was obliged to yield to the faction of Clodius, supported, openly enough, by Cæsar, who wished to subdue the republican liberty of Cicero, and secretly by Pompey himself, who was jealous of the reputation and influence of the orator. He took the resolution of banishing himself; and was recalled sixteen months afterwards, with so much éclat, that it may be said, that he owed to his disgrace the fairest day of his life; but it cost blood to obtain his return. Although, at that time, all the orders of the state were united in his favour, although all the powers of Rome had declared for him, the ferocious Clodius, whom nothing could intimidate, having placed himself at the head of a troop of hireling gladiators, and of a banditti, escaped from the defeat of Cataline, laid siege to the Forum, and pretended, by open force, to hinder the tribunes from convoking the assembly of the people, in which the recal of Cicero was to be proposed. Milo and Sextius, seeing that it was absolutely necessary to repel force by force, arranged themselves for defence, and presently the streets of Rome and the public places became the theatre of carnage. In one of these tumultuous encounters, Sextius was left for dead, and the brother of Cicero run a risk of his life. You may judge, from this, what species of anarchical disorder had been introduced into Rome since the wars of Marius and Sylla, and imposed, from time to time, silence on the laws. I will point out, presently, the cause, when I speak of the prosecution of Milo. But we may observe, in this place, that these bloody quarrels resembled in nothing those horrors of the first days of September, which, among so many inconceivable circumstances, offer nothing more extraordinary than their long impunity. You see that this Clodius was at least a brave villain, marching at the head of a banditti, determined like him, accustomed to the sword and to battles, who hazarded every thing in daring every thing, attacked with arms in their hands other armed men, and exposed their lives in menacing that of another. The domestic asylum was never violated; the sex, infancy, old age, were not even insulted

Clodius hired old soldiers become robbers, gladiators degenerated into assassins, but he never thought of setting in motion a battalion of women, to proclaim massacre and pillage in the name of Liberty; he had not recourse to this cowardly expedient, to the end that the repressive force, feeling for the weakness of the sex, even in those who had lost all their rights, by abjuring them, might permit disorder and revolt to increase and grow bolder, and to attempt, without danger, all that they might be able to achieve. When the laws are without power, the worst species of miscreants are not those who can brave every thing; they are those who blush at nothing. But, also, they are the most easy to repress as soon as the law reassumes its sword. Those who boast of having fatigued their arms, with slaughtering unfortunate men, without defence, will never cross the sword against the sword, and those who are capable of drinking blood, will never risk their own, or rather it is not blood which is in their veins, it is only mud. As soon as the public force designates and surrounds them, it has no occasion to strike them, and death ought not to reach them but upon the scaffold.

[From a British Essayist.]

ON THE PROPRIETY OF TRYING DUNCES IN SOME ART, UNCONNECTED WITH LETTERS.

I have introduced an instance from the clerical profession, principally, because parents, by a most perverse way of thinking, usually bring up a boy to the church, whom they consider as scarcely fit for any thing. It is also certain, that dunces, educated for law and physic, when they find themselves unsuccessful at the bar and the bedside, seek an asylum in the pulpit. From both these circumstances, it happens, that the church is complimented with those, whom the world is supposed to throw aside, as refuse. The temple is thus converted into an hospital for incurables.

Dunces at school are, however, by no means to be considered as refuse, though I must contend that they ought not to be particularly consecrated to the service of the altar. No boy, who does not shew some taste for the belles lettres, for oratory, poetry, and history, should be brought up to that, or to any of the learned and liberal professions.

But some boys, who are dull in the belles lettres, who never could read or relish the classics, have a turn for mathematics, and all the arts which depend on mechanical contrivance. A reputed dunce should be tried in these studies, before he is given up as incorrigible. I have been told of a very able man, who, when a boy, displayed no symptoms of parts, till he was tried in Euclid's Elements. They struck him with delight; he studied them with eagerness, grew fond of application, and gradually rose to high eminence as a polite artist.

Others, who make no progress in their books, have a taste for music and drawing. These, indeed, will seldom be sufficient to qualify for employments, by which life is to be supported, or a fortune acquired; but, when a dull boy in books, appears to be ingenious in these arts, he ought to be allowed to cultivate them, at least as amusements, in order to rescue himself from the imputation of a total want of ability.

It should be considered, too, before a boy, who makes little improvement in the classics, is despaired of, that the parts of different boys display themselves at different periods. Many of those, who produce fruit of the most durable kind, do not blossom till late in the season.

But yet there are some, who shew such symptoms of insuperable stupidity in learning, that after a reasonable trial, the limitations of which must be left to the parent's discretion, they ought, as their happiness is valued, to be led to other pursuits, in which activity of body is chiefly required.

I have said, that the time of trial should be determined by the parent, for few masters will venture to speak unwelcome truth to their employer, especially on a tender subject, which may affect the whole life of their pupil, and perhaps draw down his bitterest resentment upon them at a more efficient age. The office of deciding whether or not a young man shall proceed in a way of life, pointed out by prudence and by parental authority, is too important to be imposed on a common master. The compensation he usually receives is not sufficient, and the connexion is not close enough, to justify the parent in throwing the odium and the burden upon him. The parent himself, after accurate observation, and the opinion of the master, should remove the boy; but not subject him to the mortification and disgrace of being avowedly removed, because he was a dunce. Some prudential reason should be assigned to justify the change of plan, and to save the character of the boy. To punish him for the defects of his nature would be savage cruelty. And here I cannot but observe, that the practice of beating dunces, to make them scholars, is at once egregious folly, and abominable brutality.

Dunces in books often possess an animal vivacity in the affairs and intercourse of common life, which causes vulgar people, both high and low, to consider them as clever. Indeed, as the whole of their attention is devoted to the body, and to present and palpable objects, they sometimes excel greatly in all bodily exercises and accomplishments, and in every mode and degree of Chesterfieldian grace. External ceremony, dress, and address, are just level to the understanding of a dunce. The worst Latins and Grecians shine the brightest in the fencing and dancing school. And it is an astonishing circumstance, that blockheads in books, shew wonderful acuteness and memory in all the fashionable games of chance. Add to this that they are fond of the small-talk of the day; so that, with all these recommendations, they are usually received in fashionable circles, as very clever and agreeable fellows.

The army and the navy (I hope the rough compliment will be excused) are the proper spheres for those who are thus furnished with bodily activity, but, at the same time, deficient in that kind of parts, which are necessary to make a valuable proficiency in polite literature. Dunces not being troubled with any of those fine sensibilities, which form the poet, the philosopher, and the orator, have, in the room of them, a bluntness and callosity, which contribute much to animal courage. Though rejected from the schools of learning, they may shine in the boxing schools, become heroes of the fist, and obtain, by muscular exertion, patronage and popularity. They have usually a strong constitution, unimpaired by thought and sedentary employment, and may therefore bear the hardships of a marine life and a military campaign, better than the choicest spirits which nature has formed of finer clay.

Dunces are also peculiarly sensible of the value of money. It is a good, which they can feel and understand perfectly, while they are insensible to the subtle charms of intellectual beauty. They, therefore, seem to be intended by Providence for trade or manufactures. They may shine in the shop, though they disgraced the school, and in time may deride, as they count their stores, the poverty of science and philosophy. I never heard that a man failed of arriving at the dignity of a lord mayor, through lack of clergy. Thousands would have worn regimentals, walked the quarter-deck, or stood behind the counter, with eclat, who, as divines, physicians, and lawyers, lived uneasy, unhonoured, and unsuccessful.

Agriculture is a very proper employment for boys, who shew no abilities for the cultivation of science. It is a natural and reputable occupation; and I cannot but regret, that many boys of dull parts, but of good estates, are not brought up to farming their own lands, instead of being thrust violently into schools, inns of court, and universities. Their health and their fortunes would be improved in their patrimonial fields, but in the land of learning, they plow and sow with great labour and expense, and never reap the harvest,* either of profit, honour, or internal satisfaction.

REMARKS ON THE THEATRES.

[From Goldsmith.]

Our theatres are now opened, and all Grubstreet is preparing its advice to the managers; we shall undoubtedly hear learned disquisitions on the structure of one actor's legs, and another's eyebrows. We shall be told much of enunciation, tones, and attitudes, and shall have our lightest pleasures commented upon by didactic dullness. We shall, it is feared, be told that Garrick is a fine actor, but then, as a manager, so avaricious! That Palmer is a most surprising genius, and Holland likely to do well in a particular cast of character. We shall then have them giving Shuter instructions to amuse us by rule, and deploring over the ruins of desolated majesty, at Covent-Garden. As I love to be advising too, for advice is easily given, and bears a shew of wisdom and superiority, I must be permitted to offer a few observations upon our theatres and actors, without, on this trivial occasion, throwing my thoughts into the formality of method.

There is something in the deportment of all our players, infinitely more stiff and formal than among the actors of other nations. Their action sits uneasy upon them; for as the English use very little gesture in ordinary conversation, our English-bred actors are obliged to supply stage gestures, by their imagination alone. A French comedian finds proper models of action in every company, and in every coffee house he enters. An Englishman is obliged to take his models from the stage itself; he is obliged to imitate nature from an imitation of nature. I know of no set of men more likely to be improved by travelling, than those of the theatrical profession. The inhabitants of the continent are less reserved than here; they may be seen through upon a first acquaintance; such are the proper models to draw from; they are at once striking, and are found in great abundance.

Though it would be inexcusable in a comedian to add any thing of his own to the poet's dialogue, yet as to action he is entirely at liberty. By this he may shew the fertility of his genius, the poignancy of his humour, and the exactness of his judgment. We scarcely see a coxcomb or a fool, in common life, that has not some peculiar oddity in his action. These peculiarities it is not in the power of words to represent, and depend solely upon the actor. They give a relish to the humour of the poet, and make the appearance of nature more illusive. The Italians, it is true, mask some characters, and endeavour to preserve the peculiar humour by the make of the mask; but I have seen others still preserve a great fund of humour in the face, without a mask; one actor particularly, by a squint which he threw into some characters of low life, assumed a look of infinite solidity. This, though upon reflection we might condemn, yet, immediately upon representation we could not avoid being pleased with. To illustrate what I have been saying, by the plays I have of late gone to see; in the Miser, which was played a few nights ago at Covent-Garden, Lovegold appears through the whole in circumstances of exaggerated avarice; all the player's action, therefore, should conspire with the poet's design, and represent him as an epitome of penury. The French comedian, in this character, in the midst of one of his most violent passions, while he appears in a most ungovernable rage, feels the demon of avarice still upon him, and stoops down to pick up a pin, which he quilts into the flap of his coat pocket, with great assiduity. Two candles are lighted up for his wedding; he flies, and turns one of them into the socket; it is, however, lighted up again; he then steals to it, and privately crams it into his pocket. The Mock Doctor was lately played at the other house. Here again the comedian had an opportunity of heightening the ridicule by action. The French player sits in a chair with an high back, and then begins to shew away by talking nonsense, which he would have thought Latin by those who he knows do not understand a syllable of the matter. At last he grows enthusiastic, enjoys the admiration of the company, tosses his legs and arms about, and in the midst of his raptures and vociferation, he and the chair fall back together. All this appears dull enough in the recital; but the gravity of Cato could not stand it in the representation. In short, there is hardly a character in comedy, to which a player of any real humour might not add strokes of vivacity, that could not fail of applause. But instead of this, we too often see our fine gentlemen do nothing through a whole part, but strut and open their snuff-box; our pretty fellows sit indecently with their legs across, and our clowns pull up their breeches. These, if once or even twice repeated, might do well enough; but to see them served up in every scene, argues the actor almost as barren as the character he would expose.

* Meliore luto finxit præcordia.

* Littus sterili versamus aratro. Juv.

The magnificence of our theatres is far superior to any others in Europe, where plays only are acted. The great care our performers take in painting for a part, their exactness in all the minutiae of dress, and other little scenical proprieties, have been taken notice of by Ricoboni, a gentleman of Italy, who travelled Europe, with no other design but to remark upon the stage; but there are several improprieties still continued, or lately come into fashion. As, for instance, spreading a carpet punctually at the beginning of the death-scene, in order to prevent our actors from spoiling their clothes; this immediately apprizes us of the tragedy to follow; for laying the cloth is not a more sure indication of dinner, than laying the carpet, of bloody work, at Drury-lane. Our little pages also, with unmeaning faces, that bear up the train of a weeping princess, and our awkward lords in waiting, take off much from her distress. Mutes of every kind divide our attention, and lessen our sensibility; but here it is entirely ridiculous, as we see them seriously employed in doing nothing. If we must have dirty-shirted guards upon the theatres, they should be taught to keep their eyes fixed on the actors, and not to roll them round upon the audience, as if they were ogling the boxes.

Beauty methinks seems a requisite qualification in an actress. This seems scrupulously observed elsewhere, and for my part, I could wish to see it observed at home. I can never conceive a hero dying for love of a lady totally destitute of beauty. I must think the part unnatural, for I cannot bear to hear him call that face angelic, when even paint cannot hide its wrinkles. I must condemn him of stupidity, and the person whom I can accuse for want of taste, will seldom become the object of my affections or admiration. But if this be a defect, what must be the entire perversion of scenical decorum, when, for instance, we see an actress, that might act the wapping landlady without a bolster, pining in the character of Jane Shore, and, while unwieldy with fat, endeavouring to convince the audience that she is dying with hunger.

For the future, then, I could wish that the parts of the young and beautiful were given to performers of suitable figures; for I must own, I could rather see the stage filled with agreeable objects, though they might sometimes bungle a little, than see it crowded with withered or mis-shapen figures, be their emphasis, as I think it is called, ever so proper. The first may have the awkward appearance of new-raised troops; but, in viewing the last, I cannot avoid the mortification of fancying myself placed in an hospital of invalids.

LEVITY.

The national morality implicated in Female dress.

[From a British Paper.]

While the public mind is agitated by speculations concerning peace or war, my intention is occupied by a subject of far deeper importance. The stormy cloud which now threatens us may blow over, but there is a destructive pestilence among us, which I fear it will be impossible ever to check. After the eloquent speeches of some reverend prelates in the House of Lords a year or two ago, it would surely be superfluous in me to prove the dependance of national morality upon female dress. Well, Sir, what has been the effects of all the sermons, dissertations, essays, and paragraphs that have been written against vestimentary errors and offences? Have stays been resumed? Have ten-inch tuckers become fashionable? Have petticoats been lengthened? But we have no longer any right to put these questions. Our own sex, in effeminacy, exceeds the indecency of the the other. Do we not every day even hear of Bond Street loungers blanching their hands with cosmetics, and embrowning their cheeks with walnut-juice? Is not Juvenal's descriptions of the Roman youth strictly applicable to us?

*Ille supercilium madida fuligine tinctum,
Obliqua producit acu; pingitque tremantes
Attollens oculos.*

And might not the ladies, with the spirited Laronia, reply to all our reproaches,

*De nobis post hæc tristis sententia fertur!
Dat veniam corvis: vexat censura columbas.
Non erit ullum
Exemplum in nostro tam detestabile sexu?*

The evil is certainly beyond all ordinary means of cure. The divine, the philosopher, the wit, and the physician will exert themselves in vain. Many wish to "cover the naked," but the naked will not be covered. Still we must not give ourselves up to despair. Let us make one grand effort in behalf of civilized society; and, if it should go to pieces, having a good conscience, we will remain undaunted amidst its ruins.

Sir, I propose instantly to call in the interference of the legislature. Instead of passing penal acts against crime, how much better to crush it in its birth? Why was Mons, together with all the towns in Austrian Flanders, taken so easily by the French; Because the Emperor Joseph had dismantled their fortifications.—Let its proper defences be restored to Virtue by authority of Parliament, and it will become unassailable.

But this plan, though feasible, will be attended, in its execution, with innumerable difficulties. I do not allude to the opposition the bill would meet with in the two houses, although I am a little afraid of female influence. Few M. P's obey the instructions of their constituents. I imagine there are a few who are not at liberty to shew equal contempt for the representations of their wives and daughters. Peeresses, by our constitution, have not a seat in the house of lords, yet there are probably not many, either dukes or marquesses, or earls or viscounts, or barons, who are not fully convinced that they have a voice. But, supposing the utmost unanimity to prevail in both chambers, and that our gracious sovereign would be ready to sanction any measures for the good of his female subjects, I scarcely see how it would be possible to proceed with effect. Must there be a particular act, regulating every piece of dress, with a schedule annexed? In three years the size of the statute-book would be doubled. Instead of the progress of money bills, road bills, and divorce bills, we should read in the newspapers of nothing but of the Fichu Bill being committed; the Landau Bill being reported; the Smock Bill being sent to the Lords; and of the following having gone through their respective stages: the Petticoat Lengthening Bill; the Jumps Stiffening Bill; the Two-inch Waist Elongation Bill; the Bill to prohibit the use of flesh-coloured stockings, &c. However beneficial their consequence might be, I know not if it would be altogether consistent with the dignity of Parliament to spend a week debating bills with such a preamble as this:

An. Quad. Ter. Geo. III.

A Bill, &c.

‘Whereas an evil practice hath lately grown up among divers giddy girls, to cock their bonnets, not upon the middle of their heads, as was used of old time, as is decent and seemly, but upon the side thereof; whereby it cometh to pass that one of their ears is un-covered, discovered, and laid bare, while the other lies hid, concealed, and out of sight: And whereas this sight doth greatly disturb his majesty's liege subjects of all degrees, ranks, and employments: Be it enacted, by the King's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after, &c. &c.’

The House of Commons would not have a moment to spare for the discussion of treaties of peace, or for the impeachment of ministers. Princes may defraud, and have punishments ordained for them. But how is it possible to foresee, or to prevent, the ramifications of folly? Every rout, every ball, every packet from France, will render necessary a new bill of pains and penalties. And you are not to suppose that these are to be hurried through the House like a bill for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; a bill to strangle political discussion. Women are not thus to be deprived of their prescriptive right to arrange their ribands, and to adjust their handkerchiefs, as to them seems good. Due notice must be given to all concerned; petitions must be received; counsel must be heard; milliners, mantua-makers, and perfumers must be examined at the bar. Although the bills should be infinitely better drawn than those by Messrs. ——— and ———, and though they should be submitted to the Blue Stocking Club, instead of the twelve Judges, yet, in legislating upon such new, strange, and uncouth subjects, what ambiguities and obscurities would necessarily arise? It might be necessary to bring in seven bills, during the same session, to explain, amend, and render more effectual an act regulating the form, suspension, and lawful purposes of the ridicule.

Besides, sir, the question must at once occur—supposing this code of fashionable law framed with the wisdom of a Solon, how is it to be executed? Shall the process be by indictment? Having Burn by me, I must furnish a precedent: 'Middlesex to wit.—The jurors of our Lord the King, upon their oaths, present that ———, spinster, commonly called lady G——, not having, &c. but on the 27th day of April, in the forty-second year of, &c. &c. did at a congregation of loose and disorderly persons, named a rout, held in Portman Square, in the county aforesaid, craftily intending to steal men's hearts, and to burn their livers, then and there appear, with her, &c. &c. to the evil example of others in the like case offending, against the peace of our said Lord the now King, his crown and dignity, and against the form of the statute in such case made and provided.'

But, sir, how is it to be tried? Lord Kenyon, I am sure, would not have ventured to direct a jury upon such points! and, deeply as his worthy successor is read in statutes and reports, I scarcely think he would presume to decide upon the cut of a sleeve, or the position of a zone. The sheriff might be directed to return a jury of elegantes; but this would be making them judges in their own cause. There would be no such thing as impartiality or justice in such a tribunal, even though ancient virgins were excluded. Suppose that Lady Elizabeth C, Lady Charlotte S, the honourable Miss V, the Countess of P, and her Grace of ———, were sworn 'well and truly to try, and a true deliverance make, between our Sovereign Lord the King, and the beautiful Mrs. P.' whom they all envy and detest, can charity suppose that they would remember their oaths?

Tante celestibus iræ?

Although our researches have hitherto been so unsuccessful, I assure you, sir, that I have a plan in contemplation, free from every possible objection, and calculated to produce the most salutary consequences. This I shall fully detail to you the moment that the present preliminary article appears in the Morning Chronicle. As you are a steady supporter of morals, I cannot doubt that you will give it a place, however dull you may think it.

Yours,
MISOGYMNOSIS.

SKETCH OF JAMES BEATTIE, LL.D.

Professor of Moral Philosophy and Logic, in Marischal College, Aberdeen. In 1761, Doctor Beattie published an octavo volume of original poems and translations: and, in 1766, 'the Judgment of Paris,' a poem, in quarto. The first book of his highly celebrated poem, 'The Minstrel,' was published, in quarto, in the year 1770, and about three years afterward, the second book made its appearance. The elegance and feeling which characterise this poem, written in imitation of the stanza of Spenser, have been too generally acknowledged, to stand in need of our panegyric. His beautiful song, called the Hermit: the Cave of Pope, and other poems, have also obtained him distinguished applause.

Not satisfied with wearing the poet's wreath, Dr. Beattie entered the lists with the celebrated Mr. David Hume, in an essay on the Immutability of Truth. This performance was very favourably received by the clergy; was answered by Doctor Priestly, and particularly recommended its author to the friendship and esteem of Doctor Porteus, the present Bishop of London. In 1776, he published a quarto volume of Essays on Truth, Poetry, Music, &c. and, in 1784, a quarto volume of Dissertations Moral and Critical. His subsequent publications have been 'Evidences of the Christian Religion briefly stated,' in two small octavo volumes, which were drawn up at the particular request of Doctor Porteus: a volume on the Theory of Language: and, Elements of moral Science, in two volumes, octavo. Doctor Beattie not long ago experienced a severe calamity, in the death of his son, a young gentleman of brilliant talents and promising genius. The doctor printed some memoirs of his life, for the purpose of distributing them among his numerous acquaintance, but not with a view to general circulation.

SKETCH OF THE REV. JAMES BERESFORD,

Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. A gentleman whose talents and learning are of the highest promise and excellence. He contributed several exquisite papers to the Looker-on, a periodical publication: with the ingenious author of which he is in habits of strict intimacy: among these contributions, the humorous imitation of Boswell's life of Johnson is singularly excellent. In the year 1794, Mr. Beresford published by subscription, in one volume, quarto, 'A Translation of Virgil's Æneid,' in blank verse. Altho' this volume had the advantage of being introduced to the world under the patronage and applause of its celebrated censor, the Reverend Simon Olivebranch, the elegance of whose taste, and the excellence of whose critical sagacity, confer the greatest consequence upon his nod, it has not gone so far, as might justly have been expected, toward establishing the reputation of its author. A hasty, beggarly, criticism was passed upon it in the Monthly Review: a circumstance which we are sorry to remark concerning a work of so much general candour. The following characteristic sentences upon this translation, from the pen of Mr. Roberts, are by no means the effusions of the partiality of his friendship. 'He has adhered to the sense of his author with a remarkable scrupulosity, to which, however, he has made no sacrifice of ease or perspicuity. If you read it with an eye to the original, you are delighted with his precision: if you read it for itself, you forget it is a translation. It is a modern structure, built with Roman brick and Roman cement, and such as gave such unperishing strength to their ancient castles.' We shall only add to these remarks, that the indifferent estimation in which this laborious undertaking has been held, is by no means an honourable testimony to the general taste or critical discernment of the age in which we live. In 1796, Mr. Beresford published 'The Knights of the Swan,' or the Court of Charlemagne: an historical and moral tale, translated from the French of Madame de Genlis, in three volumes, duodecimo.

SKETCH OF JOHN BOWLES, ESQ.

Barrister at law, and an eminent political writer. He was one of the first writers, and one of those most successful, in exposing Paine's Rights of Man: his pamphlet, entitled A Protest against that publication, was received with uncommon applause. The society, who, at that time, met at the Crown and Anchor Tavern for the protection of liberty and property against republicans and levellers, ordered it to be printed, and sold at a very low price, for the purpose of extending its circulation among the lower classes. At the commencement of the war with France, Mr. Bowles published a spirited and ingenious pamphlet, entitled, 'The real grounds of the present war with France, considered,' which was very favourably received. He has since written 'Considerations on the respective Rights of Judge and Jury;' two Letters to Mr. Fox, occasioned by his motion respecting libels; a short Answer to the Declaration of the persons calling themselves the Friends of the Liberty of the Press, published in 1793; the real Grounds of the War with France; and Dialogues on the Rights of Britons, between a Farmer, a Sailor, and a Manufacturer, both likewise published in that year; Reflections submitted to the consideration of the combined powers; and farther Reflections, both published in the year following: Thoughts on the origin and formation of political constitutions, published in 1795; and, since that time, three Letters to a British Merchant, containing reflections on the foreign and domestic politics of Great Britain, together with strictures on the conduct of opposition.

SKETCH OF THE REV. WILLIAM LISLE BOWLES,

A gentleman of most eminent poetical talents. He was educated at the school of Christ's Hospital, and afterward became a member and fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. In 1789, he published his exquisitely elegant sonnets: at first under the title of 'Fourteen Sonnets, elegiac and descriptive,' without the author's name. But to a second edition, published in the same year, he prefixed his name, and added seven other 'little poems,' of the same kind. He is also author of Verses to Mr. Howard; the Grave of Howard; Verses on the Philanthropic Society; a Monody, written at Matlock; and Elegiac Stanzas, written, during sickness, at Bath. A most elegant edition of his 'Sonnets and other Poems,' was printed at Bath, in 1796. The poetry of Mr. Bowles is exquisitely pathetic, and perfectly original. He possesses the power of awakening the finer feelings to a degree of even painful sensibility. Next to pathos, dignified simplicity appears to be the leading feature of his work.

EDUCATION.

The Reverend Mr. Abercrombie's 'Two Compendis for the Use of the Philadelphia Academy: 1. of Elocution, 2. of Natural History,' are executed in a manner, which reflects credit on the writer. Mr. Abercrombie has for some time past been engaged as the instructor of youth, and in that capacity has the reputation of having acquitted himself in a very useful and honourable manner. In prosecution of the plan of Education which he has thought proper to adopt, the Compendiums now referred to were written. In the endeavor to reduce the subjects, treated of, to a concise, systematic order, Mr. Abercrombie has availed himself of what has been written on these subjects by many excellent writers, without, however, yielding the right of thinking for himself, or forfeiting the claim to a considerable degree of originality.

The following analysis of GRAY's Elegy, which has often been said to be without a plan, was sketched by the late Mr. Scott, of Amwell.

The poet very graphically describes the process of a calm evening, in which he introduces himself wandering near a country church yard. From the sight of the place, he takes occasion, by a few natural and simple, but important circumstances, to characterize the life of a peasant; and observes, that it need not be disdained by ambition or grandeur, whose most distinguished superiorities must all terminate in the grave. He then proceeds to intimate, that it was not from any natural inequality of abilities, but from want of acquired advantages, as riches, knowledge, &c. that the humbler race, whose place of interment he was surveying, did not rank with the most celebrated of their contemporaries. The same impediment, however, which obstructed their course to greatness, he thinks, also, to have precluded their progress in vice; and, consequently, that what was lost in one respect, was gained in the other. From this reflection, he, not unnaturally, proceeds, to remark, on that universality of regard, for the deceased, which produces, even for these humble villagers, a commemoration of their past existence. Then, turning his attention to himself, he indulges the idea of his being commemorated, in the same manner, and introduces an epitaph, which, he supposes, to be employed, on the occasion.

Mark how the bashful Morn in vain
Courts the amorous Marigold,
With sighing blasts, and weeping rain,
Yet she refuses to unfold.

But, when the Planet of the day
Approacheth, with his powerful ray,
Then she spreads, then she receives
His warmer beams into her virgin leaves.

So shalt thou thrive in love, fond boy,
If thy sighs and tears discover
Thy grief, thou never shalt enjoy
The just reward of a bold lover.

But, when, with moving accents, thou
Shalt constant faith and service vow,
Thy Celia shall receive those charms,
With open ears, and with unfolded arms

SONG.

Sweetest love! I'll not forget thee,
Time shall only teach my heart
Fonder, warmer to regret thee,
Lovely, gentle as thou art.
Farewel, Bessy!

Yet, oh! yet again we'll meet, love,
And repose our hearts at last,
Oh! sure 'twill then be sweet, love,
Calm, to think on sorrows past.
Farewel, Bessy.

Yes, my girl, the distant blessing
Mayn't be always sought in vain,
And the moment of possessing,
Will it not, love, repay our pain?
Farewel, Bessy.

Still I feel my heart is breaking,
When I think I stray from thee,
Round the world that quiet seeking,
Which, I fear, is not for me.
Farewel, Bessy.

Calm to peace thy lover's bosom,
Can it, dearest, must it be?
Thou within an hour shalt lose him,
He forever loses thee.
Farewel, Bessy. [MOORE.]

Horace, Ode XX. book I. imitated by W. Boscawen, and addressed to Henry Gregg, Esq.

Plain, humble port is all you'll meet,
With me, dear Gregg, in Baker street:
I safely stow'd it there,
The very week, your gentle bride,
To crown your wish, and please your pride,
Gave you a son and heir.

I think I hear the welcome sound
Quick from the enraptur'd nurse rebound,
And spread a general joy.
The house maid, butler, footman, cook,
Repeating, with delighted look,
"My mistress has a boy!"

Your claret, I allow, is fine,
Madeira, that has cross'd the line,
Your ample means afford:
But, since no wealthy bank I share,
Partake a younger brother's fare,
Where Welcome crowns the board.

SONG.

Jessy on a bank was sleeping,
A flower beneath her bosom lay;
Love, upon her slumber creeping,
Stole the flower, and flew away!

Pity, then, poor Jessy's ruin,
Who, becalm'd by Slumber's wing,
Never felt what love was doing—
Never dream'd of such a thing!

There's something in women their lovers engage
Of whatever complexion or stature or age;
And she, who would frighten a mere stander by
Is a Venus herself, in the fond lover's eye.

If She's pale, never swan was a tenth part so fair;
If tawny, like jet are her eyes and her hair;
If Xantippe herself, her scolding's thought wit;
If meek, all good wives to their husbands submit.

If a pigmy, how neat is her air and her mien;
If a steeple she's graceful, and walks like a queen;
If a girl in her teens, all's handsome that's young;
If eighty, her fortune says—World hold your tongue.

In short, to dear woman 'twas given to please,
And tho' the whim often should take them to tease,
To perplex, to torment and a thousand things more
They're the deities men were all born to adore.

Mr. Gifford, the translator of Juvenal, has completed his preparation for a new edition of Massinger. A very accurate collation has been made of the early editions, which abundantly prove, that the text is exhibited in a most corrupt and mutilated state in the publications of Coxeter and Monck Mason. Mr. Gifford has accompanied each piece with notes, critical and illustrative; and subjoined to each play, a critique on its merits and defects. Mr. Malone has communicated a curious and copious fragment of an unpublished play of Massinger.—It is only a fragment, for the bottom of each page of the manuscript is mouldered away by length of time.
Lon. Mag.

Addressed to a Lady who said she had never known a Woman, to whom the ensuing panegyric would apply:

"Reserve with frankness, Art with truth allied;
"Courage with softness, Modesty with Pride!"

And who, you ask, can claim so high-wrought praise?
Whose brows can justly bear so blooming bays?
Where do such sense and sweetness so combine,
So softly mingle and so brightly shine?
Ah! You alone may vainly hope to find
The happy mansion of so blest a mind.
So Eve, when roving through Edenian bowers,
Through lofty groves, and paths bestrew'd with flowers,

Ere yet the polish'd mirror's glassy glare
Had learn'd the echo flattery to the fair,
Unheeding whither chance might bid her stray,
To the smooth streamlet shap'd her careless way;
O'er the broad mirror bent with native grace,
And saw a faultless form and charming face,
View'd the fair transcript, where each beauty shone,
Nor knew the Heavenly image was HER OWN!

A BALLAD.

Thou hast sent me a flowery band,
And told me 'twas fresh from the field;
That the leaves were untouch'd by the hand;
And the purest of odours would yield.

And indeed it is fragrant and fair;
But, if it were handled by thee,
It would bloom with a livelier air,
And would surely be sweeter to me!

* This ballad was probably suggested by the following epigram in Martial:

Intactas quare mittis mihi, Polla, coronas,
A te vexatas malo tenere rosas. Epig. xc. Lib. ii.
E.

Then take it, and let it entwine
Thy tresses, so flowing and bright;
And each little flowret will shine
More rich than a gem to my sight.

Let the odorous gale of thy breath
Embalm it with many a sigh;
Nay, let it be wither'd to death
Beneath the warm noon of thine eye.

And, instead of the dew that it bears,
The dew dropping fresh from the trees;
On its leaves let me number the tears
That affection has stolen from thee! [MOORE.]

Sir John Harrington, who flourished in the reign of Queen Elizabeth was a poet of great Pleasantry and humour, whose wit was not his business, but his diversion. The following is a specimen of his Epigrams.

OF LYNUS, BORROWING.

Lynus came late to me Six crowns to borrow
And swore, G—d d—n him he'd repay to morrow
I knew his word, as current as his bond,
And straight I gave to him Three crowns in hand:
This I to give, this he to take was willing,
And thus he gain'd, and I sav'd fifteen shilling!
In Cornutum.

What cur'd pate youth is he that sitteth there
So near thy wife, and whispers in her ear,
And takes her hand in his, and soft doth wring her
Sliding his ring still up and down her finger!
Sir, 'tis a Proctor, seen in both the Laws,
Retained by her in Some important cause;
Prompt and discreet both in his speech and action
And doth her business with great Satisfaction.
And thinkst thou so? a Horn plague on thy head,
And thou so like a fool and wittol led
To think he doth the business of thy wife?
He doth thy business I dare lay my life.

OF FORTUNE.

Fortune, Men say, doth give too much to many,
But yet she never gave enough to any.

AGAINST A FOOLISH SATIRIST.

I read that Satire thou intitledst first,
And laid aside the rest and overpast,
And swore I thought the author was accurst,
That, the first satire had not been his last,

AGAINST FAUSTUS.

In scorn of writers, Faustus still doth hold,
Nought is now said, but hath been said of old;
Well, Faustus, say my wits are gross and dull,
If for that word I give thee not a Gull:
Thus then I prove thou holdst a false position;
I say thou art a man of fair condition,
A man true of thy word, tall of thy hands,
Of high descent and left good store of lands;
Thou with false dice and cards hast never play'd,
Corrupted never widow, wife, or maid,
And, as for swearing, none in all this realm,
Doth seldomer in speech curse or blaspheme.
In fine, your virtues are so rare and ample,
For all our Song thou mayst be made a sample
This, I dare swear, none ever said before,
This, I may swear, none ever will say more.

In Orihuela a Spanish city of note, perpetual fertility is secured by judicious irrigation. There is a Spanish proverb which very quaintly alludes to this circumstance. Síe Uoce, aytrigo en Orihuela y si no Uoce, aytrigo in Orihuela. "If it rains there is plenty of wheat in Orihuela, and if it does not rain, there is still plenty of wheat in Orihuela.

TO A SLEEPING MAID.

Wake, my life! thy lover's arms
Are twin'd around thy sleeping charms:
Wake, my love, and let desire
Kindle those opening orbs of fire.

Yet, sweetest, though the bliss delight thee,
If the guilt, the shame affright thee,
Still those orbs in darkness keep;
Sleep, my girl, or seem to sleep.

TO MYRA.

Thou bid'st the lyre awake—the lyre obeys:
The soft persuasion of thy smile,
Thy glance of fire,
And Pity's pensive mein the while,
Wake from the sleeping chord obedient lays.
The meanest of the Muse's choir,
Rapt by thy beauty's vivid power,
Sweeps the bold string, and raves his little hour.
So Memnon's fabled harp of old,
Touch'd by Aurora's infant ray,
That kiss'd its strings of conscious gold,
Impassion'd quiv'ring to the day,
E'en the grey shadows fled the dew-bright plain,
Breath'd to the kindling pow'r a votive strain.
By thee inspir'd, advent'rous now no more,
He safely swells the sail, and quits the shore;
Sings, unappall'd, of heav'n's prolific doom
O'er sinking worlds, and earth's eternal tomb.
A saviour thunders from his throne of death,
And shaking nations with a single breath;
Calls from the womb of night
The long enthroned shade,
Bids her dark confines shudder at the light,
And wakes to hope and joy the ruin she had made.
Sings too of majesty at nature's birth,
Divinely smiling o'er a smiling earth;
O'er countless worlds extending his survey,
And leading new-born empires into day.
And, Oh! like him, should'st thou propitious smile
On the rude offspring of the Muse's toil;
Warm should th' impassion'd strain ascend,
And list'ning angels o'er its raptures bend;
Love from thy voice to string their harps anew,
Or drop their golden harps to gaze on you.

FROM CATULLUS.

My Lesbia, let us live and love
Nor heed the voice of churlish Age,
Which censures the delights we prove,
And spends itself in empty rage.
Suns, sunk beneath the western main,
In equal splendors rise again:
But vanish'd once our transient light,
Eternal slumber seals the night.—
Give me a thousand kisses, charmer,
And after them, a hundred warmer,
A thousand, and a hundred yet,
With thousands, hundreds, full as sweet:
And then, lest we should count them o'er,
We'll mingle all with thousands more,
Or lest some, envious of our blisses,
Should know how many were our kisses.

WINTER—AN ODE.

Once more the sire of storms his cloudy tent
Has pitch'd upon our northern hemisphere,
And, from his shadowy seat,
Forc'd Autumn to retire.

The feeble race of flow'rs have breath'd their last,
And sad, and solemn, sounds the frequent knell
Of rural beauty gone,
Of rural pleasure lost!

Waving his ebony wand, the sullen pow'r
Calls forth from their dark cells the chilling train
Of foul, unwholesome fogs,
And glooms of hideous hue.

To light her chariot on its dreary way,
Night now needs all her lamps, save when the moon
Pours from her silver urn
The radiant flood around.

The curtain that enclos'd morn's rosy couch
No more its gay embroider'd folds displays,
As from it she descends
To greet the rising sun.

Eve, like a mourner, muffled in her weeds,
Beside the tomb of one she dearly lov'd,
Eyes the dull scene awhile—
Then, with a sigh, departs.

Faint Nature falls a prey to atrophy;
And all her living tribes seem sorrowful,
Their common parent, thus
Declining, to behold.

But, those, to whom the God, who governs all,
Gave intellectual light, to see and judge,
They know that, by and by,
Her health will be restor'd.

They know that, by and by, the breath of Spring,
With renovated vigor, shall inspire
Her faded form again,
And deck it with new charms.

BALLAD.

A woman grown, with sparkling eyes,
High health and easy carriage,
Doll felt her anxious bosom rise,
While something whisper'd marriage.
But, ere she leap'd, took, to her praise,
This maxim from her mother,
Ne'er wed, dear girl, while Reason says
One thing, and Love another.

This golden rule to guard her heart,
She went to see her cousins,
Where many a fop came round and smart,
Till Doll had counted dozens;
But still the more the timorous maid
Was teas'd with all this pother,
She found grave Reason one thing said,
And sprightly Love another.

I've lov'd you long, cried out a smart,
For weeks and months I've watch'd you,
You, and you only, have my heart,
Cried Doll, I've fairly catch'd you:
I've left, good sir, but three short days,
My native place and mother,
Who truly told that Reason says
One thing, and Love another.

In this short time I've look'd around
Those things I fancied real,
On close inspection, I have found
Illusive and ideal;
I've heard false vows, I've seen mean pride,
I've known vice virtue smother;
Wise Reason taking still one side,
And silly Love another.

This having seen, I'll hie me home,
By Prudence now grown wiser;
And, while I vow no more to roam,
Hoard wisdom like a miser,
Wed honest Ned, who loves me well,
With glad consent of mother,
So shall no longer Reason tell
One tale, and Love another.

BALLAD.

Celia eighteen her next birth-day,
Accomplish'd at her fingers ends,
Had read, could sing, and dance, and play,
And scandalize her dearest friends;

Secure she never should grow old,
For looking-glasses all tell truth,
And she had by her glass been told
She should enjoy perpetual youth.

Lovers in shoals came to her net,
Not one her fickle mind could guess;
She'd giggle, simper, and coquet,
And love, but never would say yes.
For love brings wedlock, wedlock strife,
Not always, but too oft, a truth;
And Celia thought to be a wife
Would not ensure perpetual youth.

Her faithful mirror now grew rude,
Told her her features were decay'd,
That the coquet would turn a prude,
And youthful Celia an old maid.
She curs'd the glass, and curs'd the hour
She falsely thought it told her truth;
'Teach me, she cried, some pitying power,
How to obtain perpetual youth.'

'Hold, cried a sprite, she now saw pass,
I come to tell you what's amiss,
You had from Vanity that glass,
And now from Reason's hand take this;
It tells you in life's varying day
Faces are frail, minds fix'd like truth,
That charms are transient, and decay,
That sweetness is perpetual youth.

That Reason's morn is Beauty's eve,
That of the dimpled smiles supply,
When loss of teeth the lips bereave,
With smiles the mind adorns the eye.
Thus females shall the men adore,
While blest with gentleness and truth,
For whether twenty or fourscore,
Good nature is perpetual youth.'

SONG.

I am a Friar of orders grey,
And down the vallies I take my way;
I pull not blackberry haw, nor hip,
Good store of venison fills my scrip.
My long bead roll I merrily chaunt,
Wherever I walk, no money I want;
And why I'm so plump the reason I'll tell,
Who leads a good life is sure to live well.
What baron or 'squire, or knight of the shire,
Lives half so well as a holy friar?

After supper of heaven I dream,
But that is fat pullets and clouted cream;
Myself by denial I mortify
With a dainty bit of warden pye.
I'm cloth'd in sackcloth for my sin,
With old sack-wine I'm lin'd within;
A cheeruping cup is my matin song,
And the vesper bell is my bowl, ding, dong.
What baron, or 'squire, &c.

REVIEW.

REPORTS of Cases, argued and adjudged, in the SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, in August and December terms, 1801, and February term, 1803—volume I. By WILLIAM CRANCH, Assistant-Judge of the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia: Washington city—Published by Conrad and Co.

Since the removal of the national seat of government to the city of Washington, the sessions of the Supreme Court of the United States have, of course, been held there. The importance and necessity of having accurate and authentic reports of their adjudications has become greater and more urgent, by their removal, from a great and commercial city, to a situation, so remote from the seats of those transactions, which call for the decision of this highest judicial tribunal of the Union. The questions, which the nature of their jurisdiction principally presents for their investigation, are deeply interesting to the people of all these states, but peculiarly so to the maritime and commercial part of the community. A very small portion, not only of the people, but even of those, whose professional occupations require a constant attendance upon the courts of justice, can enjoy the opportunity of hearing, in person, those luminous discussions and deliberate determinations of the great national and constitutional questions, which receive their ultimate settlement at this bar. It is, therefore, a fortunate circumstance, for the members of the legal profession, for the nation itself, and, it may be added, for the future age, that the task of reporting the cases, argued and adjudged in the Supreme Court of the United States, has been undertaken by a person, so well qualified for its execution, as the volume, now before us, has proved Mr. Cranch to be. This gentleman, being, himself, one of the judges of the Circuit Court, for the Territory of Columbia, and residing at the seat of government, naturally derives, from his situation, advantages, from the ease of access to the records, and from the attention to the proceedings of the superior court, enjoined upon his station, which scarce any other man could possess. The practice, adopted by the court itself, since the appointment of the present chief justice, of giving, upon all questions of difficulty and importance, a written opinion, has a further and happy tendency to stamp, with peculiar authenticity, the cases, reported in this volume.

It contains the cases, adjudged in August and December terms, 1801, and in February term, 1803: that is to say, the decisions of the court, from the time of their removal, to the present seat of government, until, but not including, the last February session. A continuance of the work is promised by the author, should the reception of the present volume afford him a sufficient encouragement, in the pursuit of his labours, of which we think there can be no reasonable doubt.

It is observable, that, since the organization of the District of Columbia, and the removal of the government thither, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, has been, in fact, very much enlarged, and the objects of its decisions greatly multiplied. The court may be considered as sitting in a twofold capacity; first, as a court of the United States; and secondly, as the supreme territorial court for the district. The powers of legislation, over the district, in all cases, are given, by the Constitution of the United States, to congress. In organising the district, they have declared, that the laws of Virginia and of Maryland, respectively, shall continue to prevail, in the portions, ceded by each of those states, constituting the territory; excepting where they may be altered by acts of congress; and the final appellate territorial jurisdiction being vested in the Supreme Court of the United States, they are, of course, called to exercise the functions of the highest state courts of Virginia and Maryland, over those parts of the district, ceded, severally, by those two states, in addition to their ordinary duties, as the court of the last resort, for the exposition of the laws of the Union. Hence, the cases, reported by Mr. Cranch, in the present volume, may be divided into two classes—the one of decisions on appeals, from the state courts, or courts of the United States, in the several states, and the other of causes, appealed from the territorial court of Columbia. As a national tribunal, this jurisdiction comprises all controversies, arising from the laws of nations, and the Constitution and laws of the Union. As a territorial tribunal, it comprehends all the minute and multifarious objects of municipal litigation. Combined together, it constitutes, beyond all question, the court of the most extensive and diversified powers, extant in any civilized nation.

The cases of the second class, on writs of error, from the circuit court of Columbia, constitute, in number, the major part of the reports, contained in this volume. Among them, however, are several of general and national importance, either on account of the principles, upon which they were decided, or, as presenting the decisions on subjects, which have been often brought into public view, by comments and animadversions, in the public prints. Among these, are particularly to be noticed the cases of Marbury versus Madison, and of Hodgson versus Dexter.

The former of these is the well-known case of the justices of the peace for the district of Columbia, duly and fully appointed to office, under the last administration, but whose commissions have been withheld, by the secretary of state, under the present. The remedy, attempted by the injured party, was an application to the Supreme Court for a mandamus, to compel the secretary of state to deliver the commissions, so unjustly detained. After a full and entirely satisfactory investigation of the case, on its merits, the opinion of the court was, that a mandamus could not issue, because it would, in this instance, be an exercise of original jurisdiction, when, by the Constitution of the United States, they were expressly confined within the limits of an appellate authority. They held, therefore, that the remedy, to which, in justice, Mr. Marbury was entitled, was not within their powers to dispense; and thus, this outrage against public right and private duty, this violation of official trust, for the poor purpose of party gratification, has been accomplished, with triumphant success, and with a prospect of perpetual impunity. Such is the condition of society, in all human governments. They, who feel power, and forget right, are thus, in all nations, able to practise the most bare-faced oppression, and laugh at the impotent efforts of their victims, to obtain redress. The power, which is supported by popular delusion, may be as deaf to the voice of naked Justice, as that which leans only upon the bayonet; and, for all the purposes of present victory, may bid alike defiance to the resentments of those, whom it wrongs. It is fortunate for the people of these states, that the records of its judicial courts are not yet within the grasp of those, who are stronger than the law. It is fortunate for posterity, that this very act has been submitted to the scrutiny of honest and independent judges. Equally fortunate is it, that by the publication of this volume, the transaction is exhibited in its genuine colours; that the facts are proved, to the clearest demonstration; that the infraction of the law is made evident, beyond the reach of a cavil; and that the verdict of impartial posterity is irrevocably fastened upon a procedure, which the submission of the times, when it passed, suffered to be perpetrated with impunity.

It is a justice, due to the present secretary of state, Mr. Madison, to observe, that the disgrace of this unprecedented measure is not entirely imputable to him. The non-delivery of the commissions, when applied for, was, indeed, by him; but from the reluctant and evasive evidence of the present attorney general, Mr. Lincoln, it may be inferred, with sufficient certainty, that the commissions had been purposely withheld, not destroyed, while he acted as secretary of state. Mr. Madison has the reputation of an accomplished classical scholar. On this application to the Supreme Court, for a mandamus, he did not condescend to enter an appearance. This conduct, so unnecessary for the maintenance of his official dignity, so disrespectful towards the court, ought not to pass altogether without animadversion. Had he been

"By ancient learning, to the enlighten'd love
Of ancient glory warm'd,"

he would have remembered, that in the most illustrious ages of the Roman republic, it was the proud boast of her most distinguished citizens, to manifest their veneration for the laws, and their perfect deference to the officers, invested with their authority. The opinion of the court, that they had no power to issue the mandamus, applied for, is no justification of his omission to appear. If his objection was to their jurisdiction in this case, it was his duty to have entered a plea to that effect. If his principle was that a secretary of state could, in no case, be made amenable to the highest tribunal in the union, we apprehend he was under an error of the most dangerous tendency to the rights and liberties of this country.

It is, indeed, one of the most remarkable features in the history of this prostration of the laws, by an executive, solemnly sworn to put them in execution, that they have used every possible artifice, and been ashamed of no equivocation, to escape from the investigation of justice. Knowing that their proceedings would not bear the light of judicial inquiry, their only solicitude has been to shroud them in darkness, and elude detection. When the justices applied for their commissions to the department of state, instead of an open and candid refusal, they were discreetly referred over, from Mr. Madison, to the chief clerk, Mr. Wagner, and by him put off, with an evasion. When they applied to the senate of the United States, for a copy of their own records, containing the nomination and appointment, merely as evidence, rendered, by the detention of their commissions, necessary to substantiate their right, the senate refused to allow such copy to be given. Mr. Madison made no appearance, when summoned to appear before the court. Mr. Lincoln, summoned as a witness, first objected against answering at all, and when compelled to answer, ran through a quibbling whip-row of what he was not obliged to tell, and what he did not know; and the very clerks in the office, between their official secrets and their convenient non-recollections, made shift to reveal only just enough to shew their desire to conceal the real fact—that the commissions ought to have been delivered, and had been wrongfully withheld.

The opinion of the court is remarkable, at once, for the firmness, with which it declares the illegality of the conduct, held by the executive, in this affair, and for the tenderness, with which, through the whole course of their proceedings, they treated that same executive. This tenderness is, doubtless, justified by the spirit and purity of their decision upon the merits, and by the situation, peculiarly delicate, of the court itself.

Had an instance of such gross and undefended injustice, been brought before them, as committed by an individual citizen, they might justly have aggravated the severity of their official sentence, by the unreserved expression of their personal indignation. But, in pronouncing an unequivocal opinion, that a breach of the laws had been committed, by those, to whom the laws themselves have been emphatically entrusted, they thought that the simple intimation of this sentence would discharge their duty to their country, and that all further comment would be unnecessary and improper. On this consideration, their very liberal indulgence to the hard-bound scruples of Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Wagner, in the delivery of their testimony, as well as their earnest solicitude to imagine possibilities of pretence for justification of the administration, in this unwarrantable conduct, are fairly and honourably accounted for.

We shall conclude our remarks upon this case, by quoting, from the opinion of the court, two passages, indicative of the two characters we have mentioned, as perceptible in it. The first, of tenderness to the executive authority:

"The intimate political relation, subsisting between the president of the United States, and the heads of departments, necessarily renders any legal investigation of the acts of one of those high officers peculiarly irksome, as well as delicate; and excites some hesitation, with respect to the propriety of entering into such investigation. Impressions are often received, without much reflection or examination, and it is not wonderful, that in such a case as this, the assertion, by an individual, of his legal claims, in a court of justice; to which claims, it is the duty of the court to attend; should, at first view, be considered by some, as an attempt to intrude into the cabinet, and to intermeddle with the prerogatives of the executive.

"It is scarcely necessary for the court to disclaim all pretensions to such a jurisdiction. An extravagance, so absurd and excessive, could not have been entertained for a moment. The province of the court is, solely, to decide on the rights of individuals, not to inquire how the executive, or executive officers, perform duties, in which they have a discretion. Questions, in their nature, political, or which are, by the Constitution and laws, submitted to the executive, can never be made in this court.

"But, if this be not such a question; if, so far from being an intrusion into the secrets of the cabinet, it respects a paper, which, according to law, is upon record, and to a copy of which the law gives a right, on the payment of ten cents; if it be no intermeddling with a subject, over which the executive can be considered as having exercised any control; what is there in the exalted station of the officer, which shall bar a citizen from asserting, in a court of justice, his legal rights, or shall forbid a court to listen to the claim; or to issue a mandamus, directing the performance of a duty, not depending on executive discretion, but on particular acts of congress, and the general principles of law?"

To the truth, the justice, and the moderation of these remarks, it is impossible for a fair and unbiassed mind, to refuse its assent. Let us now see in what manner the court have expressed their sentiments on the merits of the case:

"It is therefore decidedly the opinion of the court, that when a commission has been signed by the president, the appointment is made; and that the commission is complete, when the seal of the United States has been affixed to it by the secretary of state.

"Where an officer is removable at the will of the executive, the circumstance, which completes his appointment, is of no concern; because the act is, at any time, revocable, and the commission may be arrested, if still in the office. But when the officer is not removable at the will of the executive, the appointment is not revocable, and cannot be annulled. It has conferred legal rights, which cannot be resumed.

"The discretion of the executive is to be exercised, until the appointment has been made. But having once made the appointment, his power over the office is terminated in all cases, where, by law, the officer is not removable by him. The right to the office is then in the person appointed, and he has the absolute, unconditional power of accepting, or rejecting it.

"Mr. Marbury, then, since his commission was signed by the president, and sealed by the secretary of state, was appointed; and, as the law, creating the office, gave the officer a right to hold for five years, independent of the executive, the appointment was not revocable; but vested in the officer legal rights, which are protected by the laws of his country.

"To withhold his commission, therefore, is an act, deemed, by the court, not warranted by law, but violative of a vested legal right."

The case of Hodgson versus Dexter was an attempt to charge Mr. Dexter personally, in his individual capacity, with the loss by fire of the buildings, leased to him, for the purpose of a war-office, while he was the secretary of that department. It is well remembered, and cannot soon be forgotten, with what infamous calumnies the public were long abused, in certain newspapers of that time, upon this subject. Of these, indeed, no traces appear in the Report of this cause. When brought before a tribunal, where truth was to be investigated, Mr. Hodgson's allegation was, that the building was burnt by 'the negligence or default, not of the said Dexter, but of some person, unknown,' but that he had made himself individually responsible, by the terms of the lease, though he had expressly contracted in his official capacity, and though with an explicit exception of inevitable casualties. The opinion of the court was, that, contracting as a public officer, and for the public service, he could not be held responsible, in his private person and property, and this decision was only the recognition of a principle, long since established.

One of the most important cases in the volume, is that of Talbot versus Seamen, which was the question, on the right of salvage, for the recapture of a neutral vessel and cargo, from a belligerent power. The principles, on which the definitive sentence of the court was founded, are the same with those, which governed the British court of admiralty, in a similar case. This was a recapture in the year 1799, by an American armed ship, of a vessel and cargo, belonging to Hamburg, which had been captured by a French sloop of war. The right of making this recapture at all, and the right of claim to any salvage, even admitting that of recapture, were both contested by the claimants. While on the part of captain Talbot, a demand of one half the property, recaptured for salvage, was insisted on, under the formal and positive letter of an act of congress. The decision of the district court at New York, grounded on such a construction of the law, had given the salvage, as demanded by captain Talbot. The circuit court, proceeding on the general usage of nations, not to give salvage for the recapture of neutral property, had reversed the decree of the district judge, and ordered restoration, without salvage. The Supreme Court, steering that intermediate course between both extremes, in which the current of substantial justice is surest to be found, decreed, that salvage should be allowed; but reduced its quantum, from one half, to one sixth, of the property saved. To warrant this sentence, the opinion of the court elucidates, with admirable perspicuity, the general principle, upon which, by the custom of nations, salvage for the recapture of neutrals, is denied; the confirmation of that principle, by the exception to it, which the French decree of January 18, 1798, rendered necessary the right of recapture, vested, by the law of nations, in the armed vessels of the United States, which authorized the proceedings of captain Talbot; and the true construction of a section in an act of congress, for the government of the navy, passed 2d March 1799—a construction, proved by the reasoning of the Court, to be unquestionably correct, though very different from that, which the literal import of its words would, at first view, present.

In the case of Stuart and Laird, page 299, the constitutionality of the act of congress, passed 29. April, 1802, and entitled 'An act to amend the judicial system of the United States,' and of the previous act, of March 8. 1802, repealing the judiciary system, established in 1801, was brought into discussion: but the question was rather parried, than decided by the court. The chief justice, having tried the cause in the inferior court, declined giving an opinion, and Judge Cushing was absent, detained by illness. Judge Patterson, who delivered the opinion of the court, seems to have considered the constitutional objections, urged against those acts, in that case, as confined within the narrow limits of the inquiry, whether an act of congress could transfer a cause from one court of inferior jurisdiction, to another. Thus far, the court held there was no constitutional restraint upon congress; the main and solid objection against the acts, they appear to have considered as not properly sub judice, and passed it over, without notice.

From the decision of the court, in the case of Mandeville vs. Riddle, page 290, it appears, that, by the laws of Virginia, the indorsee of a promissory note cannot maintain an action against any of the indorsers, but the last, for want of privity of contract. The reporter has given, in an appendix to the volume, a long note upon this case, containing a learned, minute, and accurate history of the introduction and progressive prevalence of this species of contract in England, with a review of all the adjudged cases, in the books, relating to it, prior to the statute of 8 and 4 Anne, ch. 9. And he appears to have proved, beyond a doubt, that promissory notes were negotiable at common law, before that statute; though a different opinion has, of late years, been very generally entertained among lawyers, both in England and in this country.

The opinions of the court, in almost every case, reported by Mr. Cranch, being, as has already been observed, in writing, his task has, in that respect, been merely that of a copyist. The statement of the cases, and the arguments of counsel, are the parts of his work, which required the exertion of his own talents, and the exercise of his own judgment. They will be found, on examination, to possess the characters, most essential to this species of compilation: they are clear, methodical, and correct; neither obscured by brevity, nor perplexed with diffuseness. We have no hesitation in saying, that they will bear the test of legal criticism, without shrinking from that of comparison, with any other judicial reports, published on either side of the Atlantic.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

Of the other Harangues of Cicero.

All the violences of Clodius hindered not the return of Cicero, because the legal authority soon became strong enough to re-establish order, and compel Clodius to respect it. But this madman had the impudence, one year afterwards, to cause Sextius to be accused of violence, by Albinus, one of his confidants, while he prepared himself to accuse Milo. He had not time to accomplish his design, and perished miserably as he deserved; but, before he died, he had the mortification to see rescued from him, by Cicero, a victim, whom he had not been able to assassinate with his own sword, and whom he wished to destroy by that of the law. If Cicero ever appeared to equal the impetuous vehemence of Demosthenes, it was in this harangue, and especially in that place where he recalls the combat, which was intended to be so fatal to Sextius. He paints, in the most vivid colours, a tribune of the people pierced with swords, and escaping from his murderers only because they believed him dead.—‘And is it Sextius, who is accused of violence? Why? What is his crime? It is that he still lives. But Clodius cannot reproach him with this. If he lives, it is because they did not pierce him with the last thrust, with the mortal stroke. Whom do you blame, Clodius? Accuse then the gladiator, Lentidius, who did not strike where you intended he should. Accuse your satellite, Sabinius, who cried out, so happily, so opportunely for Sextius, he is dead. But what can you reproach to him? Did he refuse his person to the sword? Did he not receive it in his sides, like the gladiators of the circus, whom we order to submit to death? Of what offence, then, Romans, is he guilty? Is it, that he could not die? Is it to have discoloured with the blood of a tribune the walks of the temple of Castor? Is it that he did not inform them, upon the spot, when he was brought to life, and present himself again to the sword? But let me ask you, Romans, if he had perished under this misfortune, if this gang of assassins had done what they wished to do, if Sextius, whom they believed to be dead, had been dead in reality, would you not all have taken arms, to avenge the blood of a magistrate, whose person is inviolable and sacred, to avenge the republic of the outrages of a robber? Could you calmly see Clodius appear before your tribunal? And the man, whose death would have forced from you a cry of vengeance, if you had for a moment recollected your rights and your ancestors, can he fear any thing from you, when you are to pronounce judgment between the victim and the assassin?’

It has more than once been made a question, (for these great events interest us still, as if they had lately past), whether the resolution which Cicero took of quitting Rome, when he was pursued by Clodius, was in fact the best; whether, seeing himself supported by the senate, who had put on mourning, by the whole body of knights, who had taken arms, he ought to have abandoned the field of battle. No doubt, had he only to dispute with Clodius, he might depend upon success. But he will soon give us to understand, clearly enough, what we perceive in reading history with some reflection; that Clodius was not, for him, the enemy most to be dreaded. Caesar, ready to depart for Gaul, was at the gates of the city with an army; and if in these circumstances carnage had commenced in Rome, if they had shed the blood of a tribune, can we doubt that Caesar would have meddled in the quarrel, and seized so fair an occasion to take arms, and render himself master of the republic? Rome would have been subjugated ten years the sooner. This was the danger, from which the generous devotion of himself, by Cicero, saved her. He exults, with reason, in this harangue, in having twice saved his country. We must hear him develop his own motives.

‘I proceed, Romans, to give you an account of my conduct, and of my thoughts, and I will not disappoint the expectations of this assembly, the most numerous which I have ever seen surround these tribunals. If in the best of causes, when the senate demonstrated so much attachment to me, all the good citizens so much zeal and unanimity, when all Italy was ready to do any thing, to risk every thing, for my defence, if, with such supports, I had been capable of fearing the fury of a tribune, the vilest of men, and the delirious presumption of two consuls, as contemptible as he, I had been wanting, no doubt, at once in wisdom and firmness. Metellus exiled himself, it is true; but what a difference! His cause was good, I acknowledge, and approved by all honest men; but the senate had not solemnly adopted it; all the orders of the state, all Italy had not declared for him by public decrees. He had to contend with Marius, the deliverer of the empire, then in his sixth consulate, and at the head of an invincible army; with Saturninus, a factious tribune, but a vigilant and popular magistrate, and of irreproachable manners. And who had I to combat? Not a victorious army! It was a rabble of hired rascals, excited by the hope of pillage. Who had I for my enemies? Not Marius, the terror of barbarians, the bulwark of his country; they were two odious monsters, whom an infamous indigence, and a stupid depravity, had made the slaves of Clodius; it was Clodius himself, a companion, in debauchery, of our tumblers and buffoons, an adulterer, an incestuous person, a pander of prostitution, a forger of testaments, a robber, an assassin, a poisoner; and if I had employed arms to crush such adversaries, as I could easily have done, and as so many honest men urged me to do, I had no reason to fear that I should be reproached for opposing force to force, nor that any one would regret the loss of such unworthy citizens, or rather of our domestic enemies; but other reasons restrained me. This madman Clodius, this fury, ceased not to repeat in his harangues, that all which he did against me, was with the privy of Pompey, that great man, at this day my friend, and who would always have been so, if they had permitted him to have been so. Clodius named among my enemies Crassus, a courageous citizen, with whom I had the closest relations, Caesar, whose hatred I had never merited. He said that these were the instigators of all his actions, the supporters of all his designs; that one had a powerful army in Italy, that the two others could have one, when they pleased, and that in fact they would have one; finally, they were not laws, judgments, tribunals, with which they threatened me; they were armies, generals, legions, and war. But, what? Ought I to have given so much attention to the discourses of an enemy, who so rashly named the most illustrious of the Romans? No. I was not affected at his discourses, but at their silence; though they had other reasons for their silence, nevertheless, in the eyes of so many men, it posed to believe every thing, by keeping silence, they seemed to declare themselves; not disavowing Clodius, they seemed to approve him. What ought I to have done then? Fight? Very well! the good party would have prevailed, I allow, and what would have been the consequence? Have you forgotten what Clodius gave out in his insolent harangues, that I must resolve either to perish, or to conquer twice? And what was this, to have to conquer twice? Was it not to have to combat, after this senseless tribune, two consuls, as wicked as himself, and all those who were ready to declare themselves his avengers? Ah! if the danger had threatened me alone, I should rather have died than to have obtained this second victory, which would have been the destruction of the republic. I call you to witness, O Gods of our country! our domestic deities! you are my witnesses, that to spare your temples and altars, and that I might not expose the lives of our citizens, which are dearer to me than my own, I could not resolve upon this horrible battle. Was it then death that I could dread? And when, in the midst of so many enemies, I had devoted myself for the public safety, had I not before my eyes exile and death? Had I not myself, from that time, predicted all the perils which awaited me? My voluntary banishment has preserved you from slaughter, conflagration and oppression. I have twice saved my country, the first time with glory, the second with grief. For I shall not boast to have been able to deprive myself, without a mortal regret, of every thing dear to me, in the world, of my children, my consort, of the aspect of these walls, of the sight of my fellow-citizens, who wept for me, of this Rome, which had honoured me. I shall not deny myself to be a man, nor pretend to be insensible. And what obligation would you have had to me, if I had been able to lose, with indifference, all which I have abandoned for you? I have given you, Romans, the most certain proof of my love for my country, when resigning myself to the most afflicting sacrifice, I have chosen to endure it, rather than deliver you to your enemies.’

This oration had the success which those of this orator commonly had: Sextius was absolved by an unanimous suffrage.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF J. LANGHORNE.

On the 15th of January, 1767, he married Miss Cracroft, sister of his former pupils; but his prospects of happiness from his union with this lady were soon clouded by her death, in childbed of a daughter.

This mournful event occasioned his pathetic ‘Verses to the memory of a Lady; written at Sandgate Castle,’ 1768, 4to. The death of his beloved wife was also lamented by two of his friends: Mr. Cartwright, in a poem called Constantia, and Mr. Abraham Portal, in some elegiac verses printed in his works.

In the same month that proved so fatal to this amiable person, died also in childbed the first wife of Scott, the poet of Amwell, who so acted his sorrow, by composing an ‘Elegy’ to the memory of one who had been dear to him; a copy of which he sent to Langhorne. This similarity of circumstance and congenial affliction gave rise to a friendship between these two poets, which, though they rarely corresponded, and more rarely met, continued, without abatement, till the death of Langhorne.

The same year, Shaw published his celebrated Monody on the death of his wife; which occasioning some severe lines in a newspaper, which were imputed to Langhorne, they produced a paper war between the two poets, which was conducted very liberally on either side.

In 1768, he published Precepts of Conjugal Happiness; a poem addressed to his sister-in-law, on her marriage, 4to.

About this time he added the title of Doctor of Divinity to his name, which he probably obtained from the Archbishop of Canterbury.

In 1769, he published Frederic and Pharamond, or the Consolations of Human Life, 12mo; and Letters supposed to have passed between M. de St. Evremont and Mr. Waller, 2 vols. 12mo.

The year following he published, in conjunction with his brother, Plutarch's Lives, translated from the Original Greek, with Notes Critical and Explanatory, and a new life of Plutarch, in 6 vols. 8vo.

In 1771, he published the Fables of Flora, 4to; and having intermitted his intercourse with the press for one year, he published, in 1773, The Origin of the Veil, a poem, 4to; and A Dissertation, historical and political, on the ancient republics of Italy, from the Italian of Carlo Denina, with original notes and observations, 8vo.

In the summer of 1773, he resided for a few months at Weston-Supra-Mare, in Somersetshire, for the benefit of the sea-air. At the same time, and for the same reason, the amiable and ingenious Miss Hannah More resided at Uphill, a mile from Weston. Meeting one day upon the sea-shore, Langhorne wrote with the end of his stick upon the sand,

Along the shore
Walk'd Hannah Moore;
Waves let this record last;
Sooner shall ye,
Proud earth and sea,
Than what she writes be past.

Miss More scratched underneath with her whip,

Some firmer basis, polish'd Langhorne choose,
To write the dictates of thy charming muse;
Her strains in solid characters rehearse,
And be thy tablet lasting as thy verse.

Langhorne praised her wit, and copied the lines, which he presented to her at a house near the sea, where they adjourned, and she afterwards wrote under as follows:

Langhorne, whose sweetly-varying muse has power
To raise the pensive, crown the social hour;
Whose very trilling has the charm to please,
With nature, wit, and unaffected ease;
How soon, obedient to thy forming hand,
The letters grew upon the flexile sand.
Should some lost traveller the scene explore,
And trace thy verses on the dreary shore,
What sudden joy would feast his eager eyes,
How from his eyes would burst the glad surprise!
Methinks I hear, or seem to hear, him say,
This letter'd shore has smooth'd my toilsome way;
Hannah, he adds, though honest truths may pain,
Yet here I see an emblem of the twain,
As these frail characters with ease imprest
Upon the yielding sand's soft watery breast,
Which, when some few short hours they shall have stood,
Shall soon be swept by yon tempestuous flood.
Presumptuous maid! so shall expire thy name,
Thou wretched feeble candidate for fame!
But Langhorne's fate in yon firm rock [Brean Down] I read,
Which rears above the cloud its towering head;
Long as that rock shall rear its head on high,
And lift its bold front to the azure sky;
Long as these adamantine hills survive,
So long, harmonious Langhorne! shalt thou live;
While envy's waves shall lash and vainly roar,
And only fix thy solid base the more.

In 1774, he published The Country Justice, a Poem, Part I. 'written professedly at the request of his friend, countryman, and brother-justice, Dr. Burn,' to whom it is addressed. 'The distinction you have acquired on the subject,' says the dedication, 'and true taste for the arts, gives that address every kind of propriety.'

It was followed, in 1775, by the Second Part of the Country Justice, 4to, which is dedicated, in some elegant introductory stanzas, to his pupil and brother-in-law, Robert Wilson Cracroft, Esq.

The year following, he published The Proper Happiness of Ecclesiastic Life, in a public and private sphere; a Sermon, preached before the Bishop of Bath and Wells, at his primary visitation at Axbridge, July 4, 1776, 4to; and The Love of Mankind the fundamental principles of the Christian Religion; a Sermon, preached before the gentlemen natives of the county of Somerset, at their annual meeting, in the church of St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, Sept. 16, 1776, 4to.

The same year he published Milton's Italian poems translated, and addressed to a gentleman of Italy, 4to; which was followed by the Country Justice, Part III. 4to. 1777; and Owen of Carron, a poem, 4to, 1778, which was the last publication he gave to the world.

From this time, finding his health gradually declining, he no longer strained his faculties with any literary composition. After a lingering illness, he died at Elagdon-House, April 1, 1779. He married a second time; but it is apprehended he left no issue by his second marriage. After his death, an Elegy to his Memory was published by Mr. Portal, who mentions that he left the care of his daughter, by his first marriage, to Mrs. Gillman, a lady whom he has frequently celebrated in his poems.

His poetical works, reprinted from the edition in 2 vols. 1766, with the Precepts of Conjugal Happiness, Verses to the Memory of a Lady, Fables of Flora, and Owen of Carron, &c. were collected into the edition of 'The English Poets,' 1790. His poems, originally printed in the Effusions of Friendship and Fancy, Theodosius and Constantia, and Solyman and Almena, are now, for the first time, collected into an edition of his works.

Of his numerous prose writings no editions have been called for since his death, except of Solyman and Almena, Theodosius and Constantia, and Plutarch's Lives, which have been frequently reprinted.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO. ADVICE TO A JOURNALIST.

OF LANGUAGES.

A good journalist ought to be acquainted, at least, with the English and Italian; for there are many works of genius in these languages, and genius is scarcely ever translated. They are, in my opinion, the two languages of Europe, most necessary to a Frenchman. The Italians are the first, who have rescued the arts from barbarism; and there is so much grandeur, so much strength of imagination, even in the faults of the English, that we cannot too highly recommend the study of their language.

It is to be regretted, that the Greek is neglected in France; but, a journalist is not permitted to be ignorant of it. Without this knowledge, there are many French words, of which he can never have but a confused idea; for, from arithmetic to astronomy, what term of art is there, that is not derived from this admirable language? Scarcely is there a muscle, a vein, a ligament, in our body, a disease, a remedy, whose name is not Greek. Shew me two young men, one of whom is acquainted with this language, the other ignorant of it; neither of whom has the slightest knowledge of anatomy; let them be told that a man is afflicted with a diabetes, that it is necessary to perform on this one a paracentese, that another has an anchilose, or a bubonocoele, he who understands the Greek, will immediately comprehend the meaning of these terms, for he knows their derivation; to the other they will be absolutely incomprehensible.

Several bad journalists have dared to prefer the Iliad of La Motte to the Iliad of Homer. Surely, had they read Homer, in his own language, they would have seen, that the translation is as inferior to the original, as Segrais is inferior to Virgil.

Can a journalist, versed in the Greek language, avoid remarking, in the translation, which Tournell has given of Demosthenes, some defects, in the midst of its beauties? 'If any one,' says the translator, 'ask you: Gentlemen Athenians, are you at peace? You will reply, no, by Jupiter, we are at war with Philip.' The reader, from this exposition, might believe, that Demosthenes jested unseasonably; that these familiar terms, appropriate to low comedy, 'Gentlemen Athenians,' by Jupiter, correspond to similar Greek expressions. But this is not true, and this fault is entirely attributable to the translator. There are a thousand little inadvertencies of this kind, which an enlightened journalist may point out, provided he, at the same time, remarks more particularly the beauties.

It is desirable, that the learned in the Oriental languages, should give us a journal of the books of the East. The public would not then be in the profound ignorance in which they are, as to the history of the most considerable portion of our globe; we should should accustom ourselves to reform our chronology, according to that of the Chinese; we should be better instructed in the religion of Zoroaster, whose sectaries still subsist, although without a country, in the manner of the Jews, and of some other superstitious societies, scattered, from time immemorial over Asia. The remains of the ancient Indian philosophy would be disclosed to us; no longer would the pompous title of 'Universal History,' be given to compilations of the fables of Egypt, of the revolutions of a country, not larger than Champagne, called Greece; and of the Roman people, who, although so widely spread, and so victorious, never had under their dominion as many states as the people of Mahomet, and never conquered the tenth part of the world.

But let not your love of foreign languages inspire contempt for the works of your native country; do not imitate the fastidious and false delicacy of the personage in Petronius, who says,

Ales Phasiacis petita Colchis,
Atque Afræ volucres placent palato;
Quidquid quaeritur optimum videtur.

No French poet, except a volume of Malherbe, was found in the library of the Abbé de Longue-rue. I repeat, that, with respect to the belles lettres, I should wish we were of all countries, but particularly of our own. I will apply to this subject some verses of M. de la Motte, for he has sometimes composed excellent verses,

C'est par l'étude que nous sommes,
Contemporains de tous les hommes,
Et citoyens de tous les lieux.

THE CARAVANSARY.

I have always considered genius distinct from talent, as the one is the gift of nature, and the other the result of industry. In common conversation they are generally confounded, and it may, therefore, be no useless employment to point out their difference.

Genius is an intrinsic faculty, which enables its possessor to discover an object at a single glance. Talent may discover the same object, but would require more time, and the aid of a telescope. The former, by the flash of inspiration, will in a moment accurately ascertain its minutest part, which the latter can effect only by the assistance of artificial lights and elaborate examination. Genius is a fleet courser, that distances every competitor on the turf; Talent is more distinguished for bottom than speed, and, though slow, will carry you safe to the end of your journey. More glory surrounds Genius, more usefulness generally attends on Talent, as the diamond and emerald, though more precious, are less current than silver or gold.

If a man of genius writes a treatise, he 'lightens upon the subject by the flashings of his mind,' and interests and delights, even where he does not convince. A man of talent, in the same pursuit, may write with more method, and reason with more closeness, but we yawn and gape before we reach the end of the volume. The style of Genius is glowing, figurative, and yet simple. The style of Talent is comparatively either cold and low, or else glaring, pedantic, and stiff.

In eloquence the distinction is not less striking. The man of genius pours forth the richest stores of elocution. With every classical figure at command, like Pericles, he thunders and lightens, and clothes the choicest sentiments with the choicest language, borrowed from the exhaustless wardrobe of his creative imagination. He inspires his audience with the passions he feels, and, like a mighty magician, now thrills them with horror, and now fires them with disdain, by the powerful spell of his irresistible eloquence. The man of talent keeps precisely to the point, says the very thing that he ought, and no more, is plain and perspicuous, well acquainted with his subject, and aims only to give correct information, in correct language. The man of genius will speak on the spot to a new question, which he has never before considered, and disentangle every knot, in which it may be involved. The man of talent requires more time and deliberation to obtain the same success, and, after all, produces less effect on the hearers.

As statesmen, the man of genius is bold and original, the man of talent cautious and safe. There are times, in which the former may endanger the state by his temerity, or save it by his great abilities; whilst the latter, in any important crisis, could do neither, but in common times would steer the political ship with safety, though without glory.

Among the Grecians, Pericles and Alcibiades were more distinguished for genius, Aristides and Themistocles for talent, though the talent of Themistocles was animated by a considerable portion of genius. We observe the same characteristic distinctions among the great men of Rome. Talent predominated in Fabius and Pompey, genius in Caesar and Lucullus; and in England we may discover the same difference in Oxford and Walpole, Bolingbroke and Chatham, the former excelling in talent, the latter in genius.

In a word, genius is an intuitive creative power, original in its conceptions, powerful in its combinations, and rarely met with, in an eminent degree. Talent is universal, and the infallible reward of attentive industry. But talent, by cultivation and habitual exercise is, in some, so great, as scarcely to be distinguished from genius, whilst genius in others, by indolence, profligacy, and want of exertion, is so far smothered as to emit but few temporary flashes, unable to diffuse a bright and steady flame. Let none have the vanity to imagine, that they are gifted with the rarest of intellectual endowments, and flatter themselves that they are persons of extraordinary genius, but let it be the honest ambition of all to obtain what is within the reach of all, and exert themselves to become men of useful and respectable talents.

[From a British Essayist.]

ON THE NECESSITY OF DELAY AND CAUTION, BEFORE A BOY IS GIVEN UP AS A DUNCE.

Before I leave the subject, I think it necessary to add a caution against a too precipitate decision, on the abilities of boys; a rash removal of them from a life of learning, and a too early condemnation of them as dunces incurable.

There are some natures, and those too of the sublimest kind, which will not submit to the trammels of common discipline, but will thrive with spontaneous vigour, and grow of themselves to a stupendous elevation. Thus, the oak of the forest would scorn to be nailed against a wall, like the feeble exotic fruit-tree, but will reach the skies, when left unmolested in its native soil. Boys of this kind do not display much of their ability at schools and colleges, and often offend those who cannot comprehend their noble natures, by the appearance of a dulness, which, like the mist of the morning, is only the prelude of solar effulgence in a sky unclouded.

The history of literature affords many examples of those who made a disgraceful figure both at school and college, but who afterwards became greater men than their boasted school-fellows and contemporary collegians. Scioppius, who wrote a philosophical grammar, would not submit, while at school, to learn the common rules, as he relates of himself; and Cowley either could not, or, as it is most probable, would not commit to memory those elementary instructions, in which all boys educated at grammar-schools are constantly initiated. There is, in the minutiae of grammar, as taught by some persons, something no less abstruse than logic and metaphysics; and therefore highly disgusting to boys, whose distinguishing talent is imagination. Very bright boys, therefore, may exhibit, where a proper method of introducing them is deficient, a backwardness in learning grammar, which may cause them to be mistaken, by careless observers, for dunces.

Our most celebrated schools cannot boast of producing the first-rate poets of this country. Shakspeare, Milton, Pope, and Swift, were not indebted to them. They were educated rather irregularly. They were self-taught; and after all the boasts of classical discipline, the ablest men, diamonds of the first water, stars of the first magnitude, were AUTOMATHS, or instructed by their own persevering diligence. The truth is, that nature, together with the ability, gave them a most ardent inclination for excellence, which advanced them to wonderful heights, and broke through all obstacles. These considerations may answer the purpose for which they are introduced, that of preventing parents from despairing of their children's proficiency, after the failure of the first trials; or on observing the dulness of early infancy.

But after every trial, and the most patient expectation, some boys will appear, beyond the possibility of error, arrant dunces, in all that concerns what is called book-learning. But even under this unfavourable circumstance, consolation may be derived from reflections of the following nature.

Dunces, it is generally believed, are not the least happy of mankind. Though unable to afford much pleasure to others, they are commonly pleased with themselves, in a high degree. A smile of self-applause accompanies all their words and actions. If laughed at by others, they mistake derision for congratulation. The proud man's contumely affects them not. Nothing but real pain gives them real sorrow. They have no imaginary ills, that shadowy train, which haunts the ingenious. They have none of those fine sensibilities, which torture the feeling heart with unspeakable agony. Let them have food in abundance, and a sufficiency of raiment and money, and, with a wisdom which philosophers have vainly pretended to, they are perfectly satisfied.

There is no reason to believe, that they will not succeed in the world. Fools, it is proverbially said, have fortune. Some substantial reasons may be assigned to account for the adage. Unfeeling and unreflecting men of dull parts are not hurt by repulses and disappointments. Break their web, and they begin it again with all the patience of a Dutchman. They know no nice scruples of punctilious honour. They have no superabundant delicacy, to prevent their importunity of the great and powerful. They prosecute their claims with exemplary perseverance. A flat refusal, or a downright insult from their patron, strikes them with no more effect, than a tennis-ball the rock of Gibraltar.

The great and powerful often favour them as servile companions, and in consequence of familiarity with them, patronise and prefer them. They have no saucy claims of merit. They have no acquired lustre to absorb the glitter of hereditary honour. They are all compliance and servility. They are therefore often elevated to honour and profit, which no brilliancy of envied abilities would ever have reached.

If their success in the world is the object of a parent's first wishes, let him not grieve that his son is a dunce; for experience proves, that the want of literary abilities may be no obstacle to patronage.

But to speak seriously, for many will be disposed to consider such consolatory topics as the sport of a ludicrous irony, it is certain that Providence has adapted advantageous situations in society for all the sons of men, who are not in a state of idiotism or insanity. A thousand departments may be found, which even dunces may fill with credit, comfort, and success. I only contend against the absurdity of educating them, when known to be dunces, for the church, or any other of the liberal professions, where reputation and emolument ought to depend on superior abilities, and extensive knowledge.

The mistake of confining dunces to a learned life, arises no less frequently from the duplicity of the master, than from the blindness, vanity, and perverseness of the parent. Many masters are mean enough, for the sake of retaining scholars, to extol a blockhead as a genius, whenever the parent, unable himself to judge, inquires concerning his son's proficiency. It is an artifice among the lower orders of the didactic profession to make every parent imagine, that his own son is a prodigy; but it is an artifice not only contemptible in the motive which produces it, but highly injurious in its effects to the scholar, the parent, and society. It is productive of disgrace and disappointment in private life; and in public, of those numerous characters and occupations, which, instead of being useful, are an impediment, an incumbrance, a burden, and a pest. The fabric of a well-regulated community is like a fine piece of architecture, where every stone and beam is in its proper place, and where a single derangement would not only destroy the beauty and symmetry, but impair the strength and solidity of the pile.

Consolation must be sought under the circumstance of want of parts, as under every other misfortune; but after all, genius is a blessing to be considered as an instance of the favour of heaven, and an emanation from the Deity. It is devoutly to be wished for, diligently improved, and, when improved, to be devoted to the glory of the giver, or, in other words, to the advancement of human happiness. It is a mean idea which views it only as an instrument of personal aggrandisement, selfish pleasure, and sordid interest. It should, however, be restrained by prudence, and guided by benevolence; and then it will be a source of delight to the possessor, and of a thousand advantages to all who are within the sphere of its powerful influence.

It seems to be the will of Providence that, comparatively speaking, few should possess the glorious endowment in a supereminent degree. All great excellence must indeed be rare, for it would cease to be great excellence, if it were common. But let not those to whom genius is denied, lament. Genius has its evils, from which they are exempt. It is envied, it is exposed to a thousand pains and penalties of the injuries from those who, not knowing, or not regarding the irritable niceties of its sensibility, rudely strike the tremulous fibre, whenever they approach it. It is of too fine and subtle a nature for the tumults and agitations of a world, madly rushing on in the vulgar pursuits of avarice and ambition. Unguarded by discretion, of which it is often too proud to acknowledge the dominion, it too often causes a life of misery, and a premature dissolution.

Let it also be remembered by those who are conscious of inferiority to their fellow-creatures, that all distinctions, whether civil, natural, mental, or corporeal, all but superiority of virtue, will shortly cease; and that it is expressly declared, on the highest authority, that to whom much has been given, of him much will be required; a declaration which, if duly impressed, might afford comfort to the dunce, and cause the genius to tremble.

THE HISTORY OF HYPASIA.

Man, when secluded from society, is not a more solitary being, than the woman who leaves the duties of her own sex to invade the privileges of ours. She seems, in such circumstances, like one in banishment; she appears like a neutral being between the sexes; and though she may have the admiration of both, she finds true happiness from neither.

Of all the ladies of antiquity, I have read of none, who was ever more justly celebrated than the beautiful Hypasia, the daughter of Leon, the philosopher. This most accomplished of women was born at Alexandria, in the reign of Theodosius the younger. Nature was never more lavish of its gifts than it had been to her, endued as she was with the most exalted understanding, and the happiest turn to science. Education completed what Nature had begun, and made her the prodigy not only of her age, but the glory of her sex.

From her father she learned geometry and astronomy; she collected from the conversation and schools of the other philosophers, for which Alexandria was at that time famous, the principles of the rest of the sciences.

What cannot be conquered by natural penetration and a passion for study? The boundless knowledge, which at that period of time was required to form the character of a philosopher, no way discouraged her; she delivered herself up to the study of Aristotle and Plato, and soon not one in all Alexandria understood, so perfectly as she, all the difficulties of those two philosophers.

But not their systems alone, but those of every other sect were quite familiar to her; and to this knowledge she added that of polite learning, and the art of oratory. All the learning, which it was possible for the human mind to contain, being joined to a most enchanting eloquence, rendered this lady the wonder not only of the populace, who easily admire, but of philosophers themselves, who are seldom fond of admiration.

The city of Alexandria was every day crowded with strangers, who came from all parts of Greece and Asia, to see and hear her. As for the charms of her person, they might not probably have been mentioned, did she not join to a beauty the most striking, a virtue that might repress the most assuming; and though in the whole capital, famed for charms, there was not one who could equal her in beauty; though in a city, the resort of all the learning then existing in the world, there was not one who could equal her in knowledge; yet, with such accomplishments, Hypasia was the most modest of her sex. Her reputation for virtue was not less than her virtues; and though in a city divided between two factions, though visited by the wits and the philosophers of the age, calumny never dared to suspect her morals, or attempt her character. Both the Christians and the Heathens, who have transmitted her history and her misfortunes, have but one voice, when they speak of her beauty, her knowledge, and her virtue. Nay, so much harmony reigns in their accounts of this prodigy of perfection, that in spite of the opposition of their faith we should never have been able to judge of what religion was Hypasia, were we not informed, from other circumstances, that she was a Heathen.

Providence had taken so much pains in forming her, that we are almost induced to complain of its not having endeavoured to make her a Christian; but from this complaint we are deterred by a thousand contrary observations, which lead us to reverence its inscrutable mysteries.

This great reputation, of which she was so justly possessed, was at last, however, the occasion of her ruin.

The person, who then possessed the patriarchate of Alexandria, was equally remarkable for his violence, cruelty, and pride. Conducted by an ill-grounded zeal for the Christian religion, or perhaps desirous of augmenting his authority in the city, he had long meditated the banishment of the Jews. A difference arising between them and the Christians, with respect to some public games, seemed to him a proper juncture for putting his ambitious designs into execution. He found no difficulty in exciting the people, naturally disposed to revolt. The prefect, who at that time commanded the city, interposed on this occasion, and thought it just to put one of the chief creatures of the patriarch to the torture, in order to discover the first promoter of the conspiracy. The patriarch, enraged at the injustice he thought offered to his character and dignity, and piqued at the protection which was offered to the Jews, sent for the chiefs of the synagogue, and enjoined them to renounce their designs, under pain of incurring his highest displeasure.

The Jews, far from fearing his menaces, excited new tumults, in which several citizens had the misfortune to fall. The patriarch could no longer contain; at the head of a numerous body of Christians, he flew to the synagogues, which he demolished, and drove the Jews from a city, of which they had been possessed since the times of Alexander the Great. It may be easily imagined that the prefect could not behold, without pain, his jurisdiction thus insulted, and the city deprived of a number of its most industrious inhabitants.

The affair was therefore brought before the emperor. The patriarch complained of the excesses of the Jews, and the prefect of the outrages of the patriarch. At this very juncture, five hundred monks of mount Nitria, imagining the life of their chief to be in danger, and that their religion was threatened in his fall, flew into the city, with ungovernable rage, attacked the prefect in the streets, and not content with loading him with reproaches, wounded him in several places.

The citizens had by this time notice of the fury of the monks; they therefore assembled in a body, put the monks to flight, seized on him who had been found throwing a stone, and delivered him to the prefect, who caused him to be put to death without farther delay.

The patriarch immediately ordered the dead body, which had been exposed to view, to be taken down, procured for it all the pomp and rites of burial, and went even so far as himself to pronounce the funeral oration, in which he classed a seditious monk among the martyrs. This conduct was by no means generally approved of; the most moderate even among the Christians perceived and blamed his indiscretion; but he was now too far advanced to retire. He had made several overtures towards a reconciliation with the prefect, which not succeeding, he bore all those an implacable hatred whom he imagined to have any hand in traversing his designs; but Hypasia was particularly destined to ruin. She could not find pardon, as she was known to have a most refined friendship for the prefect; wherefore the populace were incited against her. Peter, a reader of the principal church, one of those vile slaves, by which men in power are too frequently attended, wretches, ever ready to commit any crime, which they hope may render them agreeable to their employer; this fellow, I say, attended by a crowd of villains, waited for Hypasia, as she was returning from a visit, at her own door, seized her as she was going in, and dragged her to one of the churches called Cesarea, where, stripping her in a most inhuman manner, they exercised the most inhuman cruelties upon her, cut her into pieces, and burnt her remains to ashes. Such was the end of Hypasia, the glory of her own sex, and the astonishment of ours.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, May 28.

This day the sittings at Westminster terminated. They commence to-morrow at Guildhall, where one hundred and forty-three causes are set down for trial, in the short interval before the commencement of Trinity term.

HARRIS v. J. CHICHESTER, ESQ.

The plaintiff is an eminent jobman in horses, the defendant a gentleman well known on the turf, residing on his estate in Devonshire. The former had purchased of the latter a coach-horse, at the price of forty guineas, under the warranty of his being quiet in harness. The horse had been offered for sale by the plaintiff to Lord Roslyn, and had been rejected, on the first trial, on account of the symptoms of restiveness, which he exhibited.

Mr. Garrow, for the plaintiff, said, Lord Roslyn could not attend, to give testimony, on account of a severe indisposition; but several of his servants deposed to the violent resistance and untractableness of the animal, on the occasion of the first experiment, so as to endanger the lives of the persons attempting to controul him.

Mr. Erskine, for the defendant, produced testimony to the quietness of the animal for a period of nine years; he said, that the beast, like himself, had often gone as leader, sometimes on one side, sometimes on the other, and that like himself also he had been found perfectly tractable on either side. He then sent for Nathaniel Fellows, Esq. from the Middlesex committee, who had frequently driven the horse, and gave evidence to his safety; and, last of all, he called John Gilpin, to shew that he did not run away with him. He further proved, that he had been driven at harrows, and in a unicorn team, or what is called a coach and three. The learned counsel then said, that he should come to the conclusive deposition at length, and produced testimony to the animal having been driven in a tandem.

Lord Ellenborough.... "This is a horse, sold under a warranty to go temperately in harness, and the evidence on both sides is strong and contradictory. On the part of the defendant, there is a chasm, as the tractable disposition of the animal had not been brought up to the precise time of the sale to the plaintiff, and a horse might be soon rendered ferocious and unmanageable, by abuse and wantonness." Verdict for the defendant.

JOURNAL OF A GREAT MAN.

February 21, 1804. Passed a very uneasy night—dream't that Colonel Walker pursued me with a horse-whip—waked in a fright, and found myself on my knees in the middle of the floor:—got Sally to change my linnen, and went to sleep. Thought myself again at Washington's tomb, pretending to weep—when a solemn voice from within cried, 'let not my ashes be disturbed by the tears of a hypocrite.' Got up—received a letter from Michael Leib, asking for office of Surveyor of Port of Philadelphia. Can't give it to him—promised already—keep him in my eye tho'—must give him something—cunning fellow—good list about the certificates—scarcely ever made a better myself.

Took my morning ride—Boy let off a squib, under my horse's nose—mischievous young dog—seemed to know I never could bear the smell of gun-powder. Met a countryman, who rode with me sometime—took me for a Virginian overseer—talked of politics—gave me several home thrusts—asked me to point out a man of real character of our party—puzzled me for half an hour—very impertinent to ask such embarrassing questions;—at last ventured, with some stammering, to name Jefferson—the fellow burst into an immoderate laugh—begged me to enumerate his virtues—inquired which I should begin with—his religion, chastity, courage, or honesty—flapped my beaver, and rode off—wished he'd been as little as Sammy H. Smith—think I could have struck him.

Damn all Feds, high and low—they 'take a pride to gird at me'—and bring out such stubborn facts, that I myself wonder at the blindness of the people. All's safe though—as yet—hav'nt got my letter to Arnold—take care they shan't—keep Ned Livingston in good humour—make a bargain with him—won't enter up his bonds to government, while he keeps my letter snug—What are AN HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS of the PUBLIC MONEY, where my office is at stake!

A DEVIL'S ADVENTURES.

It is now above four hundred years that I have sojourned in this lower world; and as I did not remain at any fixed post, I had an opportunity of visiting a great many people. The society in which I generally lived, was that of philosophers and men of letters; and if I had not taken a fancy to propriety, I should have remained with them, because I do not like changing my lodgings; and when once I was lodged in the body of one of those men, I could remain there as long as I liked. During the course of the last century, I remained for forty years in the head of a philosopher, who, to the very last hour of his life, gave me constant employment. You will suppose that I had time enough to examine every part of my lodging, and that I cannot easily forget the kind of furniture that I found in it. His head was divided into several cells, some of the principal of which I will describe to you. The cell which was called the Sovereignty of the People, was inhabited by a great fury, armed from head to foot, and surrounded by a number of little sovereigns, who were in great agitation at his feet, calling upon him loudly for bread, for tribunes, for woollen bonnet, and wooden shoes; and they made so dreadful an uproar, that, Devil as I am, I found the post was not tenable. The cell of Universal Toleration presented a singular contrast with the title which it bore. Vanity, pride, and the desire of governing, had taken complete possession of it; and I never met any thing else there but little despots, peevish and meddling, always ready to declare war against those, who were not of their opinion. The cell of Perfection gave me at first some uneasiness, because we Devils cannot get cleverly through our work in this lower world, unless there are people a little disposed to adopt the plan of perfection laid down for them by modern metaphysicians. But in examining closely what was passing in this cell, I found I had no great reason for alarm, for the more my good man of a philosopher laboured to furnish it with ideas, the more it seemed to me that he emptied it of common sense. The cell of Experience was there only to make up the number: I cannot tell you what was in it, for I never saw it open.

After remaining forty years with this philosopher, I entered the body of an old poet, whom I hoped to remain with until his death; but I found it impossible to remain above six months, without running the risk of dying with hunger. But that was not the only disagreeable circumstance attached to my new habitation; you know, or you do not know, that we Devils take the opportunity, when our hosts are asleep, to take the air and a little recreation: now, the chamber in which he lived was so small, that I might as well remain in his body, which I constantly did all night. His poor neighbours, who lived under him, for there were none above him except owls, felt the inconvenience as much as I did, for he would jump out of bed at one o'clock in the morning to continue a bad play, the characters and songs of which he repeatedly sung with so much vociferation, that it was impossible for any one, who lived within two hundred yards of him, to sleep.

It was this man that disgusted me with poverty, and, consequently, with men of letters. Though I was afterwards sufficiently tired of demagogues, because they had a great deal of wickedness, and very little common sense; yet, I must confess, that the ten years I passed with them, appeared to me not so long as the six months I spent with the poet. The greater part of the extraordinary persons I met with during that time, in popular societies, were not very well acquainted with good living, and consequently I was always in danger of dying with hunger; and now that their kitchen is threatened with a counter-revolution, I am glad to decamp and seek my fortune elsewhere. If then I wish now to enter the body of a man of property, it is because I am tired of spare diet; and property seems now secured in a way that leaves me no uneasiness upon the subject.

SKETCH OF JOHN AND JOSIAH BOYDELL,

Illustrious artists, who, by their industry and eminent abilities, have raised themselves to a very respectable rank and situation in life. They have been long known to the public as munificent patrons of the fine arts. The Shakspeare Gallery is a most magnificent testimony of their public spirit, and their love of the arts, and will transmit their names with honour to posterity. Their superb edition of Milton's Paradise Lost, their History of the principal Rivers of Great Britain, and other works, have procured them a just and extensive reputation. Mr. Alderman BoydeLL has acquitted himself with singular honour in the arduous and important duties of a city magistrate. When he served in the office of Lord Mayor of London, in 1792, his affability to his fellow-citizens, his impartial administration of public justice, and his assiduous attention to the weighty concerns of his elevated station, united in endearing him to all ranks and descriptions of people, and distinguished him as an amiable model for succeeding chief magistrates.

SKETCH OF HENRY BUNBURY, ESQ.

Brother to Sir Thomas Charles Bunbury, Bt. This gentleman is an Artist of considerable eminence in the serious, but of still superior merit in the humorous and ludicrous, departments of drawing. He may with propriety be denominated the Hogarth of his day. In 1787, he published a series of ludicrous Prints on the Subject of Horsemanship, accompanied by Instructions in that Art, written in a very happy vein of irony. The title of the volume is Hints to bad Horsemen, by Geoffry Gambado. The Progress of a Lie: a Long Story, and numerous other productions of his facetious pencil, are well known and justly celebrated. His most admired drawing bears the name of Lord's-day Evening Amusements.

SKETCH OF THE REV. ANDREW BURNABY, D.D.

Archdeacon of Leicester, of which place he is a native, and Vicar of Greenwich. He has published a quarto volume of pleasing and instructing 'Travels through the middle Settlements in North America.' Six single Sermons of uncommon elegance and beauty: and a Sermon preached not long ago in Greenwich church, on the occasion of a national fast.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

A cursory reader, or a mere lounge, will probably satisfy his curiosity by simply looking at the title of the Review, in our front page, and, terrified at the imaginary horrors of a dissertation on Law, will fly to Levity or to Poetry for relief. But he who, with an eye at once quick and strong, is capable of gazing stedfastly at the radiance of Truth, will recur again and again to an article, replete with just criticism, wholesome doctrine, and accurate discriminations. It would be injustice to the author, not to add, that his essay exhibits all the accuracy of a lawyer's learning, and all the force of a scholar's style. The value of this journal would be greatly enhanced, and the Editor's benefit, as well as the wishes of the public, would be effectually consulted, if our ingenious friend would, every week, write at least one paper for the Port Folio. We hope if, according to his intimation, he defer his lucubrations until the Spring, that they will come flying to us,

Cum Zephyris, et hirundine prima.

We exult to hear again from the TRANSLATOR of ANACREON. The poetry of Mr. MOORE can scarcely fail to delight those, who are versed in the philosophy of pleasure.

If, after all, we must with Wilmot own,
The cordial drop of life is love alone,
And Swift cry wisely, "Vive la Bagatelle,"
The man, that loves and laughs, must sure do well.

'ANGELO' is a very harsh and puritanic writer. We do not wish to give currency to such bitter invectives against lovely woman. We suspect that 'ANGELO' is benumbed by the Stoic apathy, or rather like his namesake, the hypocritical deputy, in Shakspeare, affects to be rigid, the better to conceal his propensities.

"Lord Angelo is precise,
Stands at a guard with Envy, scarce confession
That his blood flows, or that his appetite
Is more to bread than stone.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

On the recent departure, from this city, of two young ladies, whose personal charms are their smallest attractions, the author was jocosely teased to address some farewell lines to one of them, whom he had long cherished as a friend, and to whose absence it was believed he would not be indifferent.

To sing the praises of her whom he loved, and to describe the gloom, that had overspread a whole circle, upon losing one of its brightest ornaments, was a task peculiarly congenial with his feelings, and eminently calculated to awaken all the powers of poesy. But the Muses were not propitious. Calliope had been so completely taken in lately by æ, who sung the 'Wrath of Burr—the cause of all our woes,' that she strongly advised her sisters to have nothing to do with any more of the Philadelphia wits.

All his attempts, therefore, ended in despair at not being able to express his feelings in language soothing to himself, and to which even she might listen. One, in particular, beginning in a very tender manner,

And must we then, Eliza, part—was so insufferably ridiculed by a mischievous female friend, that its mortified author was compelled to join in the laugh, and in the following burlesque, as an atonement for his presumption to satirize the ordinary effusions of his more fortunate brethren.

JONATHAN TO JEMIMA,

OR

THE FOND SHEPHERD'S FAREWELL.

When first I heard that you must go,
My cheeks they turn'd as white as snow,
That I should be deserted so;

Jemima!

My heart, as father's clock, was quick;
My voice, as mother's cream, was thick,
*And almost in my mouth did stick—

Jemima!

And when thou gav'st me thy white hand,
I trembled so, I scarce could stand;
And o'er myself I lost command,

Jemima!

O you have kindled such a flame,
That it, alas! no time can tame,
Or ever fully quench—the same

Jemima!

The mischief here that you have done,
Though sore to us,—to you is fun,
But almost makes us crazy run,

Jemima!

I cannot guess for what you came,
Since you already had a name,
And could not hope to increase your fame,

Jemima!

Ah! surely love, you never can
Encounter a more faithful man,
Nor I a lovelier maiden than

Jemima!

THE BATTLE OF HOHEN-LINDEN.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL, ESQ.

[A friend of the Port Folio, on his return to the United States, having turned over the two last volumes of that work, in expectation of finding the inclosed poem, was surprised at not meeting with it. Thinking it probable that his first letter has miscarried, he has once more transcribed it; but, as he at present writes from memory, he will not answer that there may not be some inaccuracies in the present copy.]

On Linden, when the sun was low,
All bloodless lay th' untrodden snow,
And dark as winter was the flow
Of Yser rolling rapidly.

But Linden shew'd another sight
When the drums beat at the dead of night,
Commanding fires of death to light
The darkness of her scenery.

By torch and trumpet fast array'd,
Each warrior drew his battle blade,
And furious every charger neigh'd
To join the dreadful revelry.

Then rush'd the steeds, to battle driven,
Then shook the hills, by thunder riven,
And, volleying like the bolt of heaven,
Far flash'd the red artillery.

And redder still those fires shall glow
On Linden's hills of purpled snow,
And bloodier yet shall be the flow
Of Yser rolling rapidly.

'Tis morn—yet scarce the lurid sun
Can pierce the war-clouds rolling dun,
While furious Frank and fiery Hun
Shout in their sulph'rous canopy.

The combat deepens—on the brave,
Who rush to glory, or the grave,
Wave, Munich! all your banners wave!
And charge with all your chivalry!

Ah, few shall part when many meet!
The snow shall be their winding-sheet,
And every turf beneath their feet
Shall be a soldier's sepulchre!

SONNET....TO MYRA.

How sad the exile from his native skies,
Doom'd on the shades of parted bliss to dwell;
No ear to catch his penitential sighs,
No voice to sooth him in his last farewell!
Anxious he treads th' inhospitable shore,
And gazes anxious on the main,
Where ling'ring Fancy loves to feign;
Till day's last lustre bid her wake no more.
Then Horror climbs the dusky wave,
And beckons Madness to her grave;
Where, cradled by the surge to rest,
Low sighs the passing gale 'Despair is blest!'
Ah, sadder far, an exile from thy charms,
Friend, country, freedom, smile in Myra's arms.

BALLAD.

While women, like soft music's charms,
So sweetly bliss dispenses,
Some favourite part each fair performs,
In the concert of the senses.
Love, great first fiddle in the band,
Each passion quells and raises,
Exploring, with a master's hand,
Nice Modulation's mazes;
Till the rapt soul, supremely blest,
Beams brightly in each feature,
And lovely woman stands confest
The harmony of nature.

Hark! with the pensive, in duet,
The sprightly horn it mingles!
The Prude's the flute, and the Coquet
The lively harp that tingles!
One boldly sweeps the yielding strings,
While plaintive to'ther prates it;
Like Caesar, this to victory springs,
Like Fabius that awaits it.
With various gifts to make us blest,
Love skills each charming creature;
Thus, lovely woman stands confest
The harmony of nature.

Maids are of virginals the type,
Widows the growling tymbal,
Scolds are the shrill and piercing pipe,
Flirts are the wiry cymbal.
All wives piano fortes are,
The base how old maids thump it,
The bugle horn are archers fair,
An amazon's a trumpet.
Thus, with rare gifts to make us blest,
Love skills his favourite creature,
And thus sweet woman stands confest
The harmony of nature.

SHORT CANES.

Two bucks having lost their bamboos in a fray,
Side by side swagger'd into a toy-shop one day,
Each, by a new purchase his loss to repair—
But, lo! when for payment our heroes prepare,
All the cash in their pockets, together combin'd,
For the purchase of one scarce sufficient they find.
In common they buy it; and, nice to a hair,
In two they divide it, and each takes his share.
Our beaux economic, improving the hint,
The length of their canes have determin'd to stint:
And when they would buy, a whole company splice
Their pence and their farthings, to make up the price.
Hence, view the smart beau, and you soon ascertain
The depth of his purse, by the length of his cane.

JOHNSON'S CONVERSATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PORT FOLIO.

SIR,

[The following interesting communication was made by me to Mr. Boswell, a short time before his death; Dr. RUSH having politely committed to paper, for that purpose, at my request, the information, casually given, some time before, in the course of conversation. Mr. Boswell received it with many thanks, and intended to insert it in his third edition of the life of his illustrious friend, Dr. Samuel Johnson. He lived not, however, to execute that intention; I have, therefore, solicited, and obtained Dr. Rush's permission to hand it to you: a literary journal, like the Port Folio, being the most proper channel to convey to the admirers of Dr. Johnson, any anecdotes, respecting him, or any of his sentiments, which have not yet been given to the world.

Yours, &c.

JAMES ABERCROMBIE.]

Philadelphia, Nov. 23, 1804.

DEAR SIR,

During my residence in London, in the winter of 1769, I was introduced, by our worthy countryman, Mr. West, to Sir Joshua Reynolds, who favoured me, a few days afterwards, with a card to dinner. At his table, I met a group of authors, among whom was the celebrated Dr. Johnson. The day was to me one of the most memorable I passed, while abroad, on account of the singular display, which I witnessed, both of talents and knowledge. Dr. Johnson came late into company. Upon his entering the room, he found Sir Joshua consoling one of his guests, under the pain he felt from having been handled very severely by the reviewers. 'Don't mind them,' said Johnson to the complaining author. 'Where is the advantage of a man having a great deal of money, but that the loss of a little will not hurt him? And where is the advantage of a man having a great deal of reputation, but that the loss of a little will not hurt him? You can bear it.'

At dinner, I sat between Dr. Johnson and Dr. Goldsmith. The former took the lead in conversation. He instructed upon all subjects. One of them was drunkenness, upon which he discovered much of that original energy of thought and expression, which were so peculiar to him.

The anemone maritima was named by one of the company, about which naturalists have disagreed, whether it belonged to the vegetable or animal kingdom. 'It is an animal,' said Dr. Johnson, for its ashes have been analyzed, and they yield a volatile alkali, and this we know is the criterion of animal matter, as distinguished from vegetable, which yields a fixed alkali.' I was much struck with this remark; for I did not expect to hear a man, whose studies appeared, from his writings, to have been confined to moral and philosophical subjects, decide so confidently upon a controversy in natural history.

A book, which had been recently published, led to some remarks upon its author. Dr. Goldsmith, addressing himself to Dr. Johnson, said, 'He appears, Doctor, from some passages in his book, to be one of your acquaintances.' 'Yes,' said Johnson, 'I know him.' 'And pray, what do you think of him?' said Goldsmith. 'He is well enough—well enough,' said Johnson. 'I have heard,' said Goldsmith, 'he is much given to asking questions in company.' 'Yes, he is,' said Johnson, 'and his questions are not of the most interesting nature. They are such as this—' 'Pray, Doctor, why is an apple round, and why is a pear not so?'

During the time of dinner, Dr. Goldsmith asked me several questions, relative to the manners and customs of the North American Indians. Dr. Johnson, who heard one of them, suddenly interrupted him, and said, 'There is not an Indian in North America, who would have asked such a foolish question.' 'I am sure,' said Goldsmith, 'there is not a savage in America, that would have made so rude a speech to a gentleman.'

After dinner, he was drawn into a dispute with a citizen of London, about the riot, which had taken place, a short time before, in St. George's Fields, and the well-known steps, that were taken by the British government to quell it. The citizen condemned the conduct of government, in very harsh terms, and said that Colonel ——— had declared he would have suppressed the riot, without firing a gun, or killing a man. 'That may be,' said Dr. Johnson, 'some men have a knack in quelling riots, which others have not, just as you, Sir, have a knack in defending them, which I have not.'

I regret, that I cannot gratify you, by detailing the whole of the Doctor's conversation, during the course of the day. I should not have ventured, after the lapse of nearly four-and-twenty years, to have given you the above, from my memory, had they not been impressed upon it, by my having occasionally related them since, among my friends.

With great regard, I am,

dear Sir,

your sincere friend,
BENJAMIN RUSH.

REVIEW.

Nature Displayed, in her mode of teaching language to man, adapted to the French: by N. G. Duffief, of Philadelphia, in two volumes, 8vo, pp. 500. Printed by T. L. Posenman and T. S. Manning.

All efforts to improve or simplify the science of education, should be viewed by the public, with an eye of gratitude, and by the critic, whose quick-sighted penetration may detect errors and false notions, and whose business and duty it is, to expose them, with an eye of indulgence. The hope of experiencing these, if not of meeting with success or reward, notwithstanding the frequent examples of failure, sufficiently accounts for the numerous works, published on education. Therefore, and because the work before us is not written in the vernacular tongue of the author, we began to peruse, with favourable sentiments, the arduous undertaking of "Nature Displayed." When, after a minute attention to the subject, it was discovered that, instead of having the unpleasant task of combatting a system, founded on false principles, we have the pleasing opportunity of announcing to the public a work, replete with originality and profound simplicity of thought, which, when sufficiently understood, bids fair to be of extensive benefit to society.

The following analysis of the work may enable the reader to judge how well this opinion of its merit may be founded.

The title of the work, with the appropriate mottoes, from Locke, Condillac, and Sicard only, give, at once, an idea of the plan, pursued by the writer, very different one from that universally adopted. By these, it is seen, he proposes the tuition of a language, in the shortest time possible, by means of Nature's method, exemplified in the never-failing progress of children, in the acquisition of their native tongue, that is to say, without the incumbrance of the tedious processes of grammars and exercise books.

We must here confess, that, owing to early prejudices in favour of the former method of instruction, we were strongly prepossessed against the mode of teaching a language, without the assistance of grammar; and it was not till we had read the preliminary discourse of the work, in which the author completely unfolds his doctrine, with a scrupulous attention, that we embraced it, and felt an anxious desire it should be generally adopted. We, therefore, beg leave to recommend the reading of this part of the work, to all who may be of opinion, that a grammar is the best book to be put in the hands of those desirous of acquiring a language, with which they may be as yet unacquainted. If they do not become convinced by this, they will at least be pleased with the elegant simplicity of the style, and the ingenuity of his method; which last, being entirely addressed to memory, a faculty of the mind, which every human being (with the exception of idiots) is blessed with, is most certainly adapted to every capacity.

The first volume is divided into four parts, three of which are Vocabularies of words and of phrases; the last is a collection of familiar and idiomatical phrases, which probably could not be introduced among the phrases of the Vocabularies.

The first vocabulary is a vocabulary of nouns, which are classed according to the order of human wants: viz. of hunger, thirst, want of clothing, habitation, &c. This, it is acknowledged, is a very ingenious classification, as words undoubtedly the most necessary, are thereby presented first to the memory, which must greatly facilitate and abridge the acquisition of a language.

This extensive vocabulary, containing about two thousand nouns, very properly conclude with the terms of war, fortifications, and transactions relative thereto. Each noun is placed in the margin, with its gender carefully affixed, and has a particular appropriate phrase separated from the first, by a perpendicular line; and this phrase is such as may be often used in the social communication amongst the French, and in which the true genius and idiom of that language are displayed.

The two other vocabularies have also similar phrases.

The second vocabulary comprehends the numbers, the principal adjectives, and abstract nouns. In this, the order of the human wants is not (the numbers excepted) as in the first, observed. The reason of this, with regard to the adjectives, seems obvious. As they, for the greater part, receive the law of the noun, in respect to gender, a classification of them, according to their manner of forming their feminine gender, appears to have been judiciously preferred. And, as each class of adjectives is sufficiently numerous, it follows, that the learner will naturally acquire, by rote or analogy, like Frenchmen themselves, the faculty of forming the feminine gender of adjectives, agreeably to the genius of the language.

The abstract nouns are classed in alphabetical order, from an impossibility of classing them differently. If it be asked, why the abstract nouns have been placed in the train of adjectives, instead of that of the nouns, I answer, it appears to be the most natural method that could have been adopted, since he has proved, in his second volume, pages 31 and 32, that the adjective is the natural generator of the abstract noun. This being admitted, an acquaintance with the former, must, of necessity, precede that of the latter.

The third vocabulary comprises a series of words of the greatest importance to learners of a language. These have been denominated, by the author, from the part they perform in speech, 'words, forming the link or completion of sense, between the other parts of speech.' They are pronouns of all kinds, articles, prepositions, adverbs, conjunctions, &c. Much judgment and knowledge of language has been displayed in the formation of this vocabulary. Indeed, it may be clearly perceived by this arrangement and the classification of these words, that the author is a practical metaphysician. We have found in this collection a number of expressions, the meaning whereof, though they do often occur in the French, could not be obtained through the medium of any of the French and English dictionaries.

Such familiar phrases as the author could have no opportunity of illustrating, in the preceding vocabularies, together with the idioms and idiomatical phrases, or modes of expressions, peculiar to the French language, conclude the first volume. In order to collect the latter, the author informs us, he has perused above five hundred different plays. It is conceived that, if idioms are to be met with in any books, the author has made the most judicious choice for his purpose, as prose comedies may be justly entitled the picture of civilized life, in all its chequered scenes. A great advantage arises from the idioms having been thus selected; it supplies the learner with a key for completely unfolding French plays, and thereby insures to those who give a preference to such works, the certainty of the acquisition of the French language, fluently, as it is spoken.

The manner of using this book, which constitutes the method, is extremely simple, and truly adapted to every capacity.* It consists in teaching the three vocabularies, and the familiar phrases noticed at the same time; that is to say, the scholar is to learn daily a lesson in each of them, proportionate to his retentive faculty. By following this plan, with perseverance, for two or three months, we are fully persuaded, that every one, endowed with a tolerable memory, and making the French language the principal object of study, must acquire the whole of the first volume, which contains a complete phraseology of the French language; and the wonder that so many phrases are to be obtained in so short a time, will cease, upon considering, that the first phrases, these being the only difficult ones, comprise more or less of those which follow.

While the phrases are thus committed to memory, the verbs, being the link words, as there can be no phrase without them, are not to be neglected; for, besides the four lessons above mentioned, a fifth, beginning with the verbs in the second volume, and comprising all their respective conjugations, is to be learned.

Before proceeding to the analysis of the second volume, we shall say a few words on the English phrases. There are a number of these phrases, in which the idiom of the English language has been either disregarded, or in which it has degenerated into cant. Others, that do not correspond exactly with the French, and a few, that might, with propriety, have been suppressed. In order to render these observations useful, a list of these phrases has been transmitted to the author. On the French phrases, not trusting to our knowledge of that language, several gentlemen, conversant in it, who have been consulted, assured us, all these are generally in use in social communication, and all conformable, except in two or three instances, to the true genius of the language. It is to be observed, that the author has judiciously adopted Voltaire's orthography, which greatly facilitates the pronunciation of those phrases, not to be committed to memory, till the pronunciation of each of them has been acquired, by hearing from the mouth of a person, pronouncing with the true French accent.

The second volume is divided into two sections. The first is entitled 'The Philosophy of Language,' and the second, 'Syntax made easy.'

The author appears convinced, with several eminent writers, that the best grammar, instead of beginning with definitions and rules, should rather begin with a philosophical analysis of the parts of speech, as these must necessarily comprehend the history of the rise and progress of language, and consequently, some metaphysical notions.

This opinion is calculated to stagger those, in whose minds the term grammar, is associated, with childhood. What! they will say, make philosophers of them before they are made grammarians? No: that part of the volume is short, but not adapted to the capacity of children; for few things indeed are adapted to their tender age, and grammar itself, even deprived of philosophy, its life and ornament, has never been one of these; for a knowledge of grammar embraces a competent acquaintance of language and its beauties, that children can never be possessed of; as, to have this, they must have read, with reflection, (which is an absurd supposition) the authors in which these beauties are displayed. It enters not into our plan, to dwell, at present, on this interesting topic. The inquiring reader is therefore referred to an ingenious essay on the subject, in the Gazette of the United States, or in the Daily Advertiser, by Mr. J. Mackie, of this city, in which this new doctrine is established on the firmest basis.

By considering that language is the instrument of our thoughts, that it is as necessary to the faculty of thinking, as numbers are to calculation, we shall deem it of the greatest importance to become acquainted with the formation of it. The idea required the sign, and the sign, in its turn, rendered the idea fruitful; hence, the connection of grammar with metaphysics, which may be termed the science of ideas. This sufficiently accounts for the author's touching on metaphysics, in the very beginning of the Philosophy of Language, and for his introducing an analytical table of the faculties of the mind, while it also proves him well versed in that important science.

In dividing that part of his work into conversations, it will be seen he has adopted the lively and interesting mode of treating a subject, first introduced by the famous Socrates.

In page the first and second, he presents us with the following passage:

'SCHOLAR. What are words?

MASTER. The signs of our ideas and thoughts that is to say, they serve to represent our ideas and thoughts.

S. What do you call an idea?

M. The image or representation of an object or quality in the mind.

S. How are objects represented in the mind?

M. By the sensations or impressions they make on any of the five senses or organs, which the wise Disposer of all things bestowed on man, to enable him to come to the knowledge of external objects. Those sensations, kept up and present to the recollection, are ideas; we connect them with words, without which, ideas, alternately rising and vanishing on the mind, would leave no more vestige on the brain, than the transient waves of a flood leave on the eye.'

In pages 25 and 27, are found the following remarks on the adjective:

'S. What is an adjective?

M. A word joined to a noun, to signify that the object, represented by the noun, is possessed of some quality or property; as, a round table, une table ronde; a red coat, un habit rouge: the words round and red are adjectives, because they denote the figure and colour of the objects table and coat.

S. What gave rise to the use of adjectives?

M. The comparison of objects, which more or less resembled, or differed from one another. When man wanted to impart this resemblance or difference to his neighbour, he had, at first, no particular terms for the purpose; but, inspired by his wants, he happily and naturally came to introduce into language a new kind of words, which have been called adjectives, a word derived from the Latin adjectum, which means added to.

S. Could adjectives be dispensed with?

M. No: for without them, language would no longer exist. Nouns would only represent objects, divested of all their qualities, properties, forms and actions, which render them so highly interesting in the communication of our sentiments. Without the assistance of adjectives, the loveliest objects of nature would sink into indifference, and the finest subjects of imagination would be consigned to oblivion; we should, in fact, be deprived of the faculty of reasoning, as the mere repetition of solitary words, to represent certain objects, would be of no avail to express any of the conceptions of the human mind.

The simplicity of language is divine and admirable; and, as there is some relation between an object and its qualities, which flow from the very nature of the object itself, the adjective may also be said to be derived from the noun, as the latter gave rise to the former.

S. Favour me with some further explanation on this subject.

M. By all means. Some objects possess qualities in such an eminent degree, that the very mention of them conveys to the mind the idea of

* As it is supposed there can be no capacity, without memory.

those qualities. For instance, as a mountain is a very striking emblem of height and magnitude, a person, who would inform his companions that he had seen a very tall or gigantic man, would have said that he had seen a mountain man; for, had he used the word tall, to convey that idea, he would not have been understood, until he had explained to them the meaning, which he intended to convey by this word. He was, therefore, in order to make himself intelligible, obliged to resort to a noun, which was already associated, in their minds, with his prototype; or, suppose he were desirous of extolling the beauty of a fine woman, he might happily express himself, by saying, that her shape was an arrow, (meaning straight or slender) her complexion, snow, (meaning white) that her eyes were heaven, (that is, blue) her cheeks, roses, (red) and her lips cherries or strawberries, (meaning ruddy.).

S. By what means would he have represented a gentle and docile child?

M. Probably by the word lamb; as, a lamb child. But this is a very imperfect mode of expressing the quality. The idea of size, conveyed by the word mountain, is far superior to that of the tallest man. No woman's complexion, however fair, has ever equalled the matchless white of snow.

Such nouns as, at first, gave to savage man a rude idea of the qualities, discovered in certain things, were gradually replaced, when he came to aim at precision, by the words now called adjectives, which were nothing but nouns themselves, that had undergone various modifications, the better to distinguish the quality from the objects, which man, by comparing them, in order to discover their relations, had learned to separate or abstract from them. This alteration in the noun, to signify the quality, greatly improved the faculty of thinking; as, by this means, different names were given to different things, order and regularity began to be established in the understanding of man, and this was the result of the faculty, called abstraction, by which alone mankind are placed so far above the brute creation.

All the ideas of the author are not always as philosophical as the above, and the light of reason is sometimes supplied by the glimmerings of conjecture, such are observed in his highly ingenious hypothesis, concerning the manner in which genders for inanimate things have been introduced into those languages, which admit of them.

M. Man, being of an inventive, scrutinizing genius, and giving names to the objects of his wants, must have early observed, that nature had divided his own species into two sexes, the male and female: and her division would not have been respected, had he called the female by the same name as his fellow man, or, in other words, had he given the appellation of man to woman. He therefore soon devised a term, by which the female of his species was to be designated, and thus, he called her woman, france.

But animals also had their sex. The cow, that supplied him with wholesome and nutritious milk; and the sheep, that defended him from the inclemencies of winter, with her warm fleece, were severally entitled to distinct names, for the discrimination of their sex; and man, inspired with reason, and actuated by gratitude, formed the judicious and laudable distinction. With respect to animals, less important to him, or less worthy his attention, he was not so particular; and instead of imposing a name on the female, entirely different from that of the male, he framed a specific name for the former, by a slight change in the termination of the latter, as, in French, from the masculine terms, chat, a cat; chien, a dog; loup, a wolf; he derived the feminines, chatte, chienne, louve.

Nothing appears more reasonable than this distinction, which the God of Nature has wisely marked, by drawing, with an unerring hand, the sexual line. But man soon deviated from the path of reason, in rendering every object, even the inanimate things of his own creation, male or female, by arranging their names in the class of masculine or feminine nouns. The cause of this erroneous principle in language may be thus accounted for: in the infant state of society, when his condition was precarious and circumscribed, the sex of all animals could not be discovered. Some, that were dangerous and terrific to him, he carefully avoided; some, that viewed him with dread, sought the deepest recesses of the forest for safety: and others, expressing their fear, with fluttering pinions, launched into the vast regions of the air, far beyond his observation. Notwithstanding these obstacles in the road to improvement; and, as no law of nature nor intellectual exertion could direct him, in his course, such was the ardour of his inclination to use the faculty of speech, now become familiar, that he gave names to animals of the same species; as if conscious that they were all absolutely males or females. This will account for the elephant, leopard, bear, rat, &c. having, for instance, the name of the male only, in French; and for the panther, wasp, adder, mouse, &c. having no discriminating name for the male species. Thus, were fear and weakness the authors of error. By judging too hastily, the mind was misled; and man, in early society, leaving the path of nature, to take that of caprice, and easily biassed in his judgment, erred now so much, as to impose names even on inanimate things, as if they had been of the male or female sex.

If the hypothesis of Harris, &c. which he combats, be not well founded, the discerning reader will not, perhaps, think the above much better. He, however, finds the means of explaining by it in what manner the English language came to be deprived of gender for inanimate things, and forms thereby a contrast with the other European languages.

Here, perhaps, it may be thought well worth spending some time in inquiring, why the English language should stand alone among those of Europe, in assigning neither the masculine nor feminine gender to inanimate objects. The hazarding a few conjectures on this subject appears to me the more necessary, when it is considered, that such grammarians, as have discovered the greatest acuteness in their researches, have passed it by, in silence.

To explain this singular deviation from the nature of other languages, I shall have recourse to that fruitful principle of the progress of the human mind, called the association of ideas. Whoever is acquainted with the English, knows, that by the help of the pronouns he and she, prefixed to certain nouns of animals, the male or female thereof are clearly denominated; thus they say, a he or she cat; a he or she goat; a he or she wolf, &c.

In the origin of the English language, there was no room for error, as we have shewn there was in those languages, that impose genders on the names of things; as, when giving names to animals, the framers of this language were always able to make such names masculine or feminine, by the addition of those monosyllabic terms; terms, that were, perhaps, first devised, to express an idea of sexuality. Whenever it was necessary to impose names on things without sex, in speaking of them, they could never have made use of the words he or she; for these words having been placed before nouns of animals, to designate sexuality, in the beginning, could not fail to awaken in the mind the idea of one or other sex. Natural good sense, as yet unimpaired, could not think of employing them, when discoursing of things without sex. The genius of invention directed y reason, and stimulated by necessity discovered the word it.

The limits of this paper will not admit of more quotations; suffice it to say, that many ingenious ideas, but some of these, perhaps, too fanciful to be seriously adopted, beam through his 'Philosophy of language.'

The inquiring reader is referred, for these, to the conversations and notes on the noun, article, pronoun, verbs, &c.

To give, at one view, to those, unacquainted with the work, an idea of the author's system on language, it may be observed, that he admits but one fundamental part of speech, the noun, which, he attempts to prove, generated the other parts of speech. According to his doctrine, their generation took place in the following manner.

The noun generated the adjective; the adjective, in its turn, generated the abstract noun; the articles and pronouns draw their origin from nouns. With regard to the verb, it is the name for respiration or existence, and there is but one, the verb est. The verbs, called adjective, in the French language, are, by a decomposition, proved to be composed of that verb, in its other terminations, and of the adjectives active, or of the participle present. With regard to the preposition, the author agrees with Horne Tooke, concerning its origin. He admits of but one conjunction, that is, et, which proceeds from the verb être, and endeavours to prove that every other word, called conjunction, receives its conjunctive force from this. Such is the very ingenious system of grammar, displayed in the 'Philosophy of Language,' supported by such reasonings and illustrations, as render it not easy to be overturned.

This part of the volume would, from the above, appear almost useless to the American pupil, for the purpose of learning French, were not those metaphysical disquisitions blended with many useful particulars relative to the French language and especially with the conjugation of verbs; which last, it is thought, is the most analytical and extensive, ever presented to the consideration of the learner. It is said, some respectable French teachers have refused to adopt his system of conjugation, owing to the change of the names of the tenses: I do not conceive such an objection to have the least weight. For, if a language should be learned by memory, which few will deny, what odds can it make, if a few terms, which appear, on close examination, very judiciously expressive of the use of the tenses, be added to so many words and phrases, that most indispensably be committed to memory.

The Syntax of the French language concludes the second volume. It appears justly entitled to what the editor of the Literary Magazine has said of it: 'it contains' says the writer, 'a body of instruction, digested in a more luminous method, and comprehending a greater number of particulars, than are found in any work extant.' To this well-written eulogium, it may be added, that the subject is sometimes presented in a point of view, so striking, that the dryness of grammatical matter is here seen to excite an interest, that few could think it capable of. This part of the work is, according to the author's principles, to be attended to, when the first volume has been previously committed to memory. His reasons for it are so well developed in his preliminary discourse, that the reader is referred to it.

Finally, we conclude, that those who peruse 'Nature Displayed,' with attention, will agree with us, that it has much originality and much merit, while it promises such utility to society, (as the principles are applicable to all languages) that the laws of the old world will probably be lost in those of the new, in teaching this important branch of literature.

BIOGRAPHY.
THE LIFE OF J. LANGHORNE.

Of the domestic manners and petty habits of Langhorne, few particulars have been recorded. His private character appears to have been very amiable and respectable. All his contemporaries bear testimony to his candour, probity, liberality of sentiment, and amiable benevolence. Tenderness, in every sense of the word, seems to have been his peculiar characteristic. He had from his childhood, as he himself informs us, a remarkable turn for retirement; and frequently walked, when he was very young, two miles from home, to a solitary place, whose shady privacy aided contemplation. The romantic aspect of his native country probably added to this innocent enthusiasm; and the rude contrast of rocks, and woods, and waters, impressed something of their own wild irregularity on his imagination. His poems abound with images and descriptions connected with the place of his nativity. In his Fable of the Garden Rose and the Wild Rose, the recollection of the scenes of thoughtless gaiety and puerile amusement, which he had long forsaken, restored to his mind the pleasing images which were connected with them, and rekindled, in some measure, that enthusiasm which they first cherished and inspired.

—Enon's wild and silent shade,
Where oft my lonely youth was laid,
What time the woodland genius came,
And touch'd me with his holy flame—
Or, where the hermit Belou leads
Her waves through solitary meads,
And only feeds the desert flower,
Where once she sooth'd my slumbering hour;
Or, rous'd by Stanmore's wintry sky,
She wearies echo with her cry—
Where Eden's fairer waters flow
By Milton's bower, or Ooty's grow,
Or Brockley's alder-shaded cave;
Or, winding round the druid's grave,
Silently glide with pious fear,
To sound his holy slumbers near—

When he resided in London, and became a writer of celebrity, his company was very earnestly solicited; and he became as much distinguished for his social and convivial spirit, as for the force of his genius, and the amiable simplicity of his manners. He is recollected to have been a very constant visitor at the Burton Ale-house, the sign of the Peacock, in Gray's-Inn Lane, where he is supposed to have taken too liberally that substitute for the Castalian fountain, which the house supplied. His manner of living in the country was genial and elegant: and he died, much lamented by his brother justices and convivial friends.

As a prose writer few of his compositions have obtained much popularity, though they afford such pregnant proofs of genius, taste, and learning, as render them in general deserving more attention than they have hitherto received.

His Letters on Religious Retirement are addressed to a lady of good sense and fine accomplishments, but unhappily a little tainted with enthusiasm, and inclined to that sort of melancholy and aversion to the rational pleasures of society, which naturally arises from mistaken apprehensions of the Supreme Being, and the absurd notion of divine impulses and illuminations. They contain a variety of striking arguments and observations, clothed in elegant and pathetic language, not unlike the flowery style of Harvey though applied to a very opposite purpose.

His Sotyman and Almeha is one of the most popular of his performances. In invention, originality, and interest, it is inferior to the Raselas of Dr. Johnson, and the Almorani and Lamet of Dr. Hawkesworth. The design and tendency of the story are more commendable than the execution. In venturing to sport in the flowery fields of fiction, he has sometimes forgotten the poet's precept, convenientia fingere. In the composition, few strong marks of the eastern style, or manners are visible; but the defects of the style, though in general easy and elegant, is compensated by the useful instruction it conveys. The design of the tale is perfectly chaste and moral, tending to confirm the habits of virtue, and to inspire us with a confidence in Providence.

In his Effusions of Friendship and Fancy, he has ventured into the pleasant province of humour; in which, if he does not make such a distinguished figure as Sterne, it ought to be remembered, that few have succeeded in the art of agreeable trifling. The second volume contains a variety of ingenious criticisms, and remarks on the study of poetry, addressed to Mr. Cartwright, which evince his abilities as a classical scholar, and his good taste in polite literature.

His Theodosius and Constantia is founded on the unfortunate love tale told in the "Spectator," No 164. The design of the work is to inculcate many of the great duties of natural and revealed religion, and the practice of some of the most amiable virtues of private life. The merit of this moral and entertaining Correspondence is very considerable. The letters are written in a polite and pleasing style, though his manner is too poetical for prose composition; his language too flowery, too luxuriant, and in some places too finely polished for epistolary writing; in which art should never want ease, nor elegance lose sight of nature.

His Sermons are in general animated, eloquent, and pathetic compositions; but they are sometimes more verbose, diffuse, and affected, than a polished taste can patiently endure. They have been severely censured by Mr. Mainwaring in the preface to his "Sermons," 8vo, 1780; where speaking of specimens of false pathos, he refers to sermons "by writers of little judgment and no genius—to those of Dr. Langhorne in particular, and of the Methodists in general, where the instance, of false pathos are so numerous, and so easy to be found, that I think it needless to quote them." Again: "Although method cannot be too exact, it may be too studiously displayed. There are sermons of the first merit, in all other respects, that may justly be compared to fine skeletons, in which the bones, muscles, and sinews, are fashioned, arranged, and adjusted, in the most perfect manner; but a composition of this sort, though ever so consummate for its strength and symmetry, can only be pleasing to the eye of a virtuoso. The extreme opposed to this is the loose soft texture of Dr. Langhorne's style."

His Memoirs of Collins, though general and scanty, are elegantly written; and the Observations on his Genius and Writings, though sometimes slight and nugatory, are commonly just and pertinent, and always lively and ingenious.

His Letters on the Eloquence of the Pulpit, contain few observations that are new or striking; but the composition is more close and pure than the generality of his prose writings.

In his Frederick and Pharamond, there is a liberality, as well as a rectitude of sentiment, which merits the highest praise; but neither the conduct of the dialogue nor the style are commendable.

His Letters between St. Evremond and Waller, are in general characteristic and elegant, and do equal credit to his taste and judgment.

Of Plutarch's Lives, the translators have given a version that amply supplies the defects of that translation to which Dryden lent his glorious name, written, as he himself acknowledges, by as many hands as there were lives. It had indeed been corrected in the editions, 1727 and 1758, with great learning and ability, as far as correction was possible; but the cast and complexion could only be improved by a new work, which has been executed by the poetical brothers, with an elegance, fidelity, spirit, and precision, that merit the highest praise, and must forever preclude the necessity of a subsequent version. The Life of Plutarch is well written; and the Notes are very valuable.

His translation of Denina's Dissertation on the Ancient Republics of Italy, is an accession to English literature, that has received an additional value from his Original Notes and Observations.

As a poet his compositions are distinguished by undoubted marks of genius, a fine imagination, and a sensible heart. Imagery and enthusiasm, the great essentials of poetry, inspire all his works, and place them far above the strain of vulgar compositions. The tenderness of love, and the soft language of complaint, were adapted to his genius, as well as elevation of thought, opulence of imagery, and the highest beauties of poetry. But the qualities for which he is chiefly distinguished, are imagination, pathos and simplicity, animated sentiment, opulence of allusion, warmth and vivacity of expression, and melodious versification. His sentimental productions are exquisitely tender and beautiful; his descriptive compositions show a feeling heart and a warm imagination; and his lyric pieces are pregnant with the genuine spirit of poetical enthusiasm; but his style, in the midst of much splendour and strength, is sometimes harsh and obscure, and may be censured as deficient in ease and distinctness. His chief fault is redundant decoration, an affectation of false and unnecessary ornament. He is not always contented with that concise and simple language which is sufficient to express his sentiments, but is tempted to indulge in superfluous diction, by the fascinating charms of novelty or harmony. By giving way to the luxury of words and immoderate embellishment, he sometimes, though rarely, violates simplicity, and becomes unavoidably inaccurate and redundant. His sentiments, however, are always just, often new, and generally striking. A great degree of elegance and classical simplicity runs through all his compositions; and his descriptions of nature, rural imagery, pictures of private virtue and pastoral innocence, have a judicious selection of circumstances, a graceful plainness of expression, and a happy mixture of pathos and sentiment, which mark the superior poet.

His Death of Adonis is a classical and spirited version of one of the most beautiful pastoral poems of antiquity. The diction is easy and elegant, and the numbers musical and flowing.

The Poem to the Memory of Mr. Handel may be considered as the genuine and animated wailings of poetry, who deplores her sister's loss in Handel, in very elegant and harmonious verse. There is a considerable variety in the numbers, which are happily adapted to the subject, and modulated with a judicious correspondence to the images and the sentiments. In the passage beginning I feel, I feel the sacred impulse, &c. the pauses and cadences of the numbers are so nervously sweet and mutable, that it must revive the idea of a fine band in every relisher of music.

The Ode to the River Eden is very pretty and fanciful. The stanza extends to ten lines of eight syllables, except the tenth, which, sinking into six, changes the cadence agreeably enough. The expression, laughing wing, in the fourth stanza, is a bold, but very pardonable experiment in metaphorical language. Of the Hymn to Hope, the versification is smooth, the diction elegant, the imagery agreeable, and the sentiment is mostly simple and pathetic. The Viceroy praises Lord Halifax with truth and delicacy, but little poetry.

ADVICE TO A JOURNALIST.

[Concluded.]

Of the Style of a Journalist.

As to the style of a Journalist, Payle is, perhaps, the best model, if you require one; he is the most profound logician that ever wrote; the only compiler possessed of taste. But in his style, always clear and natural, there is too much negligence, too great inattention to propriety, too much inaccuracy. He is diffuse, it is true, he enters into conversation with his reader, like Montagne; and, in that respect, he charms every one; but he abandons himself to a negligence of style, and to trivial expressions of loose conversation; and thus he often disgusts the man of taste.

I give you an example of this: it is the article Abelard in his Dictionary, 'Abelard,' says he 'was more amused by feeling and kissing his pupil, than by explaining an author to her.' He is too familiar with such faults, do not imitate him.

Nul chef-d'œuvre par vous écrit jusqu'aujourd'hui, Ne vous donne le droit de faillir comme lui.

Never employ a new word, unless it be necessary, intelligible, and sonorous. New ideas, particularly in natural philosophy, require new expressions. But to substitute in the place of an usual word, another word, which has only the merit of novelty, does not enrich the language, but corrupts it. The age of Lewis XIV merits respect from Frenchmen, because the authors of that age speak no other language than that which constituted the glory of those illustrious years.

One of the greatest defects in the works of this century is the confusion of style, and particularly the so prevalent desire to speak of the sciences as we would talk of them in familiar conversation. I see books, on the most serious subjects, tarnished by expressions, which seem to be affectedly refined with regard to the subject, but which are, in truth, low and trivial. For example, 'Nature pays the cost of this expense. We must place to the account of Roman vitriol a merit for which we do honour to antimony. Adieu the knowledge of curves, if we neglect calculation,' &c.

This defect has an estimable origin, we dread pedantry; we wish to embellish dry subjects; but, in vitium ducit culpae fuga, si caret arte, I think that all discreet persons prefer a heavy but judicious man to an impertinent wit. Other nations do not fall into this ridiculous folly. The reason is that they have less dread than the French of being what they really are. In Germany, in England, a natural philosopher is a natural philosopher; in France he wishes, moreover, to be witty. Voiture was the first who derived reputation from his familiar style. People exclaimed 'this is writing like a man of the world, like a courtier; this is the style of good company.' The attempt was afterwards made to write on serious subjects in this style of good company, which would often be intolerable in a letter.

This folly has infected many works, in other respects reasonable. It is attributable rather to indolence than to affectation; for these light expressions without meaning, which every body thoughtlessly repeats, these common-place observations, are more easily made than an energetic and elegant expression. It is not with the familiarity of the epistolary style, it is with the dignity of the style of Cicero, that we ought to treat of philosophy. Mallebranche, less pure than Cicero, but more forcible and more replete with imagery, appears to me to be a model in this kind of composition; and would to God he had established truths with as much solidity, as he has defended his opinions with eloquence.

Locke, less elevated than Mallebranche, perhaps too diffuse, but more elegant, always expresses himself, in his own language, with perspicuity and grace. His style is charming, proque similinus amni. In these authors you discover no desire to shine unseasonably, no points, no artifice. Do not follow them with too much servility, O imitatores, servum pecus! But, after their example, accumulate profound and just ideas. Their words are of easy occurrence. rem verba sequuntur. Remember that those who have thought most correctly, are also those who have written with the greatest perspicuity.

If the French language is to be corrupted, this corruption will flow from two sources; one is the affected style of the authors who live in France; the other is the negligence of writers who reside in foreign countries. The public papers, and the journals, are continually infected with improper expressions, to which the public becomes accustomed by the frequent habit of reading them.

For example, nothing is more common in the gazettes than this phrase: We learn that the besieging army, on such a day, should have battered in breach; it is reported that the two armies should have approached each other; instead of, the two armies have approached each other, the besieging army has battered in breach, &c.

This faulty construction is an imitation of the barbarous style, which has unfortunately been preserved at the bar, and in some edicts. In these instruments the King is made to speak a Gothic language. He says: it should have been represented to us, instead of, it has been represented to us; will and pleaseth us, instead of any other phrase, more methodical and more grammatical. This Gothic style of the edicts and laws is like a ceremony in which we wear antique dresses; but we ought not to wear them on other occasions. Laws should be couched in ordinary language, for they ought to be easily understood. The elegance of the institutes of Justinian is worthy of imitation. But how remote are we from the form and from the substance of Roman laws!

Authors should avoid this abuse, to which all the foreign gazettes are addicted. They ought to imitate the style of the gazette printed at Paris; it utters useful things, at least in correct language.

The greater part of the literary men who write in Holland, where the most extensive trade in books is carried on, are infected with another kind of barbarism, derived from the language of merchants: they begin to write per contra for on the contrary; this present, instead of, this letter; exchange instead of change or alteration. I have seen translations of excellent books filled with these expressions. The mere exposure of such faults should suffice to correct authors. Would to God it were as easy to correct the vice which daily produces so many mercenary writers, so many unfaithful extracts, so many falsehoods, so many calumnies, with which the press overwhelms the republic of letters.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

Of the other Harangues of Cicero.

It seems to have been the destiny of Cicero to have all those to defend who had defended him; but he was less fortunate for Milo than he had been for so many others. It was not that his cause was worse; but we must acknowledge that the political circumstances, which had so much influence upon judiciary affairs, were not favourable to him. I have already spoken of the open war, which Clodius and Milo carried on in the midst of Rome: it was not doubted that one or the other must fall. Cicero in more than one place speaks of Clodius as a victim, whom he abandons to Milo. The latter demanded the consulate, and the former the praetorship; and Clodius, who had so much interest in not seeing his enemy clothed with a superior magistracy, had publicly said, with his ordinary impudence, that in three days Milo should be no more. Milo appeared determined to spare him as little. It was, nevertheless, a mere accident, and not any project, on one side or the other, which produced the rencounter, in which Clodius perished. He was on his return from the country, with a train of about thirty persons; he was on horseback, and Milo, who was on his way to Lavinium, was in his carriage with his wife; but his followers were more numerous, and better armed. The quarrel began: Clodius, wounded, and feeling himself the weakest, retired to an inn, as if to make it an asylum. But Milo would not lose so fair an opportunity; he ordered his gladiators to force the house, and to kill Clodius. In a peaceable and well ordered state this murder would not have been excusable; but when the laws have not sufficient energy to protect the lives of the citizens, every one returns to the rights of natural defence: and this was the case of Milo. Nevertheless, the man whom he had killed, was of so much consideration, that his relations and friends would pursue their revenge for his death. Milo was accused, and this prosecution was, like all others at this time, an affair of party. Pompey, who was then the most powerful citizen of Rome, was not sorry that they had delivered him from Clodius, who respected nobody; but, at the same time, he let it be perceived that he would be well pleased to be rid of Milo, whose character, firm and unaccommodating, could not fail to displease any one, who affected a domination. It was this disposition of Pompey, too generally known, which very much injured Milo. This cause was pleaded with extraordinary preparation, and before an innumerable multitude, who filled the Forum. The people were mounted even upon the roofs to be spectators of this trial, and armed soldiers, by the order of the consul Pompey, surrounded the enclosure where the judges were sitting. The accusers were heard in silence, but when Cicero arose to answer them, the faction of Clodius, composed of the vilest of the populace, set up a cry of fury. The orator, accustomed to acclamations of another kind, was disconcerted: it was some time before he composed himself, and with some difficulty made himself heard: but he was not able to recover this first impression, which enfeebled all his argument, and prevented him from displaying all his powers.

Of fifty judges, Milo had only thirteen for him: all the others condemned him to exile. It is true that among the voices which were favourable to him, there was one which was more respectable than all those which were not, Cato was of opinion to absolve him; and if sometimes they accused Cato of too much severity, he never was reproached with too much indulgence. He thought that Milo had rendered service to the republic, by delivering it from so bad a citizen. This was also the opinion of Brutus, who published a memoir, in which he maintained that the destruction of Clodius was lawful. He had even advised Cicero not to disavow the fact or the intention, and to maintain that Milo, in wishing to kill Clodius, and in killing him, had done nothing but what he ought to do. Cicero thought this defence too hazardous, and in that state of things he had reason. He took, therefore, another course, and availed himself ably of all the circumstances of the action to prove that Clodius had laid in wait for Milo in the Appian way, and to throw all the odium of the homicide upon the slaves, who had acted without the order of their master. This discourse passes for one of his master pieces; but the one that we have is not that which he pronounced. He was too much intimidated to have so much energy. Accordingly when Milo, who supported his exile with great spirit, received the oration which Cicero sent him, and such as he has transmitted to us, he wrote him, 'I thank you for not having done so well at first; if you had thus spoken, I should not now eat at Marseilles such fine fish.' A man who received his destiny with so much resolution, merited the suffrages of Cato and Brutus.

Although Cicero would not establish his defence upon the plan which they proposed to him, he nevertheless rejected it not entirely; and after having demonstrated, as well as he could, in the first part of his discourse, that it was Clodius who was interested in the destruction of Milo, and that he had the design to effect it; in the second he goes farther, and availing himself of all advantages, and relating all crimes of Clodius, he maintains that if Milo had openly pursued him as a public enemy, far from deserving punishment by the laws, he would have merited the gratitude of the Roman people. But he appears to me to have chosen his means like an able orator, when he preferred to state this assertion as an hypothesis, and not as a fact; it has much greater force. It was something too hard to say bluntly: I meant to kill him, and I have killed him; on the contrary, after having presented his adversary as the aggressor, as a lyer in wait, one is received much more favourably, to say, although I had even aimed at his life, he had given me a right to take it. We speak, in such cases, to minds prepared, which may more easily allow themselves to be persuaded of that which might have revolted them at first. This progression in the ideas which we offer, and the impressions we wish to make, is one of the secrets of the art of oratory. We obtain by management and preparation what we could not carry by mere force. But, after all the precautions he had taken, Cicero appears to triumph when he says, 'If at that moment Milo, holding in his hand the still bloody sword, had cried out, Romans, hear me: hear me citizens; I have killed Clodius; with this arm and with this steel I have removed from your persons the furies of a miscreant, whom no bridle could restrain, and the laws could no longer bind; it is by his death that your rights, liberty, innocence, and honour, are in safety; if Milo had held this language, would he have had any thing to fear? In fact, who, at this day, does not approve him? Who does not think him worthy of praise? Who does not think, who does not boldly say that no man ever gave the Roman people greater cause to rejoice? Of all the triumphs which we have seen, none, I dare say, has diffused, within these walls, more joy, or promised more durable advantages. I flatter myself, Romans, that you and your children are destined to behold in the republic the most happy changes: but, believe me, you would never have seen them, if Clodius had lived. Every thing authorises us to hope, that, with such a consul as the great Pompey, this very year will see a bridle put to licentiousness, cupidity restrained, the laws re-established; and such days of security as we now expect where is the man sufficiently bewildered to flatter himself with the hope of them in the lifetime of Clodius? What do I say?—Which of your domestic possessions would you have been able to promise yourselves the secure and peaceable enjoyment, as long as this madman could have supported his domination? I have no apprehensions that the public will suspect that my private resentments have inspired into my accusations more of violence than truth. Although I had more than any other man a right to detest him, nevertheless my personal hatred cannot exceed the universal horror which he excited. Finally, judges, let me ask you—the question to be decided is concerning the death of Clodius. Let us imagine then, (for the supposition may for a moment represent us objects as if we saw the reality), imagine then, that they should promise to absolve Milo, on condition that Clodius should return to life—You all shudder! What then! If this bare idea, dead as he is, has struck you with terror, what would happen if he were really alive?

THE CARAVANSERY.

There is no one of the fine arts more commonly esteemed, or that possesses a more general empire, than poetry. In music and painting, we willingly acknowledge our ignorance, where it exists, and deem it no disgrace to be born with an indifferent ear, or to be unable to point out the defects and excellencies of a picture. But of poetry every man presumes to judge, and will give his opinion of an ode or tragedy, with as much confidence, as the first critic of the age.

But, notwithstanding the general presumption, there are, in reality, but few, qualified to judge accurately of this charming art. To estimate justly the production of the Muse, requires not only a fine natural taste, but an extensive acquaintance with elegant literature, both ancient and modern. Without these indispensable qualifications, we can form no correct opinion, and though we may cavil, we cannot criticise.

From this general inability to judge accurately, arises the admiration, unjustly conferred on modern poetry, to the comparative neglect of those univalued masters, to whom our language is chiefly indebted for its harmony and grace. Novelty seems to compensate for excellence, and the short-lived poems of the day are perused with avidity, and praised with extravagance, while the standard bards are allowed to moulder on the shelf. It is my intention, therefore, in this paper, to restore the great poets to their proper rank, and assign, to the rest, that station, to which their respective talents entitle them.

To Milton and Shakspeare, all, I presume, are willing to yield the first seat in the temple of the Muses; the former distinguished by his sublimity and learning, the latter by his universality of genius.

The claims of Dryden and Pope to the second, will hardly be disputed, though it may not be so clear, to which of these great poets, the palm of superiority is due. Dryden may have more genius, but Pope has more art. The subjects, on which Dryden exercised his talents, were generally of a temporary nature, and consequently excite little interest in posterity. Pope wrote to the business and bosoms of men, and will therefore be read with instruction and delight, while the English language lasts. Dryden is sinking into neglect, but Pope is rising still higher in the estimation of scholars, throughout the whole civilized world. The works of Dryden have never, I believe, appeared, but in their native tongue; the productions of Pope have been translated into every polished language in Europe. We respect Dryden for what he could have written: we are grateful to Pope, for what he has actually performed.

It has been fashionable, of late years, to depreciate the genius of Pope, as deficient in originality. But no charge can be more unfounded. Long before he was of age, he wrote an epic poem, entirely the creature of his own imagination, and many other performances, which sufficiently prove, that he was not wanting in fertility. These, his mature judgment committed to the flames, so that he is indebted, for this charge of deficiency in original genius, to his exquisite taste. What Pope loathed and rejected, would probably have been admired and extolled, by these sticklers for originality.

I have often thought, that if the great critics of antiquity, who were most distinguished by correct taste, could rise from their graves, and, by some miracle, be enabled to comprehend modern languages, they would give a decided preference to Pope, over all the authors of Europe. Though Milton, in some particulars, may excel all the ancients, yet, his quaintness and pedantry would exclude him from the first rank of classics, in the judgment of Horace and Quintilian.

Thomson, Armstrong, Somerville, Akenside, and Cowper, may be considered among the first poets in the second class. Of these, Thomson is the most pleasing, and Armstrong the most correct. Goldsmith, Mason, Gray, and Collins, may possess equal, though different excellence. Gray is thought, by some, to have refined too much, and Mason is universally acknowledged to yield to no writer, ancient or modern, in purity of language.

These are the authors, that ought to form and guide the public taste in poetry, and to whom our language is under the greatest obligations. Many modern versifiers may have merit, but it is of an inferior stamp, and entitled to little praise, beyond that of industry. Cowper is the last of the English poets, and since him, I know not an individual bard, who will probably reach posterity. The public, in general, are fond of novelty, and incompetent to judge. Hence, every new poem is extolled, in terms of extravagant encomium, by the ignorance of its admirers, and by the partiality of the author's friends. We all remember the admiration, which Della Crusca and his followers excited, both in England and America; nor did the delusion cease, until the pen of Gifford, like the spear of Ithuriel, dissolved the charm, with its magic touch, and discovered the loathsome deformities, concealed under the dazzling covering of brilliant phraseology. An intimate acquaintance with the good poets will enable us to detect the faults of the bad; and let it be remembered, that this is no trifling accomplishment, if it be true, that a good taste in literature generally leads to a correct taste in politics, morals, and religion.

ON MORAL PHELEBOTOMY, A MODE OF DISCIPLINE AMONG THE ROMANS.

It was a part of the ancient military discipline among the Romans, to order a delinquent to undergo phlebotomy; and this was originally intended, as Aulus Gellius seems to think, rather as a remedy than a punishment, quasi minus sani viderentur omnes qui delinquerent, with an idea, that all who misbehaved were therefore to be considered and treated as invalids or unsound.

I was seriously considering this method adopted by the wise Romans, and I could not help thinking, that the remedy might be extended to delinquents, in modern times, and in other professions and employments of life as well as in the military.

Suppose the case of a knowing young man, who is not easy till he has picked a quarrel, or distinguished himself by a nocturnal riot in a college, in Covent Garden, in the lobbies of the Theatre, in the rural retreat of Vauxhall, or in a duel in Hyde Park. As his irregularity is usually attributed to the warmth of his blood, I should think the lancet might be used with the greatest probability of success. A few ounces quietly let out in the surgery, might prevent the effusion of great quantities by throwing bottles, by the stroke of the watchman's staff, or the sword of some hot-headed antagonist.

It is usual to call persons who are too eager in their pursuits, sanguine; for such surely no cure can be so certain and well adapted, as phlebotomy.

There is a passion which assumes the name of love, but instead of promoting the happiness of its object, regards neither its peace nor good fame, while it licentiously seeks its own gratification. It has nothing in it of the tenderness, the delicacy, the purity of love, but is very violent, and seems by the symptoms, to partake the nature of a fever. I believe in this case, copious bleeding, with a cooling regimen, would not fail of affecting a temporary cure.

There are numerous tribes of schemers, projectors, and garreteer politicians, who pester themselves and the public with their crudities, but who might be brought to their sober senses, if the blood, which flows in too great quantities to the brain, were drawn off by well-timed and powerful revulsion.

You authors, Sir, excuse my freedom, often stand in great need of phlebotomy. You have a thousand flights, fancies, and vagaries, which can be attributed to nothing but the irregular tide of your blood. You swell with pride and vanity, and think to reform the world from your garrets; but the world goes on as it pleases, and you have nothing but your labour for your pains. I think I could lower your pride and vanity by my lancet, and teach you an humility which perhaps you will never learn in the books of philosophy, and which would save you a great deal of needless trouble.

In a word, all poets, religious enthusiasts, balloonists, lottery adventurers, ambitious statesmen, and choleric orators in the British or Irish parliament, may, I am convinced, receive great benefit from the phlebotomizing system of morality. I intend soon to offer myself to the universities as a professor of moral phlebotomy. How convenient and expeditious a process will it be! No occasion for preaching, reading and contemplating; for whatever disorder you labour under, only repair to the artist who shaves for one penny, and bleeds for two, and you may be restored to health. Adieu. I stop short, lest you should think I want bleeding myself.

Your's, &c.

AN ETHICO CHIRURGICAL OPERATOR.

Though my correspondent has treated the subject ludicrously, yet I have little doubt but he meant to convey instruction, and I shall take occasion from his letter to recommend bodily temperance, as conducive to the government of the passions and imagination.

The irregularities of youth are often caused by excess, than by that natural ebullition of blood which is often alleged in their excuse. But allowing as much as can be required, to the impulse of the blood and spirits, yet it will still be true, that extravagances of behaviour will probably be much aggravated by intemperance in wine: for indeed, to add the heat of wine to the heat of youth, what is it but to throw oil upon the fire! Yet at no age do men indulge in wine so freely as when, according to their own confession, their blood is already too much inflamed by a natural fermentation. If, instead of adding to the flame, young men would manage it with discretion, and even damp it sometimes, it would probably continue to burn with a temperate, yet sufficient warmth to extreme old age. But the ardour of youth, raised to a fever by wine, not only urges to acts of folly and madness, but burns the vital stamina which were intended by nature for long duration. I by no means go so far as to recommend either phlebotomy or cathartics to a young man, who is under the influence of a violent passion; but I venture to suggest, that he would find the conquest over himself greatly facilitated by abstinence from wine, and by moderation in diet. His reason might have an opportunity of asserting that ascendancy, which she ought to claim and will probably possess, when the delirium of intemperance is once abated.

The errors of imagination are very much increased by intemperance. During the fever which it occasions, man is apt to dream, and to mistake his visions for realities. How many lives have been sacrificed to supposed affronts and injuries, to affronts never intended, and injuries never committed! But they appeared, in the hour of convivial excess, not only real, but of the greatest magnitude, and in the most ugly colours. If the offended parties would allow themselves time too cool, and spend the next day in abstinence, or at least, in strict temperance; I think the phantom of imagination, which appeared like a giant, would dwindle to a dwarf, or dissolve into nothing, like a cloud in the azure expanse of heaven, which melts into air, and leaves an undisturbed serenity. Temperance would effect what argument attempted in vain; and such influence has the body over the mind that there is often no method of reducing the peccant humours of the mind so effectual, as that of duly arranging the frail mansion in which it is destined to dwell. It is a most unhappy degradation, when the mind is governed by the body, over which it might, by the exertion of its native powers, exercise, for the most part, an absolute dominion.

To cure the mind through the medium of the body is by no means a new process in mental medicine. The fasts, and the mortification of self-denial, which are recommended in the church were certainly intended to promote sanctity of life, by purifying the body, which in revelation is so greatly honoured as to be called the Temple of the Holy Spirit. After all our efforts, the humiliating experience of frequent failure must convince every serious man, that he must submit himself to the supreme physician, the physician of souls, who, if he will, can make us clean; and that he will do so, if we ask as we ought, with sincere faith and piety, there is every reason to hope and believe, from the consideration of that attribute in which he is known chiefly to delight.

SKETCH OF JOHN CALDER, D. D.

Originally a clergyman of the church of Scotland. He was first brought to London under the patronage of the late Duke of Northumberland, and resided for some years in the neighbourhood of that nobleman at Alnwick Castle. It was here that he conceived the design of a sumptuous edition of the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, with notes assigning, as nearly as possible, each paper to its respective writer, and anecdotes of the lives of the writers. The Tatler, which was finished in conjunction with Mr. John Nichols, appeared in 1786.

SKETCH OF RICHARD OWEN CAMBRIDGE, ESQ.

This gentleman was one of the contributors to the periodical paper called the World: which was originally set on foot by Mr. Edward

Moore, the author of Fables for the Female Sex. He has also written the Scribleriad, a mock heroic poem in six cantos: an Account of the War in India, in 1760, in one volume 4to; and several miscellaneous poems, which were republished in Dodsley's Collection.

The Agents and Subscribers for the Port Folio are very respectfully reminded, that the Editor has nearly completed the fourth circle of his annual toil, and is preparing for the fifth.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The sketch of Dr. Johnson's conversation is very high in the estimation of the Editor. He tenders his thanks to the gentlemen, who have so obligingly furnished him with a paper, interesting to every gleaner of literary anecdotes. It is understood, that our correspondents have, in their possession many letters, from foreign authors of celebrity. It will be not less delightful to the public, than to the Editor, if he may be permitted to publish such as are of a literary complexion, or will illustrate the manners, habits, and characters of the Augustan ages of Europe.

The complimentary verses from 'P. F.' and 'ITHACUS,' to a New York beauty, are vivid tokens of the lady's merit, and the poets' fire.

To the 'Review' of Mr. Duffie's elementary work on the French language, we have allotted a considerable portion of this number, because we are willing to shew kindness to an industrious and useful teacher, who has been cast upon our shores, by the revolutionary waves of the sea of liberty, and who has the claims of a royalist emigrant, upon all the funds of good nature, and all the candour of criticism.

The 'Advice to a Journalist,' which an American gentleman has very elegantly translated from the French, is now concluded, and we hope we shall profit from many of the excellent hints, which so sensible and didactic an essay contains. We hope that our friend, to whom the language and literature of France are perfectly familiar, will not be soon weary of casting his eye over the Parisian page, and translating for the Port Folio whatever he finds well adapted to the character of this Miscellany.

'Benedict,' the married man, still displays the wit and fire of the gay bachelor. Love has not transformed him into an oyster.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE SON OF SORROW.

TO MYRA.

When deep despondence gathers into shade,
And grief, unfeign'd, calls fiction to her aid;
Paints through the vista of expected years
Hours clad with woe, and visions dim with tears;
The past and future one long waste of gloom,
Here memory's madness, there oblivion's tomb;
No ear to list, no voice to soothe despair,
And even death is deaf to sorrow's pray'r—
O say, sweet minstrel! (for thy sighs I know
Are wont to mingle with the sigh of woe,)
Where shall the hope-deserted pilgrim fly,
To live too wretched, and too weak to die?
Perhaps, e'en now, impassion'd and sincere,
The sigh of beauty steals upon his ear;
Soft as the sky-wave theme of viewless lyres
That soothe his spirit, when the saint expires.

And Oh! perhaps ere quite dissolv'd in air,
That sigh may breathe oblivion to despair;
Melt o'er the throbbing string in Myra's lay,
Till woe enraptur'd bear herself away.

FANATICISM.

I hate your sullen babes of grace,
A canting, hypocritic race,
With tabernacle phizzes,
Who think Omnipotence to charm
By faces longer than my arm!
O what a set of quizzes!

I hate those wretches, wild and sad,
Like gloomy wights in Bedlam mad,
Or d—d Old Baily culprits;
Who, with a bold blasphemous zeal,
Death and damnation dare to deal
From barn erected pulpits.

I hate that hangman's aspect bluff
In him whose disposition rough,
The porcupine surpasses;
Who thinks that heav'n is in his power,
Because his sullen looks might sour
A barrel of molasses!

A stupid dunce, who cannot read,
(A very likely thing, indeed.)
Receives from heav'n a calling;
He leaves his plough, and drops his hoe,
Gets on his meeting-clothes, and, lo,
Sets up the trade of bawling!

With lengthen'd visage, woe bedight,
An outward sign of inward light,
Now howls in dismal tone,
'I say as how you'll all be d—d,
For Satan never will be sham'd,
And you're the devil's own.'

Fools and old women blubbering round,
With sighs and sobs and grief profound,
His every tone responds, sir,
O could I catch the whining cur,
The deuce a bit would I demur
To duck him in a pond, sir.

He next to conference-meeting goes,
And loudly twangs thro' vocal nose
A mockery of pray'r;
Sows seeds of grace, in carnal way,
By which your female saints, they say,
Are suited to a hair;

Affirms 'tis plain the scripture saith
That men are sav'd alone by faith,
And right with wrong confounding,
To be consistent with his plan,
Does all the dev'lish deeds he can,
That grace be more abounding.

If any of the canting race
Are sent to visit any place,
Adieu to all decorum;
To every virtue now adieu;
Morality and religion true,
Are blasted all before 'em.

A good old woman has the spleen,
And sees what is not to be seen,
Or dreams of things uncommon,
Yea ten times more than tongue can tell,
Strange things in heaven, and eke in hell,
Oh! what a nice old woman!

Straight by the sect 'tis blab'd about,
That she's inspir'd beyond a doubt
And has her sins forgiven;
How can the wretches hope for bliss,
Who palm vile nonsense, such as this,
Upon the G—d of heaven?

Such doers of the devil's works
Are sure than renegado Turks
Worse foes to real piety;
And, tho' we would not persecute,
By dint of ridicule we'll hoot
The wretches from society.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

On earth there's nothing worth possessing,
Or can the ills of life beguile,
Without that dearest, sweetest blessing,
The magic of a woman's smile.

The glare of wealth, the pomp of fame,
Are senseless treasures, joyless, vile;
Are bawbles with a splendid name,
Without the charm of woman's smile.

The noxious clouds of motley care,
That thicken round our joys awhile,
Like morning mist, dissolve in air
Before the beams of woman's smile.

How sweet the sun's bright beam must be,
After long night to Zembla's isle!
But oh! much sweeter far to me,
The sunshine of a woman's smile!

Then place me, Fate, where'er you may,
'Mid dreary waste, or savage isle;
For o'er my soul no gloom can stray,
While I am blest with woman's smile.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

'Two poets, in two different countries born,' offer the following for the Port Folio.

TO MISS ANN B—, OF NEW-YORK,
On her Birth-day.

Arrest the flattering pen!—May nature's child
Never be wounded by the venal lay!
Nor studied praise, nor aught but accents mild
Bestow the blush on this her natal day!

As years revolve, may virtue still rejoice
Renewing blessings on thy friends around,
Calm, gentle, undisturb'd by passion's voice!
Lov'd parents gladden as thy joys abound!
And, when thy heart bestows thy beauteous hand,
Years of delight be shower'd at heaven's command!

P. F.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO THE SAME.

Five days, and three hundred, and three score their flight
Have taken, since Anna saluted the morn,
When her eye shot a tremulous gleam of delight
To hear her friends welcome the day she was born.

And five days, and three hundred, and three score
shall pass,
Ere a birth-day shall come, that can boast of a fair,
Whose charms can the charms of their Anna surpass,
And claim from their friendship a tenderer care.

Then,—frown not, fair Anna!—a maid shall be seen,
(So a poet foretells) who e'en thee shall excel;
Who shall reign in those hearts where thou once
wast the queen,
And make them forget that they lov'd thee so well.

Though bright be thy eye, yet, (believe but the muse)
Her eye too shall shine with as lucid a ray;
And as soft be her blush, as those warm-glowing hues,
That now on thy cheek each emotion betray.

And if now, for a heart of the tenderest kind,
Thou art lov'd, and art honour'd, and ever wilt be;
Yet, in her, a still tenderer heart we shall find,
And shall love her far better than now we do thee.

And if e'er laughing Innocence kindled thy smile,
Which told in thy face that thy bosom was gay,
So on her dimpled cheek shall it glow, and the while
As tranquil as thine all her pulses shall play.

And her name—but 'tis needless to mention it here;
Dull, indeed, must he be, who the name cannot tell;
For she is thyself at the end of the year,
And none, except Anna, can Anna excel.

And more lov'd and more honour'd the general voice
Shall hail thee, as each circling year shall roll o'er,
Nor a birth-day shall pass but thy friends shall rejoice
To find that their Anna still pleases them more.

ITHACUS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE FRENCH.

As hunch-back'd Æsop bath'd one eve,
He ventur'd, careless wight, to leave
His jerkin on a stone;
A brawny bully, passing by,
Its glossy colour pleas'd his eye;
He claim'd it as his own.

Now little Æsop, though aggriev'd,
Had from benignant heaven receiv'd
Less bravery than wit;
And, with submissive bow and low,
He cried, 'Gad bless me! is it so?
I hope, sir, it may fit.'

BENEDICT.

EPIGRAM.

On a Counsellor's having his hat stolen in Westminster Hall.

Should'st thou to justice, honest thief, be led,
Swear that you stole his hat who had no head.
That plea alone all danger shall remove,
Nor judge nor jury can the damage prove.

ANOTHER BRITISH SPY IN BOSTON.

IT will not, my dear S—, seem surprising that my first communication should turn on so interesting a topic as eminence in the profession of the law. Here, as at home, to be eminent in this profession, is to be eminent in the nation, and those, who can best persuade juries, and convince the mind of a court, have invariably the most influence at elections, and the greatest weight in the council.

Eminence in the profession of law, being, at this age of the world, so important an object, it is natural to inquire who are they, that have attained this proud honour.

The three great lawyers of this metropolis are Parsons, Dexter, and Otis. Of their comparative merit, as my fellow traveller and myself differ in opinion, we shall, probably, express different results. Whatever he may have written, I shall give you, with candor, the judgment I have formed with freedom, yet, I hope, without rashness.

Theophilus Parsons unites all the bloom of wit with the aridity of abstract argument. The mighty magician of law, he turns every thing to his purpose, by merely waving his wand. Of immense legal information, his memory affords a fund on which the courts here constantly draw, and whence, without diminishing the original stock, they receive constant supply. He is a mathematician, philosopher, and divine. Yet, uncouth in his person, careless of dress, and barbarous in pronunciation, he has no claim to the elegant attractions of the orator. He is, in one phrase, the Dr. Johnson of the bar.

Samuel Dexter is a man who must always enjoy fame, when fame can be enjoyed with honour, and he is proud enough to despise it, when it cannot. As a barrister, he is certainly beyond all I have met on this side the Atlantic. Americans, who have heard both, consider him superior to Erskine; and would, for the honour of our country, Englishmen could dissent. Unlike, however, that present boast of our Westminster-hall, the glory of Dexter is not confined to the stage of professional action. Powerful in the senate, as at the bar, he could overawe faction with the same ease he can silence opposition. He has proved himself as adequate to the solemn charge of legislation, as to the comparatively humble ministerial duties of his professional office. Some of the most accurate and important 'acts' of the general government were, I am told, first framed by him. The representation of this commonwealth was never more respectable, than when he was in congress. Then Massachusetts could rear her head among the states, and dared speak loud. Now her 'still small voice' is scarcely audible 'mid the tone uprear. He soon after filled so many of the first executive offices, in the Federal administration, in such rapid succession, and with such versatility of talent, that he seems justly entitled to the title of the American Pitt. Yet, with all this agency in the affairs of government, with all the time he must have spent in political occupation, he is considered, by some, second to none as a lawyer. It is unnecessary to compare him with Mr. Parsons. They are equally eminent in distinct spheres. Without more talent for the bar, if we except his wit, the latter gentleman has all the nice discrimination of our late countryman Fearn; and in the capacity of chamber counsel, would have been, perhaps, superior even to him. Comprehension, rather than discrimination, is the characteristic that marks the mind of Mr. Dexter; the forum, rather than the closet, is his appropriate element. Parsons has all the adroitness of a special pleader, and is apt to consume time in foiling his adversary with technical points. Dexter, on the contrary, overlooks every thing but the merits of his case, and d'ems a moment's delay, for mere form, an unwarrantable sacrifice. The one has the eye of a hawk; the other that of the eagle; the one a peculiar pointedness of feature, the other an original boldness. The former an acute disputant, the latter an imposing orator. Parsons has more learning and less taste, his rival more invention and eloquence. Parsons reads more than Dexter; Dexter thinks more than Parsons.

This opinion is not the result of my own unassisted observation. The — my dear S—, to whom you introduced me in this place, have influenced me by the opinion they were frank enough to communicate; an opinion, formed on more time and observation than I could have given this subject, allotting to others their proper proportion.

The Hon. Harrison Gray Otis is certainly intitled to the third rank among the lawyers of this state. As an orator, in gracefulness of gesture and music of voice, he, perhaps, excels Mr. Dexter. Mr. Otis has too a felicity in the ludicrous, which is the portion of none of his brethren. That this state should at one time produce three such characters is certainly matter of wonder. The last gentleman is now the speaker of the house of representatives in this state; and, from his well-known ambition, it has been surmised, that this is only a prelude to being speaker to both houses; but, from the little acquaintance I have with Mr. Otis, I am sensible he is too much a patriot to wish for that office till the melancholy event of the death of the present amiable chief magistrate.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF J. LANGHORNE.

[Concluded.]

The Visions of Fancy are the effusions of a contemplative mind, sometimes plaintive, and always serious, but too attentive to the glitter of slight ornaments. The thoughts are pure, simple, and pathetic; and the lines are such as elegy requires, smooth, easy, and flowing; but the diction is often affected, and the phrase un-skillfully inverted. The Autumnal Elegy, and other pieces of that kind, deserve a more unqualified commendation.

His Genius and Valour is a proper contrast to the 'Prophecy of Famine.' If he does not exceed Churchill in the fire and force of his numbers, he is at least equal to him in the easy and harmonious flow of his versification. In that part of the pastoral, where he celebrates those natives of North Britain, who have been distinguished for their genius and learning, the representation of the four Seasons appearing to Thomson, and claiming the palm, like the fabled competition of the rural goddesses before the royal shepherd on Mount Ida, is entitled to the highest praise. The Seasons are distinguished by a brilliancy of colouring, and a distinctness and propriety of attribute, that rival, if not surpass, what we meet with of the kind even in Thomson. The decision contains an elegant compliment to the amiable 'poet of the Seasons.'

—The bard, whose gentle heart ne'er gave
One pain or trouble that he knew to save,
No favour'd nymph extols with partial praise,
But gives to each her picture for her praise.

In the first epistle on the Enlargement of the Mind, he recommends the study of Nature, in order to enlarge our minds by a due contemplation of her works. The plan is somewhat defective; but it possesses, in many parts, the concise and happy expression, and the melodious versification of Pope's Essay on Man. In the Second Epistle, like the first, there is more poetry than plan. The paterfamilias on Reason is eminently beautiful, and the reflection on the proper culture of the flower divine is pathetic and spirited. The description of those graceful arts, which flock round the throne of Science, particularly Poetry, Painting, Sculpture, and Music, is appropriate and striking; and the elegiac lines to the memory of his friend General Craufurd, are tender and pathetic. The Precepts of Conjugal Happiness contain much valuable instruction, delivered in chaste and elegant diction, and easy and harmonious verse.

The Verses to the Memory of a Lady, rank with the celebrated elegiac compositions of Lyttleton and Shaw, to which they are equal in poetical merit, and scarcely inferior in pathetic tenderness. They must please every body, because there are beauties in them which affect every body. The following lines must touch every feeling heart:

See the last aid of her expiring state,
See love, ev'n love has lent his darts to fate!
Oh! when beneath his golden shafts I bled,
And vainly bound his trophies on my head;
When crown'd with flowers he led the rosy day,
Liv'd to my eye, and drew my soul away—
Could fear, could fancy, at that tender hour,
See the dim grave demand the nuptial flower?

There, there his wreaths dejected Hymen strew'd,
And mourn'd their bloom unfaded as he view'd;
There each fair hope, each tenderness of life,
Each nameless charm of soft obliging strife,
Delight, love, fancy, pleasure, genius, fled,
And the best passions of my soul lie dead.

These pathetic verses came so near the feelings of the present writer, when he experienced a similar affliction, nine years ago, that they hurt his peace of mind; and, while he admired the poet, and pitied the man, he saw his own miseries in the strongest point of view, and sought, like him, a vain relief, by composing a 'Monody to the Memory of a Beloved Wife,' in the same measure, which he extended, with a melancholy pleasure that mourners only know, beyond the bounds which custom has prescribed to elegiac verses. He has seen the scene he describes, and knows how dreadful it is. He knows what it is to lose one, that his eyes and heart have been long used to, and he never desires to part with the remembrance of that loss.

—though the inexorable urn
Never to me shall her lov'd form return;
Tho' cold the breast that life's warm current fed,
And pale the cheek that modest beauty spread;
Tho' clos'd the eye that glanc'd endearing thought,
And mute the voice that living goodness taught;
Never from me shall her lov'd image part,
But live and reign univall'd in my heart;—
Ev'n death's dim shadow seeks to hide in vain
The modest aspect, and the smile humane!
In day's broad glare, and in the gloom of night,
Her pale-ey'd phantom rises to my sight!
In vain—confest, I see my Anna stand,
And the pen falls—falls from my trembling hand!
Faint on my lips th' unhallow'd sounds expire,
That vainly emulate the muse's fire;
Afresh my tears in fond remembrance flow,
And rising anguish stops the strain of woe;
Bleeds in my breast with aggravated pain,
Throbs at my heart, and thrills in every vein!

In his Fables of Flora, the plan of fable is somewhat enlarged, and the province so far extended, that the original narrative and moral may be accompanied with imagery, description, and sentiment. The scenery is formed in a department of nature adapted to the genius and disposition of poetry, where she finds new objects, interests, and connections, to exercise her fancy and her powers. The plan is judicious, and the execution truly admirable. None of his compositions bear stronger marks of poetical invention and enthusiasm; none are distinguished by simplicity, tenderness, and delicacy, in a more eminent degree; and none have a stronger tendency to promote the love of nature and the interests of humanity. Of these charming compositions, the Sun-Flower and the Ivy, the Laurel and the Reed, the Violet and the Parsley, the Wall-Flower, and the Mistletoe and the Passion-Flower, deserve particular commendation. The two last are distinguished by imagination, pathos, and sublimity, in a superior degree.

The Origin of the Veil is an elegant compliment to the fair sex, expressed in his usual melodious flow of versification.

The Country Justice breathes throughout a laudable spirit of poetry and humanity; and is farther recommended to us by the additional charms of a flowing and elegant versification. The First Part opens with a retrospective view of the forlorn state of liberty and civil security in England before the institution of justices of the peace, in the reign of Edward III. He then celebrates this most salutary and excellent appointment and its purposes. The description of Ancient Justice Hall succeeds, in which there are some exquisite strokes of humour and pleasantry. The moral character of a country justice, such as that of every magistrate ought to be, is admirably drawn. The general motives for lenity in the exercise of the justice's office, are enforced with much energy and benevolence. In his apology for vagrants, he pleads the probable misery of the widow'd parent, who might have borne one of those wretches, in the richest vein of fancy and pathos.

Cold on Canadian hills or Minden's plain,
Perhaps that parent mourn'd her soldier slain,
Bent o'er her babe, her eye dissolv'd in dew,
The big drops mingling with the milk he drew,
Gave the sad presage of his future years,
The child of misery, baptiz'd in tears!

His declaration against that pernicious species of vagrants known by the name of gyfties, will be read with peculiar pleasure.

The subject of the Second Part is the protection of the poor, in which he points out, with great energy, and well-placed satire, the evils that result from a deserted country and an overgrown metropolis. It is introduced by a dedication, which is equally moral and poetical. In the Third Part, he treats on depredation, prison, and filiation, with the same pathetic elegance, benevolence, and well-placed satire. The prose titles to the several divisions of the poem, which break the thread of the subject, and interrupt the reader, rather unpleasingly, are omitted in the last edition.

His 'Owen of Carron' is a pathetic tale, told with simplicity and elegance. The scene is laid in Scotland, in the reign of William the Lyon. The characters are interesting, and the events distressing. Lady Ellen, a Highland beauty, daughter of the Earl of Moray, after being unsuccessfully addressed by many suitors, meets with one who succeeds, but whose success proves fatal to herself. Ellen is casually met by the Earl of Nithisdale, who becomes enamoured of, and connected with her. This intercourse is observed by Earl Barnard, a rejected and jealous suitor, who provides a band of ruffians to assassinate his rival. Ellen, unconscious of her lover's fate, goes to meet him at the accustomed bower, and finds him dead.

What was that form so ghastly pale,
That low beneath the poplar lay?
'Twas some poor youth—Ah, Nithisdale!
She said, and silent sunk away!

She is found by a friendly shepherd, who conveys her to his cottage, where she returns to life, but not to reason. Her situation at this juncture is finely described:

O, hide me in thy humble bower,
Returning late to life, she said,
I'll bind thy crook with many a flower,
With many a rosy wreath thy head, &c.

Ellen, after recovering from her insanity, and residing some years with the shepherd, is espoused to Lord Barnard, the unsuspected murderer of her husband,

The Lord of Lothian's fertile vale, &c.

From this event, it can scarce be supposed that Ellen deserves much happiness. She had confided to the care of the shepherd, a young Nithisdale, the Owen of Carron, who gives name to the poem. Owen, when arrived at years of understanding, adverting to some circumstances which he thinks inconsistent with his supposed birth and present situation, indulges a very natural anxiety.

Why is this crook adorn'd with gold?
Why am I tales of ladies told?
If I am but a shepherd's boy, &c.

The shepherdess, his foster-mother, previous to her death, reveals the secret, and Owen resolves to attempt an interview with his real mother, in the halls of Lothian. His resolution produces a dreadful catastrophe.

'Tis o'er—these locks that wav'd in gold,
That wav'd adown those cheeks so fair,
Wreath'd in the gloomy tyrant's hold,
Hang from the sever'd head in air—

The trembling victim straight he led,
Ere yet her soul's first fear was o'er,
He pointed to the ghastly head—
She saw—and sunk to rise no more.

The story, which reminds us of 'Gil Morrice,' is skilfully told, and distinguished by rich imagery, and flowing versification; but the illicit commerce of Nithisdale and Ellen should not have passed unrepined, as if it were irreproachable.

Of the pieces now first collected into his works, the Hymn to the Rising Sun, Farewel Hymn to the Valley of Irwan, the Happy Villager, to Almena, Hymeneal Song, Hymn to the Eternal Mind, Epitaphium Damonis, Epistles to Colman and Mr. Lamb, and the verses Written in a Cottage-Garden at a village in Lorrain, are distinguished by tenderness of sentiment, luxury of description, force of pathos, and harmony of numbers. The last, in pathetic simplicity, and unaffected tenderness, is not to be surpassed by any thing of the kind in the English language. In the pieces taken from Solymán and Almena, the river Eden may be substituted for Irwan, without any local impropriety. His Sonnets and smaller pieces, have their brighter passages, but require no distinct enumeration, or particular criticism.

ANALYSIS OF THE ORATORICAL WORKS OF CICERO.

SECTION 4.

Of the other Harangues of Cicero.

The peroration of this discourse is generally considered as the most beautiful that Cicero ever made. The most common object of this last part of an oration is, we know, to excite the compassion of the judges in favour of the accused, and this method is followed by the moderns as well as by the ancients. If we had an exact idea of justice, and of the ministry of those who render it, we should not see the orators of all times, and of all nations, throw themselves with their clients at the feet of the judges, and employ, to move them, all the arts of supplication. Is it not, in fact, a species of outrage to judges, to beseech them to be just? Is it permitted to demand of compassion, what ought not to be expected but from equity? To speak by his tears, as if he distrusted his reasons; to forget that the minister of the law, whose first duty it is to be without passions like the law, ought not to avenge the innocent, because he pities him, but because he judges him? This might be said by a rigorous philosopher; but eloquence has too well understood her interests, to found them on a perfection almost absolutely ideal. The orator has thought, that if philosophy, in her speculations, may, without hazard, see nothing in the judges but the living law, it was much safer for him and his cause to see nothing in them but men. He has remembered, that it is in our nature, to delight in granting as a grace, that which may be demanded as a justice; that we yield to conviction as to force, but that we give way to tenderness as to our own pleasure; that a little sensibility is more easy and more common than a great deal of equity and information; that we dispute with our hearts much less than against our reason, and that when both can decide the lot of the accused, the defender cannot do better than make sure of both.

This Cicero understood better than any man, but the character and conduct of Milo rendered it very difficult. The advocate must not appear in contradiction with his client, and the proud Milo, intrepid in danger, had done nothing which was customary for the accused to do, to render their judges favourable. He had not put on mourning, made no solicitation, nor manifested any fear. There was in his conduct enough to disconcert the pathetic of a vulgar orator; but ours takes his measures so well, that he turns in favour of his client that security which, by its resemblance to pride, might have excited a prejudice against him.

What remains for me to do but to implore, in favour of the most courageous of men, that pity which he himself does not ask, and which I supplicate against his will? If you have not seen him mingle a tear, with all those which he has forced from your eyes, if you have not remarked any change in his countenance, or his discourse, you ought not for that reason to take a less interest in his lot; perhaps it is a reason for owing him still more. If in the combats of gladiators, when the fate of these men of the lowest class is in suspense, we cannot restrain ourselves from feeling aversion and contempt for those who shew themselves timid and suppliant, and who beg of us their lives; if, on the contrary, we interest ourselves for the safety of those who demonstrate a great courage, and offer themselves boldly to death; if, in such cases, we believe that our compassion is due to those, who implore it not, how much more is this disposition just and well-placed, when it is applied to our best citizens? For myself, I acknowledge I am pierced with grief, when I hear what Milo repeats to me every day, when I hear the adieus which he addresses to his fellow-citizens. May they be happy, says he to me; may they live in peace and security; may the republic flourish. It will always be dear to me, whatever treatment I may receive from it. If I cannot enjoy with my country the repose which I have procured for her, let her enjoy it without me, though by me. I will retire, content to find an asylum in the first free and well-governed city, which I shall find on my journey. ~~O! I am not~~ and his rewarded labours! he cries, O! fallacious hopes! O! vain thoughts! I, who in these deplorable times, characterised by the crimes of Clodius, when the senate was in a state of dejection, the republic under oppression, the Roman knights without power, all the good citizens without hopes, I devoted myself to them, I consecrated to them all the power which the tribunate gave me, ought I to have expected to be one day abandoned by those whom I had defended? I, who have restored you to your country, Cicero, (for it is to me that he addresses himself the most frequently) ought I to have believed that it would not be permitted to me to remain in it? Where is now that senate, whose cause we have taken in hand? Where are those Roman knights, who ought always to be devoted to you? Where are those succours, which were promised us by the municipal cities, those recommendations of all Italy? In fine, where is thy voice, O Cicero, which has saved so many citizens? Thy voice, then, can do nothing for my safety, after I have risked every thing for yours? That, which I cannot repeat here without groans, he says with the same countenance you now behold. He believes his fellow-citizens incapable of ingratitude; he thinks them only weak and timid. He repents not of having lavished his patrimony to attach to him that part of the people which Clodius armed against you. He reckons among the services he has rendered you, his liberalities, the power of which, in addition to his virtues, has procured your security. He cherishes the memory of those marks of interest and benevolence which the senate has given him at this very time, and he carries with him the recollection of your earnestness, of your zeal, and of your regrets. He adds, and with truth, that great souls look, in all their actions, only at the pleasure of doing good, without thinking of the rewards that attend it; that he has done nothing in his life but for honour; that, if nothing is so beautiful, so desirable, as the service of our country, and to deliver it from danger, those are happy, no doubt, whom she has rewarded with public honours; but that we ought not to commiserate those to whom their fellow-citizens remain indebted; that if we estimate the recompenses of virtue, glory is the first of all; it is this which consoles us under the shortness of life, by the idea of futurity, which reproduces, after we are departed, revives us when we are no more, and serves to men as a scaffolding to ascend to heaven. In all times, says he, the Roman people, and all nations, will speak of Milo; his name will never be forgotten; even at this day, when all the energies of my enemies are exerted and united to irritate envy against me, the public voice everywhere pays me respect; wherever men assemble together they give me their thanks. I speak not of the festivals which Etruria has celebrated and established in honour of me; it is now more than three months since Clodius perished, and the report of his death, in running through all the provinces of the empire, has diffused congratulations and joy. And of what importance is it where I may be hereafter, since my name and my glory are everywhere?

This is the language, Milo, which you hold frequently to me in the absence of those who now hear me; and this is the answer I now give you in their presence. I cannot refuse you my applause for your great spirit; but the more I admire it, the more the loss of you becomes bitter and afflicting to me. If you are taken from me, if they tear you from my arms, I shall not have even the consolation of hating those who shall have given me so sensible a shock. They are not my enemies who will deprive me of you; they are those whom I have the most cherished, those, indeed, who have done me the most service. No, Romans, whatever chagrin you may cause me, and you cannot give any more cruel, you will never force me to forget what you have done for me; but if you have forgotten it yourselves, if any thing in me has given you offence, why do you not punish me rather than Milo? Whatever may happen to myself, I shall esteem myself happy if I am not a witness of his disgrace.

The only consolation, which can remain for me, Milo, is that at least I shall have fulfilled towards you all the duties of friendship, of zeal, and of gratitude. For you I have set at defiance the enmity of powerful men; I have exposed my life to all the shafts of your enemies; for you I have even been able to prevail upon myself to supplicate them; I have regarded your danger as mine, and my good, and that of my children, as your own. In fine, if there is any violence which threatens your head, I fear not to invoke it on my own. What remains for me? What can I say? What can I do, unless it be to combine my fortune, henceforward, with yours, whatever it may be, and follow you wherever you go? I consent to this, Romans; I wish you to be persuaded, that the safety of Milo will fill up the measure of all that I owe you, or that all the benefits I have received from you will be annihilated in his disgrace. But for him all this grief, with which I am penetrated, these tears, which his situation forces from me, shake not his incredible firmness. He cannot resolve to consider as an exile, any place in which virtue can inhabit; death itself appears to him but the period of humanity, and not a punishment. Let him remain then in these sentiments, which are natural to him; but we, Romans, what ought to be ours? Will you preserve nothing of Milo but the memory of him, and banish him while you regret him? Is there in the world an asylum for this great man more worthy of him than the country which produced him? I appeal to you all, O you brave Romans, who have shed your blood for your country; centurions, soldiers, it is to you that I address myself in the dangers of this courageous citizen. Is it before you, who assist at this trial, with your arms in your hands, is it before your eyes that virtue shall be banished, driven away, and rejected, far from us? Unfortunate as I am! it was by the aid of these same Romans, O Milo! that you have been able to recal me to Rome, and they are not able to assist me in retaining you. What shall I answer to my children, who consider you as a second father, to my brother, now absent, but who participated formerly in all the evils from which you delivered me? I shall say to them, then, that I have been able to do nothing for your defence before those who so well seconded you for mine. And in what cause? In this which excites an universal interest. Before what judges? Before those to whom the death of Clodius has been most useful. With what defender? With Cicero. What great crime have I then committed, in what in-expiable guilt have I involved myself, when I sought out, discovered, and crushed that fatal conspiracy, which threatened us all, and which has become for me and mine a source of evils and misfortunes? Why have you recalled me to my country? Is it to drive away, before my eyes, those who have re-established me? Do you wish then that my return should be more painful than my exile, or rather, how can I believe myself, in fact, re-established, if I lose those to whom I owe my safety? I wish to the gods, that Clodius, (pardon me, O my country! pardon me, I fear that this wish, that the interest of Milo has extorted from me, may be a crime against you), I wish to the gods that Clodius still lived, that he was praetor, consul, dictator, rather than behold the fearful spectacle with which we are menaced! O immortal gods! O Romans, preserve a citizen like Milo. No, says he to me, let Clodius remain among the dead, where he deserved to be, and let me submit to the destiny which I have not merited. It is thus that he speaks; and this man born for his country, shall he die elsewhere? His memory will be engraven on your hearts, and shall he not have a monument in Italy?

And can any of you pronounce the exile of a man whom all nations would wish to invite into their bosoms! O, too happy the city that shall receive him! O ungrateful Rome if she banish him! Unhappy if she lose him! My tears will not permit me to say more, and Milo will not be defended with tears. All that I ask of you is to dare in giving your suffrage, to believe only your own sentiments. Believe me, he who has chosen for judges men the most just and the most constant, the honestest men of the republic, has pledged himself beforehand, more particularly than any man, to approve whatever justice your country and your virtue shall dictate to you.

The oftener I read this admirable harangue, the more I am convinced, like Milo, that if in fact Cicero had appeared in this cause as firm as he usually had done, he would have carried it against all the timid or interested considerations, which might act against the accused. This peroration is an effort of art, a singular example in which the orator not being able to excite pity for him who disdained it, conceives the thought of imploring it for himself, takes upon himself the character of a suppliant, for the purpose of exciting an interest for the accused, and employs for Milo all the resources which he refuses, leaving him all the honour of his firmness.

CRITICISM.

[From the Edinburgh Review.]

Lettres sur l'Angleterre. Par J. Fievée.

Of all the species of travels, that which has moral observation for its object is the most liable to error, and has the greatest difficulties to overcome; before it can arrive at excellence. Stones, and roots, and leaves, are subjects which may exercise the understanding, without rousing the passions. A mineralogical traveller will hardly fall foul upon the granite and the felt spar of other countries than his own; a botanist will not conceal its non-descript; and an agricultural tourist will faithfully detail the average crop per acre: but the traveller, who observes on the manners, habits, and institutions of other countries, must have emancipated his mind from the extensive and powerful dominion of association, must have extinguished the agreeable and deceitful feelings of national vanity, and cultivated that patient humility, which builds general inferences only upon the repetition of individual facts. Every thing he sees shocks some passion, or flatters it; and he is perpetually seduced to distort facts, so as to render them agreeable to his system and his feelings. Books of travels are now published in such vast abundance, that it may not be useless, perhaps, to state a few of the reasons why their value so commonly happens to be in the inverse ratio of their number.

1st. Travels are bad, from a want of opportunity for observation in those who write them. If the sides of a building are to be measured, and the number of its windows to be counted, a very short space of time may suffice for these operations; but to gain such a knowledge of their prevalent opinions and propensities, as will enable a stranger to comprehend (what is commonly called) the genius of people, requires a long residence among them, a familiar acquaintance with their language, and an easy circulation among their various societies. The society into which a transient stranger gains the most easy access, in any country, is not often that which ought to stamp the national character; and no criterion can be more fallible, in a people, so reserved and inaccessible as the British, who, even when they open their doors to letters of introduction, cannot for years overcome the awkward timidity of their nature. The same expressions are of so different a value in different countries, the same actions proceed from such different causes, and produce such different effects, that a judgment of foreign nations, founded on rapid observation, is almost certainly a mere tissue of ludicrous and disgraceful mistakes; and yet a residence of a month or two seems to entitle a traveller to present the world with a picture of manners in London, Paris, or Vienna, and even to dogmatize upon their political, religious, and legal institutions, as if it were one and the same thing to speak of abstract effects of such institutions, and of their effects combined with all the peculiar circumstances in which any nation may be placed.

2dly. An affectation of quickness in observation, an intuitive glance that requires only a moment, and a part to judge of a perpetuity and a whole. The late Mr. Petion, who was sent over into this country, to acquire a knowledge of our criminal law, is said to have declared himself thoroughly informed upon the subject, after remaining precisely two-and-thirty minutes in the Old Bailey.

3dly. The tendency to found observation on a system, rather than a system upon observation. The fact is, there are very few original eyes and ears. The great mass see and hear as they are directed by others, and bring back from a residence in foreign countries, nothing but the vague and customary notions concerning it, which are carried and brought back for half a century, without verification or change. The most ordinary shape in which this tendency to prejudge makes its appearance among travellers, is by a disposition to exalt, or, a still more absurd disposition, to depreciate their native country. They are incapable of considering a foreign people, but under one single point of view, the relation in which they stand to their own; and the whole narrative is frequently nothing more than a mere triumph of national vanity, or the ostentation of superiority to so common a failing.

But we are wasting our time in giving a theory of the faults of travellers, when we have such ample means of exemplifying them all, from the publication now before us, in which Mr. Jacob Fievée, with the most surprising talents for doing wrong, has contrived to condense and agglomerate every species of absurdity, that has hitherto been made known, and even to launch out occasionally into new regions of nonsense, with a boldness which fairly entitles him to the merit of originality in folly, and discovery in impertinence. We consider Mr. Fievée's book as extremely valuable in one point of view. It affords a sort of limit or mind-mark, beyond which we conceive it to be impossible in future that pertness and petulance should pass. It is well to be acquainted with the boundaries of our nature on both sides; and to Mr. Fievée we are indebted for this valuable approach to perissimum. The height of knowledge no man has yet scanned; but we have now pretty well fathomed the gulf of ignorance.

We must however do justice to Mr. Fievée, when he deserves it. He evinces, in his preface, a lurking uneasiness at the apprehension of exciting war between the two countries, from the anger to which his letters will give birth in England. He pretends to deny that they will occasion a war; but it is very easy to see he is not convinced by his own arguments; and we confess ourselves extremely pleased by this amiable solicitude at the probable effusion of human blood. We hope Mr. Fievée is deceived by his philanthropy, and that no such unhappy consequences will ensue, as he really believes, though he affects to deny them. We dare to say the dignity of this country will be satisfied, if the publication in question is disowned by the French government, or, at most, if the author is given up. At all events, we have no scruple to say, that to sacrifice twenty thousand lives, and a hundred millions of money, to resent Mr. Fievée's book, would be an unjustifiable waste of blood and treasure; and that to take him off privately by assassination would be an undertaking hardly compatible with the dignity of a great empire.

To shew, however, the magnitude of the provocation, we shall specify a few of the charges which he makes against the English—That they do not understand fire-works as well as the French; that they charge a shilling for admission to the exhibition; that they have the misfortune of being incommoded by a certain disgraceful privilege, called the liberty of the press; that the opera band plays out of tune; that the English are so fond of drinking, that they get drunk with a certain air, called the gas of Paradise; that the privilege of electing members of parliament is so burdensome, that cities sometimes petition to be exempted from it; that the great obstacle to a parliamentary reform is the mob; that women sometimes have titles distinct from those of their husbands; although, in England, any body can sell his wife at market with a rope about her neck. To these complaints he adds—that the English are so far from enjoying that equality of which their partisans boast, that none but the servants of the higher nobility can carry canes behind a carriage; that the power which the French kings had of pardoning before trial, is much the same thing as the English mode of pardoning after trial; that he should conceive it to be a good reason for rejecting any measure in France, that it was imitated from the English, who have no family affections, and who love money so much, that their first question, in an inquiry concerning the character of any man, is, as to his degree of fortune. Lastly, Mr. Fievée alleges against the English, that they have great pleasure in contemplating the spectacle of men deprived of their reason. And indeed we must have the candour to allow, that the hospitality which Mr. Fievée experienced seems to afford some pretext for this assertion.

One of the principal objects of Mr. Fievée's book, is to combat the Anglomania, which has raged so long among his countrymen, and which prevailed at Paris to such an excess, that even Mr. Neckar, a foreigner, (incredible as it may seem), after having been twice minister of France, retained a considerable share of admiration for the English government. This is quite inexplicable. But this is nothing to the treason of the Encyclopedists, who, instead of attributing the merit of the experimental philosophy, and the reasoning by induction, to a Frenchman, have shewn themselves so lost to all sense of the duty which they owed to their country, that they have attributed it to an Englishman,* by the name of Bacon, and this for no better reason, than that he really was the author of it. The whole of this passage is written so entirely in the genius of Mr. Fievée, and so completely exemplifies that very caricature species of Frenchmen, from which our gross and popular notions of the whole people are taken, that we shall give the passage at full length, cautiously abstaining from the sin of translating it.

‘Quand je reproche aux philosophes d'avoir vanté l'Angleterre, par haine pour les institutions qui soutenoient la France, je ne hasarde rien, et je fournirai une nouvelle preuve de cette assertion, en citant les encyclopédistes, chefs à voués de la philosophie moderne.

‘Comment nous ont-ils présenté l'Encyclopédie? Comme un monument immortel, comme le dépôt précieux de toutes les connoissances humaines. Sous quel patronage l'ont-ils élevé ce monument immortel? Est-ce sous l'égide des écrivains dont la France s'honorait? Non, ils ont choisi pour maître et pour idole, un Anglais, Bacon; ils lui ont fait dire tout ce qu'ils ont voulu, parce que cet auteur, extraordinairement volumineux, n'étoit pas connu en France, et ne l'est guère en Angleterre que de quelques hommes studieux; mais les philosophes sentoient que leur succès, pour introduire des nouveautés, tenoit à faire croire qu'elles n'étoient pas neuves pour les grands esprits; et comme les grands esprits Français, trop connus, ne se prêtoient pas à un pareil dessein, les philosophes ont eu recours à l'Angleterre. Ainsi, un ouvrage fait en France et offert à l'admiration de l'Europe comme l'ouvrage par excellence, fut mis par des Français sous la protection du génie Anglais. O honte! Et les philosophes sont dit patriotes et la France pour prix de sa dégradation, leur a élevé des statues? Le siècle qui commence, plus juste, parce qu'il a le sentiment de la véritable grandeur, laissera ces statues et l'Encyclopédie s'ensevelir sous la même poussière.’

When to this are added the commendations that have been bestowed on Newton, the magnitude and the originality of the discoveries which have been attributed to him, the admiration which the works of Locke have excited, and the homage that has been paid to Milton and Shakspeare, the treason which lurks at the bottom of it all, will be escape the penetrating glance of Mr. Fievée; and he will discern that same cause from which every good Frenchman knows the defeat of Aboukir and of the first of June to have proceeded—the monster Pitt, and his English guineas.

MISCELLANY.

ON RHETORICAL ACTION.

[From a British paper.]

The ancient rhetoricians understood by ACTION, which they so strongly insisted on, not gesture only, but the whole business of pleading a cause; that is, elocution and gesture united, as they appeared in the Court, the Senate, or the Forum, in the actual delivery of an oration.

Action in this comprehensive sense deserved the high esteem of Demosthenes, who, according to a well-known story of Cicero and Quintilian, being asked what was the first, second, and third requisite of oratory, replied action, action, action. And here action is synonymous with what we call delivery.

But many among the modern speakers seem to think that action is nearly synonymous with activity, and means in its rhetorical use, the contortions of the arms, hands, legs, eyes, and various features of the face. They imagine that Demosthenes understood by action, gesture only.

An idea thus erroneous, but supported by misunderstanding the prince of orators, has led many into a mode of delivery truly ridiculous. They were determined to display a sufficient quantity of this prime requisite, and have in consequence exhibited the action, or rather agility, of a harlequin, when they intended to represent, in their own persons, Cicero and Demosthenes revived. They have made even the pulpit resemble the stage of the mountebank, where a jack-pudding entertains with his action, the gaping multitude.

It is recorded of a divine, who did not confine his action to the pulpit, that he adorned the following passage in the Psalms with peculiar vacuity of gesture.

The singers go before, the minstrels follow after, in the midst are the damsels playing with the timbrels.

At the words singers go before he reached out both his arms at full length before him, the minstrels following after he represented with his finger pointing over his left shoulder, and when he came to—in the midst are the damsels playing with the timbrels, he illustrated the passage by playing on the Prayer Book with the fingers of both his hands, just as if he had been touching the keys of a harpsichord.

Gesture in oratory is intended to express the passions and emotions of the mind according to the impulse of nature, and not to display the speaker's abilities in the art of mimicry and pantomime. The imitation of the idea in the mind, by the attitude of the body, should not be very close; because such an intimation is desertion of the orator's part for the actor's, and turns the attention of the hearer from the subject matter to the agility and mimetic talents of a stage performer. If the imitation is really good, the spectator is struck and pleased with it, but at the same time loses the proper effect of the speech; if, on the other hand, it is awkward, he laughs, and despises the wretched attempt at unattained excellence.

Gesture is therefore to be ventured on with great caution, and conducted with nice judgment. It may destroy the effect of a fine composition, and render an orator, who may be in other qualifications respectable, an object of contempt and derision.

This consideration has induced me to express my surprise at the displeasure, which many have shewn on seeing boys at school, and young men at the university, go through their exercises of declaiming, without moving their hands and arms. I have heard the hearers observe on such occasions, that the young man recited with great judgment and propriety; what a pity it was, that he stood motionless as a statue.

This criticism arose from their habit of attending the theatres; where imitation being the professed business of the speakers, mimetic gesture is studied with laudable attention, and without danger of defeating the purpose of the player by too near a resemblance. It is his business to take off, as it is well expressed, the external form and manner of those whom he represents, as accurately, as the wax takes off the sculptured figure of the seal, or the paper takes off the engraving on the copper plate.

What Horace said of poetry may be said of gesture in oratory. Mediocrity in it is worse than the total want of it. If it is not excellent in its kind, it is better to omit it entirely. If it is stiff, formal, awkward, or excessive, it will lessen the effect of the finest oration, by mixing, with the approbation of the hearer, a sentiment of ridicule.

ACCOUNT OF THE ALPHABET CLUB.

[From the Gentleman's Magazine]

MR. URBAN,

The following letter was found among the papers of a gentleman, who contributed more than one paper to the Connoisseur. It was destined to be sent to Mr. Town, but was mislaid and forgotten. As Mr. Town is dead, I know no person, Mr. Urban, who has a better right to open his letters than yourself.

MR. TOWN.

"Nihil dulcius est otio literato." Cic.

The humour of forming clubs, which was so common in the beginning of this century,* is still in existence in this place. Indeed we are in many respects the same race of men that Mr. Bickerstaff remembers. The sect of Loungersdai-increases, and St. John's has not lost its reputation for punning. But to return to my subject. It was a gentleman of this last mentioned society, who made the first proposal for that singular club of which I am going to give you an account, and of which I am myself an unworthy member. We call ourselves the Alphabet club; as we consist of twenty-six members, each of us by the initial of his name representing one letter of the alphabet. There was at first a dispute whether we should consist of more than twenty-five, as some persons contend that V and U were the same letter: however, it was asserted on the other hand that they differed both in sound and form; and upon Q's reminding the company, that he could be of no use without U, but that he had nothing at all to do with V, it was agreed that each of these letters should have a representative. Each letter takes rank, not according to its place in the alphabet but according to its rarity; for this reason our president is always one whose name begins with a Z. The next to him in dignity is Q; after whom the rest follow in order, beginning at the end of the alphabet; for we have observed that the first Letters A, B, C, &c. are the most ordinary. We likewise endeavour to choose our members from some fancied resemblance, either in shape or mien, to the letters they represent. Our present worthy president is an excellent little Z, and is a fellow of one of the largest colleges here. The part of the corpulent B is well supported by Dr. Buster, a gentleman who measures about four yards in circumference.

* The Connoisseur was published in the years, 1754, 1755, and 1756.

But he who bears the most striking resemblance to his initial is Professor Ignoramus, who is as good and upright as any I in any horn-book who ever was. There are at present several vacancies to be filled. If you can mention to us a person who turns out his toes well, and whose name begins with P, we will prefer him to the place of that gentleman. We shall thank any body who will point out a gentleman that makes a good bow, and whose name begins with an S. We have already refused a P, who does not wear his hat with a good air; and have done the same by a V, because he has not the faculty of standing upon one leg. As we are determined that our society shall be truly English, we peremptorily rejected the proposal of a certain great scholar to admit the Digamma into our club. When we meet in an evening, which we do once in twenty-six days, we amuse ourselves in a very sprightly manner without uttering a single word; our whole conversation being carried on by the bodies of the members. We connect ourselves together by our hands, and so form words and sentences. Thus we are continually in motion, and talk in dumb show. Were you to enter when we are carrying on a brisk conversation, you would think we were playing at blindman's buff: at other times you would take us for a knot of Peripatetics. We think all this very innocent, and conducive to the sharpening of our wits, and keeping our bodies in health.

I am, &c.

RALPH CROTCHET.

P. S. There are several clubs, set up in imitation of ours; such as the Black letter, the Italic the Grecian, &c. But I believe they are not in a thriving condition. In the first there have been great contentions between the vowels and consonants, in which the diphthongs have sided with the former. The Italic has for some time been in a slender tottering condition, and we expect that it will soon fall. There is a gentleman here whose letter is filled up, and who wants us to admit him as an honorary member under the title of Et cetera. We wish to know your advice on this point.

THE CARAVANSERY.

It has been often remarked, that many, who have enjoyed the reputation of good scholars, at the University, have made but an indifferent figure in life, and have been frequently eclipsed, in the various professions, by those, whose academical reputation was greatly inferior to their own. This difference of intellectual vigor, at various periods, may arise from a variety of causes, but proceeds generally from the following:

Young men of lively imaginations, and superior genius, unless well disciplined in the earlier part of life, are inclined to be inattentive to any regular plan of study, and to consider the stated period of recitation, as a drudgery, to which they submit with reluctance. Hence they often appear to their instructors and fellow students, inferior to boys of much slower capacity, who compensate, by industry, for the deficiencies of nature. But when they are placed on the great theatre of life, genius displays its superiority, and when stimulated by laudable ambition soon outstrips its competitor.

The honours of the University, however, must always be confined to those, who perform, in the most exemplary manner, the duties exacted; the gross violation of existing laws, no less than the contemptuous neglect of any branch of literature or science, deservedly excludes the offender from academical rewards, however brilliant may be his parts, and however extensive his knowledge.

A young man, who merely performs what is required of him, and is ambitious only of appear-respectable in the hour of recitation, will not lose all the advantages, which an academical education may afford. The passive instructions of the best teacher will not suffice, without the activating activity of his own mind.

Let the student, then, who is desirous of solid improvement, after the strictest compliance with the college laws, and implicit obedience to the minutest regulations, devote his leisure hours to reading and composition. Let him examine the bent of his mind, and form it to excel in those pursuits, to which his genius leads. If his genius be scientific, he will, of course, employ the moments of retirement, in improving himself in the mathematics, and in those sciences, which depend on them. Should he be designed for active or professional life, he will turn his attention to the more useful study of classical literature. The perusal of the best Poets, Historians, and Moralists, will store his mind with useful knowledge, correct sentiments, and elegant language. The pen, says Quintilian, is the best master, and if he employs it with taste and judgment, he will transfuse into his compositions, the spirit and elegance of standard authors. He will form a style, which will be glowing, yet not glaring—easy, though not vulgar, and vigorous without pedantry and stiffness. He will always have at command, sentiment and language, and consequently will never be at a loss to express himself with propriety and effect, either as a companion, a writer, or a public speaker.

The poets, most worthy of his perusal, are Shakspeare, Milton, Dryden, Pope, and Thomson, with those works he should be thoroughly conversant, before he peruses either the more ancient or more modern bards. By these means his taste will be so far formed, that he will be able, at the first glance, to distinguish between the true and the false sublime, between a just thought, and a trifling conceit.

Johnson, Addison, Swift, Cumberland, with all the periodical writers, and the best historians, hold the first rank in English literature, and will enable him to form the best judgment of men and books.

But he will not confine himself to authors in his own language, but go back to the fountain head of elegant knowledge, and study the ancients in their native languages, till he can read them with facility, and relish their beauties. All this can be performed with ease, by a young man of parts and diligence, whilst residing at the University, and will rather aid than impede the stated business of recitation. This is the mode of education, which has been attended with the most success, and has the sanction of ages in its defence. The Romans formed themselves on the model of the Greeks, and Cicero never ceased to write and declaim in that language till he arrived at the praetorship. The most distinguished moderns, whether authors or professional men, have been intimately acquainted with the best writers in both languages, and perhaps no instance can be produced, where any man has made a great figure in the world, who was unacquainted with them, except some military chieftain or naval commander, who must still be indebted to literature, for the defence of his conduct, or the celebration of his victories.

The University of Cambridge is unquestionably the best on the continent, and has been considerably improved of late years. But still, in the best seminary, little more than the rudiments of literature and science can be taught by the ablest instructors, without the co-operation of the students themselves. That further improvements may be made in this University, and some abuses corrected, we are well convinced; and we shall, therefore, occasionally take the liberty of animadverting on this subject. Interested persons, may possibly feel hurt at some of our observations, and describe us as enemies to the establishment. But we shall appeal to a liberal and enlightend public to decide on the justness of our remarks, observing that were we inimical to its interests, we should not take the trouble of expending on it a single speculation. We are sincere and ardent friends of the University, fully persuaded that it is the great palladium of literature and science of correct morals and rational religion, which are so intimately connected with them. But we shall not be silent on any abuses that may exist, which are capable of correction, but point them out with decency and candour. Our friendship shall be employed in correcting the errors of the object which we regard, unlike those of the democrats, who, with all their cant of attachment to the interest of the people, still flatter their vices, and abuse their confidence.

[From Goldsmith.]

SOME PARTICULARS RELATIVE TO CHARLES XII, NOT COMMONLY KNOWN.

SIR, Stockholm.

I cannot resist your solicitations, though it is possible I shall be unable to satisfy your curiosity. The polite of every country seem to have but one character. A gentleman of Sweden differs but little, except in trifles, from one of any other country. It is among the vulgar we are to find those distinctions which characterise a people, and from them it is that I take my picture of the Swedes.

Though the Swedes in general appear to languish under oppression, which often renders others wicked, or of malignant dispositions, it has not, however, the same influence upon them, as they are faithful, civil, and incapable of atrocious crimes. Would you believe, that in Sweden, highway robberies are not so much as heard of? For my part, I have not in the whole country seen a gibbet or a gallows. They pay an infinite respect to their ecclesiastics, whom they suppose to be the privy counsellors of Providence, who, on their part, turn this credulity to their own advantage, and manage their parishioners as they please. In general, however, they seldom abuse their sovereign authority. Harkened to as oracles, regarded as the dispensers of eternal rewards and punishments, they readily influence their hearers into justice, and make them practical philosophers, without the pains of study.

As to their persons, they are perfectly well made, and the men, particularly, have a very engaging air. The greatest part of the boys which I saw in the country had very white hair. They were as beautiful as Cupids, and there was something open and entirely happy in their little chubby faces. The girls, on the contrary, have neither such fair, nor such even complexions, and their features are much less delicate, which is a circumstance different from that of almost every other country. Besides this, it is observed that the women are generally afflicted with the itch, for which Scania is particularly remarkable. I had an instance of this in one of the inns on the road. The hostess was one of the most beautiful women I have ever seen; she had so fine a complexion, that I could not avoid admiring it. But what was my surprise, when she opened her bosom in order to suckle her child, to perceive that seat of delight all covered with this disagreeable distemper. The careless manner in which she exposed to our eyes so disgusting an object sufficiently testifies that they regard it as no very extraordinary malady, and seem to take no pains to conceal it. Such are the remarks, which probably you may think trifling enough, I have made in my journey to Stockholm, which, to take it altogether, is a large, beautiful, and even a populous city.

The arsenal appears to me one of its greatest curiosities; it is a handsome spacious building, but, however, scantily supplied with the implements of war. To recompense this defect, they have almost filled it with trophies, and other marks of their former military glory. I saw there several chambers filled with Danish, Saxon, Polish, and Russian standards. There was at least enough to suffice half a dozen armies; but new standards are more easily made than new armies can be enlisted. I saw besides, some very rich furniture, and some of the crown jewels of great value; but what principally engaged my attention, and touched me with passing melancholy, were the bloody, yet precious spoils of the two greatest heroes the north ever produced. What I mean are the clothes in which the great Gustavus Adolphus and the intrepid Charles XII. died, by a fate not unusual to kings. The first, if I remember, is a sort of a buff waistcoat, made antique fashion, very plain, and without the least ornaments; the second, which was even more remarkable, consisted only of a coarse blue cloth coat, a large hat of less value, a shirt of coarse linen, large boots, and buff gloves, made to cover a great part of the arm. His saddle, his pistols, and his sword, have nothing in them remarkable; the meanest soldier was in this respect no way inferior to his gallant monarch. I shall use this opportunity to give you some particulars of the life of a man already so well known, which I had from persons who knew him when a child, and who now, by a fate not unusual to courtiers, spend a life of poverty and retirement, and talk over in raptures all the actions of their old victorious king, companion, and master.

Courage and inflexible constancy formed the basis of this monarch's character. In his tenderest years, he gave instances of both. When he was yet scarcely seven years old, being at dinner with the queen his mother, intending to give a bit of bread to a great dog he was fond of, this hungry animal snapt too greedily at the morsel, and bit his hand in a terrible manner. The wound bled copiously, but our young hero, without offering to cry, or taking the least notice of his misfortune, endeavoured to conceal what had happened, lest his dog should be brought into trouble, and wrapped his bloody hand in the napkin. The queen, perceiving that he did not eat, asked him the reason. He contented himself with replying, that he thanked her, he was not hungry. They thought he was taken ill, and so repeated their solicitations. But all was in vain, though the poor child was already grown pale with the loss of blood. An officer, who attended at table, at last perceived it; for Charles would sooner have died, than betrayed his dog, who he knew intended no injury.

At another time when in the small-pox, and his case appeared dangerous, he grew one day very uneasy in his bed, and a gentleman who watched him, desirous of covering him up close, received from the patient a violent box on his ear. Some hours after, observing the prince more calm, he intreated to know how he had incurred his displeasure, or what he had done to have merited a blow. A blow, replied Charles, I don't remember any thing of it; I remember, indeed, that I thought myself in the battle of Arbela, fighting for Darius, where I gave Alexander a blow, which brought him to the ground.

What great effects might not these two qualities of courage and constancy have produced, had they at first received a just direction! Charles, with proper instructions, thus naturally disposed, would have been the delight and the glory of his age. Happy those princes, who are educated by men who are at once virtuous and wise, and have been for some time in the school of affliction, who weigh happiness against glory, and teach their royal pupils the real value of fame; who are ever shewing the superior dignity of man to that of royalty; that a peasant who does his duty, is a nobler character than a king even of middling reputation. Happy, I say, were princes, could such men be found to instruct them; but those to whom such an education is generally intrusted, are men who themselves have acted in a sphere too high to know mankind. Puffed up themselves with the ideas of false grandeur, and measuring merit by adventitious circumstances of greatness, they generally communicate those fatal prejudices to their pupils, confirm their pride by adulation, or increase their ignorance by teaching them to despise that wisdom which is found among the poor.

But not to moralize when I only intend a story; what is related of the journeys of this prince, is no less astonishing. He has sometimes been on horseback for four-and-twenty hours successively, and thus traversed the greatest part of his kingdom. At last none of his officers were found capable of following him; he thus consequently rode the greatest part of his journeys quite alone, without taking a moment's repose, and without any other subsistence but a bit of bread. In one of these rapid courses, he underwent an adventure, singular enough. Riding thus post one day, all alone, he had the misfortune to have his horse fall dead under him. This might have embarrassed an ordinary man, but it gave Charles no sort of uneasiness. Sure of finding another horse, but not equally so of meeting with a good saddle and pistols, he ungirds his horse, claps the whole equipage on his own back, and thus accoutred, marches on to the next inn, which by good fortune was not far off. Entering the stable, he there found a horse entirely to his mind; so, without further ceremony, he clapped on his saddle and housing with great composure, and was just going to mount, when the gentleman, who owned the horse, was apprized of a stranger's going to steal his property out of the stable. Upon asking the king, ~~who he had never seen, and~~ how he presumed to meddle with his horse, Charles coolly replied, squeezing in his lips, which was his usual custom, that he took the horse because he wanted one; for you see, continued he, if I have none, I shall be obliged to carry the saddle myself. This answer did not seem at all satisfactory to the gentleman, who instantly drew his sword. In this the king was not much behind hand with him, and to it they were going, when the guards by this time came up, and testified that surprise which was natural to see arms in the hand of a subject against his king. Imagine whether the gentleman was less surprised than they at his unpremeditated disobedience. His astonishment, however, was soon dissipated by the king, who taking him by the hand, assured him he was a brave fellow, and himself would take care he should be provided for. This promise was afterwards fulfilled; and I have been assured the king made him a captain.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

OLD BAILEY.

Michael Foley was indicted for stealing 600l. in bank notes, the property of Mrs. LARKIN. The case as opened by Mr. GURNEY for the prosecution was as follows:—That the prosecutrix, Mrs. LARKIN, who lived in Sloan-street, Chelsea, became acquainted with the prisoner who lived in the same street, and he so far ingratiated himself in her favour that he prevailed upon her to lend him 325 guineas, as he said to pay for recruits, he having represented himself as an officer in the army; she accordingly sold out stock from the Bank, and on the first day of June last the prisoner came to her house in Sloane-street to receive the money she intended to lend him. She had at that time 600l. in notes lying before her; while they were together somebody knocked at the door, and the prisoner was told a friend was waiting for him, upon which he swept all the notes from the table and walked off with them.

Mrs. LARKIN was called to prove this case, which she stated in substance the same as opened. She was a very old Lady, rather gay and youthful in her dress, and the cross-examination went to establish that she had lent the whole money to the prisoner, who was a young athletic Hibernian, it being insinuated that she had a conceived a very warm friendship towards him. She denied this, however, but admitted to the learned judge, that she had brought this criminal prosecution as the shortest way to get her money back; he directly directed the jury to acquit the prisoner. The jury having done so, the prisoner wished to address the Court, but the recorder told him, he had better remain contented with what already passed. He had very properly been acquitted of any criminal charge; but his conduct could not be deemed harmless, for it is very culpable for any man to take advantage either of a very young or a very old woman.

SKETCH OF GEORGE CHALMERS, ESQ.

The author of some valuable political pieces, as well as several other works. His productions are in general characterized by a quaint, patch-work, pedantic style, which it had been much better if he could have avoided, though it seems habitual to him. He published, in 1779, a quarto volume, entitled, 'Political Annals of the United Colonies;' and about three years afterward a quarto pamphlet, entitled, 'The comparative Strength of Britain during the present and four preceding Reigns. In 1786, he published an Estimate of the Comparative Strength of Great Britain, in one volume, octavo: a year or two previous to which he circulated a three-penny pamphlet, entitled, "Opinions on Subjects arising from American Independence." His subsequent publications have been an edition, in one volume, quarto, of Daniel de Foe's History of the Union between England and Scotland, to which Mr. C. prefixed the author's Life: this life was handsomely reprinted in an octavo volume, in 1790, and though sold separately, was designed to be prefixed to Mr. Stockdale's splendid edition of Robinson Crusoe: a Collection of Treaties between Great Britain and other powers, in two volumes octavo, published in 1790: the Life of Ruddiman, keeper for almost fifty years of the library belonging to the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh, with new Anecdotes of Buchanan, in one volume, octavo: a volume in which the author has to a ridiculous extravagance neglected no opportunity of sporting a Johnsonian period: and a tedious, plump octavo, Apology for the Believers in the Shakspeare MSS. Mr. Chalmers is also the writer of two very good papers in the Looker-on, the one on Illicit Hopes, the other on the Equalization of Follies and Diseases, both of which, but especially the latter, abound with much genuine humour.

SKETCH OF THOMAS COGAN, ESQ. M. D.

The supposed author of the History of John Bunce, jun. He has published a Philosophical Survey of the Creation: a Journey from Utrecht to Franckfort, chiefly by the Borders of the Rhine, in two volumes, 8vo. published in 1794, in a series of agreeably-written letters: and Memoirs of the Society at Amsterdam in favour of drowned persons. He is forever to be venerated as one of the first promoters, in conjunction with Dr. Hawes, of that inestimable institution, the Humane Society.

SKETCH OF ADAM FERGUSON, LL. D. F. R. S. E.

Formerly professor of 'Moral Philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, to which station he was called in 1764, and continued in that chair during twenty years. He is a distinguished character in the republic of letters. His first publication was an Essay on the history of Civil Society, which first appeared in 1765, in one volume quarto, and is a performance of very considerable excellence. In 1770, he published a duodecimo volume, entitled, Institutes of Moral Philosophy, which is a syllabus of his lectures: and, in 1783, he produced his History of the Progress and Termination of the Roman Republic, in three volumes, quarto, a work which has been very favourably received and highly esteemed. Dr. Ferguson has here undertaken a most glorious and interesting period of history, and, although his style be not remarkably luminous or elegant, his work will be read by the philosopher and the statesman with equal pleasure and advantage: it constitutes a very valuable addition to the literature of our country, and gives its author a most respectable rank among our greatest historians. In 1792, he published Principles of Moral and Political Science, in two volumes, quarto, which work is chiefly a retrospect of his college lectures.

SKETCH OF R. GRIFFITHS, ESQ.

The proprietor of, and formerly an occasional writer in, the Monthly Review. He is brother-in-law of the late Dr. Rose, of Chiswick, who, with a Mr. Cleveland, was the original institutor of that celebrated Literary Journal, in the year 1749. The very surprising manner in which this publication has maintained its reputation for half a century, does the highest honour to the learning and liberality of its series of conductors.

The Agents and Subscribers for the Port Folio are very respectfully reminded, that the Editor has nearly completed the fourth circle of his annual toil, and is preparing for the fifth.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

The very elegant verses of 'Lodinus,' to the fair invalid, display the most soothing tenderness, and many a poetical beauty. They are entitled to the attention not only of the lady, who is so kindly greeted, but of men of taste and sensibility.

The poetry of E. is always of a moral and generally of a pensive character. But her muse, though often in mourning, is never idly querulous, nor monotonously dull.

The imitation of 'Donec gratus eram,' which we copy, with much pleasure, from the WASHINGTON FEDERALIST, is in a very happy vein of playful humour.

The Editor is harrassed by complaints of the want of variety in some of the papers of the Port Folio. Whenever he is not pressed with the more onerous articles of disquisition, it is a favourite object to diversify his columns as much as possible.

But, after all, what would you have me do,
If out of twenty I can please but two?
When this Heroics only deigns to praise,
Sharp Satire that, and this Pindaric lays;
One likes the pheasant's wing, and one the leg,
The vulgar boil, the learned roast, an egg:
Hard task to please the palate of such guests,
When ADAMS likes what Maevius detests.

The criticism, from the Edinburgh Review, upon the nonsensical book of a foolish French jacobin, who has presumptuously supposed that he is qualified to appreciate the English character, is written with such caustic wit, that we are sure the miserable republican will never again offend.

'The Caravansary,' a periodical paper, written by the wits of Boston, and published in the Repository, frequently furnishes us with entertainment and instruction.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ON SEEING A BEAUTIFUL YOUNG LADY, WHOSE HEALTH WAS IMPAIRED BY THE AGUE AND FEVER.

Dark minister of many woes!
That lov'd the sad vicissitude of pain,
Now shiv'ring mid antarctic snows,
Now a faint pilgrim on Medina's plain*—
Say! can no form, less fair, thy view engage?
Must feeble loveliness exhaust thy rage?
Oh! mark the falt'ring step, the languid eye,
And all the anguish of her burning sigh.
See the faintly-struggling smile;
See Resignation's tear, the while!
So to the axe the martyr bends his form,
So bends the lovely lily to the storm.
Still, though, sweet maid! thy yielding bloom decays,
And faint, the waning tide of rapture strays;
Oh! may'st thou 'scape Grief's more envenom'd smart,
Nor ever know the ague of the heart!
For, rising from the sun-bright plain,
The bended lily blooms again;
But ah! what life-imparting power
Can e'er revive the broken flower?

LODINUS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO E. H. W.

From cypress groves and faded leaves,
The muse her mournful chaplet weaves;
And oft with brooding Fancy sits,
Where the lone night-bird dimly flits,
Waking her soft mellifluous art,
To wound my peace, and rend my heart.
Yet, erst, my friend, her tuneful strain,
Warbled on yonder village-plain,
Deepen'd the glow, that summer yields,
And mark'd the waving harvest-fields:
The rocks, beside the murmuring rill,
The path-way to the cottage sill,
The cragg'd ridge, the shelter'd gate,
Where filial love would lingering wait,
Till she, who cheer'd my youthful way,
And gleam'd through every adverse day,
Brighten'd the rosy-bosom'd Hours,
And dress'd the sylvan world in flow'rs.
Oft have I sought the hallow'd shrine,
Where Laura mix'd her pray'rs with mine,
That she, whose soft maternal voice
Bade every languid pulse rejoice,
That she, whose starry light was given,
To lead our wand'ring steps to heaven,
Would, pitying, bend at Mercy's throne,
For us, unguarded, and alone!
Oh! Thou, who bade the tempest rise,
Where Peace illum'd her azure skies,
And taught Affliction's storm to lour,
Arm'd with the ensigns of thy pow'r,
If e'er Allurement's silken wings
Spread o'er my heart its twisted strings,
Should life assume its wonted form,
Its mellow tints, and colour warm,
Bid every soft enchantment flee,
Which robs my soul of faith in thee!

Didst thou not say, deceiving heart!
That time would bring its healing art,

The heats, that prevail amid the sands of Arabia, are well known to be excessive.

To this lov'd scene would oft return,
Ere Sorrow clasp'd the silent urn?
Trembling, I caught the faithless wile,
And cherish'd every beamy smile,
Close to my aching bosom prest
The lenient balm of promis'd rest,
And lull'd each anxious thought to sleep,
Which rais'd a sigh, or bade me weep;
E'en now, I see thy radiant form
Sparkling amid the recent storm,
And mingling all thy transient dews,
With soft Affection's rainbow hues.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[We are the first to present the following spirited poem to our American readers. It exhibits the graces and the peculiarities of the Oriental style.]

A Song, from the Persian, paraphrased in the measure of the original, by Sir WILLIAM JONES.

Sweet as the rose, that scents the gale,
Bright as the lily of the vale,
Yet, with a heart, like summer hail,
Marring each beauty thou bearest,

Beauty, like thine, all nature thrills,
And when the moon her circle fills,
Pale she beholds those rounder hills,
Which on thy breast thou wearest.

Where should those peerless flowrets blow?
Whence are the thorns, that near them grow?
Wound me, but smile, O lovely foe,
Smile on the heart thou tearest.

Sighing, I view that cypress waist,
Doom'd to afflict me, till embrac'd;
Sighing, I view that eye, too chaste,
Like the new blossom, smiling.

Spreading thy toils, with hands divine,
Softly thou waviest like a pine,
Darting thy shafts at hearts like mine,
Senses and soul beguiling.

See at thy feet no vulgar slave,
Frantic with love's enchanting wave,
Thee, ere he seek the gloomy grave,
Thee, his blest idol styling.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[The following translation of one of the most pathetic and moral odes of Horace, was made by Sir WILLIAM JONES, when a school-boy of fourteen. It is not faultless, but it is a wonderful instance of an early fondness for the classics in one, who always displayed the spirit of an ancient Roman, and lisped his language, even when a child. We fervently hope, that the love of Latinity will still be cherished, in despite of the new Goths and Vandals, who strive to deface the Roman empire, and to substitute the brass of Barbarians for ancient gold.]

How quickly fades the vital flower!
Alas! my friend, each silent hour,
Steals, unperceiv'd, away:
The early joys of blooming youth,
Sweet innocence and dove-eyed truth,
Are destin'd to decay.

Can zeal drear Pluto's wrath restrain?
No; though an hourly victim stain
His hallow'd shrine with blood,
Fate will recal her doom for none;
The sceptred king must leave his throne,
To pass the Stygian flood.

In vain, my Parnell, wrapt in ease,
We shun the merchant-marring seas,
In vain we fly from wars,
In vain we shun th' autumnal blast—
The slow Co. ytus must be past.
How needless are our cares!

Our house, our land, our shadowy grove,
The very mistress of our love,
Ah me, we soon must leave.
Of all our trees, the hated boughs
Of cypress shall alone diffuse
Their fargrance o'er our grave.

To others, then, we shall resign
The numerous casks of sparkling wine,
Which, frugal, now we store;
With them a more deserving heir
(Is this our labour, this our care?)
Shall stain the stucco floor.
